The Matron of the School was interested in a visit on the twenty-second to an Indian man, in middle life, who is, we fear, a victim of consumption. He seemed very glad to see us and talked of the years gone by when he was a boy at the School. He was here when the building burned in 1884 and came back when the present one was ready for occupancy. He spoke so highly of the School, and its influence on his people, and said, "Oh, I long to go there once more, and talk to the children, and tell them to appreciate their opportunities and not to run off, and do wrong things. I have had time to think things over as I lay here, and I think I am not afraid to die. I have been given to drink sometimes but I have never killed anybody, and I cannot remember ever stealing anything; thanks to the training I had up at the School. There is one other thing come up to me. I always liked to talk and the Indians came and liked to hear me spin my yarns and I did not always stick to the truth as I should have done, but I've thought things all over and I think I am not afraid to die. I just lie here on my lounge and think about the Heavenly Home."

If we are to keep our hearts with all diligence, we must be kept by the power of God, and that power is not merely to make diversion outside the beleaguered fortress which may force the besiegers to retreat and give up their efforts, but is to enter in and possess the soul which it wills to defend. It is when the enemy sees that new succors have, in some mysterious way, been introduced, that he gives up his siege. It is God in us that is our security.—Evangelical Visitor.

MARGARITE SORORI.

(Wm. Ernest Henley, an English writer, critic, editor, 1849-1903.)

A late lark twitterers from the quiet skies;
And from the west,
Where the sun, his day's work ended,
Lingers as in content,
There falls on the old, grey city
An influence luminous and serene,
A shining peace.

The smoke ascends
In a rosy and golden haze. The spires
Shine and are changed. In the valley
Shadows arise. The lark sings on. The sun,
Closing his benediction,
Sinks, and the darkening air
Thrills with a sense of the triumphing night—
Night with her gift of stars
And her great gift of sleep.

So be my passing!
My task accomplished and the long day done,
My wages taken, and in my heart
Some late lark singing.
Let me be gathered to the quiet west,
The sundown splendid and serene,
Death.

AROUND THE WORLD.

It takes about thirty-five days of actual travel to go around the world in latitude forty degrees or thereabouts. Six days will take one from New York to London, fourteen more will carry him across the Eastern Continent to Japan. Then there will be ten needed on the Pacific Ocean to Vancouver, and five days more will bring him by rail back to New York. Of course the ability to do this will depend on connections, and on railroad trains and steamships running on time. But assuming these facts no special skill is needed to make the trip.

I would not have any one infer that in our recent trip over this route we made it in any such brief time. In fact we spent ninety-three days. One week was passed in London, another was scattered along through Belgium, Germany and Russia. We had a full month in Japan, and a week in the Canadian Rockies.

In England we had the pleasure of meeting a little group of Haverfordians. . . . We found in London a young man who is coming to Haverford as freshman the coming year. We had the pleasure of attending sessions of the House of Commons and a Liberal Meeting in the suburbs of London. In the latter they got some American advice.

Having had some experience in Russia twenty-five years ago, when the officials threatened to expel me from the country for unwise reflections on the Government, I was somewhat alarmed that upon entering the country my passport was so long detained; but it was finally given to me, after having spent two and one-half hours in the middle of the night in a dreary custom house at Alexandrovo, on the boundary between Germany and Russia. After that I was discreet in saying nothing that could be tortured into any lack of appreciation of the methods of the Russian Autocracy.

Three days in Moscow give an opportunity to soak in the beauties and history of the Kremlin,—a most impressive mass of churches and fortifications on a hill in the center of the city. It is worth while to visit Russia once, but probably a reasonably short stay will suffice, and the desire to repeat the visit will not be very strong. There is something rather fine in the Russian character. The common people are uneducated but courteous. They have apparently none of the capacity for combination and mutual support which the American working class has. They relentlessly underbid each other, and union prices are unknown; but they are a kindly, sympathetic people —and even when they cheated you it was with a sort of innocence which disarmed one's indignation.

It was a long ride of nine days, and nights by the Siberian Railway through Moscow to Vladivo took which is worth taking once if for nothing else than to note the people that crowd the platforms. As you move eastward the Mongol element increases in evidence and the Russian type becomes less prominent. There are Tartars and Mongol, Chinese and Japanese. The immigrant trains going both ways are full to the brim of hungry, thirsty, poorly clad people who pour out on the station platform for tea and cheap supplies of food which are furnished at the booths at one end. The country is capable of great development, and is the eastern counterpart of our Canadian and Northwest prairie land. Some day it will be a great wheat producing country, but the inveterate conservatism of the Russian peasant prevents any effective exploiting of the natural resources. Nevertheless there are large cities growing up of the modern sort. Tomsk has a University of 2,000 students with all the equipment of a modern institution. Omsk, Irkutsk and others are well built cities with the electrical and mechanical attachments we are accustomed to see at home. There is, however, as everywhere in Russia, a great gulf fixed between the comparatively small number of comfortable citizens with all the appliances of civilization, and the vast mass of poorer people who are purposely kept in ignorance and poverty. If history repeats itself there will some day be a great uprising of the Russian people, who will demand opportunities to lift themselves above the conditions in which they have stagnated for centuries.

When you cross over into Japan you find another condition of affairs. The electric energy of modern life is there in full force with a compulsory system of popular education, a great desire to learn from other nations, especially in the way of material improvements, with a sensitiveness to criticism which is the sure precursor of future development. Japan will occupy a large place in the coming history of the east. When we were there the Japanese pride had suffered a severe wrench from the California legislation, a piece of work which it seems to me, if necessary, was most unfortunately arranged, and if not necessary, as is more probable, one which has done damage to both countries. Japan has been looking to us as an example in government and education. We had so often expressed our sympathy for her rapid development and for her efficiency as shown in the Russian War and otherwise that she had come to consider us as her friend. To be rudely and unexpectedly told that her people were not wanted in this country while all other immigrants were welcome was a slap in the face, which she had a just right to resent. The matter will doubtless be fixed up by diplomacy, but a few other such discussions will destroy our influence in that country and the commercial interests and the religious influence of America there.

We found Haverfordians—Harold Morris, '08, who had come up from China for his vacation and Lloyd Smith, '12, who was also taking his recreation in the high land of the Japanese mountains at Karuizawa. Mt. Asama at this place got up an especial eruption for us, shaking the houses and giving us a shower of sand and ashes which covered the country with dust. As a compensation for this it also gave us some beautiful displays of volcanic energy in the shape of great clouds which were forced out from its apex and spread through the heavens. . . . Karuizawa is the headquarters for the foreign residents in Japan during the summer months and is more an American than a Japanese city. We had the pleasure of meeting a considerable number of the influential Americans in Japan and talked very freely concerning the conditions of Christianity and civilization in general as the result of foreign influence and effort. It seems to be their opinion that the number of professed converts is no index of this influence. Certain moral questions such as temperance, peace, sanitation and sound dormitories and the developments of the idea of a higher life for women have largely had their initiative in foreign effort though greatly aided by the Japanese themselves. Many Non-Christian Japanese are perfectly willing to admit the ethical superiority of Christianity and are anxious to adopt the Christian virtues if not the Christian doctrines. In this way, if in no other, the missionary effort is finding itself justified and there are something like 100,000 Protestant church members in Japan at the present time. This represents the work of some fifty years of missionary effort. Equally interesting was a conference to which an American missionary who had large influence with the government made way for me in Tokio with a number of public men, members of the Japan Parliament, and others. We had a very frank illuminating discussion concerning the relations between the two countries, and the means to be employed to retain the confidence and attachment which had hitherto existed. The most of them could speak English, as indeed all the Japanese college graduates can do, more or less well. Many of them had been in America as students or otherwise and were very well informed as to conditions here.

Japanese public life leaves much to be desired in the way of fairness to opponents and unprejudiced adherence to certain beliefs. The parties do not seem separated so much by principles of government as by adherence to the fortunes of some strong man. This brings in the personal element of politics and the attempt to overthrow an adversary by attacking his character is sometimes too strong to be resisted. So as in other directions Japan is going through a stage of evolution which America and probably all other countries have passed through long ago. She is passing through it, however, rapidly, and while political troubles are doubtless in store for her, it is hard to believe that a nation that believes in universal education and trained leadership will not rapidly conquer its difficulties and emerge into continuous civilization.

The Pacific Ocean belied herself and gave us a rough, cold passage for half the journey. The Empress of Asia on her maiden trip was so comfortable and roomy, the service so good and the officials so courteous that the journey was made as pleasant as is possible. The dates of leaving and arriving are deceptive, for on the antipodal meridian an extra day is thrown in, and while the schedule only counts nine days, we were in reality ten days in the passage.

One need not say anything about the Canadian Rockies. Here we had the finest scenic effect of the whole trip. The snow-covered peaks, the glaciers, the water-falls and in some places the fine trees give to western Canada a reputation for beauty which is well deserved. The week there was an ample antidote for the uneasy feeling which we brought from the ocean.—ISAAC SHARPLESS, in The Haverfordian.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE INSTRUMENTALITY OF A DOG.

Two instances of the revival of Friends' meetings referred to in THE FRIEND of this week (Eleventh Month 27th), one in the editorial and the other by a correspondent, have recalled an incident of somewhat similar character which I heard narrated many years ago by the late Samuel Bettie, Senior. He said there was a Friends' meeting (I think it was in Virginia) where the membership was gradually diminished by deaths and removals until there was but one member remaining, and he continued to go regularly as his custom was on meeting-days and take his usual seat alone, excepting that he was accompanied by his dog, who would lie quietly at his master's feet during the usual hour.

After a time this lone member died, but the dog so long accustomed to attend with his master on meeting-days, continued the habit, until he was observed by one of the neighbors, who followed him into the meeting-house and taking a seat near the dog he presently dropped into serious meditation, and was made to realize, as never before, the life and power of silent worship. Mentioning the matter to some of his neighbors a few of them joined him, and soon there was a considerable gathering, resulting in the re-establishment of a Friends' meeting, and all through the instrumentality of a dog.

A STUART AMONG THE QUAKERS.

The autumn of 1688 had made shipwreck of the Stuart fortunes, and during the winter months that followed the shores of France and the remotest counties of England were strewn with the wreckage. Amongst the flotsam and jetsam cast up by this calamity there was no figure so remarkable as that of Jane Stuart, the King's natural daughter. She had spent the thirty-five years of her life at the Court—an acknowledged and favorite child. Then, seizing the opportunity of her father's flight, she herself stole away in disguise from Whitehall, and taking no one into her confidence traveled alone and on foot through half the counties of England. The goal of her journey was Wisbech, then an obscure market-town in Cambridgeshire. She had chosen it, perhaps, for its remoteness and inaccessibility, which had become a by-word in the seventeenth century. Arriving towards the end of the summer, she joined a group of laborers who were standing to be hired beside the Old Bridge, where farmers still come to engage their extra workers at haytime and harvest. In spite of her evident inexperience she was hired with the others and sent out to reap in the fields. So great was her industry that before the season was over she had come to be known as the "Queen of the Reapers"—a strange title for a woman whose sister was even then seated upon the throne of England. As the winter drew on she bought a spinning-wheel, and, hiring a cellar, she took home the flax and wool which are the chief produce of that grazing and agricultural county. Then, sitting on a stand in the market-place amongst the farmers' wives, she sold the thread which she had spun. From the time of her arrival she attached herself to the Quaker Meeting, a little community which was beginning to breathe again after the barbarous persecutions of the reign of Charles II.

Little by little her story leaked out. Her speech or her habits betrayed her. She was discovered in the act of reading the Greek Testament, and her confusion still further aroused the suspicions of her neighbors. Reluctant as she was to speak of her past life, the day came when the chief facts of her history were known in the town. For thirty years after her death in 1742 her memory was preserved only in the recollection of the inhabitants who had known her, and in the entry in the Friends' Registry of Burials. But in 1773 the grandfather of the present Lord Peckover came to live in Wisbech, and set himself to collect such details as still survived. In 1800 they appeared for the first time in print in an article in the Friends' Monthly Magazine. I am indebted for this information, as well as for some further particulars, to the kindness of Lord Peckover of Wisbech. He can himself remember his grandfather, who died in 1833, and thus forms a link, however slender, with this surprising history.

Jane Stuart was born in Paris in 1654, a natural daughter of the exiled Duke of York, but happy beyond the usual fate of these children in bearing her father's name. It is significant that her mother's identity has never been known, though she is believed to have been a Maid of Honor to Queen Henrietta Maria, and a Protestant. This secrecy seems to indicate that she came of a family which felt the disgrace of the royal favors, and the name of Stuart may have been granted to the child as an expiation of the wrong done to her mother. She may have been one of the ladies referred to by the Earl of Sandwich, when he declared that Anne Hyde was not singular in being able to produce a promise of marriage, signed by James with his own blood while he was resident in France.

At the time of Jane's birth her father was a youth of twenty-one, handsome, brave and affable. He was the idol, if we may believe Chancellor Hyde, of the French Court, and of the Army, to which he was attached as a member of the staff of Marshal Turenne. But in 1658 the French Treaty with Cromwell obliged him to leave the country and to resign his commission. He removed with his whole household, which included his little daughter, to Bruges. Here and at Brussels she grew up in the midst of a society only less corrupt than that of the Court of the Restoration. When in 1660 the exiles were welcomed back to Whitehall she came to England in her father's train; and when he set up his establishment on a scale comparable to that of the King himself he was careful that proper provision should be made for the child.

In the following autumn his secret marriage was acknowledged with the daughter of Sir Edward Hyde, the Chancellor, whose loyalty had been newly rewarded by a peerage. The bride brought the leaven of decent middle-class virtues into James's household, and it is to her influence that one can trace many of the qualities in Jane Stuart which would be otherwise inexplicable—her integrity and economy, her love of learning, and her purity of life.

Her attachment to the Quakers, which showed itself while she was still living at St. James's, is easily capable of explanation. The Friends held a prescriptive right, which they still possess, to appear before the King, and during the persecution which followed the Conventicle Act, they came almost daily to Charles the Second to plead the cause of their society. Their "Thou Speech," as it was called, and their quaint dress, crowned by the hats, which they refused to remove on a point of conscience, were familiar to every habitué of the Court. The Duke of York was notoriously friendly to them, and added to the distrust with which he was regarded by his intimacy with William Penn, the son of his favorite Admiral. Jane Stuart herself traveled in Germany in her girlhood, where she would be entertained by her father's cousin, the learned Princess Elizabeth of Bohemia, the correspondent of Fox and Penn, and a kind hostess to all wandering Quakers. Jane Stuart's "convincement" to their principles brought no difference in her position. It is related, though the tale has the smack of legend, that she pushed her beliefs to the only conclusion possible at the time, and suffered imprisonment at Newgate.

She had hoped to escape by marriage from a position that was distasteful to her, and was about to wed a man whose name and station have both been lost in the wreck of her memory. The wedding was to be celebrated in the Quaker Meeting House, but as she was driving to the place with the bridegroom and his brother the coach overturned and the bridegroom was killed. Jane, who had escaped unhurt, drove on to London with the brother, whose leg had been broken in the accident, and stayed with him in his lodgings, nursing him till he recovered.

The only other picture which she has left of this period of her life is a glimpse of the infant Prince, afterwards the Old Pretender, "a little white-headed boy," whom she nursed upon her knee. His birth gave the signal for the Revolution, and in a few months Jane herself was an exile, working unknown amongst the fields of Wisbech. At first some effort seems to have been made to draw her back to her old life. The partisans of the new King in particular desired her presence as a witness to their contention that the new-born Prince was a supposititious child and not the heir to the throne. The Duke of Argyll succeeded in fact in tracing her as far as Wisbech. But Jane recognized the familiar arms upon his coach as she sat in her stall in the market-place, and hastily packing up her thread, she hid herself until the search which she had foreseen had been abandoned.

Once, indeed, she was tempted out of her retreat. When her brother, the Old Pretender, landed at Peterhead, to lead the ill-fated rising of the '15, Jane Stuart hired a chaise and traveled the 300 miles into Scotland to see him, a journey which is in itself sufficient corroboration of his claim to be the son of James the Second.

With this brief and heart-stirring interlude her life pursued its even course for 54 years. Through the summer she worked in the fields, and in the winter she toiled at the spinning-wheel in her dark cellar or sat without awning or shelter among the farmers' wives in the market-place. Her cellar was filled with birds, which she loved and cared for. She was never so happy as in the company of children, to whom, it is related, "she gave suitable religious advice when opportunity offered."

The last scene of her life has a touch of that romantic pathos which was the birthright of all her family. She had fainted one day in the Friends' Graveyard, and as she came to herself, the peace of that green hallowed into her brain, and she asked that when she died she might be buried in the place where she had fallen. She had a rowan tree planted to mark the spot—a tree, as one of her chroniclers has noted, no taller to guard the resting-place of a daughter of Scotland. The tree grew too large for the little graveyard, and was eventually cut down and sold for 12s. But the grave is not unmarked by some reverent hand has hedged it round with box, and her initials, with her age, eighty-eight, and the date, 1741, are in evergreen letters upon it. She was, perhaps the happiest of all her ill-starred race, for she has left it on record in the only saying of hers that has come down to us—that she enjoyed such contentment and peace that she would not leave her cell and spinning-wheel to be the Queen of England! FROM SANTIAGO, CHILE.

The following extracts from a letter written to a Friend by a sojourner in Chile have the merit of freshness in addition to the general interest attaching to that distant country to the south of us.—[Ed.]

SANTIAGO, Chile, Eighth Month 3, 1913.

We are having winter such as it goes here. So far this year we have had a very pleasant winter, little rain and many bright, sunny days, though the nights are quite cold, round about zero (Réaumur) many times. But the days of rain come with such strict attention to business that three of them make up for a week's rain in other countries. Not only the streets are flooded, but also our corridors. We have to shovel the water up with a coal shovel and dust-pan and keep buckets and pans standing all over the house. But the worst part of the winter is over now, the days are getting longer and the sun has more strength; in another month we can look for spring.

In spite of all this cold weather, now is the time for oranges; they are ripening in all this cold! The funniest carts and wagons are driving through the streets full of "golden apples" and fat lemons. One can buy the former for one peso a dozen (about twenty cents). Lemons are from ten to twenty centanos apiece (two to five cents).

Fruit and vegetables are the only things that are cheap here; meat is going up, up, up. Soon the poor people will not be able to buy any. Eggs I have not bought for three months. They are six to seven cents apiece. Butter costs three pesos twenty centanos a pound, that is about sixty-five to seventy-five cents, and there is only one kind to be had, nothing cheaper. Milk this month is fifty centanos (ten cents), but is not very rich, half water. So you see you are not the only people who have to pay for things!

The only thing cheaper is wages. But the work done is not what it is in the States at a higher price. You need two or three people here to do the work of one over there, not only in regard to servants (but also in the case of) all the workmen. It makes me boil to see them work in the house. We are having some papering and painting done and you should just see the way they slash the paint all over the walls and floors and windows (and) never dream of wiping up one single spot! The floors are simply ruined. Not even Jalapac will cover the spots! The landlady is having the work done and they have been at it just nine weeks and it is not finished yet! One room! . . . The air is very clear and bracing and it is never too cold to be comfortable out-of-doors; it is indoors that I freeze!

In front of the post office is a very beautiful square. I often sit there now in the sun and admire the different trees and the soft green lawns. There are beds of blooming flowers, large clumps of calla lilies in bloom under beautiful palms and other evergreen trees; then again other trees and plants (are) black and frozen, orange trees full of fruit and the apple blossoms beginning to open. To-day I went along a square in the "Alameda" or the "Avenida de las Delicias" (Avenue of Delights), the trees, oaks were all black and bare, but under them were tables with flowers for sale as far as I could see. Such lovely, fresh, golden yellow and white lilies, violets in big bunches, large bunches of peach and apple blossoms; in short, all the spring messengers of our northern clime. I could hardly pass by without buying. Most of the public buildings, as the Palace of Justice, House of the Deputies, Senate, etc., are situated in lovely grounds with wonderful palms and blooming tropical trees and bushes and some kind of flowers blooming all the time. Now is the time of delicate white flags and white wankie camellias. . . . I think after the canal has once been opened this country will be found to contain unknown riches. All it needs is capital and strong laborers. The cry for laborers is great even now. The crops last fall could not be harvested for lack of arms, and what was harvested often was ruined by the weather all along the railroad lines in the south for the want of cars to ship the produce, especially potatoes and wheat. The north of Chile does not produce food, mostly only salt-peter and other minerals, and is dependent for foodstuffs on the south. That is the farming and cattle-raising region, but owing to the lack of quick transportation there is not half the amount shipped north that is needed; at least that is what I read in the Spanish papers. The country is sparsely populated; the natives are not very strong and not over-fond of work, so there is a general cry for hands for the few factories that exist. In some of the mining places they have had to shut down the works from lack of workers. The Negro element is missing here and the Chinese and the Japanese are not encouraged to enter; the Irish are all in the States, so there remain only a few Germans and English. These of course are more interested in business than in farming, except that there is in Valdivia a large German settlement fifty years old. The place is quite German; in fact, schools and everything. It is the garden for the northern part of the land.

The people of this country are very much afraid that the United States will "gobble them up" when they once get a foothold here, so there are lectures and newspaper articles, etc., against the "dangers of the Yankees!" The other countries, as France and Germany, join in this chorus. They have held the greatest part of the trade here and are afraid of losing it.

In Peru they have had lots of trouble again lately, political disturbances all the time. We can be glad to be away from there. You just ought to hear the way the rats are chasing each other over the top of my room! There must be several families who occasionally "fight it out" at midnight. They are a great plague here and won't go into traps. They dance around in the kitchen, eat up my best jellies and preserves in the store-room and just seem to own the house. But I do not like to lay poison for they would die and remain in the walls and ceilings. Fortunately, this is not the land for bullock plague, otherwise I would be frightened.

At present though there is quite an epidemic of small-pox all over the city. There are more than two hundred at the hospital besides several hundred who are at their homes. The doctors are not reporting lots of cases, so there is not the necessary quarantine nor the fumigation of houses. The people are so used to this state of things that they do not pay any attention to the danger of it. The municipality is trying to do its best, but has a hard fight against the ignorance and the dirty houses and streets of the poorer districts. The officers who are sent to clean and fumigate are attacked and beaten at times.

FRIENDLY NEWS.

At the special session of the Representative Meeting of our Yearly Meeting held on the 28th ultimo, the following telegram was directed to be sent to President Wilson at Washington:

To WOODROW WILSON, President of United States of America, Washington, D. C.

We earnestly pray that Almighty God may strengthen and support thy heart and bless thy endeavor to preserve our Nation from dipping its hands in the blood of our Mexican brethren. We desire to be fellow-workers with thee in hastening the righteous and peaceable reign in the earth of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Adopted by the Representative Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends for Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and parts of Maryland, at a meeting held this 28th day of the Eleventh Month, 1913.

WM. B. HARVEY, Clerk.

WITHIN a month past the Monthly Meeting which assembles in the large house at Sixth and Noble Streets, Philadelphia, decided to join itself to the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia. The official title of the Meeting about giving up its identity is "The Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District," and the Meeting to which its members are to be attached is the one that meets at Fourth and Arch Streets.

IN THE FRIEND a few years ago appeared a full sketch of the "North Meeting," written by a life-long member, Anna Taylor Stokes. The house at Sixth and Noble Streets was built within the memory of those now living; it gives one, on entering it, the impression of being the largest and best built meeting-house in the city. The first couple to be married in the house are still living, and are members with Friends in one of the western States.

The minute adopted at the Monthly Meeting referred to was to the effect that the last Monthly Meeting under the old régime would be held next Sixth Month, after that the members are part of the Arch Street Meeting and all property, etc., is transferred to that Meeting.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Burlington, N. J., on Eleventh Month 25th. Early in the meeting James M. Moon offered prayer, asking that the meeting might be held in the spirit of true worship and that all might be freshly baptized in the Spirit of Christ, that there might be an overflowing from one vessel to another.

John B. Garrett rose with the words, "The Master has come and calleth for thee." He gave a word picture of the scene with Mary and Martha, closing with the thought that the Master calleth for each one. Jacob Ellreth spoke of the need for humility, and quoted an Old and a New Testament verse, explaining true religion. From the Old Testament, "He hath shewed thee, oh man, what is good and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God." From the New Testament, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world." William Bishop also rose with the verse, "The Master is come and calleth for thee." He spoke of the need of the Spirit of love driving out the spirit of criticism in our lives. Alfred Leeds's concern was especially for the younger people that they might watch to the pointings of requirements in small things. He believed that there were those present who should take a firmer stand in these things, and he believed that the reason we did not now have Penns and Woolmans was because there was not this attention to duties in small things. Lydia Leeds and Thomas Mott were also acceptably engaged in the ministry. The meeting was felt to be a time of real uplift. In the business meeting, which followed, the same spirit was felt as we transacted certain matters of business.

AN appointed meeting with those who assembled for Divine worship at Harrisburg, in the hall of the Board of Trade, on the afternoon of the 30th ultimo, will long be remembered as a most profitable occasion—demonstrating what can be done to gather our neighbors and friends to a realization of the precious privilege of real communion with our Heavenly Father. A group of more than one hundred, including quite a number of Brethren in Christ, and several from a distance, gathered into a reverent silence. Five visiting Friends had come from Philadelphia. Daniel Oliver presented the Gospel message in a straightforward and impressive way. Joseph Elkinton spoke of Wm. Penn's settlement of Pennsylvania as founded upon liberty of conscience and a belief in self-government, but above all upon that universal spirit he so earnestly commended to all. His appeal was made in behalf of a Christian brotherhood and faithfulness to the guidance of the indwelling Christ.

One or two others took part in the vocal exercises acceptably and when the meeting concluded few were willing to leave, as the cementing power of heavenly love had bound us all together in a soul-satisfying manner.

It was then suggested that Daniel Oliver should give to the company some account of his late visit to President Wilson. He felt an earnest concern to visit the President in behalf of peace, while attending Baltimore Yearly Meeting. Friends of that meeting entered fully into his concern and also sent a telegram to the President expressing their sympathy for him in the trying position he found himself with regard to the Mexican situation. Daniel Oliver was also encouraged to see the President and Secretary of State, which he did to great satisfaction. Secretary Bryan received him most cordially and appreciated his encouragement to maintain the high moral position the Administration had taken in dealing with the Mexican Government. He also said that he would do all in his power to secure an interview with the President, although he knew the latter was very busy, especially as his daughter was to be married the next day, and the duties of the State business were very exacting. This, however, was accomplished and the hour set and a cordial welcome extended to our dear Friend, who brought home to the President the great service he was rendering the world by bringing into our diplomacy a higher principle than had usually prevailed in European countries. He reminded the President of the many who were continually praying for him, not only in these United States, but also throughout the world, that he might be enabled to demonstrate to the world that the moral and spiritual powers were infinitely greater and more practical than force could possibly be in international as well as domestic affairs. The President responded in a very heartfelt way and said he would read every word of the written message which our Friend had carefully prepared for him, in case the opportunity to speak it was lacking. Daniel Oliver was profoundly impressed by the gentlemanly manner and character of the President and said more than once, "He is a kingly man."

The remainder of the time at our disposal with the company at Harrisburg was spent in a serious consideration of what this little group of Friends and others might accomplish by a closer fellowship. There is a house, formerly used as a library, which is admirably adapted to meeting purposes, and can be purchased for $9000. It is located in the central part of Harrisburg. The Friends there were strongly encouraged to purchase it and to invite their neighbors to share the blessings of occasions such as we had so much enjoyed at this time.

While some of our meetings are growing smaller, here is one which is steadily growing stronger, because of the right spirit and method which directs the efforts of a few earnest Friends.

THE Meeting for Sufferings of Iowa Yearly Meeting has encouraged Henry Standing of Earlham, Iowa, to collect letters of our late beloved Friend, Archibald Crosbie, and to prepare them for publication. Any who have such letters will further a good purpose by forwarding them to Henry Standing.

CONFERENCE AT FOURTH AND ARCH STREETS.—Something like one thousand Friends took part in the Conference at Fourth and Arch Streets, last Sixth-day, the 5th inst. The program was printed in THE FRIEND, of Eleventh Month 22nd (No. 22) and need not be repeated here. Between the afternoon and evening sessions supper was served to the large company. The efficiency with which this was accomplished was the subject of much favorable comment. Only some of the more striking points of a few of the papers can be mentioned here, but this is intended as no disparagement to others. All were in good measure wholesome and profitable.

Under the title, "The Fostering Care of the Meeting for its Members," the peculiarly democratic character of our Society organization was made clear, and the functions and duties of those not under appointment as elders or overseers were specified and emphasized. A healthful growing body is impossible until in some very true and practical sense the Scripture ideal of "being members one of another" is realized. The function of hospitality toward fellow-members to the extent of entertaining them at your table was claimed to be of particular importance in country districts, but is applicable as well throughout the Society.

"Religious Education" was treated in papers or addresses by six young Friends. A proper diffusion of education throughout the body was shown to be necessary if we would maintain the advantages that we have inherited. This system of general education was probably better worked out in George Fox's time than since. He saw sixteen boarding schools organized as well as a normal school for training teachers. The particular point of "Denominational Teaching" had loud treatment. Friends have not realized how different they seem to other religionists. This is largely due to the fact that they are classed as anti-communionists. Our denominational teaching needs to be so positive and so clear that responsibility for such radical misunderstandings cannot be charged to us.

The religious element in "Social Work" was shown to be fundamental.

Such efforts apart from religion, of which it is the life, are but a cheapened heart in the final analysis, and need not be regarded as such.

All the papers, as well as the introductory ones, were read at the meeting emphasized the spiritual life as the source from which all social or meeting activities must spring and be sustained. The papers and their contributions of development and growth. Daniel B. Garrett, who had ready illustrations at hand in summing up the meeting, asked the subject "The Need of the Spiritual."

The evening session was signaled by reports of religious meetings of rare value. Ruby Deitchel, of Iowa, read a paper on "Baptism of the Friends to these questions:

How Can I Become a Greater Strength to My Abiding Friend?

How Can I Increase Loyalty to the Society of Friends?

What Duty Have I to My Neighbor?

What is There in Quakerism That I Should Like to Share with Others?

Two points were shown to be clear. Young Friends are thinking along these lines, and they are thinking conservatively. It remains for meetings and for well concerned Friends to see that such resources are not diverted from Society uses.

In a paper on the "Duty of the Church to the Community" Rufus M. Jones reminded the meeting that the early Friends re-discovered the value of a human life. "To them human life was too sacred to be slaughtered in battle, to rot in prison, to be beset in drunkenness or vice, or to be used as a beast of burden." This cardinal principle is capable of indefinite expansion in reaching out to save individuals or groups of individuals.

The Conference was concluded with a thoughtful paper by Alfred C. Garrett. After a careful examination of the two points of view of a church as a central storehouse of spiritual power, or of means to spiritual power, and as an agency for engaging its members in organized work, the claim was made that the former view seems to have prominence in the religious thinking of the day. This of course is in accord with the position of most of the Conservative Yearly Meetings. That it is not the position of lessened, but rather of greatly increased personal responsibility was cogently pointed out.

Looking out over so large a gathering intently engaged for several hours in such serious considerations one hears a very clear challenge, "If ye know these things happy are ye if ye do them."

ON Eleventh Month 26th, the regular session of Abington Monthly Meeting was held in the little house at Abington on Jenkintown Road. Since 1876, the Monthly Meeting has been held at Horsham, but by recent action it will in the future alternate between the two places.

A Committee of the Quarterly Meeting has labored for many years to assist the Abington and Horsham Friends to maintain their Monthly Meeting. The membership of both meetings is only thirteen, but it is hoped the change will strengthen the Monthly Meeting and encourage Friends resident within its limits to bring their certificates thither.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

THE event of greatest interest last week to a portion of the Westtown family was the attendance on the part of the Senior Class at the Large meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets, Phila., on the evening of the 5th. Quite seventy went from the School to attend either one or the other of both of the sessions.

The Seniors attended to all their school duties of the afternoon and left in ample time for the supper; there was half an hour or more for social visiting with their families and friends and the evening's program was so planned that they were able to remain to the finish. Arrangements had been made by George L. Jones for a special trolley from Sixty-ninth Street at 9.45 and the walk home over Walnut Hill at the late hour was not an inappropriate ending to such an afternoon and evening. Many members of the class have personally expressed their appreciation of the favor shown them. The mere attendance at a meeting of such earnestness should stimulate some to high resolves.

THERE was no lecture during the week on account of the meeting in Philadelphia taking the date usually given to the lecture to offset this on Fifth-day evening Daniel Oliver spoke in the Library to the teachers and members of the advanced classes on the Balkan situation and the events which led up to it. Our lecture course has already been over the Bible and omission was made, by accident, of a very interesting and timely lecture on India by Margaret Jenkins of Germantown.

THE Senior Class held their first joint business meeting for the term

some time during the past week. They elected their officers, an important action, as it is the practice for the officers now elected to serve their class for the future. The elections resulted in Alfred H. Dewees for President, Marguerite L. Brinton for Secretary, James W. Parker for Vice President, and Charles E. Jacob for Treasurer.

The Literary Union, at its meeting on the third, ventured on rather untried ground, but with real success. One of the great advantages of such a Society, where pupils and teachers stand on the same platform, is along the line of expressing oneself in public. The Society on this occasion resolved itself into a "Committee of the Whole," appointed a girl for Chairman, who proved herself amply equal to the occasion, and gave an hour to passing or amending resolutions, explaining points of order, and in a general way learning by actual practice how a legislative body works.

The orchard project has assumed a new phase, and we shall gladly keep our readers posted from time to time as matters progress on Walnut Hill. A water pipe has been laid from the new well dug in the valley of Hekman's Run and modern civilization has invaded the south slope of the hill. Several have inquired in regard to the varieties of trees planted. These are confined to apples and peaches. There are fourteen kinds of apples and nine of peaches, in all 3500 trees. Of the apples, 320 Stayman's Winesap lead the list, with Wealthy and Northern Spy close seconds. Yellow Transparent, Snake House and Jonathan number about 200 each. Grimes Golden, Gravenstein and Baldwin come next. There are fifty or fewer of various other varieties, which list possibly includes all those that would satisfy the query of interested readers who put the question, "Why did they not plant so and so?"

Of peaches Elberta comes first with 400 trees, then in order Belle of Georgia, Carman, and Hiley, with a few of some half dozen other varieties.

We have had none of the Committee with us during the week, but on Fifth-day Elizabeth C. Goodhue was at our meeting and had what was felt to be a real message for the occasion. At our First-day meeting, Daniel and Emily Oliver and Paul D. I. Maier were present and had part in the vocal exercises of the meeting.

Previous arrangements had been made for Rayner W. Kelsey of Haverford to address the School in joint collection in the evening, but he was unavoidably detained at home; Mary Ward gave a suggestive talk on Lessons from the Life and Poetry of Whittier, which was listened to with marked appreciation on the part of the boys, and Annie B. Gidley read a paper on "Orderliness" to the girls, which was brimful of such pointed but kind suggestions that every mother of our one hundred girls should be grateful to her for it.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"I do feel a real concern that the meeting for worship should have a more important place. There is great danger in the fact that our younger generation is not feeling the duty to attend meetings for worship. Things will go on for a time by the impetus of the past, but it will not last forever."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Charlotte, N. C., says: "Preachers ordained hereafter by the Western North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, must abstain from the use of tobacco. The conference ordered this after a hard contest at its closing session here. Members now addicted to its use will be allowed to continue its use without encouragement."

In a message to Congress, President Wilson lately said: "The country, I am thankful to say, is at peace with all the world, and many happy manifestations multiply about us of a growing cordiality and sense of community of interest among the nations, foreshadowing an age of peace and good will. It has been the privilege of the Department of State to bring the consent in principle of no less than thirty-one nations, representing four-fifths of the population of the world, to the negotiation and the signing by which it shall be agreed that whenever differences of international policy arise which cannot be resolved by the ordinary processes of diplomacy, they shall be publicly analyzed, discussed and reported upon by a tribunal chosen by the parties before either nation determines its course of action."

In an annual meeting of the American Society for the study of alcohol and other narcotics, Dr. John D. Quackenbush stated that out of 10,000 cases he had treated in the last fifteen years, seventy-five per cent, had been cured and stayed so after a lapse of twelve years. The remainder of the patients had left no trace of themselves or had not been treated often enough to effect a genuine cure. He held out hope to those afflicted by habit—not through his own will power, he explained, but through the awakening of the better self, latent in the conscience and soul of every human being.

It has been lately stated that cures of eighty-five per cent, of insane persons taken to the Stockton State Hospital, Cal., for the Insane have been made possible by employment of scientific methods, according to the unqualified declaration of Dr. Fred P. Clark, medical superintendent of the institution. Use of water, in various degrees of temperature and force, is one of the chief elements of the treatment.

Lead pencils and penholders used in the school-room may become carriers of deadly diphtheria germs, according to a statement made by Dr. Joseph S. Neff, Director of Public Health and Charities, who discussed the epidemic of diphtheria in a Connecticut school, for which lead pencils, used in common by the school children, are held responsible. "Penholders and lead pencils which are distributed each morning and collected at night should be sterilized each day," said Doctor Neff. "We have issued orders through the Board of Education that special attention be given this matter. Individual pencils and penholders are the best safeguard against the spread of disease in the school-room."

The statistics show that seventy-five per cent, of all the boys sent to the House of Correction in 1911 and 1912 were addicted to the cigarette habit, and records kept by Judge Carey of New York, show that ninety-five per cent, of the boys who came before him for trial were victims of the insidious practice of smoking tobacco wrapped in paper.

It is stated that back yard plots as gardens may reduce the cost of living in Philadelphia [very materially]. This fact was brought out at a late meeting of the Social Workers' Club in the New Century Club.

A despatch of the 3rd from Dallas, Texas, says: "With three rivers, the Trinity, Brazos and Colorado, and innumerable small streams out of their banks, as a result of torrential rains which still continue, the flood situation in central Texas has assumed serious proportions. The lowlands of a territory 200 miles long and 100 miles wide are under water; approximately 15,000 persons have been driven from their homes; scores have been rescued from tree tops and floating wreckage and several railroads have been forced to suspend operations. Seven persons are known to have lost their lives."

A despatch of the 3rd from Chicago says: "Chicago faces a crisis caused by an army of thousands of unemployed men, indicating that the hard times of 1907-08 may be repeated, according to a report of the Committee on Homeless Men, submitted to-day at a meeting of representatives of charitable organizations."

A despatch of the 2nd from Washington says: "President Wilson to-day was called upon by the delegates to the forty-fifth convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association to send to Congress immediately a special message advocating an amendment to the Constitution that would give the suffrage to women."

It is stated that the expenses of the railroads east of the Mississippi River have increased so much faster than revenues, that the net operating income for 1913 was $16,341,000 less than it was in 1910, and this notwithstanding the fact that more than $650,000,000 of new stock and bonds have been put into these railroad properties in that time.

It is stated that lead pencils were found to be the cause of an epidemic of diphtheria in a school at Suffield, Conn. The health physician ordered all the school's pencils burned, and forbade the distribution of used pencils hereafter. Each pupil must have his own pencil and use no other.

A recent despatch says: "New York City now has the second lowest death rate of the cities of the world, according to the annual report of Dr. Ernest J. Lederer, Health Commissioner. According to the figures, the death rate for forty-eight weeks of 1913 was 13.77 for every 1000 population."

On the 5th inst. it was stated from Dallas, Texas: "A death roll of more than fifty persons, with scores of flood refugees spending to-night in imminent peril and possibly a thousand others marooned and suffering from prolonged hunger and cold, was indicated by to-night's reports from Bryan, Tex., and the flooded Brazos River bottoms in south central Texas."

News despatches may now be received by wireless telegraph on rapidly moving trains. It is stated that news of the stock exchange, and of the strike of electricians in Schenectady, N. Y., were received and posted while a train was going at sixty miles an hour.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

EDWIN P. SELLEW.

Friends in the more immediate circle of Philadelphia have been informed of the death of our beloved friend, Edwin P. Sellew. It occurred at the Hahnemann Hospital on the morning of Twelfth Month 11th. A week before, on the third, he had submitted to a surgical operation. The immediate outcome of this had seemed hopeful. He became more comfortable, seemed to gain in strength and improve in several respects so as to surprise his physician and nurses. Less than twenty-four hours before the end, it became clear that the hopes of recovery had been groundless. He was himself quite sensible of the outcome, and faced it with a resignation that might properly be characterized as triumphant. Throughout his sickness he had manifested in a remarkable degree a spirit of submission to the Divine Will. When told that a Methodist congregation had engaged in prayer for his recovery his significant remark was, "May we not hope that they will be favored to offer that highest of all prayers—"Thy will be done"?"

For twenty-five years Edwin P. Sellew has been a unique figure amongst Friends in Philadelphia and has had an extended service in commending vital Christianity to an ever-widening circle. He was born amongst the Methodists and was trained for ministerial and pastoral work as a Free Methodist. Naturally an independent thinker, he became well known and highly esteemed in that earnest body of Christians. It was realized that he was a man of convictions, that convictions shaped his life, not his life his convictions, and we have been told that there were those amongst the most influential of his associates, who considered that he would directly succeed to the office of bishop amongst them. In the good order of Providence, and as a development of his life of conviction he found the situation of a stated pastor unbearable. From the beginning in this line he had been scrupulous in regard to receiving more than a very limited allowance of income to cover the necessities of support. He soon realized that the stated service, and a certain obligation not to wound the opinions of those especially who might be foremost as contributors to the work of the church to which he was bound, put him under limitations that seemed inconsistent with Gospel freedom.

With the growth of such views it was most natural that he should be drawn to the Society of Friends. His conviction as a Friend was of the thorough-going character one might expect in such a type of a man. Step by step he came to realize not only that he was in unity with the general principles of Quakerism, but that the testimonies of the Society for simplicity and truthfulness in dress and address appealed to him and satisfied definite requirements of the Holy Spirit in his heart. He became strikingly consistent in all these matters, but in a way that left no doubt that he had not adopted them as mere forms appealing to his judgment but as living realities that made him more true to his Maker and more honest toward his fellow-men. Sometimes such a type of Quakerism is described as antiquated and said to be no longer serviceable in the world. One could not sit in Edwin P. Sellew's seat as manager of a large office building, nor follow in his steps in any small degree into the world of business and of human interests without feeling that in the highest sense in which the term is used he was a "live wire" in the community.

As such a live wire he looked upon his mission in connection with the publication and editorship of THE FRIEND. His desire was for a positive testimony, that the things which he had known and his hands handled, should be commended to others fearlessly but lovingly. The principles he thus represented are those specially cherished by the Contributors (managers) of THE FRIEND. They feel very deeply the loss they have sustained in his death, but their appeal is to an interested body of subscribers for sympathy and for help. Those who are livingly concerned for the up-building of the Truth should lend themselves more actively to the effort to do it through a weekly periodical. Thus will the excellent concern of our departed Friend be maintained as a worthy memorial to him, and to those devoted Friends who have preceded him in the editorship. J. H. B.

The funeral of our late dear Friend was held in the Meeting-house at Fourth and Arch Streets on Seventh-day afternoon, the 13th. A very large company joined in the solemnity of grief and of worship. A note of thankfulness for such a triumphant life and death pervaded the vocal exercises and crowned the occasion as one of Divine favor.

[The following is the beginning of an editorial written by Edwin P. Sellew in his home just before the doctor sent him to the hospital. The righteous concern upon his mind will be perceived, although the article was not finished.—Ed.]

Concerned Friends have generally felt restrained from a regular attendance at the places for worship of other religious bodies, not so much, as it has seemed to the writer, because the stated services and outward ceremonies positively prevented them from performing true, spiritual worship, but more because they have felt that such attendance was a sanction or endorsement of such services and ceremonies as being in themselves worship. As in the rise of the Society Friends were able to worship amid the distractions caused by the visits to their meetings of rude soldiers and mobs, so now some would be able to so retire into the closets of their own hearts as to be true worshippers amid the thunderings of a great pipe organ or the wordy declarations of an uninspired ministry. Nor does the abstaining from such attendance necessarily imply that such Friends deny that true worship is being experienced by some of those who participate in the meetings where such perfunctory ceremonial exercises are the regular form of worship. As the music and the formal praying and preaching, when it was such, would be a hindrance rather than a help in the realization of their desire for spiritual communion, Friends usually prefer to stay away from places where they feel such obstructions are likely to be met. While thus entering their protest against a conception of worship mainly dependent upon external performances, they would in a faithful attendance at their own meetings point others to a spiritual conception of worship and invite them to be sharers therein.

THE WISCONSIN IDEA.

Philadelphians have had their attention very much directed of late to the Wisconsin Idea. This attention has been manifested by a pilgrimage made last Spring to Madison, Wis., in which a very considerable delegation participated, and more recently by a return visit from President Van Hise of the State University with a number of his colleagues and associates. Expressed in simplest terms the Wisconsin Idea may be said to be an expansion of University Extension principles. Educational institutions have attracted armies of students in our country, but when the facts are fairly faced it is clear to careful observers that multitudes are not having the benefits, particularly of advanced education. As a result, trades and industries, agriculture and commerce have failed to keep pace with a certain social expansion evident everywhere. This social expansion has seemed to some at variance with the old-fashioned idea to the effect that man is destined to eat his bread at the cost of the sweat of his brow. Doubtless this wrong interpretation of the situation has had much to give it currency in numerous conflicts between labor and capital. Fortunately there is another side to the case. The Wisconsin Idea in seeking "to teach the people what the people wish to know," has very likely got near to the inside facts of our twentieth century civilization. In place of an emancipation from grinding toil and long hours by the forcible means of strikes and lockouts, it has disclosed an emancipation more complete and more satisfying by far. The emancipation involved in the Wisconsin Idea is to result from diffused intelligence. The university is to be the ally of every trade and every industry, it is to minister to the social, intellectual, moral and spiritual uplift of country as well as city communities. Its reduction of the hours of labor will come from improved methods of industry, its increase in wages will result from greater efficiency and intelligence in production, its increase of social well-being from wise provision for recreation and the use of leisure. The means to this end are most varied. A brief reference to a few of them will indicate their practical character.

The university has been able to foster and guide legislation by arranging reference libraries that contain just the information needed by members of the legislature or other interested parties who participate in law-making.

The university has become in a very practical sense the head of the system of education in the State, and the various parts of the system are not only properly coordinated, but an aggressive policy develops new lines of work as new circumstances make the demand. Thus Wisconsin is not only in advance in industrial and trade education but movements for continuation schools and credits for educational work apart from schools abound.

Naturally under such advanced policies agriculture is fostered by the university in many interesting ways. The ideal would embrace every farm as a university laboratory, and every member of a farmer's family as an enrolled student of the university. Nor is this intended to be more true of farming than of other industries of state-wide importance. One immediately sees how all-embracing such a system can be, and one wonders whether the machinery of organization does not become too cumbersome for success. That which makes the Wisconsin Idea of special interest and value is the fact that it has succeeded, not perfectly of course, but sufficiently well to commend it to others.

Is there any suggestion of value for the religious world in this extension of university knowledge and skill? In a sense the Wisconsin Idea seems to reverse the old adage about Mahomet and the mountain. In this case it is the mountain of knowledge and the efficiency of knowledge that has had to go to the people. This is very largely the basic idea of the Gospel. It seeks out the lost. It goes to the ends of the earth. Prison doors open to its touch. The poor and afflicted cannot be so obscure that it does not shine upon them. In the general complaint of empty "churches," of neglected meetings, it is quite possible for us to forget our function, our duty, our privilege to carry the blessing of organic fellowship to absentees. What would happen in a meeting if every member in attendance had a programme like this: Each meeting-day to note some absentee and then to call on such in the real spirit of the Gospel before the next meeting-day came round? Quite impractical, we say, "there isn't time for it," and "we should soon make ourselves offensive." All of which excuses may be quite apart from the real spirit of the Gospel.

To narrow the matter a little and to put it on the extremely practical basis, how many of us go at all to absent members as we would go to a friend absent from a set occasion, with the solicitude of unquestioned love? But that is the Gospel extension system! We need not send to Wisconsin for it, nor across the sea! He has come to seek and to save the lost. J. H. B.

"WHETHER there be knowledge, it shall vanish away."
(1 Cor. xiii. 8.)

"But he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever." (1 John ii. 17.)

To gain knowledge is not our chief errand here. We have a higher calling, a more urgent duty. God gratifies our love for knowledge only in so far as it seems to be for our moral good. While the shadows lie over many a field of knowledge, the light does fall directly, straight from the presence of God, over the narrow path of duty, and, though we may not see far into the shades of the forest on either side, we can keep, with resolute feet, in the narrow path which leads into the open day.—NEWMAN SMYTH.

"O, WHAT owe I to the file, to the hammer, to the furnace of my Lord Jesus."—S. RUTHERFORD.

"BY OUR LAW HE OUGHT TO DIE."

In the whole course of the world's history one Figure stands out from all the rest of mankind with irresistible attraction. Other religions have had their founders, but their religious systems have lived on independent of them. The religion of Christ alone centres in a Person, one who holds empire to-day over the hearts of men even more firmly than when He was in their midst in bodily presence. This fact impressed Napoleon more than any other about the person of Christ. The multitudes who would have died for the conqueror when he was at the head of his army forgot him in his loneliness upon St. Helena. But as he looked back through the centuries he saw the blood of the martyrs flowing in torrents for one whom he recognized as no mere man.

The Wise Men of the East and the humble shepherds alike worshipped the Babe of Bethlehem. The Roman centurion and the dying thief alike recognized His royal dignity upon the Cross. Scholars who have studied His character minutely with a view to criticizing have ended with crowning Christ as the highest ideal of humanity. His character is so complete in its simplicity, its self-sacrifice, its boundless love, its strength and its tenderness, as to appeal to every heart.

Christ stood at the junction of three great worlds of thought—the Jewish, the Roman, and the Greek. Though by His human nature a Jew, He was distinct from them all. Men of every age and of every nationality feel instinctively the kinship of Christ. The degraded African savage, the Chinaman—alien in all his instincts to the European—are alike at home with Jesus Christ, and He with them, the moment they open their hearts to His love.

The Christ who has won this empire in the hearts of men, and who has won the victory over the powers of darkness in this world, is the Christ of the New Testament, the incarnate Son of God, who died an atoning sacrifice for sin and rose again for our justification. If the New Testament view of Him is not true, then the greatest moral victories that have been won in the world have been won through the proclamation of a lie.

Christ became Man for us, but He did not cease to be God. As Westcott says, "He laid aside the insignia of royalty." When Peter the Great worked in the dockyard at Deptford, he did not cease to be the Czar of Russia all the while that he assumed the rôle of a ship's carpenter. Christ laid aside "the form of God" for "the form of a servant."

"Which of you convinceth Me of sin?" was Christ's unanswered challenge to His enemies. "I find no fault in Him," was the thrice-repeated verdict of His judge. (Jno. viii. 46; xviii. 38; xix. 4, 6). When we remember the self-abasement and the self-loathing of the holiest men, increasing in proportion as they draw near to the one perfect ideal, we cannot understand Christ's claim to sinlessness except in the light of His deity. The verdict of His own day and of those who would criticize His claim to deity in our day, unite in proclaiming the perfection of His character. But if once that is established, if once it is admitted that He was a good Man,—yea, the best, the ideal Man—how can we reconcile this with His claim to deity except as we admit the truth of that claim?

This claim was the chief ground of the enmity of the Jews during the three years of Christ's ministry, and it was the actual ground upon which sentence of death was passed upon Him at the last. "The Jews sought the more to kill Him because He had not only broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God" (Jno. v. 10); "I and My Father are one. Then the Jews took up stones again to stone Him. . . . For a good work we stone Thee not, but for blasphemy and because that Thou being a Man makest Thyself God." (x. 30-33). "Before Abraham was I AM." Here our Lord applied that mystic name to Himself, the name by which Jehovah made Himself known to Moses. The Jews at once recognized that in doing so He claimed Deity. . . . Then took they up stones to cast at Him" (viii. 58, 59).

Caiphas adjured our Lord to tell him if He were the Christ, the Son of God, and on hearing His affirmative reply, He rent His clothes and appealed to the Jews to what He thought of His blasphemy. They answered and said: "He is guilty of death." When Pilate would have acquitted Him at the last the Jews answered, "We have a law, and by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God" (Mat. xxvi. 63-66; Lev. xxiv. 16; Jno. xix. 7). In each of these cases the instinct of self-preservation would have made any sane man clear himself of such a charge, and the instinct of all that is right and honoring to God would have impelled any good man to clear himself with the utmost vehemence.

Many passages in the Old Testament reveal to us the existence of the Son of God. In Psalm ii. God says, "Thou art My Son; this day have I begotten Thee," and He speaks of Him as the King whom He has anointed over all the earth. In Proverbs xxx. 4, we read, "Who hath ascended up into heaven, or descended? Who hath gathered the wind in His fists? Who hath bound the waters in a garment? Who hath established all the ends of the earth? What is His name and what is His Son's name, if thou canst tell?" This is an unanswerable question for the Jew. In Isaiah vi. 14, we have the virgin's Son, Immanuel, God with us. Other names implying deity are ascribed to the Messiah of the Old Testament and to the Christ of the New Testament. Thine Only One, Wonderful, Mighty God, the Son of God, God blessed for ever, the Lord of All. Throughout the Scriptures the Divine attributes of Omnipotence and Omniscience, of eternity and immutability are applied to Him, and the Divine offices of creation, preservation, the forgiveness of sin, the future raising of the dead (Jno. v. 25-26), the universal judgment of all mankind and the bestowal of eternal life.

The name of Jesus Christ is coupled with that of God in a way in which the name of no finite being could be coupled. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost." "My Father will love him and we will come unto him and make our abode with him." "We,"—God and I.

Jesus Christ is to be worshipped by angels and men even as God the Father is worshipped, and He accepted this worship while on earth and said that it was the Father's will that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father. He also forgave sins in His own name bringing again upon Himself the accusation of the Scribes that He had spoken blasphemy.

Further, Christ's deity is proved by His resurrection. The disciples went everywhere, proclaiming up and down in the very city where He had been crucified that He had been raised from the dead, and more than five hundred brethren, who had seen Him at the same time, were ready to testify to the truth of the fact. The Day of rest was changed to the first day in memory of it by general consent, and has borne silent witness to the event ever since. The disciples themselves were changed from cowards to courageous witnesses. Peter charged home the sin of His murderers as being against the Divine Messiah, the Holy One and the Just. The dying Stephen saw Him standing on the right hand of God, and called upon Him, saying, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

He appeared in such reality to Saul of Tarsus that the great Apostle exclaimed twenty-five years later, "Have not I seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" In Paul's Epistles, Christ is "Our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ." In Him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. He is able to subdue all things unto Himself, ascending far above all heavens that He might fill all things, yet becoming the very life of those who believe in Him. James designates himself a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ. Jude speaks of His mercy as bringing eternal life. John tells us that he that denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father; and the New Testament concludes with his vision, on the Isle of Patmos, of the glorified Saviour before whose presence he fell as dead. "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is and which was and which is to come, the Almighty."

Thus the fact of the resurrection meant to the early believers the continued presence of the Lord, and it was the proof of His deity. For, before His death, He made two claims: He claimed to be the Son of God—one with the Father—and He claimed that He would rise again the third day. God set His seal to both these claims by raising Him from the dead. He is, therefore, "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead." The admission of the resurrection of Jesus Christ leads logically to the admission of His deity. Its denial leaves us "of all men most pitiable."

The disciples, moreover, were convinced of the fact of the resurrection in spite of persistent unbelief on their part at first. The Lord Jesus revealed Himself to them with just those little touches of His personality which would appeal to each. He sends a special message to Peter who denied Him. He makes Himself known to the two of Emmaus by His own characteristic way of giving thanks at the evening meal. He calls Mary by name, and she at once recognizes His voice and turns with the word "Rabboni"—my dear Master. With exquisite tenderness He removed the doubts of Thomas—that disciple who loved Him so much that on a former occasion he had said, "Let us also go that we may die with Him;" and He put in a word for us in these far off days and this far off land. "Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed." Shall we not fall at His feet and, with Thomas, cry, "My Lord and My God?"—A. M. HODGKIN, in Friends' Witness.

MOCKING-BIRD'S SONG.

With its score of divas and prima donnas whose sweet singing has charmed millions, both at home and in the foreign world, still America's most renowned singer is the common mocking-bird. And one need not dress in the finery of precious clothes and jewels and spend a small fortune to be in the audience when this great singer is giving a concert; but in the quietness of the most humble home one may sit for hours in the evening and hear its incomparable melodies.

This bird seems never to grow tired. After listening to its song in the evening one may awaken any hour of the night and the whole air will still be flooded with its music. In the daytime, too, it may be heard mimicking the notes of all the birds of its neighborhood. Sometimes it even learns to imitate the sounds of the barnyard and the household.

All over the United States this great singer is found. It prefers to live near the habitation of men, and for their protection it pays with its songs. It is fortunately so, for ornithologists tell us that it does not earn protection, as many other birds do, by destroying insects and grubs. The greater part of its food is fruit, and most of the cultivated varieties are attacked. The good it does outside its singing does not repay for its damage.

No gorgeous gowns for this great singer. It wears only grays, an ash-gray on the upper parts of its body, with its wings and tail nearly black and its breast covered with grayish white. It is about ten inches long, the tail making up half of its length. Even in confinement the mocker is a masterly performer and formerly thousands were caged and sold, but this practice has been largely stopped by the protective laws.

Of all the tributes to the mocking-bird none is so widely known as that of the poet Longfellow in "Evangeline":

"On a sun-bright morning thicket the mocking-bird, wisest of singers,
Sung a soft note on a yellow spray that hung over the waters,
Shook from his little throat such floods of delicious music,
That the whole air and the woods and the waves seemed silent to listen.
Plainly at first were the tones and sad; then soaring to madness
Seemed they to follow or guide the revel of froliced harlequins.
Single notes were then heard in sorrowful low lamentation;
Till having gathered them all, he flung them abroad in derision,
As when, after a storm, a gust of wind through the tree-top Shakes down the rattling rain in a crystal shower on the branches."

For "THE FRIEND."

[The following thoughtful presentation, by Lucia Ames Mead, deserves as wide a reading as can be given it.—Ed.]

Four matters of transcendent importance confront the government this winter on which the eyes of all who love honor and justice should be focused.

The first is in the hands of the Senate. It is the renewal of the Arbitration Treaty with Great Britain, which expired last summer. This treaty, it will be remembered, is a very mild one, which President Taft hoped to supersede by the Arbitration Treaty defeated by the Senate in 1912. This treaty was in the form of most of our arbitration treaties with foreign nations. That it was not renewed instantly is a matter of amazement and shame, especially at this moment when we are about to celebrate the one hundred years of peace with Great Britain, with whom it is impossible for us ever again to engage in conflict. A postponement of renewal was proposed by a Western Senator in order to avoid an arbitration of the Canal Tolls issue. If this treaty is not renewed shortly before the opening of the winter session of Congress, it will be a matter of public disgrace.

The second matter of importance is in the hands of both chambers of Congress. It is the arbitration of the Canal Tolls. It will be remembered that President Taft and even Colonel Roosevelt were ready to submit this question to arbitration. President Wilson favors the repeal by exemption of duties for our coastwise trade. This will be much the simpler and better solution of the difficulty. We have already as a nation lost esteem and respect in more than one country for our hesitancy in arbitrating a small question like this which in no wise affects our honor or vital interests.

The third matter of enormous importance is the preparation for the program of the Third Hague Conference. At the Second Hague Conference provision was made for a Third to occur in about 1915, the program of which was to be prepared two years in advance. Thus far no adequate attention has been given to this matter in which the United States should take the initiative. President Taft appointed three members as the American Committee to consider the matter. One of these was an army man; the second, a navy man, and the third one, an under-officer in the State Department. This appointment was very unsatisfactory, as it left the predominance to military men. It has been suggested to President Wilson that this committee be enlarged, so that civilians should form its majority. What action has been taken by the State Department is unknown. It is understood that the New York Peace Society will hold a special conference in [First Month] for the consideration of the whole matter. But, before that, it is to be hoped that our State Department will have pressure brought to bear upon it by lovers of peace and justice throughout this country to the end that the United States shall insure an adequate committee and shall take the initiative in calling other nations to carry out the plans of the Second Hague Conference without a moment's delay.

The fourth matter of importance lies in the hands of both branches of Congress. It is the one-battleship program. For two years the democrats have proposed one-battleship program and last year carried it out. The Navy League has been much alarmed and the naval forces throughout the country have been laboring for the past six months to secure a three or four-battleship program this winter. Washington correspondents have been supplied with specious articles and cleverly-written arguments in order to flood the papers throughout the country. It has been stated without authority that President Wilson favors a three-battleship program. At this moment when Winston Churchill's proposition to Germany for a naval holiday for a year commands the attention of the world, it will be the grossest blunder for the safest country in the world to increase its preparations for a mad rivalry in arms. It cannot be too often repeated that we are putting our chief defence where it is least needed and our least defence where it is most needed. We permit 600,000 Americans to perish annually from preventable causes, whereas it is well known that in all our foreign wars combined we lost but one fortieth of that number by foreign bullets.

Let it be remembered that all that is to be achieved must be accomplished by five hundred and thirty-one men in Congress and by our Chief Executive and State Department. Upon these men lies a heavy responsibility and these servants of the people should hear from their masters in no uncertain tone as regards these matters of national honor, justice and peace.

ELIZABETH HADDON.*

How well to turn aside to-day,
To cease our going to and fro,
To put our busy cares away,
And take a look at long ago.

Across two centuries of years,
We backward gaze with eager eyes;
A vision from the Past appears,
We see a gracious form arise.

So young, so brave, so true a maid;
Within her soul the call was clear;
Upon her slender shoulders laid
A burden that a man might fear.

How wide the sea that she must sail;
The last farewells, how hard to say;
How rough the waves; the ship how frail;
How long and weary was the way.

To the rude wilderness she brought
The gentleness of woman's ways,
The tenderness of woman's thought,
A woman's heart of prayer and praise.

Two-fold the aim of her desire,
A home in a far distant land,
With love and peace beside the fire,
And at the door, a welcome hand.

And she would build a house of prayer,
For worship, silent, pure and free,
With men and women equal there,
To speak the word or bend the knee.

So, turning from a life of ease,
To her hard task she set her hand;
Beneath the virgin forest trees,
She built her home, surveyed her land.

To dwell alone is far from good.
She had a heart, as maidens may,
Her love came riding through the wood,
And soon there was a wedding day.

Regardless of their selfish needs,
These two true lovers sought to find
A comradeship of noble deeds,
A loving service to mankind.

And, day by day, their hearts reached out
In love to all the country round,
And faithfully they went about,
To comfort, nurture, teach and guide.

The years pass on, here, or a grove,
Her faithful toil its harvest yields—
Where once the oxen sought his plow,
Outspread her wide and fertile fold.

A meeting-house upon her land
The walls of brick, the beams of oak,
She saw beside the highway stand,
Well filled with quiet Quaker folk.

She had those sorrows all must find,
Her lonely years of age and loss,
But sweet of spirit, calm of mind,
She did her work and bore her cross.

And those of us who now may come
To rest in these fair fields of hers,
Reverence the maker of a home,
And one of God's own ministers.

INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF ELIZABETH HADDON.*

HARRIET REDMAN WILLIAMS.

Elizabeth Haddon left no diary so we too are obliged to be pioneers and to blaze again the forest trails, this time through the pages of books, a few old letters, note books and meeting records, from which we piece together a story, full of youth and romance and religious zeal.

Elizabeth's father, John Haddon, was a blacksmith, who extended his trade to the making of anchors. The first five or six years of Elizabeth's life were spent on Jacob Street, in a place called Southwark, on the south bank of the Thames, opposite London and near her father's shop.

The story-and-a-half-houses stand as they did two hundred years ago on partially reclaimed land. The roofs protected from storm and time by sturdy English tile and decorated with chimney pots. Three little children, a boy and two girls, were sacrificed to the unhealthy locality in which they lived; then, as his trade increased, John Haddon moved farther up the river to Radriffe Parish into what was then almost open country, and here Elizabeth's sister, Sarah, was born. A six-story grain mill, alive with all the most modern machinery, now occupies the spot where this latter home stood and gives its name to the street and its commercial tone to the neighborhood from which once flowed kindly English hospitality.

Horselydown Meeting-house was within a half mile of this new home. John Haddon and his wife were married in this meeting and here Elizabeth worshipped until she left London for this country. John Haddon lived in the times of the persecution of Friends and suffered with others from the tyranny of those in authority. The records of Horselydown Meeting give many little glimpses of the struggles with the King's soldiers in carrying out his orders against Dissenters' Meeting-houses, also some of the uses to which Meeting-houses were put. In one note dated 1671, we read, "Ordered that Will Shewen doe goe to the artillery house and demand the timber and pay reasonable satisfaction for the buying of it, or to let them have it," which displays wonderful forbearance and forgiveness. According to our modern standards another interesting record is in regard to the care of the meeting-house under date of 1672, "Ordered that Thomas Parker have the key of the meeting-house door, and that he clean the house, set the forms to rights, open and shut the casements and windows from time to time, and that he have all the keys and that if any of the neighborhood do come to have leave to dry their clothes that one have it one day, another another, and not two in one day for fear of incummaney," a curious word, that has not been able to stand the test of the years.

Childhood was not treasured then as now; children were early initiated into the rudiments of learning so that by the age of four, Elizabeth had probably begun her substantial education. She was also actively interested in her mother's charities, as well as in the tales her father had to tell of the ports his honest anchors visited. For as she grew older, she went on modest little charitable ventures of her own. On one occasion, so the story goes, she asked her mother to let her have a party, and when the guests arrived, they were six tattered youthful beggars of the most forlorn London type, who did full justice to the cakes and fruit. When Elizabeth was only six years old, her father brought home Friends to tea from the afternoon meeting. One of them was a stranger, William Penn, who told them wonderful tales of his new colony in America and of the green country town, Philadelphia. This impressed the little girl, following as it did, a discussion of the more sombre troubles the Friends were having and colored the rest of her childhood play until Indian dolls and moccasins were laid aside for the more serious tasks her mature taste selected.

John Haddon was not among the first to become interested in the new colony in America, but in 1608, he bought a plantation of five hundred acres in what was termed West Jersey from a Friend, named Willis, who in turn had purchased it a few years before from William Penn. There is no record to show his motive for the purchase, but from that time Elizabeth's one design was a home in the new country. A few years before this exchange of good English coin and sheepskin, a new proselyte, John Estaugh, appeared at the Yearly Meeting, held at Horselydown Meeting-house, and attracted some attention with his preaching. Afterward he was John Haddon's guest at dinner and though Elizabeth, now about fourteen, was too young to appear at the table, they must have talked together. There is no other record of their seeing one another in England.

In the spring of 1701, Elizabeth's desire was gratified and she too sailed down the Thames in one of the little two or three masted ships used at that time on her long voyage to the land of her dreams. The captain's name was Nathaniel Puckle, but the name of his ship is unknown. The voyage, after weeks on the water, was safely accomplished, and she landed in Philadelphia, where some of the settlers were still living in caves. Here she visited some friends, following this sojourn with a visit to other friends in Burlington.

She was about twenty when she arrived in this country to assume the care of her father's possessions, an almost perfect type of the English Quakeress of that period. Generously educated at school as well as in her own home, where she had been trained in domestic sciences and in the judicious bestowing of charity and where she had intercourse with the best Friends of the time. "A citizen in the making," prepared to take up the restrictions and responsibilities of her new life and to follow with delight the star of her chosen destiny. No one, however respectfully they may pry into Elizabeth's motives, can ignore that fact that her love for John Estaugh weighed equally in the balance with her desire to carry Christianity to the Indians and succor to the new colony. Her devotion to him gives a touch of perpetual youth to her story.

After resting with her friends, she went to her new home in New Jersey. The following is a quotation from one of Elizabeth Haddon's kinsmen of the present day: "Almost opposite the place where William Penn had made his Peace Treaty with the Indian kings, there emptied a large creek into the Delaware. The English named it Cooper's Creek, after William Cooper, the Quaker emigrant, who owned three hundred acres at the mouth of the stream. This is the place now called Cooper's Point. Up this long winding creek was the humble little log house which had been relit by her father's orders for the new-comer. As the crow flies, it was about five miles from the mouth of the creek, but by the creek, the easiest way to travel in those days, it was nearly twice as far, no wagon road reached this lonely home of hers, only an Indian trail along which it was hard even to ride on horseback." It stood on high ground some one hundred and fifty yards from the water, in a clearing of the forest of pine and oak that stretched away on either side. Her house and purse were both large and her hospitality soon became famous, and as her residence was on the way to Newton Meeting, it was a stopping-place for Friends from all parts of the country. Here John Estaugh traveled with a certain John Richardson on his way from a religious visit in Virginia.

Some modern chroniclers have it that John Estaugh was rather awkward in his love-making; however, it is a tradition in the Gill family, one closely associated by ties of blood with Elizabeth Haddon, that the young minister observing the prosperity of the Haddons in England was depressed by the comparative humbleness of his own fortune and hesitated to make any advances. Fortunately for romance and for us he would not disguise his feeling for Elizabeth and she surmising the cause of his halting courtship, with her habitual directness, made the actual proposal easy, when he arrived in this country. Perhaps for a moment we may indulge in historical inaccuracy and quote from the Theologian's Tale of Longfellow:

"Then Elizabeth said, though still with a certain reluctance,
As if impelled to reveal a secret she fain would have guarded,
'I will no longer conceal what is laid upon me to tell thee,
I have received from the Lord a charge to love thee, John Estaugh.'

And John Estaugh made answer, surprised by the word she had spoken,
'Pleasant to me are thy converse, thy ways, thy meekness and spirit,
Pleasant thy frankness of speech, and thy soul's immaculate whiteness,
Love without dissimulation, a holy and inward adorning.
But I have yet no light to lead me, no voice to direct me.
When the Lord's work is done and the toil and the labor completed
He hath appointed to me, I will gather into the stillness
Of my own heart awhile and listen and wait for His guidance.'

Then Elizabeth said, not troubled or wounded in spirit,
'So is it best, John Estaugh. We will not speak of it further.
It hath been laid upon me to tell thee this, for to-morrow
Thou art going away, across the sea, and I know not
When I shall see thee more, but if the Lord hath decreed it
Thou wilt return again to seek me here and to find me.'
And they rode onward in silence and entered the town with the others."

They were married in her own home in the last of the summer of 1702, in the presence of a committee of Friends and a few guests, including some Indians whose calmness matched the serenity of their Quaker brethren.

Soon after this John Estaugh became John Haddon's business agent in this country, assuming the management of his property here, which had increased by extensive purchase.

Elizabeth and her husband made three visits to England, for Elizabeth, we gather at times, was homesick for London sounds and scenes, and neither pirates at sea, nor land company duties in New Jersey, nor gentle admonitions from her father, could dissuade her from making the perilous journey.

John Haddon and his wife never came to this country, though their plans to sail at one time developed so far that a copper furnace was made to take across the seas as a protection from our winters.

As the country became more thickly settled, a new site for a home was chosen and twelve years after their marriage a two-story brick house was built, a short distance from the present borough of Haddonfield. It is thus described by a person who resided there in the year 1830:

"The front door opened into a large hall with a fire-place at one end ornamented with tile, on each side of which was a cupboard with glass doors. The small parlor had a marble mantel and hearth and opened into the garden by a glass door and another with Venetian blinds. An entry back of the hall had a spiral staircase leading from it. At one end of this entry was a bed-room and the other a kitchen, with a room back of it. In the cellar was a large fire-place and dresser, and a vault under the kitchen four or five steps deeper. Fire destroyed this house in 1842." In the garden the yew trees brought from England still thrive, silent spectators of changing times and scenes.

John Estaugh had some knowledge of medicine and he and his wife were famous for their skill in nursing and healing. He also traveled in the ministry and wrote some tracts which were afterward published by Benjamin Franklin.

Her hospitality was unlimited, in connection with which Elizabeth's cheerful disposition, discretion and charity are often noted.

Having no children of their own, Elizabeth adopted as her heir, Ebenezer Hopkins, a son of her sister, Sarah Haddon Hopkins. He is the founder of the present family. Elizabeth lived to be eighty years old, surviving her husband by nearly twenty years. She retained to the last control of her affairs and guided those dependent upon her for advice and assistance. John Estauagh died in 1742 while on a religious visit to the West Indies.

No act in Elizabeth Estauagh's life displayed more of her business ability than her will, in which is shown a masterly knowledge of her estate, both real and personal.

This is the framework of Elizabeth Haddon's life from which poet and historian have drawn inspiration and adorned with the colors of their fancy. Each investigator must be impressed with the determination, the wonderful stamina of a child who at an early age selected her path and never deviated from it. Few annals provide such an incentive to reasonable men and women to do the simple things well, to meet difficulties, stand up under responsibilities, to get the best results from their chosen task.

Year after year the cherished mahogany and china associated with Elizabeth Haddon increase we suspect. We name our blue-eyed children, with English roses glowing in their cheeks, Elizabeth, but does her spirit go marching on? Are we pioneers? Does her life not give us the example to dare to blaze new trails and to push forward to the accomplishment of high tasks and lofty ideals?

"Others I doubt not, if not we,
The issue of our toils shall see;
And (they forgotten and unknown)
Young children gather as their own
The harvest that the dead had sown."

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE QUESTION OF AMUSEMENT.—Last winter a wealthy American woman gave an entertainment that she proudly asserted was unique—as doubtless it was. She stripped her spacious drawing-room of rugs and furniture, covered the floor with saw-dust, and stretched coarse canvas over the walls, in tolerable imitation of a tent. The proprietor of a circus that was then in winter quarters provided her with a professional clown, some acrobats, and—triumph of realism—half a dozen wild animals in their cages—small carnivora, warranted to roar fearfully. The guests came in correct evening dress, and sat on benches raised uncomfortably at one end of the room. Some distinguished amateur athletes gave an exhibition that was almost as good—within that limited space—as the performance of the acrobats. The clown tumbled and joked. The animals roared and imparted a true circus smell to their new quarters. Supper—the supper of civilization—was served on rough wooden trestles, with tin plates and tin cups. The guests were thrilled. The hostess was reasonably elate. At an enormous cost she had provided her friends with a diversion that very nearly equalled a real fifty-cent circus. She was a benefactress of society.

Now surely we have wandered as far from republican simplicity on the one hand as from the high altitude of civilization on the other, when such extravagant peculiarities pass for pleasure. "It is in his pleasures that a man truly lives," says Charles Lamb, who knew whereof he spoke, for he was rich in friends if poor in purse, and he had tasted night after night the joy of keen, witty, stimulating conversation. Virility delights with Lamb in the companionship of books and men, or with Scott in tarn and mountainside, or with Doctor Johnson in the crowded London streets. "When a man is tired of London, he is tired of life," and Johnson vigorously and zealously feel his splendid responsiveness to the great world he lived in. But the dullard who strives to baffle ennui by foolish and fantastic devices has receded from civilization and is moving backward to the childishness of savagery. When the avaya hunts, he is a man when he fights, he is something of a devil when he amuses himself, he is hopelessly and pitifully a child.

If we live in our pleasures we reveal our selves in our pleasures, and we are judged by them. The list of attractions offered by the theaters of any big American city is the most dispiriting of symptoms. Surely the nation is too robust for a diet of musical "shows" and vaudeville. Surely we have still some sentiment, some humor, some interest in the vital things of life. We do not yet resemble the apathetic little dog in Punch, whose mistress is compelled to hire another dog, a performing poodle, to amuse it. Ennui belongs to decadence. The French monarchy was tottering to its fall when Louis XV said wearily to a courtier, "Come, monsieur, let us bore ourselves together."—Youth's Companion.

LIVING, as we do, from day to day, we do not appreciate the great oscillations of thought, unless some shining moment marks them. Such a moment is marked by Sir Oliver Lodge's address, before the British Association, on immortality. Nearly two generations ago, men of science discovered the principle of evolution, and triumphantly proclaimed that material evolution would solve all the problems of the universe. Now at last is coming the swing the other way, and even science is beginning to recognize the vast possibilities of spiritual mystery.—Youth's Companion.

THE MODERN MIRACLE.—"Doctor Brown," asked Bob Metcalf, "do you honestly believe that the miracles in the New Testament actually occurred?"

The clergyman looked keenly at the boy, and waited a moment before replying.

"You see, it's hard for me to think so," Bob went on; "There is no way to account for them, and they are contrary to the laws of nature."

"What are those 'laws of nature' you speak of, Bob?" the clergyman asked, gravely. "We speak as if we knew all about them. In reality, all we know is a little bit about a few of them. How many other laws of 'nature' there may be that can produce results entirely contrary to what we have been accustomed, we do not know! What is a 'miracle' to one age, may be commonplace to the next. Is there anything in the New Testament more startling to those who witnessed it, than the wonders of electricity or wireless telegraphy would have been?"

"But with our increased knowledge," replied Bob, "we ought to have gained some insight into the laws whereby those miracles were produced, if they really happened."

"That has been the case," replied the minister. "Most of the miracles were miracles of healing. Modern psychology has shown us that such results are produced by natural laws. Huxley, the ablest agnostic of the last century, says that scientifically, he has not the right to say that any one of the miracles was inherently impossible. He says that each case must be decided simply upon the evidence."

"What evidence is there to support them?"

"To me," said Doctor Brown, "the fact that the miracles in the Bible are just the kind of thing Christ would have done if He were able, means much. They were all done to relieve human distress. Not one was for Himself. Not one was meaningless, as all of those in the spurious 'Gospel of the Infancy' are. There the writer says the child Jesus made pigeons of clay that became alive when He clapped His hands. When the early centuries began to imagine what miracles our Lord could perform, that meaningless miracle resulted. Those in the Scriptures are entirely in keeping with our Lord's dignity of character.

"Moreover, it seems to me rational to believe that Christ could do what other men could not. Professor James has declared that the possibilities of human nature, its powers and capacities, are not yet even faintly realized or appreciated. It would seem reasonable that one so in advance of mankind as He, had powers that other men did not possess.

"But I am infinitely more concerned about another phase of His power. Whether or not He fed five thousand people on the mountainside, I know He has fed the souls of millions since. Whether or not He calmed that storm on the Sea of Galilee, I know He has calmed storms of passion and hatred and fear in the souls of Christendom from that time until now. Whether or not He brought Lazarus out of the tomb, I know He has taken the souls of men in whom truth and honor and sobriety and purity had died, and He has brought new life and power and goodness to birth in those souls. After all, Bob, we have ourselves seen the greatest miracle that can be wrought!"—Youth's Companion.

The following anecdote is related of Earl Camden, when Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

Being on a visit to Lord Dacre, at Alveley, in Essex, he walked out with a gentleman, a very absent-minded man, to a hill at no great distance from the house, upon the top of which stood the stocks of the village.

The Chief Justice sat down upon them, and after awhile, having a mind to know what the punishment was, he asked his companion to open them and put him in. This being done, his friend took a book from his pocket, sauntered on, and so completely forgot the judge and his situation that he returned to Lord Dacre's.

In the meantime, the Chief Justice being tired of the stocks, tried in vain to release himself. Seeing a countryman pass by, he endeavored to move him to let him out, but obtained nothing by his motion.

"No, no, old gentleman," said the countryman, "you was not set there for nothing," and left him until he was released by a servant of the house, who had been hastily dispatched in quest of him.

Some time after he presided at a trial in which a charge was brought against a magistrate for false imprisonment and for setting in the stocks. The counsel for the magistrate in the reply made light of the whole charge, and more especially setting in the stocks, which he said everybody knew was no punishment at all.

"Brother, have you ever been in the stocks?" asks the Chief Justice.

"Really, my lord, never."

"Then I have," said the judge, "and I assure you, brother, it is no such trifle as you represent."

A little experience of the real trials of life would be useful to those whose path in life has been smooth and prosperous, but who really wish to help their less fortunate brethren. Nothing promotes true sympathy like a kindred experience.

THE WORK AT TUNESASSA.

The family consists of the Superintendent and Matron, a caretaker for the boys and one for the girls, two teachers for the upper and lower grades, a Manual Training teacher, a Sewing teacher, and two Domestic Science teachers in the kitchen and laundry. These are all interested and earnest young Friends, who have their time very fully occupied in training and teaching some fifty Indian children at the irresponsible ages of nine to sixteen years. A day woman, also, makes excellent butter from the herd of forty-seven cows. Three to five hundred pounds weekly supplies the family as well as customers in Salsmanan and Atlantic City, or elsewhere. An Indian man or two also work by the day on the farm. But where the malking, cooking, baking, washing and ironing and all other indoor and out-door work is accomplished largely by so many small pairs of hands, it may readily be imagined that the oversight, responsibility and help of every other person is needed from early dawn till dark, to complete the day's work and pay.

The new Manual Training appeals to most of the boys, and with their teacher's help, useful work has already been accomplished, such as the making of their work-benches, with drawers for the tools, the making of new stanchion frames and other carpenter work for the cattle barn; milking stools and small tabourets for plants. Also a huge bread chest, with partition for two bakings; lockers and doors for the girls' sewing-room; wooden mallets for use in the shop, made by the little boys; and other work about the buildings. Such practical experience now should be of great value to them later in life.

The girls, too, have made progress in making dresses or aprons in the sewing-hour; and the making and dressing of their "corn-husk" dollies out of school. Basketry and carpet-weaving are largely in the future. A fly-shuttle loom has been presented, which, though not yet in active operation, promises rapid work. An upright hand-loom, similar to those used by the Navajos in the southwest, in process of construction in the shop, should offer opportunity for Indian hand woven rugs. Weekly lessons in basketry have been begun—taught by one of the Indian mothers, living seven miles away. She comes by train, staying a day overnight; but gives her time and services freely—for she says, "We are doing all that we can for their children; and she and her husband want to do all they can, to help all children." Her husband also spent a day "pounding splints," but would accept no money, telling the boys, when they asked what he was going to get for it, "I want all the Indian girls to have a chance to learn to make baskets." This is an instance of Indian "giving," the spirit of which means much to us.

TREASURER'S REPORT.

Encouraging progress has been made in securing contributions for installing a central steam heating plant to replace the numerous stoves throughout the building, and for other improvements at the School.

Of the $4,000 which it is hoped to raise, $2,550 has already been received or promised from one hundred and three contributors.

The architect's plan for the new heating plant called for a one-storied building. It has since been suggested that the raising of this building one story would make available a good-sized room which on rainy days could be used as an outlet for the energies of boys or girls, and at other times would serve as gymnasium or work-room.

FRIENDLY NEWS.

A POSTCARD from M. I. Reich, under date of Twelfth Month 1st, says: "In thankfulness and peace I have been permitted to return home again. All is well—through mercy."

It is reported from San José that our dear friend, Joel Bean, has been quite prostrated as the result of additional surgical treatment. A large circle will feel sympathy for him, and join his family in the hope that he may be spared for further usefulness.

The following report of the Australian General Meeting is adapted from The Friend (London):

At the General Meeting at Adelaide "there was a spirit of quiet willingness to see visions of future work, and to take steps for entering upon this as soon as the right workers volunteer." Active public peace work was undertaken by Friends during the meeting. William H. F. Alexander speaks of how "Friends got that splendid comprehensive minute from York-hire and one from China before the ken of the public, the latter being specially valuable in view of the 'Yellow Peril' clamor. The valuable minute on the attitude of Friends with regard to militarism was sent to the Prime Minister, the Minister for Defence, and to each Member of the Federal Parliament."

HADDONFIELD and SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING, held at Moorestown, N. J., on the eleventh inst., while not so large as sometimes, was yet well attended. There were but few vacant seats upon the main floor.

The meeting for worship was quiet, and most of those who spoke did not follow each other so rapidly, as is sometimes the case at our large meetings.

Word of the death of our friend, Edwin P. Sewell, had reached Friends as meeting gathered, and the sense of our loss in his removal and thankfulness for the Grace which sustains through pain and death, had place in the exercise for the best welfare of the living.

In the business meeting, which was held mostly in joint session, reports of the Quarterly Meetings Committee on Visitation, of the Atlantic City and of the Merchantville Committee were read.

The three city Monthly Meetings have for some time had under discussion the question of the right use of the income of the Forrest Trust. For many years the Select School has been receiving an annual appropriation in addition to the payment of individual tuition bills. It is proposed to decrease this appropriation year by year, until the Select School shall receive as Westtown and other Friends' schools in the Yearly Meeting receives, only sums needed to meet the actual tuition bills of pupils whose parents require the assistance. The final adjustment of the question has probably not been made.

The Board of Managers of Friends' Institute on S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, presented their Thirty-third Annual Report recently.

The history of the Institute for a third of a century contains much of interest to its members, but the retrospect for one short year gives little that calls for special notice.

Over 12,000 have used the rooms during the year for many different purposes.

It is encouraging to note the number of Committees meeting at the Institute is continually increasing, and it often proves difficult to accommodate all of them.

Early in the year, Asa S. Wing, who has been President of Friends' Institute since 1884, felt it necessary to resign his position. The Board feels that the members will unite with it in sincere appreciation of the long service of the President in the best interests of the Association.

During the year several socials were held at the Institute, given with the desire to bring together the young Friends residing in the city. While not directly under its care, the Board has wished to encourage such effort by granting the use of the rooms in connection with those of Twelfth Street Meeting.

The value of the Institute as a centre of Friendly interests is widely acknowledged and shown constantly by the use made of its facilities. As yet, however, the invitation to share in the support by becoming members has been accepted by only a few of those who are partaking of its benefits. In order to arouse a fresh interest a Committee of the Board has prepared a brief illustrated history of the Institute which will soon be sent throughout the Yearly Meeting limits, and it is earnestly hoped by the Board that it may meet with a hearty response.

FRIENDS' meetings are to be resumed the first and third First-days of each month at eleven a. m., 424 Duquesne Way, Pittsburgh, Pa., in the Y. W. C. A. Building. Also, the Quaker Round Table meeting the third Sixth-day evening of each month. Friends passing through or stopping over night in Pittsburgh will be most welcome.

The British Friend calls attention to a Friends' meeting held recently at a Congregational place of worship near Birmingham, England. The "concern" in this case originated with the "church," and a company of a dozen or more Friends yielded to an impression of duty and attended as invited. The meeting was held after the order of Friends, as we understand it, without any prearranged schedule and without the singing of hymns. Those who were really under the weight of it felt the occasion to have been owned and blessed of the Master.

FRIENDS already support a fair number of periodicals dealing with the interests of the Society. Another is soon to be launched. We take the following from a prospectus of Present Day Papers, a monthly journal to be published in Philadelphia and to be edited by a joint staff of English and American Friends; the prospectus does not give the list, but states that Rufus M. Jones of Haverford is to be Editor-in-chief. Of the English Board, Edward Grubb will be a member, and he will be prepared to take a responsible part in the general editorial policy, and to contribute articles from time to time. It is also hoped that most of the able writers who have given The British Friend its present standing will continue as contributors to the new paper, with the addition of other well-equipped and sympathetic writers from the United States.

It is felt that "the growing fellowship between Friends in the United Kingdom and in America and Australia, is the best evidence of the sense of the world-wide union of the Society, and that the publication of a monthly magazine of still wider scope, and of a more universality of finding space for current denunciations of Friends' work."

The Bethel Friend, which with the prospectus mentioned above, for the second year, is to be discontinued. It will be replaced by a new journal, the name where it has been published, is not given.

The American Friend, for the month of December, 1913, contains the following which appears to be an English version of the same:

Francis A. Wright, in a paper read at the Yearly Meeting, at the local meeting on Ministry and Oversight at Kenilworth, N. J., August 1913, the use of their vestments in a Friends' congregation was a prominent note explains, with unassuming humor, that they are not used only on special occasions." F. A. Wright also mentions a very beautiful and impressive service" held in a "Friends' Church on Good Friday, 1913, when "there was no room for any spontaneity or impromptu expression of any description. Everything was planned beforehand, and each person sang or spoke or prayed exactly in the words of the printed programme." His article is well entitled, "Whether are we teaching?" In a later issue there is an editorial on "Conserving our Membership," in which it is stated that while eight Yearly Meetings report 5,520 "conversions and renewals for the year," and while the total for the year would probably be not less than 7,000, it is likely that the figures of "total membership this year will indicate a loss." The exchange comments: "We agree with the writer that there is something wrong, and ask him to consider whether the two things to which we have drawn attention are not causally connected."

WESTTOWN NOTES.

The fall term is nearing its close—reservations for pupils living at a distance have been made on trains leaving Philadelphia on the twenty-third instant; the vacation will last until First Month 5th, or two weeks lacking a day. One of the important jobs which is to be pushed through while the large family is away, will be the extension of the steam heating system to the boys' north side rooms; the corresponding rooms on the girls' side were supplied with radiators several years ago.

Though we are having some wintry weather, yet the building operations connected with the orchard proposition are progressing; the masons have the walls for the dwelling house well under way; the pipes from the windmill were just in and covered before the ground was frozen—rocks on the large-pasture field have been blasted and are being put to good use in the walls.

On Seventh-day last with ice two inches thick, some of the younger boys indulged in skating for awhile on the shallow end of the lake. This naturally whets the appetite for more of the sport on the larger field.

The lecture on Sixth-day evening last was illustrated; Stanley R. Yarnall, who had been recently touring Norway, was well posted on his subject, and the well-selected slides were much enjoyed, accompanied by an interesting narrative of experiences.

The social which occurred on the evening of the thirteenth, was one of rather unusual interest; a special feature during a portion of the time was a reversion of the usual order of things, wherein a large group of the faculty were the pupils and a senior girl acted as teacher, there were roars of laughter as one after another of the pupils, renewing their youth as it were, did and said things, to amuse, if not instruct the interested audience.

On Fifth-day of last week Charles S. Carter and Sarah W. Cooper, members of the First Month Visiting Committee, were acceptably in attendance at our meeting for worship.

On First-day morning, fourteenth last, we were favored with the company of Walter W. Haviland and family—the first named was exercised in the ministry; in the afternoon there was held in the meeting-room a meeting for worship, intended for the school family and those of our neighbors who upon invitation might incline to attend, upwards of two hundred persons, young and old, were present; a reverent silence prevailed over the assembly which was not broken for fifteen or twenty minutes after which a number of vocal offerings both in prayer and in praise were made. It was felt that there was a living solemnity in the offering of vocal service; the goodly number of visitors, members of other churches, was an encouragement to those whose concern it was to hold the meeting.

In the evening Walter W. Haviland addressed the School in joint collection in the library on the book of Jonah.

CORRESPONDENCE.

It was with much interest and satisfaction that we read "In Memoriam." Persis E. Hallock.

It has called to mind many pleasing and precious memories of our dear friend. I was glad of the allusion to her love of flowers. I remember her expressing her preference for white flowers. A white lilac, a Deutzia gracilis, a yuca filamentosa and white campanula, taken up by her own hands years ago and given to me, remind us each year that white flowers were her especial favorites. It seems fitting that she did admire them in all their beauty and purity—true emblems of her own life of singular purity and loveliness.

I love to recall a marriage occasion when our dear friend quoted the text, "Light is sown for the righteous and gladness for the upright in heart." (Psalm xxvii: 11), followed by a heart-felt message of love and earnest desire for the true welfare of the young people thus united to travel life's pathway together.

Then I recall on a funeral occasion her impressive message from the text, "My witness is in heaven and my reward is on high." (Job, xvi: 19). Truly the memory of the just is blessed.

POPLAR RIDGE, N. Y.

EXTRACTS FROM A PERSONAL LETTER TO MARGARET W. HAINES FROM ALICE G. LEWIS, TELLING OF A MEETING HELD IN TOKIO IN COMMEMORATION OF THE TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE FRIENDS' GIRLS' SCHOOL.

ELEVENTH MONTH 7th, 1913.

I cannot forbear writing briefly to-day of our yesterday's gathering. The day was beautiful, the preparations complete and the spirit fine.

The room was comfortably filled with the old students and friends of the school; the program simple and dignified.

First there was a time of devotion, in which Mangi Kato read from the Scriptures and engaged in prayer. Then the president gave some account of the founding of the school and the care throughout these twenty-five years that had been given so devotedly by the Foreign Missionary Association of Friends of Philadelphia.

Next Josephi Cosand spoke of the arrival of himself and wife in Japan and the steps that led up to the founding of the school. Then Chuzo Kaifu spoke of the early days and particularly of the spirit of simplicity that had always been the aim of the school.

Then the President of the National W. C. T. U. and for nearly forty years the president of the Presbyterian Girls' School spoke on the advancement of women's education.

The main speaker of the afternoon session was Professor Shemoda, of the Women's Higher Normal School. He spoke very well indeed on women's education and was followed by Dr. Nitobe, who spoke briefly on the purpose of education.

Then Gilbert Bowles read a letter of greeting from the American Ambassador, who was unable to be present, and the cablegram from your anniversary meeting in Philadelphia. The cable message reached us at 3.45, while the main address was in progress. Its arrival was most welcome and the time opportune.

In the evening the Japanese held in the meeting-house a thanksgiving meeting for the work of Minnie P. Bowles, during the past twenty years, for on Tenth Month 18th she completed her twentieth year of service in Japan. Those present on this occasion were mostly teachers and pupils of the school and members of the meeting.

We all, both you and we, have much to be thankful for in blessings upon the school, but our greatest concern must be to seek to make ourselves more efficient instruments in our Father's hands that the influence of the school may be wider, deeper and nobler.

I wish that some of you might have been with us, but I know your hearts were here.

A. G. LEWIS.

MITO, Japan, Eleventh Month 7, 1913.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It has recently been stated that strong in their belief that the days of the beverage liquor traffic are numbered, fifty prominent business men and clergymen went to Washington to participate in a demonstration on the steps of the Capitol, when 1000 prominent men of the nation, representing every State, will ask Congress to re-submit to the States an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting the manufacture, importation and transportation of intoxicating liquors.

A despatch says: "Cotton is being grown successfully at Roseville, 107 miles north of San Francisco. Interested ranchers already have contracted for seed, planning to experiment on a larger scale. This year's cotton production in the Imperial Valley is 100,000 bales, an increase from 100 bales in four years."

It is stated from Houston, Texas: "One hundred and fifty persons were known to have perished in the floods that have swept through several sections of Texas. Twenty-five of those drowned were in territory where warnings have been posted for several days."

A despatch of the 8th from Washington says: "President Wilson today pleased a delegation of 100 women suffragists by telling them, when they called at the White House, that, personally, he favored the appointment of a standing committee of the House on woman suffrage."

It was stated on the 9th inst. from Harrisburg, Pa.: "Letters and other notices received by the State Department of Health indicate that all the larger corporations in Pennsylvania have already complied with the order of the advisory board of the department relating to the abolition of the common drinking cup and the common towel. Many of the corporations have been furnishing individual cups and towels for some time."

President Wilson's efforts to bring about a settlement of the internal troubles in Mexico without armed intervention were praised, and laws to control and limit the manufacture and sale of firearms were urged in resolutions adopted by the Pennsylvania Peace Society, at its forty-seventh anniversary meeting, in this city. A protest was made against the indiscriminate use of firearms among children and others. The carrying of weapons also was denounced.

A despatch from Portland, Oregon, says: "A ruling made by the State Welfare Commission last night, effective in 60 days, prescribes a minimum scale of $8.25 a week for all women employed in industrial occupations in the State of Oregon, and fixes 54 hours as the maximum they may be employed in any one week."

It has been stated that the property loss on the Great Lakes during the recent storm is estimated at from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, including the score or more vessels driven on the rocks or shore and partially or wholly destroyed. The loss of life among sailors is placed at approximately 260, of which 95 were on Lake Huron, 48 on Lake Superior, seven on Lake Michigan and six on Lake Erie.

The International Anti-Vivisection and Animal Congress adopted a resolution at the session in Washington, asking Congress to appoint a joint committee to investigate vivisection and other forms of cruelty to animals.

It is said that 6,000 tons of beef arrived at New York from the Argentine Republic one day lately. The beef was admitted free of duty under the new tariff law. But still the demand was so much greater than the supply that prices were no lower. More Argentine beef is on the way.

It is stated that 1200 "stay-on-the-farm" boys and girls from Ohio visited Washington lately at an expense of about $100,000. Other hundreds are expected.

It is said that the capacity for sending wireless messages across the Atlantic has been trebled lately. The new duplex system installed by the Marconi company makes it easy to send and receive messages at the same time, without interference.

A despatch from Springfield, Ill., of the 12th, says: "Governor Dunne's proclamation prohibiting the shipment into Illinois of dairy cattle from the following States was issued to-day: Pennsylvania, New York, West Virginia, Virginia, Wisconsin, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, Missouri, Arkansas and Montana. The purpose is to prevent the spread of bovine tuberculosis in this State."

It was stated from Reading, Pa., on the 12th inst.: "The Pennsylvania State Grand jury held its final session here to-day. The Committee on Peace, in its annual report, indorsed a resolution calling upon the nations of the world to refrain from the construction of dreadnaughts and war armaments during the coming year."

It is stated from Washington that this year's cotton crop is estimated to be worth close to $1,000,000,000, the most valuable ever produced in this country. The previous most valuable crop was in 1910. It was valued at $963,180,000.

Doctor Neff gives warning against pneumonia, which he says causes the death of nearly 3000 persons every year in Philadelphia. He says: "Don't sleep with the bed-room windows closed. Treat pneumonia as a catching disease."

The Delaware County No-License League has filed remonstrances weighing more than 400 pounds, and containing 20,000 signatures, against saloonkeepers of the county.

It is reported from Colorado that the fruit crop of the Grand Valley amounts for 1913 to 2500 cars, of which $53 are apples, 800 peaches, and the remainder canteloupes, pears, etc.

It is stated that according to a statement issued by the Department of Labor, investigations carried on in 40 different cities show that the things which the average family uses cost eight per cent. more than at this time last year, and 15 per cent. higher than two years ago.

A despatch from Santa Fé, New Mexico, says: "Forgotten cities of the prehistoric people, far beyond what was deemed the furthest eastern limit of the town buildings, were reported lately to the School of American Archaeology at Santa Fé. The ruins of the villages and communal dwellings antedate the Spanish conquest of 300 and more years ago and, judging from the debris that covered the sites and hides the ruins, the cities are a thousand and more years old. The two villages nearest to Pinos Wells are located on a high mound, and the communal buildings are circular in form."

It is stated that a tremendous downpour of rain in Texas, lasting three days, led to the loss of 75 lives and $2,000,000 in property. Streams that are usually only a few rods wide broadened out to five or six miles, covering or floating away the little cabins. In some places 100 or more people huddled upon little mounds of earth that still remained above water, and waited for the rescuing boats. Some spent days and nights in the branches of trees, or clinging to roofs.

It is said that with 2,128,255 books and pamphlets, the great Congressional Library at Washington is outgrowing its building and already needs larger quarters. Within a year, 115,000 books and pamphlets were added. This is the largest library in the world, excepting that of the British Museum.

FOREIGN.—A despatch of the 9th from Victoria, British Columbia, says: "An order in council promulgated yesterday by the British Columbia Government prohibits for a time the entry to the province of all artisans and laborers. The order is not restricted to any particular race of people. The reasons for the action is the congested conditions of labor on the Pacific coast."

A despatch of the 9th from Kiev, Russia, says: "Sixteen hundred Jewish young men and women, students at the schools of dentistry in this city, to-day were served with notices of expulsion by order of the Governor. It was declared in the notices that the students did not possess the legal right of domicile in Kiev."

It is stated that 28 million copies of the Bible are now distributed annually in the world.

In an address before the Canadian Society in New York, Secretary Bryan declared that no cause would be given for war with any other country during the present administration.

A despatch of the 10th inst. from Christiania, Norway, says: "As the Nobel peace prize was not awarded last year, the Norwegian committee to-day awarded two full prizes of $40,000 each, one to Senator Elihu Root, of New York, and the other to Senator Henry La Fontaine, of Brussels, Belgium, ex-president of the International Peace Bureau at Berne. The report of the committee refers to Senator Root's work in the pacification of the Philippine and Cuban provinces, and the American-Japanese dispute."

A despatch from Constantinople of the 11th inst. says: "Work has been opened of the Empress's Marriage to marry the Sultan and his bride, completed in the work of restoring the property of the Meuse, some of the granary of the world, by means of irrigation. The Wall of the city, who designed the walls for the Turkish Government, is now building the Garden of Eden now abandoned in the district of the city of Bagdad. Further work of the city to complete the work of irrigating the country, and Egypt, and to bring the sea and the empire to the empire."

It is stated that a "naval holiday" of one year is proposed, and Secretary Daniels is doing all he can to bring it about. The agreement calls all the nations to send delegates to confer in Washington, D. C., to agree that each will stop building battle-ships for at least twelve months. Then it is hoped that the agreement will be continued for another year, and another and another.

A despatch from Peking, China, of the 12th, says: "M. Kroupensky, the Russian Minister to China, in the name of his government, proposed the withdrawal of all foreign troops from China proper; that is, from all parts which have not become colonies of the Powers or have not been leased to them. This would mean the withdrawal of the foreign forces at Peking and at other points of the province of Chih, including the legation guards, the regiments at Tientsin and the troops guarding the railway between the sea and Peking. Russia considers conditions in the north of China no longer dangerous to foreigners, and, according to M. Kroupensky, intends, in case the other Powers disagree on the proposal, to act alone and withdraw even her legation guard."

THE QUAKER CALENDAR FOR 1914 IS READY

One of the very nicest Christmas Calendars has always been the Quaker Calendar :

This year the Calendar consists of 12 leaves (one for each month), size 8x11, is splendidly printed in a dark brown ink and bound with a dark rich brown silk cord. The subjects illustrated are the best we have ever shown and consist of pictures of some of the most interesting moments in the lives of Friendly leaders and also some splendid illustrations of our colleges and schools, etc. They are "George Fox Refusing to Take the Oath;" "Swarthmore Hall," (the residence of the Fell family); "Barclay of Ury;" "Jordans Meeting House," (the burial place of William Penn and his family); "Thomas Ellwood Reading to Milton;" "Interior, Birmingham Meeting House;" "Elizabeth Fry Speaking to Convicts Bound for Australia;" "Haverford College;" "William Penn and Rebecca Wood, of Darby;" "Swarthmore College;" "John Woolman and the Slave;" "Old Westtown."

We would be glad to send this calendar "on approval." That is, we will send one calendar by mail allowing the privilege of examining it and either returning the calendar or sending us 25 cents, which is the price of the calendar postpaid.

VISITATION COMMITTEES.

There is something significant in the fact that at the present time the four largest Quarterly Meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have, as the result of independent action, committees of visitation under appointment. This surely means far more than that a Committee has been appointed in each of these meetings to visit the families and the meetings. What its true significance is and what it seems to point to may be a profitable topic of thought.

Most of us are originally Friends by inheritance; we have come into possession of much that differentiates Friends from others, just as one inherits privileges because he belongs to a certain family. Had we been trained as carefully in some other fold it may be that we would have been as strong supporters of that denomination as we claim to be of Friends. This does not mean that we are traditional and not heart Quakers. No one can estimate the value of the initial impulse given to one's life career in determining the final direction of its course.

The fact that most of us are Friends by birthright and by very much that is peculiar to us as a people is accepted by us almost as a matter of course, before we have any very clearly defined convictions regarding it, make us a people set apart from many, with whom we rub elbows, but of whose views of life's problems we have no adequate knowledge.

Our circumscribed education, the guard that has been set about it, has accomplished much that is excellent, but it has also yielded fruits not unmixed with what we would be glad to be rid of. It has surely created on our part a spirit of aloofness toward others, and has made others think that such a feeling exists far out of proportion to the real thing. This is a natural limitation of our plan of training, and it is exactly in line with what one might expect. There is probably nothing in man's schemes of planning, that if pushed to its extreme limit, be that ever so desirable, but will develop excesses that are objectionable and detract from the ultimate good.

There are two texts of Scripture that have been handed forth from the Friends' galleries, and from other galleries as well, which represent two phases or attitudes of Christian growth, and as the emphasis is placed first on one and then on the other, first one made to eclipse the other, and then conditions reversed, the church has responded, and responded more quickly than one may at first reflection appreciate. The trouble all along has been that we have failed to grasp or to follow the Will of the Divine Giver, who has placed the e-texts as our guides, and who intended that they should never be divorced.

It was part of the last recorded message of our Saviour, a found near the conclusion of Mark's Gospel: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," and then we turn to the same relative position in St. Luke and read that after the little band of devoted followers had recovered from the wonderment, that came upon them, when they had found themselves in the very presence of their risen Lord, He said to them, "And ye are witnesses of these things. And behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you; but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high."

How these two commands of "Go" and "Tarry" have been played upon! What wrecks there have been because men have gone who should have tarried, and have tarried when the command has sounded clear to go. It is the discerning mind that alone can know the guiding, and it is the willing spirit that can alone obey and it is the combining of the two commands that can alone bring peace to the individual and call down God's blessing on whatever one endeavors to do.

If one will read church history from the view-point these texts bring up, he will find that all along through the centuries excess of zeal has been checked till it results in stagnation, and we can find sad evidences of this in the short history of our own Society. The fact that at this time a great majority of our membership, so far as they can act as a unit in the capacity of Quarterly Meetings are sufficiently alert to have under appointment large committees for the spiritual welfare of the body, is indication of the stirrings of life among us. This we do not believe is anything short of the yielding on our part to an impression of duty brought home very clearly to some of the membership, and a willing surrender on the part of many more to yield themselves to such service as opens up before them.

The ideal plan of religious service as held by Friends is the Gospel plan, for each man and woman to yield a full surrender to the Master's call and to follow or tarry as He directs. This is so high and holy a calling that none can invent or contrive anything that transcends it; yet it is one that the humblest and simplest are enjoined to adopt, but, to modestly accept a position in a large or small committee that has been called into service as the result of a prayerful attitude toward the Master's Will on the part of the fathers and mothers in the church, is so closely allied to the other, the most perfect plan, that it receives our endorsement.

The service of such a committee is two-fold, direct and reactive, and it is, or at least should be, wide-spreading. We believe it stirs up life among the visited, and returns with richness upon those who visit. It may be one of God's ways to develop latent gifts, for He demands little sacrifices at first, and as these are yielded to then more difficult and it may be, more important, are added.

In columns of THE FRIEND have appeared notices not infrequently of late of meetings held under the appointment of one or another of these committees, wherein the baptizing power of God's spirit has been felt in an eminent degree. If an afternoon spent in the service of such a committee has dipped thee or me into a spirit of outreaching prayer, and has lifted us more out of self and selfishness, it has been an afternoon well spent; if it has through me helped my fellow-member who has sat beside me, it has had even wider service, and if in God's providence it has strengthened a neighbor whose life I know little, alas! too little about, and whose perplexities I have never stopped to help him solve, it has been an afternoon returning the richest harvest of all.

I AM A STRANGER ON THE EARTH.

TRANSLATED FROM A WALDENSIAN JOURNAL, "LA LUCE," FOR "THE FRIEND."

If thou has sojourned in a foreign land and if the language of the country has been a strange tongue to thee, thou wilt know why thou was homesick. Everything seemed to remind thee of the land of thy birth.

So it is with the soul. It longs for and seeks its native land. The soul will find peace only when it has found its native land and until it has, it will ever lament its isolation.

At first the soul goes astray and seeks happiness amid pleasures, wealth and vanity. Here in spite of the joy and intoxication of a day, the soul is not happy. And then is heard an insistent voice which says: "Seek, still seek."

In meeting the Christ of the Gospels, the soul finds the glorious revelation of the land of its nativity. Here near to God it finds pardon, purity, justice, love.

Yet something is still lacking. Toward men through the effect of sin, brotherly communion ever remains imperfect; toward God also through the effect of sin, a cloud seems to fall between God and man. Because of these isolating, chilling influences, the soul does not recognize, except at certain moments, the atmosphere of its native land.

Oh yes, like Christian thou must consider thyself a stranger on the earth. If thou should lose this feeling, thou should have to acknowledge that thou has gone back again to the earthly, to the carnal things. This misfortune will reveal to thee the sublimity of thy origin. Born in heaven, thou will long for the land of thy birth. Then by faith in Him who has risen again and has revealed this land thou shalt take possession of it forever and joyous songs shall take the place of mournful sighs.—TITO CELLI.

WHOM HAVE I IN HEAVEN BUT THEE?

From past regret and present faithlessness,
From the deep shadow of former distress,
And from the nameless weariness that grows
As life's long day seems wearing to its close;

Thou! Life within my life, than self more near!
Thou! veiled Presence infinitely dear!
From all illusive shades of sense I flee,
To find my centre and my rest in Thee.

Take part with me against those doubts which rise
And seek to throne Thee far in distant skies!
Take part with me against the self that dares
Assume the burden of these sins and crimes!

How shall I call Thee who art always here,
How shall I praise Thee who art still most dear.
What may I give Thee save what Thou hast given
And whom but Thee have I in earth or heaven?—

JOHN MARTIN'S HOUSE AND THE FORREST TRUST.

GEORGE VAUX.

William Forrest wrote two letters of instructions relative to the disposition of his devise, which were annexed to or accompanied his Will.

The first of these was addressed by endorsement on the back "To the Monthly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia," and was of even date with his Will. It is as follows:

PHILADA., 30th 8th Mo., 1710.

DEAR FRIENDS.—In the love of the blessed Truth, which is unchangeable, wherein we have often had sweet comfort together, in a sense whereof I do at this time salute you, herewith transmitting unto you the inclosed, containing my last will and testament, of the same date, desiring the lots, houses and premises may not be otherwise sold or disposed of, but for the particular uses which I have already expressed; and the inheritance thereof, in fit persons which the Meeting may make choice from time to time, forever; to be kept and the profits thereof to be laid out for charitable uses as therein expressed; and so, in the same love, hoping therein to remain and finish my course here in this world, I take my last farewell and remain your friend and brother whilst I am

WM. FORREST.

Witnesses present:

THOS. STORY,
ANTHONY MORRIS,
ANTHONY MORRIS, JR.
JOS. LAWRENCE.

The other letter of instruction was in William Forrest's own handwriting, and is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, 6 day of ye 3 Mo., 1714.

DEAR FRIENDS.—This is my desire: that the house and lot I have left upon my will to my Friends Isaac Norris and Wm. Hudson, after my decease and my wife, I desire that it may not be put to that use John Martin's house is. I desire it to be kept in good repair and let out, and the income of it for the use of poor Friends and other charitable uses, as Friends may see fit. This from your loving brother.

WILLIAM FORREST.

This last letter of instruction, as it has been mostly seen, has had the words, "Friends' Almshouse," or their equivalent, introduced by some unauthorized person, with the object of making it appear that the institution known as Friends' Almshouse was the only institution which was excluded from participating in the benefits of the devise. This circumstance has been misleading and obscured the fact that it was the use and not any particular institution that was prohibited. As a matter of fact, as will be seen by the quotations which follow, Friends' Almshouse had no existence until the year 1727, thirteen years after William Forrest wrote his last letter of instruction, and consequently it could not have been that institution only which he had in mind, although it was undoubtedly subject to the prohibition as well as others. The essential point as to what the prohibition referred to, was what John Martin's house was used for. It cannot be doubted that it was a boarding-house for poor Friends, and it was this that was forbidden. Any institution having boarding-house characteristics could not participate in the benefits of the charity.

It will be seen from the following extracts from the Minutes of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting that the property of John Martin was always spoken of, and that the name of Almshouse does not seem to have appeared until 1727 when the arrangements were made for building that institution on the Walnut Street front of the lot.

MEMORANDUM OF EXTRACT FROM MINUTES OF PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MEETING.

Date Ninth Month 27, 1702.—Jno. Martin by his last will and testament made Thos. Chalkey, Ralph Jackson and Jno. Michener his Executors, intending his debts being pd and charges defrayed his Est. should be disposed of for the use of poor friends according to this meeting's direction, therefore Thos. Story and David Lloyd are desired to draw what writings may be convenient for the sd Exrs. to sign, to declare ye trust thereof to Edwd. Shippen, Samuel Carpenter and A. Morris for friends' service according to the sd Jno. Martin's intent.

1714. 8-0. Isaac Norris and others are appointed to see the conveyance of the Burial Grounds proposed according as it has been agreed by a former M. M. and also that of Jno. Martin's Est. and the ground of Pentecost League adjoining the Bank Meeting House.

1720. 3-27.—The Friends appointed to view the house formerly Jno. Martin's and to consider the reparings, report that it will want such layings out to repair it that they think it more prudent to rebuild it, the meeting thereupon adds to the sd friends R. Hill, T. Masters and Wm. Carter and desires them to further consider that against next meeting.

1726. 10-30.—The friends appointed in the affair of Jno. Martin report the land in Chester Co. is not yet sold, that they have viewed the house in town and do not think it worth repairing, but are of opinion money might be better laid out in erecting six small tenements on part of the lot and the front reserved to let at a ground rent toward the support of poor friends that may be placed in the tenements proposed to be erected.

1726. 11-27.—The report the friends brought in last meeting for the erecting some tenements on the lot formerly Jno. Martin's is well approved and the same friends with Isaac Norris who is added to them are desired to make a fair draft or plan of the whole lot and the buildings proposed and get in what money is appropriated to such purposes to be forthwith employed as the sd friends shall direct in building tenements as affirmed.

1727. 10-20.—The Friends appointed to essay a draft for building the Almshouse are desired to bring one to our next M. M.

1728. 6-30.—The friends appointed in the affair relating to the Almshouse brought in two drafts of the building proposed to be erected for that service but the Mtg. not having determined which shall stand refers it till next Mtg. for further consideration. But W. Hudson acquainting this Mtg. that there is some money in his hands which he is willing should be applied toward erecting these buildings, the Mtg. therefore consents that he lay in a suitable quantity of stones and bricks to be in readiness against spring to go on with the building.

1729. 2-25.—It appearing there is material laid in for the building the Almshouse . . . are desired to lay out the ground for the erecting the same in such manner as they may judge most convenient for that service and go on with the buildings.

TEACHING THE COMMANDMENTS DILIGENTLY.—Now this is the commandment, the statutes, and the ordinances, which Jehovah your God commanded to teach you, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go over to possess it. 2 That thou mightest fear Jehovah thy God, to keep all his statutes and His commandments, which I command thee, thou, and thy son, and thy son's son, all the days of thy life; and that thy days may be prolonged. 3 Hear therefore, O Israel, and observe to do it; that it may be well with thee, and that ye may increase mightily, as Jehovah, the God of thy fathers hath promised unto thee, in a land flowing with milk and honey. 4 Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God is one Jehovah; 5 and thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. 6 And these words which I command thee this day, shall be upon thy heart; 7 and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. 8 And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes. 9 And thou shalt write them upon the doorposts of thy house and upon thy gates.—Deut. xi. 1-10.

EARLY DECLARATIONS OF THE FAITH OF FRIENDS.

The first written declaration of faith, representing some of the leading doctrines of Friends, is given in Bowden's History, as the following, as sued by Christopher Holder, John Copeland and Richard Doudney, soon after the first visit of the tax farmer in Sandwich, Massachusetts. It is dated: "From the House of Correction, the 1st of the 12th Month, 1657, in Boston."

"We do believe in the only true and living God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath made the heaven, and the earth, the sea and all things in them contained, and doth uphold all things that He hath created by the word of His power. Who at sundry times and in divers manners, spake in time past to our fathers by the prophets, but in these last days, hath spoken unto us by His Son, whom He hath made heir of all things, by whom He made the world. The which Son is that Jesus Christ that was born of the Virgin, who suffered for our offences, and is risen again for our justification, and is ascended into the highest heavens, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father. Even in Him do we believe, who is the only begotten Son of the Father, full of grace and truth. And in Him do we trust alone for salvation, by whose blood we are washed from sin; through whom we have access to the Father with boldness, being justified by faith in believing in His name. Who hath sent forth the Holy Ghost, to wit, the Spirit of Truth, that proceedeth from the Father and the Son, by which we are sealed and adopted sons and heirs of the kingdom of heaven. From the which Spirit the Scriptures of truth were given forth, as, saith the Apostle Peter, 'Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' The which were written for our admonition, on whom the ends of the world are come; and are profitable for the man of God, to reprove, and to exhort, and to admonish, as the Spirit of God bringeth them unto Him, and openeth them in Him, and giveth Him the understanding of them.

"So that before all men we do declare that we do believe in God, the Father, Son and Holy Spirit; according as they are declared of in the Scriptures; and the Scriptures we own to be a true declaration of the Father, Son and Spirit; in which is declared what was in the beginning, what was present, and was to come. . . . [The only doctrinal matter which follows is contained in an exhortation to turn to the Spirit] that showeth you the secret of your hearts, and the deeds that are not good. Therefore while you have light, believe in the light, that you may be the children of the light; for, as you love it and obey it, it will lead you to repentance, bring you to know Him in whom is remission of sins, in whom God is well pleased; who will give you an entrance into the kingdom of God, an inheritance amongst them that are sanctified."

In the following year, 1658, or ten years after George Fox commenced his ministry, the following confession of faith was published by Richard Farnsworth. In 1668 and 1671 this was reprinted, with some other treatises, by John Crooke, William Dewsbury, Humphrey Smith, Isaac Penington and Alexander Parker, in a work entitled "The Principles of Truth, being a Declaration of our Faith who are called Quakers."

"We profess and confess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ his eternal Son, the true God, and the Holy Spirit. And we do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the words of God; this we testify; and we are not ashamed to confess and profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ his eternal Son, and in the Holy Spirit, as the Scripture saith; but we do believe in them, and acknowledge subjection and dutiful obedience unto them, viz: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. And moreover we do hereby declare and testify to all true Christians, God's elect, what God we do own, and profess faith in, even in that God that appeared unto Abraham, the father of the faithful, when Abraham was ninety-nine years old, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God, walk before me and be thou perfect (Gen. xvii.) The everlasting God, the God of heaven and earth," etc. [After giving a number of Scripture passages illustrative of the majesty and glorious attributes of the great Jehovah, he proceeds: "And this is God the Father, which we own and profess faith in, and in Christ Jesus His eternal Son, who said, 'I and my Father are one' (John x: 30), upon which saving the Jews took up stones to stone him; yet notwithstanding, the same Christ that the Jews hated, we love, believe in, and own; who was delivered up to be crucified for our offences, and was raised up again for our justification (Rom. iv: 25), who is the true God; and Him we own and profess faith in, and in the Holy Spirit, God, together equal with the Father and the Son, one God over all, God blessed forever."

George Fox's celebrated reply to priest Stephens is considered to have occurred in the year 1654. In 1656 he replies to another in his "Great Mystery":—"Christ gave himself, His body, for the life of the whole world; He was the offering for the sins of the whole world, and paid the debt and made satisfaction; and doth enlighten every man that comes into the world, that all, through Him, might believe; and he that doth not believe in the offering is condemned already."

In the same year, 1650, we find Edward Burrough answering: "As for the word Trinity, it is invented, and He hath learned it out of a mass-book, or common prayer book; but we own the doctrine of the gospel of Christ, that Christ is God, and the Spirit is God; and there are three that bear record, the Father, Son and Spirit, and these are one." So, more fully, Francis Howgill in the same year.

To pass now from earliest individual declarations of the faith of Friends, we take up the first that we can find as issued by the Society in its official capacity.

In the year 1668 the Society of Friends issued a tract, entitled, "An Epistle from the people in scorn called Quakers, for all people upon earth to read over, that they may see what the people called Quakers hold, concerning God, Christ, His death, His resurrection, His blood, His offering, redemption, salvation, justification, faith and hope. This Epistle was drawn up by George Fox and Ellis Hoopes, who was clerk of the first Yearly Meeting of Friends (London), held in 1675 (the first held in America was at Newport, in 1672). The following is an extract from the Epistle:

"Christ Jesus the Immanuel, God with us; whom all the angels most worship. Christ offered himself through the eternal Spirit, without spot to God, and by his blood purges our consciences from dead works to serve the living God. And so we know that Christ, by one offering, hath forever perfected them that are sanctified. And so as people walk in the light, they have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin. And Christ, who his own self bare our sins in His body on the tree, that we being delivered from sin, should live unto righteousness, by whose stripes you are healed. And we, being justified by the blood of Christ, shall be saved from wrath thro' Him. For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life (Rom. v: 8).

Post-script. And this is to clear us from all those pamphlets which are scattered up and down among people, that we should deny the Godhead, His eternal power, or His offering, or His blood, or that we should be bought with a price. For it pleased the Father that in Him the fulness of the Godhead should dwell bodily, and the Father, and the Son, and the Spirit, we do own. And so let all stop their mouths that say that the Quakers' principles are hid till now, for we have manifested our principles both in our printed books, and would that all people know our inside as they know our outside; and we do know, and also others know it, that we have an esteem of Christ's sufferings and death, and blood, and the Scriptures of the prophets and Apostles, more than any other people.

GEORGE FOX,

ELLIS HOOPES.

The following, as given in the London Friend, was presented to Parliament in 1686, and may be found in a pamphlet entitled "The Christianity of the Quakers asserted against the unjust charge of their being no Christians." It is in the form of questions and answers.

"Q.—Do you believe the Divinity and humanity of Jesus Christ, the eternal Son of God, or that Jesus Christ is truly God and man?"

"A.—Yes, we verily believe that Jesus Christ is truly God and man, according as Holy Scripture testifies of Him; God over all, blessed forever; the true God and eternal life; the one Mediator between God and men, even the man Christ Jesus.

"Q.—Do you believe and expect salvation and justification by the righteousness and merits of Jesus Christ or by your own righteousness and works?"

"A.—By Jesus Christ, his righteousness, merits and works, and not by our own; God is not indebted to us for our deservings, but we to Him for His free grace in Christ Jesus, whereby we are saved through faith in Him, not of ourselves, and by His grace enabled truly and acceptably to serve and follow Him as He requires. He is our all in all, who worketh all in us that is well-pleasing to God.

"Q.—Do you believe in remission of sins and redemption through the sufferings, death and blood of Christ?"

"A.—Yes; through faith in Him, as He suffered and died for all men, gave Himself a ransom for all, and His blood being shed for the remission of sins, so all they who sincerely believe and obey Him receive the benefits and blessed effects of His suffering and dying for them; they, by faith in His name, receive and partake of that eternal redemption which He hath obtained for us, who gave Himself for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity; He died for our sins, and rose again for our justification; and if we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin."

In 1693, Friends being greatly misrepresented, another Declaration was published, signed by George Whitehead, Ambrose Rige, James Parke, William Fallowfield, Charles Marshall, John Bowater, John Vaughton, and William Bingley. The following appeared in it:

"We sincerely profess faith in God by His only begotten Son Jesus Christ, as being our light and life, our only way to the Father, and also our only Mediator and Advocate with the Father;

That God creates all things; He made the worlds, by His Son Jesus Christ, He being that powerful and living Word of God, by whom all things were made; and that the Father, the Word, and Holy Spirit are one, in Divine being inseparable, one true, living, and eternal God, blessed forever."—Sewell's History (Vol. 2, p. 449).

The above extracts, compiled mostly from Evans's Exposition, have been selected with reference to their earliness rather than to the doctrine delivered. They are intentionally defensive rather than comprehensive. One has to put several books or treatises together to find all points of the doctrine of Friends fully stated.—Reprinted from THE FRIEND, Fifth Month 16, 1903.

CALL TO SERVICE.—You, who are enlightened, self-sufficient, self-governed, endowed with gifts above your fellows, the world expects you to add to and not to subtract from its store of good, to build up and not to tear down, to ennoble and not to degrade. It commands you to take your place and to fight in the name and honor of chivalry against the powers of organized evil and of commercialized vice, against poverty, disease and death, which follow fast in the wake of sin and ignorance, against all the innumerable forces which are working to destroy the image of God in man, and unleash the passion of the beast.—JOHN GRIER HIBBEN, President Princeton University.

You will find as you look back upon your life that the moments that stand out above everything else are the moments when you have done things in a spirit of love.—HENRY DRUMMOND.

[THE Editors are obliged to the Committee in charge of the Friends' School at Germantown for the privilege of reading the subjoined Annual Report, and we know that our readers will join us in the feeling.

The Report is submitted with no feeling of self-satisfaction on the part of the Managers. They are all busy men and women, some of them very busy, but they have a deep interest in the best welfare of the Institution and sacrifice time and effort for its good.

The origin of the School dates back to 1845. A Minute of the School Committee of that year opens as follows: "At a meeting of the School Committee of Germantown Meeting were present: Thomas Magarge, Abraham Keyser, Samuel Johnson and Samuel B. Morris; Alfred Cope being absent from home and Jonathan Robeson detained by indisposition."

Two generations later some one made this statement, which found its way into print: "At this date (1904) it is interesting to note that the granddaughter of one of this Committee of six is a teacher in the School, and that a little great grandson of a second and a great granddaughter of a third are this year starting the hill of learning in our Kindergarten class."

In 1864 the Committee decided to make the School strictly "Select," and very few but Friends were admitted; as a matter of fact, just six made up the roll. It grew in size and power as Friends' families settled in Germantown until in 1884, when a limited number of non-members were admitted to the privileges of the School.

The first pupil of this class afterwards married a Friend, becoming herself a member before her death, and her daughter, a member, now attends the School. The growth of the School from this time on was natural and for the most part healthy. In 1906 it had reached its capacity, about three hundred; as the Report which follows states, it has now reached over four hundred, probably the largest body of children attending such a Friends' School in our country.—[Ed.]

ANNUAL REPORT OF GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL, 1913. TO THE MONTHLY MEETING.—

The Report of the Committee in care of the School property shows no extensive work undertaken during the summer holidays. Miscellaneous repairs, painting, the addition of furniture, soap fonts to replace cups in the cloak-rooms, and additional ventilators make up the chief items. This does not signify, however, that your Committee regards the physical equipment of the School as by any means complete. The urgent need of a play-room for the Primary School on stormy days led to the appointment of a special committee to investigate the whole subject of the adaptation of the present buildings to the needs of the School. This Committee reported that without contemplating any increase in the size of the School, certain rather extensive changes should be made in the buildings in order to facilitate the work. The Committee was therefore authorized to employ an architect to prepare plans embodying the needed improvements, such as a single heating plant and ventilating system, a larger lunch-room, a play-room and increased space for the Intermediate School, which plans are to be held under advisement during the current school year.

Your Committee realizes that it is not probable that sufficient money will be available at any one time in the near future to carry out all the alterations and additions contemplated, but in order that changes when made may be part of a harmonious well-thought-out plan, it is thought wise to have embodied in architect's drawings all the improvements that would be necessary to accommodate a school of the present size in a thoroughly satisfactory way.

The teaching staff with the Principal and two Secretaries numbers thirty-three. Louise E. Roberts, teacher of Intermediate Arithmetic, resigned her position at the end of the last school year.

Irvin Corson Poley, A. B., Haverford College, a graduate of our School, was appointed to teach English and Mathematics in the Intermediate School.

Near the opening of the School in the Sixth Month Anne C. Swan, for seven year teacher in Haverford, Pa., was in Tecumseh, Michigan. A tribute to her memory, the following Minute was adopted by the Committee and a copy thereof sent to her family:

"The members of the School Committee of Germantown Friends' School desire to record their appreciation in the death of our teacher, Anne C. Swan. We feel that an unusually deep and quiet impression has been left upon our community by her life and devotion to duty and seriousness of aim. The testimony of pupils and their parents alike is clear and true, as to the influence she exerted in molding the character of those who came under her care.

"The feeling of her fellow-teachers as well as of our school is fully and truly expressed in the words of the Principal of the School:

"From the first, she entered with absolute loyalty and faithfulness into the life of the School and her influence constantly grew more helpful and constructive. To her class-room duties she brought adequate college preparation, efficient method as a teacher and remarkable persistency and patience. She was progressive in her teaching and was always improving and advancing in her chosen field of work.

"To these characteristics as a teacher there were added fine qualities of personality. She left no detail of her work uncared for, but always regarded the building of character and the cultivation of high ideals in her pupils as far more important than the actual instruction imparted."

To take Anne Swan's position, Elizabeth Quackenbush, a graduate of the University of Wisconsin, of the Milwaukee Normal School, and Master of Arts, Columbia University, was appointed.

Nineteen of the teachers are members of the Society of Friends. Ten of the fourteen non-members were educated in Friends' schools or colleges.

The enrolment of pupils for the current year is as follows:

High School Department.....	110
Intermediate Department.....	114
Primary Department.....	155
Kindergarten.....	30
Total.....	409
Friends or those closely connected by family with Friends.....	133

The graduating class of last Sixth Month numbered nineteen—eleven girls and eight boys. Of these, four girls entered college this autumn; two Bryn Mawr, one Mt. Holyoke, and one Western Reserve University. Another girl passed the Bryn Mawr examinations but has since changed her plans. Of the boys, two have entered State College, two Haverford, one the University of Pennsylvania; one passed all the College Board examinations for entrance to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, making a remarkable record in his grades for Science and Mathematics, receiving grades of one hundred in Solid Geometry and Algebra. One of the two entering Haverford was awarded one of the four Corporation Scholarships given by Haverford to the four passing the best entrance examinations. Another boy passed Haverford examinations, but decided to enter the Philadelphia Textile School for direct training for business. An increasing number of pupils throughout the School are looking forward to college preparation.

Lectures were given before the School by Professor Baumgardt, of California, Dr. Schmucker and Mary M. Vaux.

The General Information Test was given as in previous years and aroused the usual interest. Our Principal wrote an account of this test for the Independent, giving the list of questions and tabulated results. The article created wide-spread interest and many comments and questions were received by the Independent and by our Principal.

The usual elocution contests were given with usual interest on the part of pupils and patrons.

During the past year the courses of study were thoroughly revised by a committee of teachers and submitted to your committee for approval. Pursuant to this revision a series of questions about program conflicts, college requirements, order of studies, etc., was sent to thirty of the leading schools in the East. These answers, as well as the catalogues of the schools questioned, were carefully studied and the course adopted is believed to be in line with the best educational practice. The same care to keep abreast of the best methods in mental training is extended also to the department of physical culture. We believe that department to be conducted in a highly creditable manner, the aim being to study the needs and further development of every pupil rather than to produce picked teams which receive the greater part of the attention and benefit in the training and sports. The use of the Athletic Field during the summer by members of the School is increasing. Thirty-seven full memberships were enrolled last summer and a considerable number in addition used the field occasionally.

The remarkable testimony which has been borne by patrons of the School to the influence on their children of Anne C. Swan's quiet and unobtrusive work among them has led many of us to reflect on the amount of similar influence which must be radiating from centres in our School. We cannot fully realize unless we participate for a time in the life of a school how much of the best and noblest in a teacher's character is drawn out in daily work. This work is truly with all our teachers a labor of love, bringing the reward of a good conscience and the durable satisfaction of an unflagging interest in the molding of character. Mistakes are made, misunderstandings arise, but the sincerity and good will of the teacher is seldom questioned. That this is so is a high tribute to the devotion of the band of men and women whose efforts are directed toward unfolding in the boys and girls under their charge the character of "happy warriors," who in the conflicts of life shall "keep faithful to their trust with singleness of aim."

Signed for the Committee,

WILLIAM H. HAINES,
Clerk.

"Is the world to shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world"—Bible.

There must be shade-spots in our pilgrimage,
Our Father wills it so. There lurks a thorn
Even near the rose-cup which we cull and wear
Next to our heart. What matters it? The cloud,
The pang is transient, but the hope that springs
From its stern ministry—the faith that looks
Up to its God when these low skies are dim
Outwigh all misery which this fleeting world
In its worst wrath can teach. The Saviour knew
Her whole of tribulation, yet He bade
Be of good cheer since in the shielded breast
Was power to overcome.

Will thou despair
Thou born of God, because life's shadow fills
Led but by dewdrops of terrestrial good
Reeds and vanish?

Ask of God
To smite thy spirit even as the strapping youth
Who with the simple weapon of the brook
Thy gambler giant slew. Be thy step firm,
As thy demeanor like some angel guest
Present of earth, yet, for Heaven's bliss prepared.

FACTS FROM THE MOSLEM WORLD.

ROBERT E. SPEER.

The great Moslem Feast of Sacrifice, known in Turkey and Egypt as the Bairam, occurred this year on the ninth of last month. The feast is a part of the rites of the Pilgrimage to Mecca, although it is observed also in all sections of the Mohammedan world both as a day of sacrifice and as a great festival. Tradition records that Mohammed observing the Fast of the Atonement by the Jews on the tenth day of the Seventh Month, asked them why they kept the Fast, and on being informed that it was a memorial of the deliverance of Moses and the Children of Israel from the hands of Pharaoh, replied, "We have a greater right in Moses than they," and commended his followers to fast also. Later when Mohammed broke off his friendly relations with the Jews, Mohammedans preserved the day, only substituting in its observance the sacrifice of animals and a feast. Mohammedans generally hold now that the Feast was instituted in commemoration of Abraham's willingness to offer up his own son as a sacrifice, and maintain that the son was Ishmael and not Isaac. Apart from its religious ceremonies Bairam is observed as a great time of rejoicing and holiday.

The Continuation Committee of the Lucknow Conference of Christian Missions to Mohammedans suggests that the day be made this year a special day of prayer by all Christians for our brothers and sisters of Islam, that God may turn their hearts at this crisis in Moslem history and on this great day in their calendar to Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world, and that a feeling of compassion and kindness may spring up in the hearts of Christians toward the Moslem peoples.

Most of the missionary work among Mohammedans is carried on by the American Churches, the Congregationalists in Turkey, and Bulgaria, and Albania; the Presbyterians in Syria, in Persia and India, the United Presbyterians in Egypt and India, and the Methodists in India. Never before were the spiritual needs and opportunities among the Moslem peoples so great.

Special intercession is asked in behalf of the Albanians. If ever a people needed the prayers of Christendom, the Albanians are that people. By decision of Europe they have been given autonomy—on paper at least. They number 2,000,000, some say 3,000,000. The majority are classed as Moslems, the rest belong to the Greek and the Catholic Churches. Many of their leaders declare that as Mohammedanism was forced upon them, now they are free they will repudiate it. They have suffered so much at the hands of the Greek Church they declare they will never become Greek. They so fear Austria and the Roman Catholic Church that they say Catholicism can never be their religion. They now look to Protestant England and America as their only hope.

In Persia the majority of the pupils in higher mission schools are now Mohammedans and in some of them the teachers are Christian converts from Islam, and there is a wide open door to unhindered evangelism.

In Africa the advancement of Mohammedanism has carried the faith of the Prophet south into Kamerun and the Congo Free State, and though there are still great sections of Africa north of the Congo where Mohammedanism has not yet established itself, and where the Christian Church should be first with the Truth that will be last, its day should not be delayed by the Moslem deluge.

In India almost all the missions, especially those in the north, are in constant contact with the Mohammedan problem under political conditions which threaten no prosecution to the Moslem who comes to Christ.

NEGLECTANCE is enough to condemn a man. In order to go down to the nethermost depths, you do not need to do anything, you have simply not to do something, and down you will go by gravitation.—ALEXANDER MACLAUREN.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

A BOY WITH A PURPOSE.—In the magazine which bears his name, S. S. McClure is writing the story of his fifty-six years of life. It is worth reading, and perhaps worth repeating in part to "Our Younger Friends."

The first nine years were passed in Ireland, in his native county of Antrim; and we have a picture of the Irish country life of the time, of the little lad tramping along the country road to school, delighted to find on the dykes which bordered it, beneath the thorn hedges, the first spring primroses. He tells us, by the way, what a splendid road it was; always clean and good, even in the wet Irish winter, and that he heard of a certain man named McAdam, who was then living in a nearby town, and teaching people how to make such roads.

"The home was a thatched cottage, of but two rooms, yet he says "everything about it seemed interesting and beautiful, and just as it ought to be." "I remember asking my mother whether there was anywhere in the world a more beautiful house than ours?" "The earthen floor would sometimes get out of order and have to be filled in, but the house was warm and comfortable, and my mother kept it exceedingly neat."

He was only four years old when school life began, and from that time, on through his boyhood, Samuel McClure's great purpose in life was to get an education—the best that could be had.

Even so, the first school-days were wearisome, and the long, hard form (bench) on which he sat, very uncomfortable, so that, for the first three days, the poor little fellow had a long crying spell, "from sheer fatigue," before the hour for closing arrived. He still remembers how kind his teacher was at these times, and how the boys, large and small, kept from teasing, or laughing at him.

School lasted six hours a day, for fifty weeks of the year, and there was only a half-holiday at the end of the week. "I was always a little sad to see Saturday come," he says, "because there were always more interesting things to do at school than at home." "I liked everything about going to school."

One drawback there was to this pleasure. Little Samuel was not a strong child, and could eat very little breakfast, even when his father, as an especial treat, gave him the bit of white of egg which he chipped from the top as he ate his egg from the shell. This was the only egg which the state of the family purse permitted them to have.

So the boy would be tempted, on his way to school, when the fresh air, and the lively company of the other boys had revived his appetite, to take a bit of the oaten cake, which he carried for luncheon. As one bit followed another, he tried to persuade himself that he would not be so hungry at noon. But alas! he always was!

And how he enjoyed his lessons! "Working out examples was like playing a game. I never tired of it." "For a long while I was convinced that long division was the most exciting exercise a boy could find."

When Samuel was seven, his father went to Belfast to work in the ship-yards (he was a skilled carpenter), and from there to Greenock in Scotland, where there was work on a large man-of-war, which was building. And one autumn day, when the boys were coming from school, and all feeling "unusually gay," a man came along the road, and called, "Samuel, your da' is dead!" Hurrying home, Samuel learned that the father, leaving his work, at twilight, had stumbled, and fallen down a hatchway, carelessly left open by a fellow-workman, and had been so injured that he died in a Glasgow hospital.

A month after he was thus left fatherless, his younger brother was born, and, to the mother and her boys, hard times came indeed. But she was young, and strong, and hopeful, and her heart turned more and more to America, where some of her family had settled.

So in 1866, they sailed, and the boy enjoyed the voyage, and felt at the sight of the shore of the new land, what he says he has only felt once since, and that was when, as a man, he first caught sight of the city of Jerusalem.

Yet, although hopes were high and bright, Fourth of July celebration which came soon after he reached Indiana, made his heart beat with joy and pride that he was now an American, the hardship and privation were by no means all past.

The aunts, his mother's sisters, soon found that their husbands felt the addition of the fatherless boy to their already large families, would be too much. In fact, one uncle not loaded them into his wagon and took them to the town where their mother was already living as a domestic servant. That night, after wandering about the town together wondering what they should do, they found a building which was being repaired, and spent the night in an empty room.

"I remember," says Samuel, "the great anxiety about getting shoes for the children. I had gone barefoot as late as possible, like all the other country boys, and delighted to do it, but the time came when shoes were a necessity. My mother managed to get them, somehow. I can remember when she bought me mine, and that they had brass toes. We had not very heavy clothing, and during that winter we children and the Coleman family lived very meagerly. I remember the hardship of having to eat frozen potatoes boiled into a kind of gray mush. I did not thrive on this nourishment. Before the winter was over I had become so weak that my hands were very unsteady and I could not carry a glass of water without spilling it."

At last the mother married again, "a kindly, industrious man" from Tyrone, Ireland, named Thomas Simpson, and then the boys had at least a settled home, although they still worked hard, and chopped so much wood that he says some years later when he was working his way through college, "I suddenly turned against wood-sawing. I made up my mind that I had sawed so much wood that, whatever happened, I would never saw any more. And I never have."

Now, with better times, school-life began again. "The second winter I attended school for the first time since we came to America. I went to the Hickory Point School, and my Irish speech afforded the boys there a great deal of amusement. The snows were very deep there, and the crust was often so hard that we skated to school, over fields and fences. I was so fond of school that, if I had to work at home for part of the day, I would go all the way to school to get the last hour, from three to four.

"When I was twelve years old and was still going to that school, I heard somewhere, for the first time in my life, that there was a kind of 'arithmetic' in which letters were used instead of figures. I knew at once that I must somehow get hold of this. I asked the teacher, a young man who was then trying to work his way toward a medical school; but, though he had heard of algebra, he had never studied it and had no text-book. There lived not far from us an ex-soldier named McGinley, and I had heard that his wife had been a school-teacher. I went to her to ask her advice, and she lent me an algebra. My brother John and I took up this book and went through it as fast as we could, working it out for ourselves and solving the problems as we came to them. We got so excited about it and talked about it so much that my stepfather said he thought he would like to study it, too. He would sit down with us in the evening and work at the problems. But after a little while his zeal flagged and he decided that he could get through the rest of his days without knowing algebra."

The second summer—spent on his stepfather's farm, when Samuel McClure was eleven years old, was one of very hard work, but the disheartening thing was that no matter how diligent they were (and he says his mother worked the hardest of all)—the debt on the farm could never be reduced, and so the mother was at last brought to the decision that her boys must leave the farm, and when he was fourteen he did so.

"At Valparaiso a new High School was to open that fall, and my mother said she thought I had better go there and see if I could work for my board and go to school. I followed her advice.

"I carried with me no clothes except those I had on, and I don't think I took a package or a bundle of any kind. I had no capital but a dollar and the hopefulness and optimism of fourteen years."

In the new school he took a new name, in this way:—

"After the new pupils were seated, Professor McFetrich came down the aisle, asking each boy to give his full name and say what studies he wanted to take. I was a little nervous, anyway, and it made me more nervous to hear each boy giving three names—John Henry Smith or Edward Thomas Jones. What bothered me was that I had but two names, Samuel McClure, and I didn't want to be conspicuous by having less than the other fellows. I began to rack my brain to supply the deficiency. I had read not long before a subscription history of the Civil War, and had greatly admired the figure of General Sherman. Professor McFetrich was still about six boys away from me, and before he came to my desk I had decided on a middle name. So, when he put his question to me, I replied that my name was Samuel Sherman McClure. Later I changed the Sherman to Sidney. I am usually known now as S. S. McClure, but there never was any S. S. McClure until that morning, and my becoming so was, like most things in my life, entirely spontaneous.

"After he took down my name, the principal began to name over the studies, for me to say "yes" or "no": Arithmetic, History, Latin, Geography, German, Algebra, Geometry. To his amusement, I said "yes" to every one of them. I did not know what else to do. There was certainly nothing in that list that I could afford to give up, and it didn't occur to me that I could save any of them and take them at a later date. During the morning, however, I began to get nervous about the number of studies I had agreed to take. At noon I went to the principal and told him that I was afraid I had registered for more subjects than I could do justice to. He smiled knowingly and said he thought I had. We compromised on a rational number."

The next step on this long road "to Learning," was to Knox College at Galesburg, Illinois. And thus he arrived:

"I got off the train with fifteen cents in my pocket. I had on my only suit of clothes, and my mother had made them. The trousers were a good deal too wide and about an inch too short in the leg, and of very stiff cloth. The coat and vest probably had similar faults, but I was most conscious of the trousers. I had on a pair of cowhide boots, and a black felt hat with a droopy brim. I went at once to the campus, and stood looking over the campus and the buildings. I thought I had never seen such fine trees. The afternoon was singularly fresh and clear after a rain, and everything looked wonderful to me.

"There are few feelings any deeper than those with which a country boy gazes for the first time upon the college that he believes is going to supply all the deficiencies he feels in himself, and fit him to struggle in the world. My preparation had been scanty and I would have to enter the third preparatory year; that meant that it would be three years until I was even a freshman. I was seventeen, and it was a seven years' job that I was starting upon, with fifteen cents in my pocket. I felt complete self-reliance. I had never had any difficulty in making a living, and I knew that I was well able to take care of myself. On the first afternoon, certainly, there was no room in my mind for apprehensions. I could only think about what a beautiful place this was, and that here I was going to learn Latin and Greek.

"Once in Ireland, when I was a little boy, in the Public House at Ballymena I had seen a young priest sitting at a table reading a book intently. I looked over his shoulder, and, though I could read very well by that time, I could not read a word of that book. I asked him why this was, and he told me that this was Latin. I had never heard of Latin before, but I instantly knew that I wanted to learn to read it, and resolved that one day I would. Now, ten years later, on the other side of the ocean, that day had come."

Perhaps we need not follow him further. All that lay between this point and his present position may be guessed from what went before. A boy who delighted in algebra, and cherished for ten years a resolve to read Latin "some day" would be likely to take up his later work in the same spirit, and be willing to work hard to win his successes. If we—with our much greater opportunities—can add to them his pluck and patience, to what rich reward may we not attain?—F. T. R.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

PENNSYLVANIA HEAVIEST SLATE PRODUCER.—Four and a half million school slates made in 1912!

Pennsylvania is the greatest slate producing State in the United States. The total slate production during 1912 was valued at $6,043,318, and of this Pennsylvania produced $3,474,247, or 57.48 per cent., according to an advance chapter, by A. T. Coons, from "Mineral Resources for 1912," United States Geological Survey.

Of the State's total output the greatest value was in roofing slates, which were produced to the value of $2,528,791, representing 716,770 squares, a square being a sufficient number of pieces of slate to cover 100 square feet, allowing a 3-inch overlap for each piece. The output of manufactured mill stock was 3,663,518 square feet; of rough mill stock, 437,683 square feet; of blackboards, 2,898,742 square feet and of school slates, 4,482,571. All of the school slates are produced from Pennsylvania quarries.

Pennsylvania slates in 1912 were quarried in Lancaster, Lehigh, Northampton and York counties. The quarries reporting operation in Lancaster County in 1912 are those located at Peters Creek. The slate from Lehigh County is used for roofing and for ordinary mill stock and also on account of the fineness of its cleavage, for school slates and blackboard material. Lehigh County produced 22.12 per cent. of the State's roofing slate output, and 13.24 per cent. of the output for the entire United States.

The slate of Northampton County has the same uses as the Lehigh County slate, but the total value of the output is over three times as large. In 1912 Northampton County produced 75.34 per cent. of Pennsylvania's roofing slate, and 45.10 per cent. of the total quantity produced in the United States.

York County produced nothing but roofing slate of the same Peach Bottom variety as that of Harford County, Md. T. Nelson Dale, of the United States Geological Survey, gives the following interesting description of a new quarry in this district: "The Baltimore Peach Bottom Slate Co., of Delta, Pa., has recently adopted the tunnel method in its Cardiff quarry in order to save the expense of removing the 'top.' It is found that this method also has the advantages of not only affording a shelter to the workmen but a uniform temperature of 60 degrees F. both day and night, and of preserving the moisture in quarried blocks for an indefinite period. Channelling and overcutting machines operated by compressed air are used.

The Pennsylvania slate is mostly of a dark gray or other dark color. Many of these dark slates, however, become somewhat lighter in color on exposure to the atmosphere.—From U. S. Geological Survey.

FRIENDLY NEWS.

We are informed by F. A. Knight of Winscombe, Somerset, Eng., that the Annual Monitor for 1914 is now ready for delivery. It contains memoirs of Thomas Hodgkin, Joseph Storrs Fry, Jonathan Hutchinson, Ann Ford Fowler and others. There are also fourteen portraits. The price per vol. is 1/6 with 2d. extra for postage. When six or more copies are ordered the postage is free.

The Managers of the Institute for Colored Youth decided at their meeting Twelfth Month 10th to extend the time of the Summer School session next year to six weeks. Many of the students travel long distances to attend the Summer School and a four weeks' course has seemed too short for them.

Numerous improvements are in course at Cheyney and the friends of the Institute are warmly invited to inspect the work and to give the new principal an opportunity to make their acquaintance.

All the former care in store-room management and in the study of dietaries has been continued and this system and its results challenge attention far and wide.

CHESTER MONTHLY MEETING, N. J.—One of the largest, if not the largest, company of Friends in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting that assembles in Monthly Meeting capacity, is that which comes together at Moorestown, on the Third-day evening following the first Second-day in each month. This meeting, in common with most others whose history dates back to the days of settlement of the country, takes its name from the township in which it is located. It was formed in the year 1803 by the junction of Chester Meeting, now Moorestown, established shortly after the year 1700, and Westfield, established about the year 1794. The meeting appears to have been one of continuous growth throughout its history. For while at the time of the division of the Society in 1827 a comparatively small number of Friends held with the so-called Orthodox side, the meeting continued to grow, until the small frame building erected for its accommodation proving too small, it was at first enlarged and then removed for the erection of the present brick structure—one of the largest and most modern in the Yearly Meeting. Its strength in the past has in large measure been due to the fact that a number of the leading families of the membership have held to their ancestral homes established during the latter part of the eighteenth century, or, if removed from these, have continued to reside in the neighborhood, though having passed from the agricultural pursuits of their forefathers to the more lucrative ones of manufacture, merchandise or finance. The membership is now 388. The number of children is 117. The meeting has for years maintained the largest suburban school within the limits of the Yearly Meeting. In the school building is maintained a free library, which, though not officially connected with the school or meeting, is under the directorship of Friends, has an interesting history covering a long period of years, and is one of the chief instruments of the neighborhood for its literary and moral uplift. The members of the meeting have also for years maintained a lyceum, which, under the name of "The Ramblers," gives bi-weekly lectures during the winter season. These combine the features that will afford wholesome recreation, literary instruction and opportunity for social intermingling on the part of the membership of the meeting with one another and with such of the townpeople of other denominations as have in their life ideals much in common with Friends. Within the past year the meeting has joined a church federation of these denominations, the object of which is to work together for the social and moral uplift of the community. A large First-day school is conducted, which though not officially recognized by the Monthly Meeting, has the support of almost the entire membership.

Amid all these signs of outward prosperity the main question remains unanswered. What are the evidences of an ideal religious life on the part of the membership, as reflected in the meeting as a working organism? For the nurture of this life there sit before the meeting from meeting-day to meeting-day, and walk in fellowship with the membership, in addition to a large number of Elders and Overseers, five recorded ministers; besides these there are a number of others both young men and women who have at times something to offer in the way of testimony and prayer. It is this sign of the presence of the Heavenly Guest in the body of the congregation during the season of worship, which constitutes one of the strongest evidences that hearts are being touched with the love Divine, and that there are moments of earnest consecration of all that is best in man to the highest purposes of which he is capable.

As would be expected, the institutional activities of the meeting are reflected from month to month in the sessions of the body in Monthly Meeting capacity. Rarely is the meeting held without some item of new business of stirring interest, whether it be the care of the meeting in the matter of marriage (seven of the members having entered into that relationship during the past year), in the matter of sending out or receiving certificates of removal, of which there have been several instances; or it may be an application for membership, a thing not infrequent. Again, it may be the reading of the modest credentials of an unheralded messenger of the Gospel, coming into our midst, upon which the seal of the Great King is at once recognized. At the meeting last held there was an application for membership of unusual interest. A woman, a seeker after religious fellowship, had attended the meetings of Friends as well as those of other denominations, and had been a frequent and earnest student of the Bible, and had been a member of the church of Christ recently, while attending the meetings of Friends. She had also shown the power that speaks of grace and the truth that leads to life, and had, furthermore, confirmed her in the belief that the Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are the best exponent of the truth of which she had been seeking.

Another item of special interest was the admission of a new member to Monthly Meeting. One of the members of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting who had recently been a member of the church of Christ, and who had been a member of the church of Christ in the provinces of Canada, had been a member of the church of Christ in the provinces of Canada, and had been instrumental in bringing to the attention of the Yearly Meeting the fact that settlers from London Yearly Meeting had been coming to Philadelphia for information given around the country. This Monthly Meeting, however, resulted in a committee being appointed to visit the members of the church of Christ in this non-resident member and the little group of about thirty who were interested, with a view of encouraging them in the Christian life.

The responsibilities of any Monthly Meeting are numerous, and the size and avenues for service, as revealed by the questionnaires returned to the Holy Spirit upon the membership. Where any good and true work will be required. May not the state of our Yearly Meeting be such that the membership of our Yearly Meeting are made of those who are in the neighborhoods where the meetings of Friends are held to be flourishing, from participating in the blessings which they have received through and enlarged Christian fellowship.

The recent Bulletin of the Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia contains matters that all Friends should know about. There are no organizations among us that offer so much for so little, and at the same time give to each member the genuine satisfaction that comes only in serving a good cause. Mary S. Allen, 24 West Street, Media, Pa., is our Treasurer of the Historical Society and is the one to receive the annual fee of membership. Allen C. Thomas, of Haverhill, Md., is our Baltimorean by birth, but a Philadelphian by adoption, edit the Bulletin, and would doubtless gladly receive anything that bears the standard value that belongs within the scope of work planned for the Bulletin.

The chief paper in this issue of the Bulletin is by Isaac Sharp and David Lloyd. David Lloyd's warm and repeated encounters with James Logan, the two prominent political leaders in the colony, make interesting reading for all, and especially so to those who have a natural taste for the records of colonial times.

There are several pages devoted to old minutes from Monthly and Quarterly Meetings; the chief impression which these and others like them should leave upon us is the great care Friends have always bestowed upon matters of "discipline"; they have allowed time to season their judgments.

Among the collection of old bills received by the Treasurer of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in the years paralleling the Revolutionary War is the following: "I delivered to Christopher Sower, Junior, 6d Apologies, July 4 to Anthony Benezet and now I deliver 7d, in all 13d, Ac't." The 8th April, 1780, John Weaver.

Another bill of about the same date is for translating, printing and binding 2,000 Pamphlets in German, wrote by Friends Leitch, but sent from this city." This had reference to the two Prussian churches like those of fifteen others who were suffering unjust banishment in Westchester.

A letter of special interest to be found in the Bulletin is one written about John Dickinson and dated the 8th of Fourth Month, 1794, in which that saw the final consummation of one of the "Big D" schemes of the Friends, the founding of Westtown School. No mention concerning him can fail to be welcome. Amelia M. Conner, an Ohio Quaker, views the three original copies of John Woolman's journal. The two earliest are in the safe-keeping of the librarians of Swarthmore College, and came to them through a lineal descendant of John Woolman. The third described and the dates given; the first is carried down to 1742, the second includes the first and is carried on down to 1770. No other copy is complete of all, is at the rooms of the Penna. Hist. Socy. It is now in the hands of one into their possession through the Comfort family. The third copy is in the hands of Mary having married into that family. A M. C. C. note includes thus: "The Friends' Historical Society possess a copy of the original of the 'Journal,' which will be further amplified and corrected by biographical notes of each person mentioned therein. The two manuscripts of Woolman are very rare and of great value. The discovery of the existence of such will perform a real service to the Society."

efforts to set forth the work with accuracy, by communicating with Amelia M. Gummere, Haverford, Pa."

A LARGE and interesting company attended the Tea Meeting held in Germantown the evening of Eleventh Month 17th. The program consisted of a study of Abington Quarterly Meeting, its past history and present limitations and opportunities. Caroline Smedley presented a carefully prepared history of the various meetings composing the Quarterly Meeting, from the earliest records, giving much that was new to all present. Hannah P. Morris read a spicy paper, bringing us into close touch with several worthies of the olden time. The meeting then listened to Francis R. Taylor, who exhibited a series of lantern views of meeting-houses, and a map showing the situation and extent of the various Friendly centres, both past and present. He spoke with deep feeling of the needs of the smaller meetings, in this and other parts of the Yearly Meeting. His earnest plea was for that consecration of life which, if it could come, would lead individuals or small groups to settle in the vicinity of weak meetings, where they might exert an influence that would tend to build up those meetings, rather than remain as units in meetings of large membership. The feeling was evident that the situation of the Quarterly Meeting as a whole, and the possibilities for service, both among our own members and among those who are our neighbors, had become more plain through these clear presentations.

A second Tea Meeting on the evening of Twelfth Month 8th, carried the company to the Lebanon, where Daniel Oliver through a series of lantern slides showed places and people with whom he and his wife are closely in touch in their work in Syria. His graphic description of what a day's work embraces for them, the touches of true human interest, and the insight into the far-reaching results of their work were of deep and true interest.

CORRESPONDENCE.

We are permitted to make the following extracts from a private letter written by a worthy Friend of eighty-eight, to express her concern in regard to the policy of our paper. We have unity with her exercises and desire to maintain the standard she upholds.—Eus.

"Our standard of faith and practice has been obtained through great suffering and much self-denial by our predecessors in the Truth, so that the necessary cross of Christ which we are now called upon to bear before a sinful and a dying world, in order to obtain the crown of Glory, finally, is rendered more tolerable than formerly; and with faithfulness and fruitfulness to God, we may have much peace and comfort and commend our religious scruples even to our children and descendants. . . .

Let us not ignore the suffering of our early Friends, or compromise with unbelief and hardness of heart or the unfruitful works of darkness by joining in with the customs and maxims of a vain and deceitful world, which is transitory in its nature. By compromising with doubtful things we may lose that clearness of vision which we were favored with at the time of our conversion to God and get away out to sea where we will not be able to steer aright. We certainly do want a judgment superior to our own to enable us to make straight steps to our feet heavenward, as well as the Grace of God to strengthen our weak hearts. Human gifts and parts, as well as the acquisition of book learning is futile in comparison with the guidance and help of the Holy Spirit in the work of redemption from all evil and our complete salvation by and through Jesus Christ our Holy Redeemer. In Christ's school the teaching is Divine. The inspiring of a babe in Christ is superior to the soul that is created anew in Christ Jesus. . . . The supernatural is far above what is natural to human beings and is beyond the power of language to describe. It is a blessed experience of individuals who surrender themselves fully to the power of the Holy Spirit and are taught of the Lord of Life and Glory.

"Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable Gift offered unto us! Let us keep it in remembrance."

Twelfth Month 8, 1913

SUPPLEMENT.—The story of the faithfulness of a dog in attending meeting, as narrated by Joshua L. Baily in THE FRIEND of Twelfth Month 11, 1913, perhaps the following story of a horse might prove interesting to many who know Greenwood Meeting in Columbia Co., Penna.

My Uncle Jessie Hancock lived on a large farm about a mile and a-half from Greenwood Meeting-house, and regularly on First-days and in mid-week, old "Prince," a driving horse, was hitched to the family carriage and conveyed the old folks to meeting. As he became too old for work, he was left out in the pasture most of the time in good weather, his only duty being the meeting drive.

One Fifth-day Uncle and Aunt were away and when meeting time approached and the Friends in the neighborhood drove past on their way to meeting, old "Prince," not being called, proceeded to open the gate along the main road and trotted off to meeting, taking his accustomed place in the sheds with the other horses, where he was discovered when meeting was over.

Needless to say this representation of steadfastness to duty on the part of the faithful animal was oft repeated to us children when we wanted to omit the usual hour of worship.

W. G. HEACOCK.

HARRISBURG, Pa.

[The following from a personal letter is timely.—Ed.]

I don't know when I have been more pleased than this morning reading in the Public Ledger an article entitled "House passes Naval Holiday Resolution." And followed by another article from London Daily News.

It was to me most refreshing to read this, when it seems to me that Cowper's description of the newspapers of his day, which he says tell us of all "the wrong and outrage with which earth is filled," is applicable in our day also. It struck me that it might do good, to reprint in an early issue of THE FRIEND, with proper credit given to the Ledger for its being printed there. Many may not have seen it. I could but feel encouraged as a Peace man.

ELLISTON P. MORRIS.

"LONDON, Dec. 8.—The London Daily News welcomes the enormous majority by which Hensley's naval holiday resolution passed the House of Representatives as a satisfactory and significant indication of the power of the peace movement in the United States. The News says:

"It is not in itself so important as the recent Bavarian pronouncements, of course, for the position of the United States is such that nothing but a corrupt love of militarism for its own sake could induce American democracy to join in a race for armaments. It no doubt is much easier to seek peace and to insure it when the risks and disadvantages of war prodigiously outweigh any possible gains from it. Still, the almost unanimous vote whereby this resolution was carried is a happy augury for the international conference which President Wilson has stated he is about to call on the subject. It shows he has his own people heartily behind him, and the success of the conference will depend on the degree in which the European Powers can be persuaded to translate their common aspirations into common action."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Dr. Howard A. Kelly, of the Johns Hopkins University, in connection with Dr. Robert Abbe, of New York City, have announced that radium has effected many cures of cancer. Doctor Kelly has also stated that malignant tumors may be removed as if by magic, the rays of the radium eating into the growths and causing them to disappear, in many cases, within forty-eight hours.

It was stated from Washington on the 15th inst.: "The final official estimates of production and value of products of the soil in the United States for the year 1913 was issued to-day by the Department of Agriculture. The value of all crops is placed in round numbers at $6,000,000,000, while the value of animal products of the farm is estimated at $3,000,000,000."

A despatch from Washington of the 15th inst. says: "Secretary Bryan and Chevalier van Rappard, the Netherlands Minister, to-day agreed upon the terms of a peace treaty embodying the principles of the arbitration plan announced early in the present Administration. The principal feature of the peace plan, the first negotiated with a European power, is a provision for an investigation throughout at least one year of any misunderstanding between the signatory nations by a commission of five members one to be chosen from each of the contracting countries, by their respective Governments; one to be chosen by each of the contracting Governments from some other country, and the fifth to be agreed upon by the two contracting Governments."

It has been recently stated that the final estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture of production and values of crops of 1913 and 1912 in Pennsylvania show a decrease in practically every crop and at the same time an increase in price.

It is stated that the total amount of money expended for intoxicating

THE irregularity in the delivery of THE FRIEND the past two weeks (it may even affect the present week) has been due to the congested condition of the Post Office service. The paper has been in hand each time even earlier than usual. We sincerely regret these delays and the disappointment, especially of any who have not received their paper before First-day.—[Eds.]

FROM THE MINUTE OF EXERCISES OF SELECT YEARLY MEETING, HELD AT PAULLINA, IOWA, 1913.

Thanksgiving was expressed unto our Heavenly Father, that He was still pleased to own us, unworthy as we feel ourselves to be, and the language of the Psalmist was revived: "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments." This unity, when not marred, extends over the whole body. It is the fruit of the spirit of Christ, it bringeth all into order, and maketh increase of the body to the edifying of itself in love.

Desires were expressed, that insight might be given us individually, to know whether or not we stood on forbidden ground; if any were permitted to see in what way they erred they might acknowledge it and might entreat the Father of Mercies for forgiveness, for "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they than gold, yea than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb. Moreover, by them is thy servant warned; and in keeping of them there is great reward. Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou me from secret faults. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins, let them not have dominion over me. Then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression." JOSEPH HENDERSON, Clerk.

Our years are sometimes likened to milestones. They may particularly be compared to the days of a long sea voyage. We start the trip of life with high hopes and with every sail set. Our gallant little barques seem strong and secure. They gaily ride every wave of difficulty and are not dismayed by the threatening storms.

On the sea there are many vicissitudes. Every day may bring the unexpected. At times the sunlight sparkles across the decks. The sounds of mirth and joy are heard. The gentle breezes invigorate. The pulse throbs with strength and hope. The azure heavens cover us as with a protective mantle, and the water beneath reflects the glory of the skies.

So are the quiet years in the long voyage of human life.

We are in large degree like children, and in the hazy of youth rejoice unfeignedly in all the goodness that Providence bestows. The Christian, in the happy year, lit up a flood of thankfulness to God.

Then possibly some day during a sea voyage a storm comes on. The threatening clouds close in upon us, the waves mount on high, gloom intervenes, it seems as if the mighty deep will engulf our trim, and once steady little ship. And yet, in the voice of the tempest, and in the midst of the apparently uncontrollable forces of Nature, we realized that the storm sometime must cease, and that God rules over all.

Our tempestuous years are like the stormy days at sea. Circumstances beyond our control affect us. Happy are we when all things rock beneath our feet and the gales of affliction drive us in directions that we do not care to go, if, like the steadfast mariner, we can hope for the morrow, and, as Christians, trust in the unfailling guardianship of God.

Probably some of my readers may feel that 1913 has been a stormy year—to others it has been rich with joy. But, whatever the past has afforded us, or whatever the portents for 1914 may be, let us approach the opening twelve months with a firm reliance on Him who holds the sea in the hollow of His hand.

The traveler who would attempt to sail on a long voyage without some definite port in view would be open to condemnation. The Christian is ever sure. He always looks forward. His objective point is heaven. He gazes beyond the storms and sunshine, which day by day are so impressive because they are seen, to the immortal refuge, the undying glory which, though now unseen, awaits him at the end. Like the master of a little ship, that he is, he onward sails by faith, yet confident in the chart and compass that we all possess and which may be read in the deepest recesses of our souls.

I have in many famous ports of the world watched proud, splendidly equipped vessels go to sea. How buoyantly they ride the water! How sharply their prows have cleaved the waves and tossed aside the glistening spray! So is it often with young people commencing the journey of life.

And then, perchance, I look towards the harbor entrance and see a battered old ship come limping into port. Her bulwarks are stove in, the rigging is partly gone, the eas paint has vanished, the cruel old ocean has seemed to mock her. I think that she is more entitled to admiration than when she started on her voyage—she is a more alluring sight than at the first. She has been tried and not found wanting.

Thus we think of the old, tried Christian. He has participated in the sunshine and the storm, and finally reaches his desired port, where he shall forever rest in the arms of everlasting Love.

May the coming year, and all that awaits us as we are swept along by its only seemingly relentless tide, bear us to a haven—the eternal haven—the heavenly city—where "builder and maker is God!" W. C. A.

Sax José, Cal.

NEW YEAR'S EVE, 1900.

(A DREAM.)

The grey day drew slowly to a close, and from the dark pinions of the night flakes of down came softly, slowly floating. Thicker and faster they came, until old Mother Earth was snugly wrapped in a warm, feathery covering—sight and sound being alike lost in the double mantle of night and snow.

The deep silence of the solemn night penetrated in measure the cosy within, although darkness and cold were there dispelled by the gentle warmth of a glowing fire, which sent its soothing rays into the farthest corner of the pleasant room. With easy chair drawn before the bright fire, and slippers feet resting comfortably on the grate, night and storm, and the great world without were alike forgotten in blissful enjoyment of the present, and a sense of rest stole over me, so that the old clock in the corner, whose regular ticking alone broke the stillness, did not disturb my reverie. The silence grew more intense until it could be felt, and not until then did I perceive that I was no longer alone.

Before me stood a strange figure. The snows of centuries might have been scattered upon his hair, so silvery was its whiteness, but his eyes were sharp and piercing—his form seemed bent with its weight of years, and yet his bearing was still strong and alert. In one hand he held an hour-glass, whose sands were nearly run, and in the other a scythe which rested against his shoulder.

A feeling of awe stole over me as I gazed upon my strange visitor and for some moments neither spoke; then in a low, trembling voice, I asked, "Who art thou, stranger, and wherefore hast thou come?" In a deep, sepulchral tone the answer came, "Mortal, wouldst thou know who I am, and whence I came? I will tell thee. Ages ago, before the mountains were brought forth, my race began. I have witnessed all of change that Earth has ever known, have seen nations rise and fall; have made kings and overthrown them. Millions have desired to find me, but I have outlived them all, and although weary with the weight of years, my course is not yet run. I have seen the Earth without form, and void, and have seen it peopled with savage tribes who loved strife and bloodshed, but at length among the nations of the world, a spirit of love in measure replaced the spirit of hatred, and I thought to see the Twentieth Century dawn upon a blissful period of rest and peace.

"Such were my dreams and fondly had I cherished them, to be, alas! rudely blasted. One great nation stood out nobly in a position in the forefront of a battle, a bloodless battle, for right and justice and freedom, and my heart rejoiced; now, sadly, with bowed head, I watch the sands of the century running out on a world of beauty, but not of peace; fierce strife blackens the beautiful places of the earth, and bloodshed mars an otherwise fair picture. Mortal, hast thou done thy part that the century may close in peace and happiness? Hast thou, in season and out of season, raised thy voice on the side of peace and right, or hast thou selfishly enjoyed thy sheltered nook, where war's rude blasts could not disturb thee, and raised no finger in protest against the spirit that prevails in the world?"

"Pause and reflect. The sands of the century are nearly run. Each day, each hour, each moment, do thy part that no sins of omission may be recorded against thee."

The bowed figure seemed to become erect as the voice grew more intense, until suddenly a deep silence fell upon me. My strange visitor had disappeared. The hands of the old clock pointed to the midnight hour, and looking upon its face, I realized that Father Time and his hour-glass were the figures of a dream.

THE BRUMANA HOSPITAL.

[Some weeks before our Friend Edwin P. Sellw had become so ill as to give up his daily visits to the office of THE FRIEND, in an interview with Daniel Oliver he expressed a willingness to publish through our columns some account of the hospital work in Syria that has for years been so near Daniel Oliver's heart. Edwin P. Sellw's signature being annexed with others to an appeal for funds, and having on different occasions expressed to his fellow editors his warm interest in the welfare of the hospital at Brumana, we feel it almost a matter of duty to carry out his intention.

The Editors, however, wish to make their position clear, that THE FRIEND does not as a rule open its pages to appeals for financial assistance; were we to follow such a course our columns would soon be crowded. We have a deep interest in the effort that is being put forth by Daniel Oliver, and recommend him and his cause to Friends and others everywhere. We subjoin a brief, signed circular, and also over the signature of Daniel Oliver a short description of what the hospital needs are.—EDS.]

NEW HOSPITAL AT BRUMANA.

We, the undersigned, have warm sympathy and unity with the effort to raise $40,000 for rebuilding the Friends' Mission Hospital at Brumana, Syria.

We believe this work to be of great benefit to the people of Syria, and we commend the need of the Hospital to the generosity of Friends everywhere.

We hope that Daniel Oliver will have opportunities of speaking on behalf of the Hospital among Friends in many places in this country.

John Way has kindly consented to act as Treasurer for this fund, and all contributions, however small, should be sent to him, care of The Provident Life & Trust Co., 409 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

FRIENDS' HOSPITAL, BRUMANA, SYRIA.

Far off on the slopes of the beautiful Lebanon lies the village of Brumana, overlooking, from a height of 2500 feet, the deep blue waters of the Mediterranean Sea. On the outskirts of the village is an ancient fountain, which in former years was supposed to be frequented by the "Jen" (evil spirits) so that no one would pass that way after sunset. It was near this spot that Theophilus Waldmeier first started a boys' boarding-school, under the auspices of Friends, and changed the name of the fountain to Ain Salaam (fountain of peace). Later on a girls' boarding-school was also built near the same spring of water. As sick people flocked to the mission seeking medicine and advice, regular clinics were in time started by a young Syrian doctor named A. J. Manasseh, who had previously rendered valuable help as a teacher in the boys' school.

It was found that the medical work was so extensive that it could not be carried on at either of the schools without seriously interfering with the education of the children, so a kind Friend bought an old building which had been used as a silk factory. This was fitted up as well as possible and turned into a hospital with twenty-two beds, and during the thirty-six years it has been in existence thousands of patients have passed through its wards. There is a regular dispensary and an out-patients' department, in addition to the hospital, where large numbers of patients are seen every week.

The majority of the cases in the hospital are surgical ones, and the demand for admittance is so continuous that patients have at times to be put on mattresses in the corridors, so that as many as possible may be treated and cared for.

Many of the patients come from long distances riding on donkeys, mules or camels, and one man, who had broken both his legs, was carried in a coffin on a mule's back. They represent all the different sects and communities, viz: Mohammedan, Druse, Maronite, Greek-Orthodox, etc., and all receive the same loving care and attention, the poorest sharing equally with those who can afford to pay a small fee. The work of the hospital is highly appreciated by the Syrians, who help, by voluntary contributions, to support four free beds for the very poor.

We are now face to face with a great crisis in the history of this most useful institution. The building is in a serious condition, owing to the rotting of the timbers, etc., and expert opinion reports that it would be a waste of money to try and repair the present building. Also the medical work has far outgrown the old factory building, therefore we have only two courses open to us: first, to pull down the present building and rebuild on another site a good up-to-date hospital, and go on with the work; second, to close the hospital. But that is unthinkable to any one who has a heart to feel for the suffering of humanity.

The Syrians as a nation have many fine traits of character, and are a warm-hearted and most lovable people. One cannot but admire their fine courtesy and charming manners, also their beautiful hospitality and kindness to strangers, a custom dating back to the days of Abraham. Their courage in the face of danger and death, and their resignation to the will of Allah in the time of calamity is touching and impressive. Their mental ability and wonderful powers of memory mark them as a people who can rise to the greatest heights, and in consequence of the importance of their geographical position, and the new development of railways connecting them with Asia Minor and the Persian Gulf, they are destined to have a great future.

Surely such a people, living in a land from which has come the light and inspiration of the world, are worth helping.

The great needs of the Syrians are:

1. Spiritual religion.
2. Educational facilities.
3. Medical help.
4. Good government.

I would emphasize at present the medical need. The unsanitary condition of most of the villages, the want of hygienic knowledge by the masses of the population, and the total lack of any kind of government inspection by health officers, leads to the prevalence of many infectious and contagious diseases, such as small-pox, typhoid fever, diphtheria, ophthalmia (leading sometimes to blindness), erysipelas, etc.

The hospital has become truly a refuge to these people in times of sickness and accident. Dr. A. J. Manasseh is a very fine surgeon, and by many years of faithful and successful work has won the confidence of the people. He is spoken of as the Doctor with the "Yad El-Kheudra" (the healing hand); but no doubt a considerable part of the success is owing to the careful and skilful nursing of Theodora Cunningham and Ethel Stevens, two whole-hearted and devoted women, who are ably assisted by three young Syrian nurses.

The training of Syrian girls, who will go out as district nurses to care for the sick in their own homes, is one of our ideals. But for all this work a suitable building is needed; without it the work must stop. It has been carefully estimated that $40,000 will enable us to erect a good, modern building with the necessary equipment. I voice the need of thousands of Syrians in this appeal to the generosity and sympathy of the American people.

The hospital is the work of Friends, and should commend itself to all who are in sympathy with the work of relieving suffering and saving life. Your co-operation in this effort will be warmly appreciated by the people of Syria, and above all by Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

WESTTOWN, Pa., Twelfth Month 16, 1913.

MEETING OF THE REPRESENTATIVE MEETING.

At the session of the Representative Meeting held on the Twelfth Month 10th, there were thirty persons. At the opening of the session by Samuel Emlen of Germantown, Pa., the minutes of the Abington Quarterly Meeting were read. The minutes were read by Samuel Emlen has faithfully served the interests of the cause in many other capacities, and the report is called for by expressions of appreciation and love.

The Committee having in charge the proposed Capital Punishment had previously reported that on account of the members constituting their Committee were all absent six years, they were directed to nominate a new Committee to take the place of their number and at this session the names of William W. Bishop, J. Henry Bartlett and Joseph Flood, from all four States were confirmed. The Capital Punishment Committee had been under appointment for six or more years. Soon after their appointment they issued a pamphlet of twelve or more pages, being a full argument against capital punishment. This was widely circulated and received some notice through the press. Later the same Committee, with the assistance of T. Raeburn White, drafted a bill, having for its intent the abolition of capital punishment and the substitution of imprisonment for life in its place. The members of the Committee worked faithfully to see this bill before the legislature at Harrisburg and were so far rewarded that they saw it pass both houses. Governor Stuart vetoed it, and until another meeting of the legislature in the present year, little active work was done by the Committee.

With the same legal help that was generously given four years ago, a like course was pursued this year except that a greater effort was put forth to influence the sentiment of individual legislators. The bill was passed by both houses, not, however, without some disappointing back-sets, and the Committee had good reason to expect that Pennsylvania would be added to the small list of States which have abolished capital punishment, but this time Governor Tener vetoed the bill. The new law introducing the electric chair for the gallows may have been in part responsible for diverting the attention from the main question.

Members of the Committee feel that there may be a place for them to help, during the next four years, to create a sentiment in the public mind in favor of the measure which we wish to establish. There are many members of our Yearly Meeting, both men and women, who sympathize with the Committee and who are in a position to render valuable service to the cause. It is hoped they will be stimulated to join forces with the Committee.

At the Representative Meeting two memorials of deceased Friends were read: That of Mary Bettle, from the Monthly Meeting at Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, had been examined by a small Committee, it had its second reading and was forwarded to the Yearly Meeting. The other, a memorial of Josiah W. Leeds, was presented by Birmingham Monthly Meeting, which meets at West Chester, Pa. Josiah W. Leeds was a man conspicuous far beyond the range of his own small Society for his effective crusade against vice and immorality. The recital of his trials and victories as presented in this very interesting paper seemed to awaken a feeling in the meeting at large that work which he had been known to carry on single-handed was suffering because some or all of us were not living up to our duties and privileges. The indecent posters on bulletin boards and elsewhere are so much in evidence that the call for a correction of public sentiment toward them is pressing. A Committee composed of George M. Warner, Samuel L. Whitson, James M. Moon and Edward G. Rhoads was appointed to take the matter in hand, and to address George D. Porter, of the Department of Public Safety in Philadelphia, if it seemed best to them to do so.

It was the expressed judgment of many Friends present that a standing Committee of the Representative Meeting should soon be appointed to have this and kindred matters always in hand. As there are now three vacancies in the Representative Meeting, to be filled probably within the next six months, it was thought to be unwise to outline more definitely the duties of this committee of four.

Another item of importance that claimed the meeting's attention was an address on Gambling, written primarily for our own membership. This essay is given on this page of this issue of THE FRIEND. The Committee having this in charge have been diligent the past few months, having conferred with representatives of Baltimore Yearly Meeting concerning the legalized betting at the Havre de Grace and Laurel race courses in Maryland and having prepared and given to all the Maryland legislators a strong appeal that their influence as lawmakers be gained for the cause of good citizenship. The same Committee has prepared and distributed an address in regard to gambling on steamships. This last subject, it will be remembered, was introduced into the Yearly Meeting last spring by women Friends.

Bills received for payment revealed the fact that the Book Committee has issued Volume 5 of "Quaker Biographies." It is now on sale at 304 Arch Street. These books sell for fifty cents apiece or $2.50 for the set of five. They are tastefully gotten up and are a valuable addition to our stock at 304 Arch Street.

As the session drew to a close the meeting was brought into deep exercise of spirit as one whose voice is often heard among us pleaded with the members for a fuller surrender to and outspoken declaration of the views held by all true followers of our blessed Lord, a complete surrender to His will, and a living faith in that sacrifice which was made for the sins of all mankind.

COMPANIONSHIP.

For "THE FRIEND."

I closed the door and turned the key,
And spread my book upon my knee,
But though I pondered well that lore,
I ended wanting something more.

I called a comrade friend to share
My quiet room; his speech was fair,
His spirit high, his vision wide,
But I was still unsatisfied.

Then in the silence, all alone,
My soul rose up to claim her own
Inviolable right to be,
O Father, face to face with Thee.

LESLIE PICKNEY HILL.

CHILNY, Pa.

It is impossible for us to print all of the things of pronounced encouragement to the peace workers uttered by the papers in these latter days. The following from the Philadelphia Press, however, is typical:

"With the roll of war drums in Europe scarcely ceased and nations still rattling the saber, a cynic might chuckle over the news that the peace delegates have been in council at The Hague. Nevertheless, such council has its function and its influence in bringing nations into more neighborly and pacific relations. It can help towards a clearer recognition of mutual rights, a better expression of mutual duties and a closer attention to those mutual interests which war disrupts and peace consolidates. This in brief is the policy of The Hague Tribunal. Since the establishment of this international court of appeals or 'parliament of mankind' in 1899, it has become a new factor in the functioning of law. It has elevated the old tribal peace compact into the 'consent of nations.' It has interpreted the conscience of civilization by writing a new code of international law. The effect has been two-fold. First, the usages of war have been agreed upon and laid down so as to exclude inhuman barbarities such as poisonous bombs, deadly fumes, mushroom bullets, and inventions too numerous even for the war game. And secondly, The Hague Conference has persistently asserted that arbitration as a means of settling international difficulties is preferable to war. It would seem as though these ambassadors of peace have a reasonable cause for being."

TO THE MEMBERS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

DEAR FRIENDS:—The subject of gambling and the evils resulting from it has claimed the serious consideration of this body for considerable time. Gambling on shipboard by the traveling public was the special feature to which attention was called by the Women's Yearly Meeting last Spring.

We have found by correspondence and personal interview with a representative of one of the larger Atlantic lines that the management would welcome any movement to reduce or abolish gambling on their ships without trespassing upon the rights of the passenger.

But it is evident in this, as in other matters of public morals, that public opinion is the controlling element; a quickened conscience, an enlightened judgment, and a higher regard for the welfare of others—all these are necessary before legislation or rules of conduct can be of any lasting value.

Our concern in this matter begins at home; in our own households, in the social circle, in our schools and colleges, and in all these the playing of cards for money or for prizes, betting in any shape, and the playing of games which foster the gambling spirit should not be known among us. We should be clear and clean in these things, for we are persuaded that they cannot endure the Light of that Tribunal before which we must all be judged.

During our consideration of this subject we have been glad to note the expression given by our friends in England in their revised book of Christian discipline under date of 1911, as follows:

"We deeply deplore the enormous growth of gambling in this country. This habit now permeates all classes of society; commerce, finance and the press are tainted by it. Moreover, betting is by no means confined to horse-racing, but has fastened itself upon many other forms of sport. In addition to the material ruin, both of individuals and of families in all sections of the community, the moral and religious fibre of the people is seriously affected.

"We believe that all forms of betting and gambling, and all merely speculative means of obtaining money, are contrary to the spirit of Christ. Through indulgence in such practices the mind becomes set upon quick ways of getting riches, and the sense of true value of things is often lost, so that the judgment is disordered, the moral faculties are sapped, and life is lived in the excitement of the moment. This state of mind is destructive of the larger life of the soul and the habitual communion with Christ which are the privileges of His followers."

We believe the above to be an eminently just estimate of the deplorable evil against which we are now protesting. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the practice is growing in this country and that it endangers the welfare of our boys and girls as well as of our older people.

It rests with us now, however, to bring the matter forcibly to the attention of our own membership. Let us first clear ourselves and set a good example, then we may be given the power to help others; public opinion is formed first of all in the closet when the door is shut upon the tumult of the outer world; and from that sanctuary we may be fitted to go out into the service of "Him who hath before all temples, for His dwelling place, the upright heart and pure."

By direction of the Representative Meeting, held Twelfth Month 10, 1913.

A SIGN OF THE NEW TIMES.—At a recent celebration of the German Confederacy held in Bohemia, a society of art students erected and maintained a stately pavilion for the distribution of non-alcoholic drinks in the midst of the beer and wine booths which heretofore have had no such rival.

It is regarded as a significant sign of the times that this action was taken by a class of students that has been closely associated with the worship of Gambrinus.—Press Circular of the Deutsche Verein, 1913.

CATHARINE ANN STANTON.

The decease of our dear Friend, Catharine Ann Stanton, which occurred Ninth Month 15th, has brought reflections on her long and useful life of nearly ninety-three years. She was a woman of sterling worth and a beloved minister of Western Yearly Meeting (Conservative body.)

Nearly all of her life was spent at the home of her childhood near Springboro, Ohio.

In her prime, she was devoted to the interests of her family, being the mother of twelve children, doing all her household work, and at one time teaching six children when no school was in reach, and exercising her deep concern for their spiritual welfare.

During the twenty years she survived her devoted husband, she had many serious attacks of pneumonia. Her physician attributed her recovery to her calm trust and peace in God, and to a faithful daughter's care.

Her cheerful, affectionate and sympathetic nature drew a large circle of friends to her, younger as well as older, and she was watchful to drop a word as the Master prompted. She was conscientiously busy when health permitted. In addition to her reading and large family correspondence, she knit many useful articles for little children.

The subjects of Peace and Total Abstinence from intoxicants were especially near her heart, and she sometimes compiled sentiments on those subjects into readable articles for some gatherings.

The meeting of the Society of Friends having ceased in her neighborhood, she was the alone member of the Society within twenty-five miles. In her isolation, the occasional visits from ministering Friends were esteemed special favors from her Heavenly Father.

To the outward it might seem there was nothing to disturb her tranquility of mind, yet she knew deep provings and trials of faith. Recounting her blessings, she was wont to say, "It is all in mercy, I am not in the least deserving," and she was truly thankful her mental faculties were spared in her advanced age, and that she was able to be up most of the time.

She was a diligent reader of THE FRIEND, or listened to the reading, until her final sickness of two months' duration.

The funeral was attended by several Friends from a distance, the meeting being at her home, where a considerable number gathered, the day of rain preventing many others. Under a sense of the Lord's presence and his fresh anointing for service, the occasion was precious and comforting.

The following is one of her compilations, expressive of her own feelings:

I am growing old
The precious flow of sweet contentment
Brings me peace.

My earthly race is well nigh run,
A calm comes to me from the skies,
As slowly sinks life's setting sun.

Peace, like a river flows,
Serenely calm and clear,
I rest upon my Saviour's arm
And feel that Heaven is near.

The past may cost a sigh,
The future waken joy,
A place for me has Christ prepared
And bliss without alloy.

Waiting, dear ones! only waiting
Till the Master calls come home,
Waiting, with my lamp all burning,
Till the blessed Bridegroom comes.

NOTES FROM JAPAN.

When I walk out on the main street of Mito, between ten and four in the afternoon, I am met by a crowd of school boys turned homeward after school. It is quite a striking feature of this town where are collected, school of man kind, from the whole prefecture, and everyday hundreds of boys and girls — the boys in uniform of Western style, and very unbecoming, it must be confessed, the girls with pleated wooden kimonos of blue or red or purple over the usual narrow kimono, along the journey to and from their schools — some of them, indeed, many miles in from the country. When I see the boys going and coming, I see what I believe is the great hope of the future in Japan. The older generation rests its hopes upon the old civilization of its country, and tends to hear of foreign influence, which has already robbed that civilization of much of its beauty and dignity. But the present school generation is open to truth of all kinds. That a truth bears the stamp of the West upon its face, does not hinder its circulation among these seekers. I do not say earnest seekers, for they have a tendency that often accompanies tolerance, that of indifference to spiritual matters. Nevertheless I believe that from their midst, earnest souls may be found, who shall build the Christian Church of the future in Japan.

It is these school boys and girls that are the generous supporters of our Bible classes. You may ask why they come, and I answer—some because it is an opportunity to learn English; some because they wish to see a foreigner at close range, and some because they are curious to know what is this Christianity about which so much is said; but some come because they do have in their hearts desires deeper than anything in their environment can meet or satisfy. This last class and those who are earnest in the study of English, are the only ones that we can depend on for continued and regular attendance. They begin with an entire ignorance of the Bible. No passing allusion can be made to such expressions as "the Passover," "David," "baptism," or "the High Priests," without explanations that presuppose absolute ignorance. This lack of perspective that should come from the home teaching, and the fact that the mind has been formed in quite other grooves, make it often very hard to transfer the idea. The language difficulty must be superadded to this of course. But even so, I believe in the effectiveness of this teaching method for character forming. The inspirational message which may come at times must find some basis of knowledge among its hearers.

Whether or not we can persuade boys and girls to come to our classes depends quite largely on the opinion of their teachers. There are some earnest Christian teachers in the schools here; there are also some who are strongly prejudiced against Christianity, because of ancient history and ignorance of present conditions. There are others who, without having a personal knowledge of its teachings, pass judgment upon it by a comparison of the characters of the pupils who attend the classes and those who do not. They look at the grades they ask who better support the school rules, who face life more seriously; and especially they notice in the girl the effect on their manners. Is the modest, unassertive bearing required by the old standard of etiquette, still there or has it been replaced by the boldness, the independence of opinion that begets suffragetteism, and all the other extravagances of the Western woman? These are the questions the teachers ask, and that our boys and girls may give a good account of themselves and of those teachings which they only partially understand, is one of the vital conditions of success. We ought to be willing to bear the old test of being known by our fruits; and yet what a slight hold we have on the boys and girls, compared with the influences that surround them for the rest of the week.

The schools of which I have been speaking are all Government schools, and represent the rather haiting position of the Department of Education in its attitude toward religion.

They have begun to realize that the problem that Western States have been facing for many decades—that of the relation of State education and religion—is a problem which Japan, too, must face. Every day a short period in the school curriculum is given to what is called moral instruction. But the authorities are not satisfied with the results of this. One hears over and over again from the pen of leading men that the nation is losing its religious heart, and that there must be more definite religious teaching. The State religion is Shinto, the principal observance of which, when considered from the standpoint of the nation, and not of the individual, is the worship of the reigning Emperor. The schools own portraits of the Emperor, and the rooms in which they are kept have somewhat the sacredness of a shrine. A curtain is kept hanging in front of the portrait on all ordinary occasions, and in case of fire or other disaster it is always the first thing to be rescued. In order that it may never be left unguarded, someone must stay in the building at all times, and the teachers take turns performing this onerous duty at night and during vacations, when the building would otherwise be left vacant. Occasionally the students are taken to do reverence at a public shrine, but this I should judge depends on the attitude of the local authorities.

This, as was noted before, is largely the case in regard to the status of Christianity also. In Mito the heads of the schools are cautious. Kawai Michiko, who is known to many readers of THE FRIEND, and who is known distinctively in Japan as one of the leaders of the Christian movement, was invited by the President to speak in the Girls' Normal School here, about her travels abroad, with the special proviso that she say nothing about religion. The Secretary of the W. C. T. U., although that too is known as a distinctive Christian organization, was given a hearing in the Mito schools, in the cause of temperance, with the same limitation. Such opportunities as these, wisely used, mean a great deal in the gradual melting away of prejudice.

There are many other bright spots that one cannot forget. One that I like to think about may seem like a very small thing. It is the work of three girls who are teaching in three different primary schools out in the country. They became members of the Mito Meeting when they were attending the Normal School, and now, although they are separated from any Christian organization and from any direct communion with other believers, are yet leading quiet, faithful Christian lives, being a light not only to their small pupils but to the community around them. They have not hesitated to call themselves Christians, but their daily lives are more persuasive than any words could be, I believe.

I should like to tell you one other incident that shows that the leaven of Christianity is working in the schools. It is in regard to the Tokyo school, or rather college, for young men, of which Dr. Nitobe is president. I think he would not mind my using his name. At the time of his recent resignation, the students were deeply moved, and some seven hundred of them accompanied him to his home. Standing inside his gate, before the house, one of the young men said, "Let us have silent prayer," and for three minutes a solemn silence settled over that large assembly. The true spirit of prayer was there, although but sixty of the number called themselves Christians. It contained the essence of a Friends' meeting, but its efficacy was discovered not through historical study, nor through the developing habit of a lifetime, but through the needs of the minute, felt in the heart. The tears in the eyes of all told of its tendering power. Surely the influence of one Christian life is very great, and if it is a life that stands before the young in the schools, that influence is manifold.

EX-PRIESTS IN FRANCE.

The situation of ex-priests in France has made a wide appeal to English-speaking Protestants. In the main the movement has been away from the external things of religious profession, and toward the basic principles of Christianity. Naturally, Friends have had their interest enlisted, and Léon Reyvoire counts a number of the members of London Yearly Meeting amongst his helpers.

One of our valued contributors has translated the following from Le Chrétien Libre for THE FRIEND.—Ed.

"The Work of the Priests," which has attracted a good deal of attention, especially of late, was founded in 1884. In 1908 it was changed into a work "for and by ex-priests who have remained Christian." Its office is in Paris. Its organ, Le Chrétien Libre, is a monthly journal founded and edited by an ex-priest, Léon Reyvoire. The work has a department of Evangelization, which is carried on through "missions" and "Brotherhoods," and a department of "Assistance." This department of "Assistance" has recently been transferred to the care of "The Union of Catholic ex-Priests," which is an association a year old and now has one hundred and three members. Assistance is given through three channels: (1) There is a hostel which receives for a limited time ex-priests who are without a home or priests who need more intimate intercourse with the "Union of Catholic ex-priests" or the work of Le Chrétien Libre. (2) There is an office which distributes financial help to needy priests. (3) There is a bureau of employment through which ex-priests are enabled to find occupation suited to their abilities. The President and one of the founders of the "Union," Paul Vessié, is himself a worker, a corrector of proof, and was formerly a director of secondary instruction in Montpellier. The Union was established to bring ex-priests into association and to facilitate the search for suitable positions for those who need such and also to strive to remove the ostracism which too often exists toward one who has left the priesthood.

The "Union" fills a need which exists not only in France but in other Catholic countries. The large number of these ex-priests find employment as correctors of proof, others teach literature or science, while others change the cloth of the priest for the toga of the advocate. There are some who are active in public affairs or are instructors in academies, high schools and colleges. These are men who have lost faith in the religion in which they have been reared and desire to live true to their consciences.

The Union above referred to requests that the following appeal be printed in religious journals:

TO ALL SINCERE FRIENDS OF JUSTICE AND LIBERTY:

We are to-day in France more than two thousand ex-priests who have re-entered civil life. But our number would be considerably larger if the thousands of priests disposed to quit the ranks of the clergy were sure on leaving the church that they would find a means of honestly gaining a livelihood.

Unfortunately, there exists an unjust prejudice against the ex-priest; a prejudice which is carefully kept alive by his natural enemies. This is, however, gradually disappearing, but it has, especially in certain ways, placed difficulties in the path of the ex-priest. It is to fight against this prejudice that we have established the "Union of Catholic ex-Priests."

We do not ask for a privileged place in society. We ask only for our right to live as ordinary citizens. If an officer, a magistrate or any functionary thinks that he has a reason for renouncing his career and resigns from his position, he is not on that account discredited in civil life. Why should it be otherwise when a priest leaves the clergy? Because he has assumed vows and taken orders, is the reply. But these vows and these orders are usually made in the time of youthful inexperience and enthusiasm, and are contrary to the laws of nature and for the same reason they are shorn of value in the eyes of every sensible man. So true is this that since the Revolution the civil law, in accord with the natural law, has refused to ratify these vows. We have then on our side nature and law.

This certainly ought to be sufficient, and yet it does not suffice. It is necessary that we should have the support at least of all those who avow that they have minds free from prejudice. These are, however, those who are interested may pretend, the large majority in our country. It is, then, to these that we address ourselves. We ask these to aid us according to their ability, in this work of freedom and of humanity that we have undertaken. On the moral side we ask them to recognize and on occasion to declare with us that the fact that a priest quits the ecclesiastical state is not in itself dishonorable, is nothing which ought to brand him as the object of the dislike or ill-will of his fellow-citizens. We ask them to aid us in our efforts in a material way in finding for every ex-priest a position which is suited to his capacity and aptitude, and we shall be thankful for any information that they can give us on this line. Finally, we make a financial appeal to the generosity of our sympathizers to help forward our work of propagandism which will aid in the development of our organization and will help forward our efforts on behalf of indigent ex-priests. These, let me hasten to say, are a small minority.

By dint of perseverance and energy, the majority of ex-priests have been able to find suitable places in civil life, but at the price of many difficulties and in many cases after rude rebuffs. We would save others from the difficulties and the hardships which so many of us have had to endure. It is, then, primarily to a work of humanity and of social justice that we invite the generous and all sincere friends of justice and of liberty.

In this movement for emancipation which daily helps to free modern society from clerical influence and to make it more independent of all religious tutelage, and of the organization of the confessional, the liberation of the Catholic priest and his return to civil life are destined, by the force of things, to play an important rôle. This freedom from clerical domination will not triumph definitely in the social organism until secularization is made not only possible but easy for all members of the clergy.

This we believe is a truth which is recognized by the clear-sighted, by those who are not blinded by the prejudices of another age and who are ready to declare themselves under every circumstance, the determined advocates of progress. And this is why we dare to hope that our call will not go unanswered.

The Committee of the Union of Catholic Ex-priests,

P. VESSIE,

President.

"Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." (John II, 5.)

An anonymous writer in treating of the (faith) of the woman at Cana observes: What would Jesus think of our faith? Where are those who resemble the woman at Cana? Where are our overcomers? The response is: With few exceptions we are all spiritually ill, although we have been born again. Our faith is wavering, although we have faith in Jesus. We think Jesus is accessible to a few because so few are blessed; we are not earnest enough; we are too easily overcome; we have not faith enough in Him. Our faith ought to be the victory which overcomes the world (1 John v, 4); and yet we hardly dare to raise the voice to let it be known that we believe in Jesus! What kind of faith can this be?

If thou believe in Jesus, thou wilt persevere in prayer; thou wilt rely upon all the promises; thou wilt go forward in the way; thou wilt fight against Satan, against the world and against sin however presented. With Christ thou shalt be victorious. No difficulty will discourage thee; no danger will make thee afraid. Jesus is thy friend. It is well that thou pass through trial; this is needful that thy faith be strengthened. Without the discipline of trial thou could not be prepared for Heaven. Thou shalt never be abandoned to the power of the enemy. If thy faith is anchored in Jesus, of necessity thou wilt be enthusiastic, courageous, persevering.

The moment has now come for those who profess to have a heart and not on the lip only. It is the time to show our faith, heart faith must take in hand, a confidence which must be a very great thing to contend, the faith of the "prince of this world" already "conquered and overcome" can come from man. It is not the "faith of the world" in Jesus' strength. He always will triumph over the forces of evil and He will make us conquerors in His name. We must be fixed on God and on His glory. Being a poor, indigent, indigent, though we pass through tribulation, let us be the most powerful enemies. Let us be the faithful unto death and we shall receive the crown of life according to the promise made to us by Jesus Christ. This will be the supreme victory which will open the gates of Heaven, where from eternity to eternity we shall enjoy, mellible life with the multitudes of the elect and sin, the price of the Lamb slain for us. Amen! Translated from the Italian of a paper La Luce for THE FRIEND.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

POORER THAN THEMSELVES.—We relate the following incident which happened several years ago. A gentleman sat in a plain office puzzling his head over a perplexing question. He was the agent of a benevolent society organized to help the poor of a great city. The trouble was this: Thanksgiving was at hand and he had not enough money to do all that he wished to do on the coming day. He knew, too, many families who lived at starving-point, to whom Thanksgiving gave little apparent reason for thanks.

He knew young men who did not hesitate to spend three dollars on a single rose. He knew young ladies who thought nothing of wasting more or less dollars a week on candy. Twenty-five cents would buy a sumptuous dinner for a starving child.

Many hundreds of the extremely poor looked to this man for one good dinner at Thanksgiving time. For one day in the year they hoped to have enough to eat. How was he to give it?

Suddenly, three or four dirty faces peered through the window; a timid knock followed. Five street boys and two somewhat tattered little girls trooped in. The agent recognized them as members of the city mission school. He said pleasantly:

"Well, children, what can I do for you to-day?"

"Nothin'," answered the children, vaguely.

"You, Jimmie, you tell," said one of the girls, giving the tallest boy a shove. Jimmie fumbled in his ragged pocket, and slowly produced a large handful of pennies and small change.

"We fellers are a club," said Jimmie, with a grand air. "There's twenty of us, mister."

"We gals are in it, too," interrupted the girl who gave the shove.

"We, all of us, and the gals, too," responded Jimmie. "We come from Cummin's alley, and we're a club to help 'em gals givin'." Here's—here's nine dollars and ninety cents.

The agent stared at the large sum, collected at what cost of self-sacrifice only the givers could say.

"It's for them that can't eat no dinner," explained the little spokesman.

"Is it?" exclaimed the good man. He hardly knew what to say, as he glanced at the poor clothes and shrunken cheeks of the "club."

"Yes," said Jimmie, stoutly. "There's plenty poorer than us, mister; we're a club to help 'em. We didn't care how we didn't have a dinner for two or three days so's that we might give real poor folks one."

"How many dinners will nine dollar and ninety cents set?" asked a little girl, rather hungry.

"What kind of a dinner?" inquired the agent. The question was perceptible weakening in his voice.

"Oh—turkey and stuffin', and—and puddin'!" cried the children eagerly.

"That will cost perhaps twenty-five cents apiece," said the agent, "and your money will give a fine Thanksgiving dinner to as many as thirty-five hungry people. You have done nobly, children."

The dinners were bought, "the club" distributed them. The children's first plan was to put a cabbage in with each dinner, the agent says. But there were not cabbages enough to go around. So they cut each cabbage into quarters and put one piece into each bag.

That club of twenty poverty-stricken children worked until nine o'clock at night on the day before Thanksgiving, distributing thirty-five dinners to people "poorer than themselves."—Zion's Watchman.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

A room full of sixty-five old women bending over their sewing all day, only pausing for dinner—a "manager" at the desk reading aloud from a spicy book—a clatter of wheels and hoofs in the busy street—all these come back to me as I recall Mary Whitaker, and my first acquaintance with her at the Seventh Street House of Industry in Philadelphia. She came from Lincolnshire, and her English thrift and commonsense were in advance of her fellow-workers—she would chuckle with delight over the happy parts of the book—she could tell what we had read a year before—she was inspiring because responsive. She had lost her husband and three sons in the cruel North Sea—that grave from which so many fisher-folk never return, and then the "promised land" of America beckoned to her and she came to Philadelphia.

A little attic room was her only home, and the pittance that she earned barely kept the wolf from the door, yet her brave spirit and genuine religion made her a good neighbor, and she had a rare smile, a strong hand-grasp, a faith that shone out in her life.

One day we saw that her needle was flagging. "What's the trouble, Mary?" "Oh, the rheumatism is worse than ever—I don't see how I can sew much longer, and cutting carpet rags is no better." Then we lost sight of her for some weeks.

The scanty fuel, the mid-winter weather, the icy streets were hard for her. A knock at her door came none too soon, and her face brightened as two deaconesses from the Methodist Church brought her substantial comfort. Sitting down beside her, they learned her said plight. "Our Old Ladies' Home on Belmont Avenue is the right place for you, Mary! You have supported yourself and now age is upon you. We are poor women ourselves, but let us all three pray earnestly that way will open soon." This they did for a fortnight, when a bright-faced maiden presented herself at their office.

"I have come," said she, "to tell you of my mother's death and that I wish to do something as a memorial that she would approve. I have no desire for costly marble over her grave, but I am sure that my payment of admission to our Old Ladies' Home would be the right thing. Can you find me the right woman?"

"Yes, just the very one," they cried, "we will take you to see her now—her prayers and ours are answered."

In a few days Mary had left behind her forever the lonely attic, the doleful court, the struggle for existence. An intense appreciation of her new environment has remained with her ever since, so great is the contrast. When I drop in to spend an hour with her she is beaming with happiness. "Look at the view from my window—see this furniture, this fruit, these pictures. My dear young lady comes often and gives me all these warm clothes. Oh, how good God is to me!" "And the rheumatism, Mary, where is it?" "All gone, all gone; this is a heaven upon earth."

"Are the other women here so happy, Mary?" "A few are—come with me and visit them!" So we go from room to room, and one bright old countrywoman of Mary's, aged one hundred and six, deserves her name, "Wonderly," for she is hemming dish-towels and has good sight and hearing.

In the chapel of the Home they gather often for religious service, and as their voices join in Wesley's hymns they "sing with the spirit and understanding also." To many of them this large building is a haven where their last days are their best. Well can they say with Cowper:

"Here may we learn the Power of Prayer
To strengthen faith and sweeten care,
Here teach our faint desires to rise
And bring all Heaven before our eyes."

H. P. MORRIS.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

AN ARMY SURGEON'S LOYALTY TO TRUTH.

John Bellows gives a deeply impressive account of a young Hungarian named Skarvan, who had served as surgeon in the Russian army, and whose case was brought to the notice of our friend when he was traveling in Russia.

"[Young Skarvan]," writes John Bellows, "was within three weeks of the expiration of his term of military service when the light became clear to him that to kill men is entirely incompatible with the teaching of Christ. His friends begged him to keep on as he was for the brief interval in which he must serve, but he could not do so without doing violence to the love of God in his heart, and the love of all men which springs from it, and he voluntarily faced the unknown sufferings of a long imprisonment, followed by incarceration in a lunatic asylum, rather than fail in his testimony to the Truth?"

When this narrative was read at a small social gathering, one of the group observed meditatively:

"It must have been very hard not to wait until the end of his term of service, when that time was so near."

"Yes," responded another, "it would seem as though he might have gone on for just those three weeks instead of exposing himself to such persecution and suffering."

In the discussion that followed, a voice of protest was heard—"The clearer vision came to him when loyalty to it cost much. If the young man had waited for a convenient season to be true to himself and to God, if he had lived in conscious disobedience for just those three weeks, he would probably have lost all perception of right. Be sure it was not by accident that a deeper revelation of Truth came to him at that precise juncture, it was as a test of obedience."

The story of this young soldier brings before us the whole question of obedience to Christ's inspeaking voice, about which the world has such hazy ideas. Apparently up to the time mentioned, he had followed his profession with no feeling of condemnation—and therefore he was guiltless. But we may feel confident that through his years of military service he had been loyal to the Truth that he saw; had been led on step by step, until he was gradually prepared for the fuller light and for the test to which he was put.

Is it not often at a crucial period in life, at a time when faithfulness costs much, that some strong conviction of duty comes, and to the shrinking appeal: "Suffer me first" to do this or that, Christ answers as of old: "Follow Me;" "Now is the accepted time."

Young Skarvan's later record was worthy of him. He was at last set free, and finally accompanied some Russian refugees to England, joining a settlement there, and living with others in a small farm house at Purlleigh. John Bellows, who visited him at this place, says:

"When I met him first he could speak no English, but it was impossible not to feel the sweetness of his spirit, even when no words were spoken. A delicate-looking, singularly interesting young man, everybody about him was drawn towards him. He occupied his time in working on the farm, I suspect beyond his strength. The last time I was at Purlleigh he was lying very ill, and the doctor said he must soon die. It was very touching to sit by his bedside and see him at the end of his great sufferings, with the Divine presence shining on his countenance as visibly, it seemed to me, as it shone upon the face of Stephen! I have never before seen so remarkable a degree of it anywhere as in that little room.

"A week or two before, a young Georgian Prince had come there, drawn, I suspect, by curiosity more than anything else, to see who and what these Russians were who form the group of refugees. Be this as it may, finding Skarvan ill, he volunteered to sit up with him at nights, and the effect of being in [this young Christian's] company has been very powerful upon the prince. It has evidently shown him the reality of a power to which he had been much a stranger, and will leave a mark upon him that will not pass away."—A. S. L.

FALSE AND DANGEROUS.—In his book on South America, James Bryce says, "Effort and suffering do no doubt test and try a community. War, be it civil or foreign, never leaves men the same as it found them, though the common assumption that it makes them either stronger or wiser in the exercise of their strength, is as false as it is dangerous. If war, apart from the pure aim and high spirit in and for which it conceivably may be, but seldom has been, undertaken, ennobles the soul as well as toughens the fiber of a nation, what virtues ought it not to have bred in these South American countries, where the lance was always glittering and the gunshot always echoing."

FRIENDLY NEWS.

THE three Monthly Meetings in Philadelphia for some time past have shared the responsibility for the First-day evening meeting held at 7:30 in the Twelfth Street House. It is not often that as many as fifty assemble at that time, but the meetings are so frequently such opportunities of favor that those who attend regularly feel drawn to invite others to come and join them.

Haverford School.—Doubtless many thoughts have reverted to Thomas Brown's suggestion, at a recent Educational Meeting, that each Monthly or Preparative Meeting community do some serious thinking about the financing of their respective schools, looking toward greater independence of any foreign educational fund.

Haverford Primary School is one that has always been financed within the limits of the Monthly Meeting. This fact is due to unusually favorable circumstances, and to a larger patronage outside of the membership. The latter had become so great, that the Monthly Meeting decided last spring to meet the demands of the neighborhood for larger school accommodations.

During the summer months, a new school-house was in construction on the site of the old one. The completed building is a dignified two-story structure about forty by sixty-five feet. It resembles the adjacent meeting-house in finish and color.

Three commodious, abundantly-lighted school-rooms are on each floor. Hallways, cloak-rooms, lavatories and spacious stairways occupy the remaining space. The basement is light and airy, and a portion of it gives ample room for gymnastic drill.

The upper rooms are planned for "open-air work." The construction differs from the other rooms only on the south side, which is solid wall to window height. Then it becomes all window.

By arrangement of sash this can be made almost entirely open, admitting air and sunshine, dancing snow-flakes or gentle rain-drops. Incidentally some of the openings form a beautiful view of the College wood, with glimpses through and beyond, in the leafless season.

There is total desk accommodation for one hundred and four children. Eighty-four are enrolled, ranging from six to eight years of age.

Sixty-four of these are open-air devotees, and some of the remaining twenty are still pleading with mothers for open-air privileges.

Such unevenness of numbers made it necessary to press a first floor room into open-air service by opening windows and shutting off heat.

Under each desk in these rooms is a blanket bag, deep enough to reach well above a child's waist. It is covered with canvas about the bottom and has a thick felt pad inside.

Entering the room each child dons his one-piece leggings, his jacket, cap and gloves, all woolly and warm, and gray in color; slips into wool-lined, soft-leather shoes, then into the waiting bag, and sits at his desk in almost as much freedom of posture as do children of the other rooms.

When it comes to the matter of the open-air work, the school is now in a position to render more effective service to a considerable number of girls.

Here the most valuable thing that can be done for the improvement are of the nature of the work, and the fact that the school is now in a position to render more effective service to a considerable number of girls, the blackboard is an excellent thing. It is also a matter of course of blackboard?

Class work is so arranged that the pupils are able to do the same work in the same time as in the same way.

One can touch the blackboard with the hand, and the work will ultimately thrive. It is not the matter of the blackboard, but the matter of the blackboard. But one can touch the blackboard with the hand, and the work will ultimately thrive. It is not the matter of the blackboard, but the matter of the blackboard.

CHEYNEY NOTES.—We gladly insert this month's edition of the Cheyney Notes printed last week. —[Ed.]

The Board Meeting of the Institute for Colored Youth held Tuesday, Month 16, was a large and encouraging one. All but three members were present.

Most interesting work has been accomplished so far this school year and the spirit of teachers and pupil is most encouraging to the Management. Among the important items of business covered by the minutes, and the Principal's report are the following:

It was decided to hold the Summer School next summer and to extend the session from four to six weeks. This is in line with the best educational practice. A large number of pupils in earlier years have expressed the wish that they might continue two weeks longer, and it is believed that the instruction given in six weeks will be much more helpful to the teachers who are able to attend. The only difficulty in the question is one of expense, as the six weeks' course will cost more.

The Executive Committee is considering the question of charging more for board. This seems a necessity, although a large number of teachers from Southern schools are barely able to pay the $10 for which has always been charged.

Dr. Jane E. Baker, of West Chester, has been making a careful physical examination of the girls. This is the first year such examinations have been made. Many weaknesses and dangers have been noted and recorded, and the Institute is now in a position to render more effective service to a considerable number of girls. It is believed that such examinations may help our future teachers to carry such service into the schools under their charge in future years. An intelligent appreciation of the health element is an important part of the problem in Southern schools, as it is directly related to food and to proper sanitation and hygiene.

The Domestic Science room has been doubled in size by the removal of a partition and by throwing together two rooms. New apparatus, benches, etc., have been installed and the classes are now more efficiently conducted than heretofore.

The need of laundry machinery was brought before the Board two months ago. It is now important that our graduates not only know how to wash and iron in the old-fashioned way but to understand practical laundry machinery and how to adjust and manage it. Consequently a steam washing machine, centrifugal dryer and mangle have been purchased and will be installed ready for use at the end of the approaching vacation. The work of strengthening overhead supports, including the shafting and the machinery will be done by the pupils under the supervision of one of the teachers and thus a considerable saving will be effected.

Perhaps the greatest improvement at Cheyney has not been the rearranging of the Library. A large number of new shelves have been built and books that had been in storage have been carefully re-arranged and arranged on the shelves for service. The Library is much appreciated and used by pupils and teachers and already has become an effective help in the departments of the Cheyney work. Donations of really valuable books are welcome; also literary and scientific periodicals sent regularly after readers are through with them, even though they may come to Cheyney a month late.

A careful study and a critical examination of the courses of study is now in progress, with the aim of organizing a system of units of instruction which will produce better results in the future, it is believed.

Our new Principal is already making the acquaintance of some influential friends of negro education in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, and recently with his wife had the opportunity of meeting some of the considerable number of the leading negro teachers of Philadelphia and of showing for them the old ties of interest and friendship with the Institute for Colored Youth.

He is also conducting correspondence with the High School Principals of Pennsylvania and is preparing a list of negro pupils in the State of Pennsylvania, in the hope that those who seem fitted for future usefulness in their people along educational lines may be attracted to Cheyney.

For several years the Board has considered the advisability of appointing a President, a position heretofore lacking. Two years ago provision was made in the Constitution for the creation of this office. At the last Board meeting, George Vaux, Jr., was chosen President. The other officers remain the same as heretofore.

Chairman of the Standing Committees were appointed as follows:

Executive Committee,	J. HENRY BARTLETT.
Finance Committee,	THOMAS C. PUTTS.
Farm Committee,	EDWARD BRINGTON.
Household Committee,	ALFRED C. ELKINGTON.

The First Month's issue of the Westonian, volume XX, No. 1, is expected soon after the opening of the new year. Through the generous management of the six Friends who planned and carried out the many details of the large conference held at Fourth and Arch Streets on the fifth of Twelfth Month, all the addresses given and papers read, numbering thirteen, were ready for the press a few days after the meeting.

Those, with a few editorial comments, make up the First Month Westonian, which is about twenty pages larger than the usual edition. It was thought that most who were present at the meetings, as well as very many who were not, would prize the collection and that not a few would give the papers a careful reading. We are informed that an extra one hundred copies will be printed for those who are not regular subscribers, and these may be had for ten cents a piece by addressing the office of the magazine at Westtown School.

HARRISBURG MEETING.—Following so closely the recent visit of Joseph Elkinton and others to Harrisburg, I am greatly pleased to announce that the Friends of Harrisburg have made arrangements for the ensuing year at least with the Academy of Medicine of Harrisburg for the use of their lecture hall for the holding of public meetings on First-days and for such lectures and socials in the evenings during the week as may be arranged for without conflicting with other pre-arranged engagements.

This building is especially fitted for our purposes; is fully furnished, heated and lighted at all times; has a seating capacity in the hall for about one hundred; and is located almost in the centre of the city, and accessible from all parts of the city as well as being in a quiet residential section.

We feel that we now have a place of meeting where strangers as well as our own membership may be cordially welcomed.

It is hoped during the coming year at least that visiting Friends will remember us and so arrange their visits to Harrisburg as to permit of their attending our Meeting for Worship on First-days, and help us to build up not only our local membership, but our power for good in the community, and strengthen the Friendly interest already shown.

It is too early yet to submit definite plans for the future, but with the meeting-places available, it is hoped that we can make our efforts more effective. Our membership would be glad if those outside of Harrisburg and having Friends or relatives living or visiting in this vicinity who could be likely to attend our meetings, would kindly advise them of best places in the hope that they would become associated with us. The names and addresses of such handed to our committee would be followed with the best of hopes of increasing our membership.

It is hoped now that the question of place is seemingly settled that we will be able to determine things towards a Christian fellowship that we may meet here in the past and so seek fervently for that continued blessing which is our chief and abiding joy during the past six years, preparing ourselves to meet here for those greater things which were ordained by the Spirit of the Father, John Dillman and others.

It is hoped that Friends who have contemplated a visit here will see their way open to embrace the opportunity as way opens, and if timely notice of our accommodations will be made for their comfort while among us.

The new address is No. 319 N. Second Street, Harrisburg, Pa., and the time will continue to be as at present, 10.30 A. M.

—E. J. MARKLE SR., Harrisburg, Pa. W. G. HILWORK, Clerk.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[A valued subscriber has submitted the following. We trust the appeal will have place with many.—Eds.]

The references in THE FRIEND recently to the subject of the use of tobacco have been of interest to me, and while but small items they contain a great deal of truth.

The increased activities of the tobacco people in advertising their goods in the farm publications and even in the family magazines intended for women, of which we receive sample copies, is a matter I should like to bring to your notice, if you have not already had it done. When one person enters protest with the publisher of a paper carrying such advertisements it has little effect, but when such protests come in by hundreds and by thousands something takes effect immediately.

While your hands may already be full, I should like to ask you to bring this matter to the attention of readers of THE FRIEND, and if each one will protest against the accepting of tobacco advertisements by the publications which come to their homes, it cannot do otherwise than have a good effect.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

[THESE notes were sent on time, but THE FRIEND was published earlier last week than usual, hence the delay in their appearance.—Ed.]

THIS report will reach our friends after the School has disbanded. Our children will be widely scattered; the points of furthest range reached by them will be Evanston, Ill.; Greensboro and High Point, N. C., and Lynn, Mass. Several of the pupils from a distance, a dozen or more, have availed themselves of generous invitations from Friends in these parts and will find a home atmosphere where they go.

On Sixth-day evening we had the last lecture for the autumn term. It was given by George W. Kirchway, of the Columbia Law School, N. Y., his topic being Politics and Humanity. Our lectures prior to this had been illustrated and for this reason made an appeal to old and young, but this choice presentation of a very profound subject in language clear and forceful was a genuine treat to at least the older members of the audience—to outline it would more than fill the space allotted for these notes and we must omit it.

OUR last Seventh-day evening found us a thoroughly contented and happy family, and it would have gladdened the hearts of the parents of all our boys and girls to have seen how naturally and sensibly the various events of the day had gone off. Alice Sears and her boys and girls of No. 5 had invited the little people that make up the youthful community on the farm, but not pupils at the School, to a lake house party. There were about forty in all, and a jolly good time the young people had, and some excellent lessons in giving pleasure to others were learned.

THE first basket ball game of the season was played in the gymnasium between 3.30 and 5. Three boys from State College and two from West Chester made up the foreign team, all old scholars. Our fellows were successful, though they are not in good practice. After supper there was a good exhibition of hand-work in the Library; Walter Magill's and Ruth McCollins' classes furnished the major part, but the girls had many beautiful things to show which had had no part in class-room work.

WE were very glad to welcome back thirteen girls of last year's class; many of them were just home from college and their thought for the old school was grateful to the family here.

On Seventh-day afternoon a party of fifty, mostly from Germantown, and guests of Arthur H. Brown, made the Westtown farm the center of a "here and bound run," ending with a supper at the Farm House. They, too, were very welcome.

IN this connection it is appropriate to call the attention of Friends to the W. O. S. A. Bulletin Board which has been placed at the Friends' Institute rooms in Philadelphia. It is proposed to keep posted there items of interest to old Westtown scholars.

At a recent meeting of the Literary Union an address was prepared and telegraphed to President Wilson at Washington. The concern originated with the pupils and was in good measure carried out by them. Within a few days a courteous return has come to them from the White House, expressing the President's thanks for the message. The message sent was as follows: "The Literary Union Society of Friends' School, at Westtown, Pa., comprising pupils and teachers, have this day voted the following resolution: "We desire to express our sincere approval of the courageous stand taken by the President in the Mexican situation. We fervently hope that success may crown thy efforts in behalf of the cause of peace and righteousness."

During the week we have had visits from Zebulon Baines and Hannah P. Morris on Fifth-day and from James M. Moon on First-day; all were exercised in the ministry. As our mind reviews these seasons for public worship that we have had this term, it would be an ungrateful heart which did not return thanks to his Father in Heaven that He has so often turned his faithful messengers toward us.

On First-day evening, Thos. K. Brown spoke with his usual directness to the boys on "Vacation Plans," dwelling chiefly on our duties to the home circle now so soon to expand and take us in. Samuel H. Brown spoke to the girls on the "Cultivation of Will Power." His happy way of making profound things simple made a very profitable half hour for all present.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—An agreement has lately been signed by Secretary Bryan and the Minister of the Netherlands at Washington providing that any question between the United States and the Netherlands, which cannot be settled by diplomacy, shall be submitted for investigation to an international commission of five members. The period of investigation is fixed at one year, although it may be shortened. This is the first treaty between the United States and a European nation, based upon Secretary Bryan's peace plan. Similar treaties have been negotiated with five Central American nations.

A quarantine has been established on the importation of potatoes from Canada, England and Scotland. An embargo has been put on the importation of potatoes from some of the countries due to the "powder scab." The quarantine may be extended. Foreign representatives said the scab did not injure the tuber, and that the disease would not affect this country. It is stated that this year's potato crop in the United States, because of the drought, is short by millions of bushels, while the crop in some of the European countries is unusually abundant.

Radium is used in the Oncological Hospital in this city for the treatment of cancer. In speaking of the work of the institution lately, George H. Stuart, Jr., its president, said: "Eight years ago the Oncologic Hospital was incorporated for the purpose of discovering the cause of cancer and tumors and to find the best method of treatment. It is the only institution in Pennsylvania that has special facilities for treating cancer in the various stages of the disease and the only place in the State devoted to such a purpose. We have used radium from the beginning, but practice surgery, use the X-ray and other approved methods. This institution is the first and I believe the only one in the State that is employing radium as a curative agent. More than 100 cases have been treated by radium and our records, which are open for inspection, show a large percentage to have turned out favorably."

A despatch of the 18th from Chicago says: "Labor Commissioners from Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, Illinois and other States began here to-day a two-day conference under the auspices of the Association of Public Employment to discuss the question of the army of unemployed and the best means of coping with the existing situation. Other delegates reported unprecedented numbers of men out of employment in Kansas City, Milwaukee, Detroit and Indianapolis."

A recent despatch from New York City says: "The latest reports of the Census Bureau, show that in the number of deaths from all causes in various occupations, steam railroad employes stand at the head of the list in the percentage of deaths from accidents. Of the number of deaths among steam railroad employes who are in active service, 53.4 per cent. are due to accidents."

It was stated from Trenton on the 19th that the cost of living in 1913 was not so high as it was in 1912, at least in New Jersey. In 1913 the cost of a test bill of goods was $13,632, while in 1912 it was $14,600, a 7 per cent. decrease. Since 1898, the report says, there has been an increase in the cost of living of 27.7 per cent. The general increase in the cost of living since 1898, Chief Low points out, is not due to anything like a uniform advance in the price of all goods, but, rather, to the phenomenal rise of a comparatively small number of articles, principally flour and meats.

A despatch from Washington says: "The American Telegraph and Telephone Company, Baltimore, and the Bell Telephone Company, New York, Trust, has agreed to combine and control the Western Union Telegraph and Telephone Company and to operate the combined system under the name of the Western Union Telegraph and Telephone Company, at the suggestion of the Department of Justice. The companies have agreed to accept the terms and conditions of competition."

It is stated that the report of a committee selected to examine the law power to cure and to restrict the sale of radium in the case of the U. S. as indicated by the investigation by the U. S. in the case of the U. S. of the Wolf-hub Company. The investigation, however, had begun to examine the nature of mesothorium, a mineral salt having the radioactivity, and the curative and palliative properties of radium. It is stated that this investigation is of import to the thousands who suffer from various forms of cancer and who, because of the scarcity of radium, are unable to obtain treatment with this product of nature. It is said that the company own large deposits of thorium-bearing mineral in North and South Carolina.

A despatch from Madison, Wis., says: "State food inspection law saved $6,000,000 to consumers of cheese in the last two years. The saving has been accomplished by keeping out adulterants. This has been in addition to the primary result of food inspection, the preservation of health. In the last two years the State food inspectors have inspected 3000 cheese factories with 125,000 patrons, 8000 grocery and general stores, 2000 meat markets and 2000 drug stores, and have almost completely stopped misbranding and adulteration of food so far as it lies within the power of the State to do so."

The currency bill lately passed by Congress has been signed by Speaker Clark. In doing so, he said: "My own judgment is that it will be satisfactory to the country in a high degree. The fact that a large number of Republicans and Progressives voted for our bill is proof positive that the country is well pleased with it."

The Union Pacific railroad announces a new schedule, by which it will be possible to make the long journey between New York and San Francisco in 86 hours.

It is reported that the Rodman Wanamaker Expedition to the North American Indians has returned to New York after traveling 25,000 miles in a special car, visiting Indian tribes. One of the purposes of the expedition was to collect true information about the Indians, their ways of life, their lands, education, health, intemperance, irrigation and water rights. The expedition was in charge of Dr. Joseph K. Dixon. It was probably the most extended expedition ever sent to Indians. No less than 189 tribes and sub-tribes were visited. This report contains much information. Secretary Lane and other officials of the Department of the Interior, it is said, think this information will be of great help in giving a better understanding of what the Indians desire and need.

A despatch from Washington of the 24th says: "The Administration has approved the general principle of settlement by arbitration of all questions that may arise between nations by the attitude it has taken in negotiation of a general arbitration treaty between America and Denmark."

It is stated from Topeka, Kansas, that crop losses amounting to $30,000,000 were caused by bugs, insects and worms in Kansas last year. Now the State is destroying the chinch bugs, Hessian flies, army worms, codling moths, San José scale and numerous insects infesting granaries and mills, which have been the marauders. Kansas-long has known that her annual losses from such causes were large. The Hessian fly is dangerous only to wheat, while the chinch bug destroys both wheat and corn. Professor Dean estimates that damage to wheat, corn, oats, kafr and cane in Kansas last year was about $16,000,000 by chinch bugs and about $3,000,000 by Hessian flies.

It is said that of the total population in this country, 36 per cent. are engaged in agriculture, 10 in manufacturing, 2 in mining, 6 in transportation and about 14 in all other pursuits.

It is stated: "When the parcel post service was first inaugurated accountants in the postoffice department estimated that the first year's revenue from the new system would amount to something like $15,000,000. Time has shown this to have been a conservative estimate, for it now seems certain that the yield of revenue from that source will total upward of $30,000,000."

FOREIGN.—A despatch from Sydney, N. S. W., says: "Steamships bring terrible details of the recent volcanic eruptions on the island of Ambrim, in the New Hebrides group. Five hundred natives have lost their lives. With a terrific roar, which was followed by a rapid succession of artillery-like detonations, all the craters of the volcano entered into full activity, spouting flames and lava and throwing out huge boulders."

Twenty-eight million Bibles, or books consisting of a portion of the Bible, were printed during the past year, according to statistics compiled in Toronto. Private publishing firms printed 10,000,000, and various societies the rest. About half the number were printed in English, the other half in about 500 languages and dialects.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.) Phila. at 6.32, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone, 1144.

THE BOOK COMMITTEE.

Some of us entertain the opinion that one of the most important services rendered by our Representative Meeting is that which is under the care of the Book Committee. One line of work after another has been delegated to the Representative Meeting, the work of this particular committee has been long in hand, and it is but reasonable to expect as the result of their many years of service they will have much to show.

Viewing it in one special line they have had a splendid record and deserve all the warm approval they have from time to time received; the remarks that follow must not be interpreted to disparage or discount this, for the labor has been freely given, often at sacrifice of what was important in individual cases.

Nowhere is there such a collection of Friends' books on sale as at our Book Store, which is managed by this Committee. Our Book of Discipline for generations has contained this or an equivalent clause, and only in the revision adopted in 1910 was a material change made. The paragraph alluded to is: "As the Meeting for Sufferings is to take the oversight of all writings proposed to be printed, which relate to our religious principles or testimonies; our members who may have any such publications in view, are to lay them before the said meeting for its advice and concurrence, etc."

The alteration made by the Committee of revision in 1910 is but a slight one and is indicative of a change of spirit more than anything else. It is this: "It is directed that if any of our members shall print or publish any writing which tends to excite disunity and discord among us, or any writing which the Representative Meeting shall judge derogatory to our Christian principles and profession, etc." Some may have felt that the rigid restriction so long imposed has been in part responsible for the very little strictly original thinking any of our publications show, but of this later. Our Yearly Meeting controls considerable funds which are used for the circulation of Friends' books, so that each year we hear in the Book Committee's report that so many volumes and so many pamphlets have been given away, a few to individuals, but by far the larger part to libraries scattered all over the country. Just what part these valuable contributions (and they are valuable, and in some cases very valuable) play in the habits of the circles where they are used, is a matter for thought. We can venture a guess that they form but a very insignificant part; this would in no wise justify us in lessening our energies to give the books all the prominence we can, but it may well awaken the query whether with the material at our disposal the money specially set aside for the purpose (a considerable sum) and women to do the work, and with each year a reading public more and more ready to take what we have to offer, they do what we offer is made attractive to the best cultivated circles of the present date, whether in face of these and other facts we are in good measure living up to our advantages for service to others?

That we are doing almost nothing in the special line of work under review is made very evident when we compare some of our publications with those which issue from the Headley Press in London each year. As I write there are on the table two volumes from the latter firm on topics that every reader of Friends' books is familiar with, and I take them to illustrate the point in hand, the Journals of Thomas Ellwood and of John Roberts, both delightful books. The latter especially captivating to young people, and a book, once begun, that is rarely thrown aside until finished, a book, moreover, which has developed in many a young man and woman a clearer line of thought than they had ever experienced before. There is nothing showy about these two volumes that would make them in the least repulsive, but in their style of type, quality of paper, manner of binding, in the illustrations used, in the artistic title page, in the literary flavor given to one of them by the interesting correspondence that passed between Whittier and Holmes concerning the Journal, and in still other particulars that could be given, they have a certain quality that renders them attractive, and appear to twentieth century readers like books issued in their century.

Some of us entertain a genuine reverence for ancient books, but unlike our reverence for aged people, we incline to look upon the ancient volumes at arm's length, and prefer the same fact in more modern decorations for everyday handling. Whether this is good taste need not come into the discussion, it is a deep-rooted with most of us to make it worth the effort to do to proof, so our plea resolves itself into this, while the complete journals and biographies of Friends, the standards of our Quaker literature need to be preserved, and our Book Committee seems to be recognized on both sides of the Atlantic as the right custodian, it is in large measure their place to stand on library shelves, or to look out at us from behind the glass doors in the bookcases in Friends' homes. As a rule their very appearance repels the casual and even the careful reader, in many cases they are too bulky, and as to the fifteenth and eighteenth century heirlooms they contain riches that is fairly abstruse to the average reader of to-day, the need of editing, which in reality means that they need to be presented from the present-day standpoint, so as to contain the spirit and standards of the past with the view-points of the present.

To do this demands certainly two things, scholarly taste and inclination and an appreciative regard for the characters to be portrayed and the lessons to be taught. Here are topics ready for the hands of any literary men and women among us—James Logan and his Services; The Pemberton Brothers; The Philadelphia Quaker during the Revolutionary War; Woman's Sphere, as the Friend has seen it for two and a half Centuries; Friends' Contribution to Education in Colonial Days; or if you want to work in a different field—George Fox's Experiences in America; or, The Fothergill Brothers, followed later by a new edition of those most helpful of all Friendly letters, the correspondence of Samuel Fothergill. The right person handling this last named topic would find ready to his hands a field that should yield a richer return than any collection of modern correspondence. Still another field offers—Barclay's Catechism is, we all agree, a very valuable collection of Scripture texts, grouped by a master hand, but, originally intended for mature minds, it has found its place as a text book in some of our schools. The formal style of language used in the questions, the appeal to adult minds and the fact that we have moved on two hundred and fifty years since Robert Barclay wrote them, satisfied many men and women years ago that a better plan should be devised for impressing the youth of the Society with the fundamentals of our faith as taught in Scripture language.

The list could be added to almost ad libitum, and there are thoughtful people among us who have serious reflections along the lines indicated. We had among us only the past summer a gifted Friend, whose feet were first directed toward the Quaker fold and whose spirit was first quickened by a desire to know us better, by the perusal of Guest's Life of Stephen Grellet. He read widely and profoundly afterwards, but his introduction came through a modest book, "The great two volumes of Seebohm's Life" he told me, "had no attraction for me in the line of introduction, but I have read them from cover to cover since."

Here then is our plea. The Book Committee stands ready to help in any reasonable plan such as has been here hinted at, the Discipline no longer enjoins the rigid censorship that it once did; the material is abundant; the financial means have rarely been long withheld from a worthy object and there is a cause to be served.

We do not expect great books, but we do count on good books. If the Society gives one book a century to the collection of standards, we do more than our share if we reckon on the basis of numbers. We have given three books that will stand the test that is demanded, one for each century. The books of this class have to be lived before they are written, they are not necessarily very perfect from the scholar's standpoint, but they invariably are the utterances of a great, good soul who has a message for the people. George Fox's Journal, John Woodman's Journal, and the Poetry of Whittier stand in a class quite apart; the twentieth century contribution, a counterpart to these, is still out of sight. D. H. F.

"We do not want the invertebrate good-fellowship that has no grasp of essential principles, no sense of the difference between truth and error; we need to be built up together on the strong foundation of the love of God revealed in Jesus Christ, and baptized together into that deep personal experience of His cleansing, renewing, vitalizing presence in our own souls which made the early Friends what they were. We shall, I am sure, only be able to repair the mistakes of the past, and help to make the Society of Friends once more a united body, full of the passion of the living God, and strong in a sense of a mission to all humanity, as we are deeply convinced in our own experience of the truth of the Christian Gospel; that the Eternal Word, planted like a seed in the hearts of all men, has 'become flesh' in the person of our Lord, who by His life and death reveals to us the Father's heart, redeems us from sin and selfishness, and floods our being with the life and love of His own ever-present Spirit."—E. G., in The British Friend.

IMPRESSIONS OF A VISITOR TO OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

It is not my purpose to write an account of Yearly Meeting, but to put down a few outstanding impressions of one who was a visitor to your Yearly Meeting this fall.

In the first place, its size and manner of entertainment. There are certainly some advantages in being a small Yearly Meeting and in coming into such close association with one another as is made possible by the ample and delightful accommodations at the school. The Yearly Meeting seems almost like one very large family and the close social unity seems conducive to a closer union in worship, as was particularly impressive in the evening collections at the school.

Another thing which interested me was the attitude of the older and younger members of this unified family toward one another. I never attended a meeting where there was so much exhortation addressed to "the younger ones particularly." Whether the fact that so few young people, however, seem to be actually "used" by the meeting is due to a real lack of interest and conviction on the part of the younger members or to a lack of confidence in youthful Quakerism on the part of the older, is not a matter for an outsider to judge. For some reason or another there seems to be an impression among some young people that any active interest in meeting affairs is rather the exclusive province of the old.

In this connection, it is stimulating for us younger Friends to remember that those invincible idealists of the seventeenth century who inaugurated the Quaker movement, were nearly all young—young men fired with a great vision of things as they ought to be, young men with a great new realization of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; and that they went forth into the conventionalized religion of their day with the undaunted belief that ought always to characterize young idealists and pioneers. How shocked they would have been if they had thought that Quakerism itself would ever become so conventionalized and static that there would be little in it to challenge the pioneer energy and aspiration of its young people! To be true to those giant-spirits of the past, to be true to ourselves, we ought to go forth and face the tremendous problems of the twentieth century with the same original Divine obedience to the Ideal Within that made them challenge the insincerities and unrealities of their day.

Each Yearly Meeting doubtless has its own particular strong and weaker points, and it is broadening to see things from different view-points, to get a little perspective on one's own short-comings, and to carry back ideas and ideals for improvement. From this point of view especially I enjoyed attending the Yearly Meeting. Underneath all our outside difference, one is deeply impressed with the great underlying unity of purpose which binds us together as members of one society and, which still deeper down, unites us with all Christians and with all men everywhere who are pressing on toward something bigger and better than has yet been realized.—EDITH STRATTON, in the Olney Current.

"CARD-PLAYING is undisputably an impediment to spiritual growth and should therefore be avoided."

"Sarah Daws produced a certificate of her travels in Maryland."

"In 1728 The Yearly Meeting asks for a subscription for Moon & Clifford who have sustained great loss by fire."

These notes, taken at random, suffice to show the standing of Gwynedd and that once more the house had to be enlarged. In 1785, Abington, Horsham, Gwynedd and Richland Monthly Meetings were set apart by Philadelphia to whom they had belonged, and they allowed to form a new Quarterly Meeting to be held at Abington.

As the Revolution approached, the Meeting for Sufferings sent a minute advising Friends to "keep from mixing with the people in their human Policy under the situation of Publick Affairs." This was evidently meant to curb the war-spirit of 1774.

The early years of the next century brought a separation in our Society which was disastrous, for families and meetings were wrenched apart, and readjustment was attempted. We find Upper Dublin Preparative Meeting uniting members to Horsham; Providence Preparative Meeting laid down and members joined to Plymouth, in 1827. Richland also abandoned as a part of Gwynedd Monthly Meeting and "a tried remnant" held their gathering at Horsham in the home of William Lukens. These finally met in a little house where the Lukens and Spencer families assembled on First-days, and as a child I remember going to the meeting; yet even there the Wilburite controversy crept, and Caleb Cope with a handful of followers retained the building while my great uncle, Geo. Spencer with as many more, built a new place of worship on his own premises. A new railroad was surveyed so as to pass through this property and the present meeting-house was built a mile away.

To return to Gwynedd, we find the origin of its name a pleasant suggestion—the early Welsh settlers who first slept in a tent, looking out the next day on new-fallen snow, exclaimed, "saw-nedd: all white." After 1827, a little meeting house was built by my grandfather, Jesse Spencer, and it was there that his daughter Lydia married Samuel Morris, in 1853—the old-fashioned wedding-customs prevailed, for the bridesmaids and groomsmen of my parents remained three days, and then adjourned to the house-warming of the new couple at Olney, and they tell of blindman's-buff and other games played around the blazing hearth that wintry night. The moving away from Gwynedd of various Friends, resulted in the closing of the meeting-house and it is now transformed into a dwelling, though the ancient grave-yard still holds its silent witnesses.

The large meeting-house is a stately structure in possession of "Race Street Friends," and there was held a "Foulke Reunion" as a Bicentennial, 1698-1898. From far and near were gathered the descendants of Edward Foulke, and many an ancient bit of history was unfolded, and many an incident recalled, concerning the settlement of Gwynedd. We were glad to find that Daniel Boone and Abraham Lincoln also claimed E. Foulke as their ancestor.

Edward M. Wistar and his sisters were among the group—his wife told us of their visit to the old homestead in Wales, still standing, and Samuel Emlen read aloud the letter of Edward Foulke to his children, showing his Christian solicitude for them—thus were linked together the present and the long ago.

Read at a Germantown Tea Meeting, Eleventh Month, 1913.

"Well done! good and faithful servant!" will be a more joyful sound, a more substantial reward, than all the favor and friendship, false praise and honor, which this life can bestow.

For "THE FRIEND."

A TRUE GOSPEL MINISTRY.

JOAB S. GIDLEY.

If the Protestants of the United States were as zealously and as unitedly engaged in trying to keep Church and State in their proper relationship as were the people of the towns of Dartmouth and Tiverton in the early settlement of New England, the writer is of the opinion that a great amount of good would be accomplished.

In the early history of Dartmouth "the Plymouth Colony court annually apportions to the town a tax for the support of ministers, but the Baptists and Quakers of Dartmouth were inflexible in their resistance to it.

"Laws were passed in 1692 and 1695 requiring the towns to provide able, learned and orthodox ministers to dispense the word of God.

"Dartmouth did elect a minister, but the question of orthodoxy then arose. In 1704 the town was indicted for non-compliance with the law. At the town meeting held [First Month] 4, 1705, this indignant reply was sent back to the court:

"To the quarter sessions to be holden at Bristol the 8th day of [First Month], 1705. We understand that our town is presented for want of a minister according to law, to which we answer that we have one qualified as the law directs, an honest man fearing God, conscientious, and a learned orthodox minister, able to dispense the word and gospel to us."

The name of this minister does not appear upon the records of the town.

In order to meet this question of orthodoxy the Assembly passed a law in 1715, in which the prevention of the growth of atheism, irreligion and profaneness is suggested as a reason of its enactment, in which it was provided that the determination of who should be ministers should rest ultimately with the General Court or Assembly. Dartmouth still refused obedience, and claimed the selection of her own minister.

At the [Third Month] town-meeting, 1723, in defiance of an act of that year, Nathaniel Howland was chosen minister, receiving fifty-five votes, while Samuel Hunt, a Presbyterian or Independent, and the first preacher of that sect in our town, received twelve votes.

The struggle culminated in 1724. In the year 1722, the Assembly of Massachusetts passed an act to raise one hundred pounds in the town of Dartmouth and seventy-two pounds eleven shillings in the town of Tiverton (then a part of Massachusetts) for the support of ministers, whose selection was subject to the approval of the General Court. These two towns were the only ones in the province that had not received any Presbyterian ministers. To blind the eyes of the people this sum was put with the province tax, and was afterwards to be drawn out of the treasury. The spirit with which this was met by the inhabitants of Dartmouth can best be seen by quoting the record of the town-meeting held [Eleventh Month] 26, 1722. The record says:

"It being put to vote whether the whole rate of one hundred and eighty-one pounds twelve shillings, called Dartmouth's proportion of our province tax, be made by the selectmen, it passed in the negative. And it was put to vote whether eighty-one pounds twelve shillings, being as we are informed by our representatives to be our just proportion of our province tax, be forthwith made by the selectmen of Dartmouth. Voted that it shall be made. Thirdly, Voted that the charges arising or set on the selectmen of Dartmouth, either by execution on their bodies or estates or in appealing to His Majesty for relief, be raised by town rates. Fourthly, Voted that seven hundred pounds be raised on the inhabitants of said Dartmouth by a town rate, for securing the selectmen for not making the rate of one hundred pounds, and also for all expenses arising in our sending to England to His Majesty in the above premises. Fifthly, Voted that the selectmen are to be allowed—shillings, each of them, a day for every day they lie in jail on the town account."

The town was thoroughly in earnest. Only five tax-payers protested against this appropriation of the seven hundred pounds. This sum, large for those days, was to be met by the tax of that year, and was not bequeathed to posterity in the form of a town debt.

The bold and defiant attitude taken by the town could not be overlooked by the province rulers. The refusal of the selectmen to assess the tax was followed by their imprisonment in Bristol jail, where they remained about eighteen months. The persons who were imprisoned were Philip Taber and John Akin, selectmen of Dartmouth, and Joseph Anthony and John Sisson, selectmen of Tiverton, a part of whom were Baptists and a part Quakers. An embassy was sent to England. Thomas Richardson and Richard Partridge, who were Quakers, interceded in their behalf. Their petition, addressed to the King in Council, was an able document, and nobly did it plead for freedom of conscience and security of religion, civil liberty and property.

The petition was considered at the Court of St. James on the second day of [Sixth Month], 1724, when were present the King's most excellent Majesty and all the lords of the Privy Council, and "it was ordered that the obnoxious taxes be remitted, and that Philip Taber and his fellow-sufferers be immediately released from their imprisonment, and the Governor and all other officers of the province of Massachusetts Bay were notified to yield obedience to these orders.*

This shows what people may sometimes accomplish when they are thoroughly in earnest and work unitedly in a righteous cause. And on penning the above the writer is reminded of the following account:

It was given Jonah to say: "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown. So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sack-cloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them. . . . And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil, that He had said that He would do unto them and He did it not."

Now if President Wilson could be induced or persuaded to proclaim and publish such a decree as the king of Nineveh did, and the people try as hard to live up to it as those of Nineveh did, who will dare to say that God will not pardon our iniquities and we shall not have to pay tribute to the priests as was made known to Joseph Hoag, in 1803, but that a free Gospel ministry shall continue to prevail?

"The Crisis presses on us; face to face with us it stands,

With solemn lips of question, like the Sphinx in Egypt's sands?"

This day we fashion Destiny, our web of Fate we spin;

This day for all hereafter choose we holiness or sin."

EXTRACT FROM MARGARET E. SANGSTER'S "FROM MY YOUTH UP."—Margaret E. Sangster has related an experience of her father's in his boyhood.

He had crossed the ocean and was living in Canada.

"The home land seemed at an interminable distance, but he did not care to show those around him that he pined for its voices and its scenes. Therefore, he would go by himself, seeking solitude in the woods that he might indulge the mood of longing that was often nigh to heart-ache.

"Wandering through the forest on a Sabbath afternoon, he discovered as night drew on that he had lost his way. Every one who has ever had the experience knows how baffling and puzzling to the sight is an assemblage of trees when there is neither path nor clue.

"The boy found himself more and more uncertain and bewildered and as the sun went down, he feared that he must spend the night alone in the woods.

"He did then what he did always throughout his life when in doubt. Kneeling at the foot of a tree, he asked the Father above to care for his child, and lead him safe back to the house he had left. Rising, he heard the faint tinkle of a cow-bell, and the sweet sound guided him out of the forest and back to the hearth."

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN J. WHITTIER, of the Temperance, a branch of the Friends' Temperance. A selection of Philosophy.

"Though we break our father's promise, yet we must not break the promise of Humanity, the traitor to Humanity is the traitor to God. Man is more than Constitution. Better to be a slave than to be a slave to the Church and State alike."

BOOZE A NECESSITY! If it were desired to establish a judicial opinion in the interests of evil doing, if it were desired to be made to discredit in the minds of intelligent men and women the theoretical sanctity of the courts, a better method more effective could be devised than the practice now prevailing in the State of Pennsylvania:

Years ago the "necessity" for certain "wayside inns" or "road houses" was established to the satisfaction of the Judges then presiding over the districts affected. But what shall we say of more recent Judges who have sustained the contention that "if it appears that a hotel or restaurant as a place where food and lodging may be obtained is necessary, then it follows as a matter of course that a license to sell intoxicants is necessary." What a travesty on our civilization, on our boasted intelligence! The saloon a necessity! A trap for the foolish ones, a snare for the unwary, a corrupter of morals, a perverter of justice, an impairer of health, a destroyer of peace—all this a necessity! As well aver that suicide is necessary. No evil is necessary. All wrong is an intrusion. Every evil thing is in perpetual violation of that Divine "order" which is "heaven's first law." It exists, not as a necessity at all, but only to be resisted, overcome and abolished. Many people acknowledge that this is true; the history of human progress confirms it; but where are the influential jurists who will stand before the Courts of Pennsylvania and defend the non necessity of the saloon? They are few indeed. In a new and literal sense the words of the Apostle Paul are true to-day. "The strength of sin is the law." What right have we to ask allegiance to a system of jurisprudence that makes the law a terror to good works instead of evil? Must we experience again those bitter tests of manhood endured by such men as Lowell, Whittier, Brooks, Sumner, and many more, who refused to compromise with "law-shielded ruffians," but defended boldly the rights of humanity despite all laws to the contrary? We may, perhaps, ponder with profit the political conditions that called forth that poem by Lowell on the capture of Fugitive Slaves near Washington, or those equally intense expressions of Whittier in The Pine Tree. But let us pray earnestly that our land may be spared from any nearer approach to such conditions than we have in many places at the present time.

WILLIAM PENN'S BREWERY.—Some one sends from Iowa an advertisement clipped from the Grand Rapids Herald which asserts that "Wm. Penn built in the city of Philadelphia what is generally conceded to have been the first American brewery." It is asserted further that "his motive was his interest in temperance," and "personally he liked good beer." One who has made the life of William Penn a special study, traveling abroad to perfect his knowledge of the character and environment of his subject, has told the writer that the above statements are quite misleading. Such, of course, is usually the character of the literature and advertising of liquor dealers. But the authority referred to is of the opinion that Penn was not the first man to build a brewery in America, that his was not a brewery in the sense in which we use the term to-day, but merely a private plantation-brewery, and that it is not admissible that "his motives" embraced any thought of "temperance" as we understand it.

The assertion contained in the advertisement that "if Wm. Penn were here to-day he would approve this industry" and its product "is not justified by the history and life of Penn." It may be true that "he liked good beer," but the liquor men appear to have no vision of the element of progress in men of any type. They reason that if a trade or custom is approved by good men in one age of the world, the said trade or custom is thereby established as a good thing for all future ages. It would be impossible for them to conceive, perhaps, that Penn. if he were living to-day, would be amongst the "radicals" in reform, just as he was then.

Can any one of open mind, who knows the character of Wm. Penn. doubt for one moment that if he were here to-day and taking part in the life and thought of this time as he did in that of his own time, he would denounce the Grand Rapids Brewery as a "mischievous and unholy thing" and would invoke the "civil powers" to abate the slanderous use of his name? Probably he would suggest, also, that we apply to their business the test of merit given in the Scripture, "A tree may be known by its fruit." "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit."

THE ANNUAL INQUIRY regarding the use of intoxicating liquors—a very personal inquiry made by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of every one of its male members (such at least is intended to be the scope of the inquiry)—is an excellent illustration of the progress of thought amongst Friends. In the time of Wm. Penn. or even one hundred years later, such a concern, although as much needed, perhaps, as at the present time, would have been regarded very much as liquor men, and a few Friends, seem to regard it to-day. It would have been pronounced as intrusive, or too exacting. But with the increase of social responsibility characteristic of this age, and with the growth of the feeling of accountability arising therefrom, Friends have responded very frankly to the question whether they "use intoxicating liquors as a beverage or hand them to others." Our members long ago ceased to engage in the manufacture or sale of liquors, few if any derive any revenue therefrom either directly or indirectly, and probably more than ninety per cent. of the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are total abstainers, while the remaining ten per cent. are as industrious as the others in endeavoring to outlaw the liquor business. The practice of the Yearly Meeting in continuing this inquiry year after year might be supplemented to advantage, perhaps, by a more explicit statement of what is expected of the various committees of subordinate meetings having this subject under their care. In order for entire unity of purpose and action it has been suggested that such committees from all the Monthly Meetings might meet in conference once a year and enter into united exercise concerning the work of the Church entrusted to them. The field of service is a large and important one.

A RECENT CONVERT TO PROHIBITION is Malcolm R. Patterson, an able lawyer and an ex-governor of the state of Tennessee. Until recently he was one of the stoutest defenders of so-called "personal liberty" and "property rights" that the liquor interest could boast of. He vetoed the prohibition bill passed by the legislature of his state and accompanied his veto with a message characterizing the bill as "destructive and undemocratic." The bill was passed, however, over his veto, and not long after another bill was passed prohibiting the manufacture of liquor in Tennessee. The speeches of Governor Patterson at this time were the strongest and most plausible arguments that can be adduced in favor of the liquor traffic. They were "as pure gold to the liquor interests," and with the united support of the "wets" he was elected a second term as governor. He has been succeeded since, however, by Ben W. Hooper, who is governor at the present time and in hearty sympathy with the law.

But by the power of Divine Grace, Malcolm R. Patterson is a changed man to-day. Brought to his knees by the goodness and the power of God, he was made to realize his own sinful condition, and filled with the holy ambition to endeavor to undo the evil he had done, and to defend the cause he had defamed. Hear him now declare the simple but touching story of his conversion and ending with the inspiring declaration, "I favor prohibition in any form that will either reduce or destroy the liquor traffic. I favor it person wide, town wide, state wide, nation wide and world wide." This man has been employed by the Anti-Saloon League for the coming year, and it is expected that he will spend most of his time lecturing in Pennsylvania.

AN ATTEMPT TO DISCREDIT the testimony of a Friend was made by the liquor interests a few years ago. A statement of the case may serve to put others on guard against similar devices. An effort was being made to close the one saloon in Malvern, Pa. Word was sent to the home of an individual who actively opposed the license, that there was a package at the station for him. The person in question being away from home, some enquiry was made and it was decided not to apply for the package in question nor to inform the reported consignee. In due time this man was called to the witness stand before the Court at West Chester and was questioned by the counsel for the hotel-keeper whether he had not ordered whisky to be shipped from Philadelphia as books, and whether the same did not arrive in bad condition so that liquor was dripping from the package. The witness, being entirely ignorant of any such shipment, declared his innocence, and consequently his testimony was not discredited. Inquiry was made later of the station agent concerning such a package and no record of it could be found. There is wisdom in the declaration of the Friend here referred to that, "It is very important to keep our own hands clean."

THE RESULTS OF THE NO-LICENSE CAMPAIGN in Delaware County cannot be given in full until after the License Court has adjourned, but never in the history of the county has the liquor question been more prominently before the citizens and the Court. The Demonstration and Mass Meeting in Media on the evening of Twelfth Month 11th exceeded expectations in size and enthusiasm and was participated in by all classes of citizens. Friends took a very prominent part irrespective of their standing in the meeting, but without violence to any of our principles. On the contrary, it is believed by many that their action was a "credit to Society." At the opening of the License Court, the Judges announced that no decision would be handed down respecting liquor licenses until after all the testimony concerning all the cases had been presented and the Court had taken time to review the situation as a whole. The General Remonstrance or "Memorial to the Court" petitioning that no license be granted in the entire county was signed by 8300 men and 12,263 women. This represents approximately the total number of individuals appealing to the Court for relief from the burden and the iniquity of the liquor traffic. Owing, however, to the large number of dealers to be remonstrated against specifically, in order to have weight under the law, these individuals were obliged to sign more than one document. A more accurate idea of the work done by the no-license workers is furnished by the fact that the total number of signatures was 115,274, or more than one signature to every man, woman and child in the entire county.

THE COMMITTEE OF ONE THOUSAND, appointed by the recent Columbus Convention of the Anti-Saloon League, journeyed to Washington, D. C., and on the morning of Twelfth Month 10th, assembled at Hotel Raleigh on Pennsylvania Avenue, preparatory to marching to the Capitol. It was discovered, however, on "lining up," that, with the sympathizers who had accompanied the committee-men, there were fully twice the number appointed, and this number was further augmented as they marched by representatives of the W. C. T. U.; so that by the time they reached the place of speech-making, at the east wing of the Capitol, there were probably three thousand men and women from all parts of the United States, a great many of them persons of merited distinction for public service. These people presented to Congressman Hobson and Senator Sheppard a resolution asking for an amendment to the federal Constitution prohibiting the "manufacture, sale importation or transportation of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage." Hobson and Sheppard went immediately from this meeting and introduced the resolution into their respective branches of Congress. The proposition will be considered in due course.

THE LAMB AND THE BEAST.

There are two principles of life according to which human lives are ordered, one from heaven, the other from beneath. In the apocalypse these two principles are respectively denominated the lamb-life and the beast-life. The book of the revelation has for one of its subjects the contrasts and conflicts between these two; and it celebrates the final victory and supremacy of the lamb. The lamb is the term employed to set forth the deepest glory of our Divine Redeemer. It stands for pure love, holy obedience, meek suffering, absolute surrender, utter self-effacement, all-consuming sacrifice. The beast means the very opposite. It is the life that seeks its own, exalts itself, vaunts itself. It wants others to minister unto it and to burn incense to its vanity. It hates the cross and lives for itself only. And it can be religious also; but its religion proceeds from and ends in self.

The beast life is quite natural to man considered apart from the grace of God. Man fell when he became estranged from his true origin—God—and sunk into his own darkness and selfishness. For man has nothing good independently in himself, any more than a solar ray has light in it independently of the sun from which it proceeds. By becoming a slain lamb our holy Redeemer aimed at slaying the beast in us and re-uniting us to the Father of our spirits. And herein consists our salvation. It is more than an escape from the penal consequences of sin. It is deliverance from the darkness, desolation and moral death of the self-life as a present experience.

The book of the revelation gives us the war of the lamb, not merely on the stage of history, past, present or future, but also in human lives. His work is both intensive and extensive. A mere outward territorial expansion of His Kingdom is nothing compared with His entrenchment in the hearts of men. With the breath of His mouth the beast-life must be slain and the lamb-life exalted. If the Lamb is ever to be the light of a jasper city He must be practically the light of men, as they individually come to His life which is the true light. When the conscience is illuminated it becomes tender. When the heart is illuminated it becomes purified. When the understanding is flooded with His light it comes into communion with the mind of God. And this light will ever lead to the cross where the body of sin, that is the beast-life, meets with its doom.

To conclude, that in us which loves meekness, simplicity, purity, submission to the daily cross, is the lamb-life in us. For that was the life of Jesus in the days of His flesh. As we turn to it, and let it lead us, it will assuredly bring us finally into that blessed city where the Lamb is in the midst of the throne and where His unveiled glory is the feast of His adoring worshippers. If we get accustomed to dwell in His light now, we shall feel at home in it when we are at last where no earthly shadows shall obscure its brightness or dim its glory.

Why sayest thou, . . . My way is hid from the Lord?" (Isa. xl: 27.)

Life is always opening new and unexpected things to us. There is no monotony in living to him who walks even the quietest and tamest paths with open and perspective eyes. The monotony of life, if life is monotonous to you, is in you, not in the world. . . . It is God, and the discovery of Him in life, and the certainty that He has plans for our lives and is doing something with them, that gives us a true, deep sense of movement, and lets us always feel the power and delight of unknown coming things.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

LITTLE things are little things; but faithfulness in little things is something great.—ST. AUGUSTINE

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE ORIGINAL FACTS relative to the real identity of the familiar nursery rhyme had at one time been discovered according to the story that the London Standard published in the New York Herald.

During the Reformation, the first of the children, Alice, in the west of England, resolved to engage in peace with Henry VIII, and, in token thereof, sent certain time-locks of all the property to the king at Whitehall. For certain years the abbot placed the documents in a pie-tray and carried them away with a crust. The dish he gave to a friend, but some day John Horner, and he told him to carry it by the name of the king in London.

On the road, Jack Horner became hungry and came to the conclusion that it would be foolish to carve while he had a pie in his hands. So he broke the crust and put in his thumb and pulled out a roll of parchment. The disused and disappointed fellow threw both pie and parchment into a nearby brook.

When the deeds did not appear, the king charged the abbot with contumacy, and commanded that the unfortunate cleric should be hanged.—Youth's Companion.

BURBANK'S MESSAGE TO BOYS. Throughout the State an aggressive campaign is being made, under the auspices of the Pennsylvania State Sunday School Association, to instill in boys and young men an abhorrence of the drink and cigarette habit.

Thousands of cards are being distributed by the school, containing a warning issued by Luther Burbank, the "plant wizard." This warning, which is used with the consent of the Sunday School Times Company, follows:

"I never use tobacco and alcohol in any form, and rarely coffee or tea. I can prove to you most conclusively that even the mild use of stimulants is incompatible with work requiring accurate attention and definite concentration.

"To assist me in my work of budding—work that is as accurate and exacting as watchmaking—I have a force of twenty men. I have to discharge men from this force if incompetent. Some time ago my foreman asked me if I took pains to inquire into the personal habits of my men. On being answered in the negative, he surprised me by saying that the men I found unable to do the delicate work of budding invariably turned out to be smokers or drinkers. These men, while able to do the rough work of farming, call budding and other delicate work "puttering," and have to give it up, owing to an inability to concentrate their nerve force. Even men who smoke one cigar a day cannot be trusted with some of my most delicate work.

"Cigarettes are even more damaging than cigars, and their use by young boys is little short of criminal, and will produce in them the same results that sand placed in a watch will produce—destruction.

"Several of my young acquaintances are in the habit of who gave promise of making happy and useful citizens, and there is no question whatever that cigarettes alone were the cause of their destruction."

LUTHER BURBANK.

THINKING OF SELF.—A nervous girl, failing normal sleep and appetite, and, in consequence, declining in health and beauty, consulted an experienced physician.

"Your trouble," he said, "is growing feebleness. You are comfortably situated, yet your weakened physical condition bears witness to a severe strain somewhere. This strain is distinctly traceable to the emotions. You must learn to get more outside yourself."

"Do you mean that I am selfish?" asked the girl.

"Not actually selfish, but inclined to think of yourself and your personal surroundings exclusively."

The girl went home disappointed and thoughtful. Her reflection convinced her that the doctor was right, and she had pointed out to her the way of escape from the distressing conditions.

It is never wise to give self a prominent place on the spiritual horizon. "To think more of yourself, but less about yourself," is good advice. We all have troubles. Without them we should be in danger of lacking in that sympathy which brings the highest efficiency. But we ought to bear our troubles not with querulous whining, but with fortitude.

"I have to live with the thing itself," said a woman who was dying of an incurable disease; "I will not live with the idea of it." Few of her friends knew that she suffered agonies every day; nor did she find life bare of enjoyment. To the sufferer from "ingrowing feelings," on the other hand, a little disappointment, a mild shock, a trifling ailment are serious matters. The sensitive person, like the coward, dies a hundred deaths.

You must fight the habit of becoming self-centered from the moment you recognize it. Religious faith, the will, unselfish interest in others—those are powerful allies. It helps toward fortitude to recognize the fact that suffering of one kind or another is common to all. Recollect the Divine promise that no one shall be tempted or tried beyond his power of endurance. Live one day at a time, but that in the best possible way. When you sincerely resolve to get away from yourself and to live in a larger world, new and alluring vistas open before you. To be self-centered is to be lonely and unhappy. To live for others is to be free.—Youth's Companion.

RICHARD JORDAN'S ADVICE TO A YOUNG MINISTER.

(COPIED FROM THE ORIGINAL BY W. B. E.)

Friday-morning, Twenty-first of First Month, 1819.

DEAR BETSY:

It did not seem likely I should have an opportunity of communing with thee before thy departure on thy intended voyage, and having been a little acquainted with navigation and its concerns, and perhaps thou might have understood that when men dealing in navigation send out a vessel they generally furnish some instructions in respect to ordering the Business, now as this business is something new to thee I thought it might not be unacceptable to thee to take a little bit from me, especially as thou has sometimes given me the endearing appellation of father—who has been some acquainted with these kind of voyages, and that the departure or setting out is necessarily attended with fear and trembling and doubting respecting our qualification for the undertaking, and whether we may not be cast away in some part of the voyage, we seem to have so little on board and not even scarcely Ballast sufficient to keep the vessel steady from upsetting—well, my dear child, good for us are all these kind of feelings, as it is said, fear begets care—now when we go out thus poor and stripped as to supplies—we go in faith in the all-sufficiency of Him who enjoined to pray and trust for our daily bread and when we are careful thus to keep our dependence on Him and on Him alone, we are sometimes furnished even with daily supplies to our own humble admiration, considering our own nothingness we are then sensible all our sufficiency is of our God. And after some of these times of favour we shall feel ourselves unbent and that there is a precious liberty in the Truth to be cheerful and social with our friends—and here's a time that needs watchfulness; be cheerful, not light; watch the bounds Truth gives, not exceed, so shall we be favored to keep the balance and avoid much of that extrem between up and down.

But when thou may experience the loss of all things in these travels and begin to wish thyself at home, or perhaps doubt whether thou hadst not better staid when thou wast there and so become stripped of everything but sack cloth, wear it underneath and disclose not thy condition to any mortal—but let this be thy Resolution, "though He slay me yet will I trust in Him."

Do not hunt for temptation just for the sake of wrestling with it.

CHRISTIANITY AN EXPERIENCE.

[By request of a Friend we are printing the following narration from a little book entitled, "The Discovery of Self," by James M. Ludlow. The lesson of the account is particularly directed to such as find a difficulty in getting satisfaction from research and scholarship, but the appeal is to a wider circle than that. Every one of us must know Jesus Christ in a saving experience and fortunately this experience is in no sense dependent upon human or scholarly attainments.—Ed.]

Let me narrate an incident in the life of a "twice-born man" whose name is held in affectionate remembrance by thousands who knew him in later years. He was a graduate of a noted German University, an honor man in more than one branch of study. He was especially versed in philosophy and the history of human thought. When the writer first met him he was an advanced rationalist, a self-satisfied materialist. He did not, as many do, pause upon the brink of speculation and apologetically call himself a mere agnostic as he looked into the abyss of universal uncertainty, confessing that he could not know the deep mysteries of existence. He thought that he had solved the "Riddle of Existence" as thoroughly as Haeckel. He regarded himself as sufficiently furnished with the facts of present science to warrant confidence in atheism, and probably derided every form of religious doctrine. As he saw no indication of a Divine law or volition in the natural world, so he admitted no Divine influence in individual experience and no providence in human affairs. His frequent saying was that Plato was greater than Jesus, neither of whom reached the attainment of the modern scientific mind.

Yet this scorn of religion did not prevent his study of its various systems. He was curiously entertained by the phenomena of the different faiths of mankind; an accomplished mythologist, familiar with the fantasies of the superstitious tribes of men, among which, and as possessing a similar importance he was accustomed to class the fabrications of the church of Rome and the theology of Presbyterians.

He was, moreover, thoroughly conversant not only with books, but with the active life of the world. He had served as an officer in the English army in the Crimean War, as a promoter of the cause of Don Carlos in Spain, as an agent of Central American revolutionists. Proud of his attainments as a scholar, confident of his abilities, absolutely independent in his convictions and conduct, he was a typical product of the best and the worst of the free-thinking movement of the day.

Circumstances led this man to sojourn for awhile in a small back-country hamlet, where, without books and genial comrades, he was left much to his own musings. Within a few months he made a very humble confession of conversion in the country church. The repute of his scholarship, and of his change of convictions, led to his being called to a professorship in one of our denominational colleges. Here for thirty years he taught, winning the love of students and the admiration of fellow-professors, not only for his rare intellectual powers, but as well for the charm of his simple Christian character.

We need not go back to the days of Augustine or Francis of Assisi for the proofs of the transforming power of the religious spirit.

In the confidence of our late intimacy this man told the writer the drift of thought which led him to reverse his opinions. He had made a spiritual self-discovery. A light flashed within him, in comparison with which all philosophy and science were a deepening twilight.

All his life previously he had looked at truth only objectively, from without. As he said, he had been seeking God in the blank spaces between the stars; tried to find his footprints in the arid dust and tangled jungles of partially-written history. But in his retreat from the outward excitements of life he communed with his own deeper self. He tried to fathom the depths with such questions as these:

"Who am I? What am I?" No answer. "What is my destiny?" No answer. "What has been my life?" The reply came like the rush of waters breaking through a mountain dam and deluging the land below—"My life has been an utter failure, unsatisfactory to reasonable judgment, to conscience, to sense of relationship to my fellow-men, supplying no generous incentive for further living."

As he uncovered the dark depths of his soul Plato and the philosophers gave him no light, save a sort of phosphorescent gleam through the surface spray.

He then re-read carefully the teachings of Jesus. He sought to analyze that prodigious personality and character. They baffled all his acumen; he felt that they belonged to things infinite.

Though he could not understand the Christ, he found that the Christ-light enabled him to understand himself. The lips that spake to me in Palestine seemed to speak familiarly with him. "I see no God anywhere." "True," said the Master. "No man hath seen God at any time, save the Son, and He to whom the Son shall reveal him." "I want no God who is a mere force beneath the material world, for nature is destroying me," groaned the human spirit. "True," said Jesus. "You need Divine companionship. 'Lo, I am with you always even to the end of the world.'" "I need counsel. My thoughts are darkling and mislead me." "True," replied the invisible speaker. "My Spirit will guide you into all truth." "This is not for me, not for me." My life has been too sinful for such communion." "True," said the Monitor. "But did I not say to one who was even lower than you, 'Neither do I condemn you. Go in peace?' Did I not inspire My disciples to write, 'If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things?'" "I want higher and holier incentive, I could not be a Christian. My life is a shipwreck. I can no longer gather up its dissipated energies." "True," said the Voice. "But 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' Did I not make of fishermen and publicans the leaders of the religion that is now conquering the world? And cannot I help you with your trained mind to gather up your powers in sublimest consecration?"

Then the proud man bowed, and breathed a prayer which was also a vow—"Help me, O Christ, and I will follow thee."

Thus, as naturally as the molten bronze fills all the indentations of the mould, the new Christian thought shaped itself in the empty places of his heart. He had discovered himself; and as he gazed into the still depths of his own being, he discovered God, as the heavens reflect themselves in quiet waters.

VEGETARIANS INCREASE.

MOVEMENT AGAINST FLESH FOODS IS PROGRESSING RAPIDLY.

For a variety of reasons vegetarians are in the increase the world over. Members of royalty, statesmen, poets and men of science are among those who say they thrive on fruits, nuts and cereals. It is noteworthy that many of the world's most famous women have abandoned all flesh foods.

George Bernard Shaw is a vegetarian because it is repulsive to him to think of eating the carcasses of slaughtered animals. He frequently makes what he regards as a hearty meal on four bananas.

Marie Corelli, English author, is a vegetarian because of her aversion to the killing of animals. The Countess of Warwick adopted vegetarianism because of her increasing weight. She has gained her former slenderness since she stopped eating meat.

August Rodin, the sculptor, declares that his imagination is more alert and his ideals higher when he sticks to the vegetarian diet. Princess George of Greece, the Grand Duchess Serge of Russia and Dieulafou, the famous archeologist, gave up animals as food because of religious feelings.

There are many famous vegetarians in America, including Dr. Crittenden, of Yale; Horace Fletcher, Prof. Herschel Parker, of Columbia University; Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Florence Morse Kingsley, Grace MacKowan Cooke, Edwin Markham, the wife of the former Mayor of New York, Robert A. Van Wyck, and Senator Robert La Follette.

What one of the earliest vegetarians, Pythagoras, once said, "I turned him a corn of wheat, and he grew into a man," is being converted while China's wheat is being converted into a man, and that abstinence from flesh food is being converted into a man.

The following from the report of the Hon. J. H. Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to the House of Commons, before the House of Commons, on the 11th of July, 1913, shows the value. He says in part:

"The largest increase since 1870 is in the value of arms. I have pointed out that 1870 arms were worth £1,000,000, and at that date of the cost of armaments. It was £1,000,000, and now it is now £74,544,000, an increase of £73,544,000. It was then growing at the rate of hundreds of thousands a year; it is now growing at the rate of millions a year. Some I have had the privilege of occupying my present office, the expenditure on armaments has grown by £15,000,000, and I see no prospect of this very menacing growth coming to an end unless there is some fundamental change in the attitude and policy of the nations of the earth.

"The expenditure on armaments differs from every other expenditure in two respects. It is non-productive and the increase or diminution in armaments is not dependent upon the will of the individual government that initiates the expenditure, or even of the House of Commons that sanctions the expenditure—it depends upon the concerted or rather competitive will of a number of great nations of whom we constitute one of the most potent. Armaments count for the largest, and I think the most sterile, increase since 1870."

FRIENDLY NEWS.

JOSEPH ELKINTON read his paper on Silent Worship to a company of Friends in Atlantic City on the 28th ult.

The Alumni Association of Friends' Select School held its annual meeting at the School on the evening of the 2nd inst. The School is reported to be in a very healthful and promising condition.

The Annual Meeting of the Foreign Missionary Association of Friends of Philadelphia will be held in Friends' Meeting-house, 20 S. Third Street, on the evening of Third-day, First Month 20th, at 7:15 P. M. Sherwood Eddy is expected to attend the meeting. He was for fifteen years national Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. for India. Last year he spent with John R. Mott in India, China, Korea and Japan.

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF THE ATLANTIC CITY COMMITTEE. The meeting at Atlantic City has been attended the past year by most of the members of the Committee according to appointment. The reasons to have been a slight increase over some preceding years, a larger number of persons, especially of visitors, attending the meeting.

By reports from various members of the Committee, it is seen that most of the meetings vocal expression has been given to the fact that we trust that much in the way of pure Gospel truth has been given. We are, however, made thoughtful when we consider the fact that there was so much speaking that seemed unnecessary to the purpose of worship. A message given forth under the promptings of the prompting of God's Holy Spirit could not have so hindered the spiritual life of a meeting.

From another report we extract the following: "At a previous meeting, I had the privilege of speaking. After the meeting was over, I took me the woman spoke pleasantly and said, 'We were speaking to-day and enjoyed it so much.' I said to her, 'I enjoyed it so much speaking.' She then said, 'I particularly liked your speaking to-day that perhaps the meeting had been tiring, and I was glad to hear that I believe we are too anxious. The meeting was very interesting and I felt much encouraged by the expressions of interest and sympathy.'"

The meetings are reported to be held in a healthful and interesting atmosphere, and gratitude is expressed to the friends who have the presence and Gospel service of ministers from various parts, as they have visited Atlantic City from time to time.

An increased interest is manifested by some of the resident members whose attention to the visitors may be of service to such a meeting.

On behalf of the Committee,

ALICE C. RIBBARD.

MOORESTOWN, N. J., Twelfth Month 10, 1913.

The following from The Friend (London) twenty-sixth of Twelfth Month will interest many of our readers.—[Ed.]

Max L. Reich, a member of Westminster and Longford Monthly Meeting, has returned from a visit to the United States and Canada extending over five months. This visit was the outcome of a concern which had been resting on him for some years past; but he did not apply for a minute liberating him, and his only official credential was a certificate of membership and of unity from his Monthly Meeting commending him to all Friends with whom he might come in contact.

Max Reich spent most of his time in and around Philadelphia, attending every Quarterly and Monthly Meeting subordinate to Philadelphia (Orthodox) Yearly Meeting. He also visited most of the particular meetings, and held a number of "appointed" meetings, besides numerous meetings in private houses. At Fallsington, Pa., in an old meeting-house where an evening meeting had never been held, an appointed meeting was arranged, though many local people thought the effort hardly worth while. In the result the building was packed, and an excellent meeting was held.

Our Friend had some opportunities with Friends of the Hicksite branch in various places, and also with the extreme conservatives of Bristol, Pennsylvania, and Poplar Ridge, New York. He attended the meeting in New York City, with which we correspond, and visited also Chicago, Toronto and Hamilton, Ont. At the last-named place he held a public meeting after the manner of Friends—a most encouraging effort, well worth following up. Unfortunately he did not know until after he had returned to England that there are quite a number of English Friends living in Hamilton.

Max Reich found remarkable openings for Friends' teaching in many of the places visited; his intercourse with Friends on that side proved most stimulating and profitable in religious matters, and most pleasant socially."

WESTTOWN NOTES.

It is too soon at this writing (Second-day morning) to chronicle the return of the large school family; with a snow-fall of several inches and mild weather, extra stage accommodations have been engaged that everybody may get in dry shod. During the vacation, very prompt work was necessary in order that the new steam heating system for the boys' north side-rooms might be installed; the job was ready for steam to be turned on the day after New Year's—so that little time has been left for cleaning. Some other improvements in the wash-rooms in both the girls' and boys' ends have been made. The usual thorough cleaning of class-rooms and corridors etc., has been in progress.

Some of the people at the School have regretted that the splendid skating on the lake was not available for the pupils; with four-inch ice as smooth as glass, and such a large surface, those who had the time, derived much pleasure from the sport.

During the severe wind storm last Seventh-day night a large oak tree in the south woods was blown over bringing other smaller trees with it; as was the case a few years ago, when an even larger tree in the south woods yielded to the inevitable, the roots were more or less rotted. We much regret losing any of these splendid big trees.

The buildings on Walnut Hill are progressing; the dwelling-house shed is soon to be under roof, while the barn, which is under way, has less to show for itself.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"I have read THE FRIEND for many years and very much value it. I earnestly hope that Edwin Sellow's co-workers may be sustained and strengthened to go on with the work and that they will have the help and prayers of Friends everywhere that the paper may lose none of its solidity or its friendliness."

Winton, Ohio.

The writer has read with interest the communication from Isaac C. Rogers in this week's number of THE FRIEND and ventures to add a bit of personal experience along the line of protesting against tobacco and cigarette advertisements.

He has long been an interested reader of The Outlook and has usually found its advertisements, for the most part at least, unobjectionable. Some months ago, however, the back outside cover of that journal was entirely given up to a cigarette advertisement, very attractively gotten up. A note of friendly remonstrance was sent to the publishers, eliciting the reply that they had, in consequence of a large number of similar objections, concluded to decline such advertisements in future. It must be borne in mind that the editor and publisher are often obliged to view matters from different standpoints, and, doubtless, there are times when the needs of the business office make very strong pulls upon the consciences of editors.

I. C. Rogers' remarks are well worth attention, and this writer hopes that all readers of THE FRIEND will do their part.

First Month 3, 1914.

JOHN C. MAULE.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated that more than 76,000 persons have arrived in this country from Europe during the year 1913. Last year the number was 61,163. Managers of employment bureaus have said an estimate of 20,000 unemployed persons in the city of Philadelphia was too conservative. They thought 40,000 or 50,000 was not an exaggeration. One year ago, it was said, labor exchanges were advertising for help.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has announced that the contract for the power for the electrification of its lines between Broad Street Station and Paoli and between Broad Street Station and Chestnut Hill had been let to the Philadelphia Electric Company. It was said that probably all of the local trains on these lines would be operated by electric power before the end of 1914.

It is stated from Washington that the exact altitudes of more than 2700 places in Pennsylvania are given in a bulletin just issued by the United States Geological Survey Bureau. The elevations were obtained by the Federal Government in co-operation with the Topographic and Geologic Survey Commission of Pennsylvania. The publication, ready for free distribution, should be of great advantage to engineers, as the elevations afford a starting-point for a survey of any kind.

It is announced that radium-bearing deposits were found by Government experts within a mile of Mauch Chunk, Pa., the first of the kind in the eastern part of the country. The property has been turned over to Federal authorities for philanthropic use, but the quantity of radium available has not yet been determined.

It is stated that after First Month 1, 1914, the weight limits of parcel post packages in the first and second zones would be increased from 20 to 50 pounds; that books would be admitted to the mails, and the rates would be reduced in the third, fourth, fifth and sixth zones.

Leonard G. Robinson, general manager of the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society, addressed the Jewish Chautauqua Society of America in this city and declared that 5000 Jewish families were now living on farms and were making wonderful strides in the tilling of the soil.

It is said that some 3,300 saloons have recently been closed in Ohio as a result of the newly adopted legislation limiting the number of saloons in "wet" territory to one for each 500 population.

It was stated from New York on the 30th ult.: "Promoters of the Life Extension Institute to-day outlined the national scope of work of the organization, just incorporated in the State of New York, and whose directors have elected ex-President Taft chairman of the board. Lengthening of life and conservation of health are, as its name indicates, the objects of the new corporation. It plans, in so far as possible, to teach Americans how to live. It will be both a philanthropic and a business organization. Any person, whether an insurance policy holder or not, may have an examination made. Experience has proved that early discoveries of slight 'impairment' have resulted in large reductions of death rates."

A despatch from Washington on the 30th ult., says: "Further regulations for payment of the income tax, issued to-day, provide that husband and wife, living together, shall be entitled to an exemption of $4000 from the aggregate net income of both, but when separated and living apart, permanently, each shall be entitled to a $3000 exemption."

It is stated that statistics show 302 persons were killed by automobiles in New York City during the last year. The report was issued by the National Highways Society. Of the total killed 149 were children. The record for 1912 was 221 killed, of whom 103 were children.

In a late meeting of scientists at Atlanta, Ga., it is reported: "Wonders that actually have been accomplished in curing cancer through the use of radium were described to the chemical section by Dr. Charles L. Parsons, chief of the division of mineralogy in the Government Bureau of Mines. He exhibited several photographs showing the results of radium treatment for cancer."

A despatch of the 1st inst. from Washington says: "Regulations of the most exacting character, restricting the importation of foreign potatoes into the United States to guard against potato diseases, were laid down by Secretary Houston, of the Department of Agriculture, to-day in the form of an official decision. Countries now barred from importing potatoes are Newfoundland, the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, Great Britain, including England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland, the nations of continental Europe and the Dominion of Canada."

A despatch from Washington of the 1st inst. says: "For his monumental story of 4000 years of farming in China, describing the methods by which the Chinese have been able to support nearly 500,000,000 people on an area smaller than the improved farm lands of the United States, the late Prof. Franklin Hiram King, of the University of Wisconsin, has been awarded a medal of honor by the National Geographic Society."

It is reported from Washington that for the first time since the Government took possession of the powerful radio station at Arlington, the time signals of the United States Naval Observatory were sent around the world last night by wireless telegraphy. Captain Joseph L. Jayne, who is in command of the United States Naval Observatory, said that, from all indications, the signalling was a success. He added: "What we most want is to stimulate interest in accurate time all over the United States. We have had inquiries from jewelers all over the country who want to get the daily signals. Many of them have private wireless plants of their own."

Figures for 1913 issued by Dr. S. Josephine Baker, head of the Bureau of Child Hygiene of the Board of Health, show the infant death rate for the year was 102 for 1000 births. This is the lowest rate in the history of the city and, judging from incomplete returns, the health officials say it is the lowest rate of any large city in the country. In 1912 the rate for this city was 105.3 for 1000 births.

A despatch from Harrisburg says: "Although the salaries of school teachers still remain low, they are steadily increasing, according to State Superintendent of Public Instruction, N. C. Schaeffer. During the last school year, the average monthly salary paid male teachers in Pennsylvania was $65.82, an increase of 78 cents over the prior year, while the average woman teacher received $48.69, an increase of but 28 cents."

Not one of 111,000,000 passengers carried by the Pennsylvania Railroad during 1913 was killed in a train accident, according to an official statement issued by the railroad. Reports for the last six years show that almost 600,000,000 passengers have been carried by the Pennsylvania Railroad, and but 16 of them lost their lives in accidents to trains.

FOREIGN.—Thousands of women and children in Bulgaria are facing starvation this winter, according to Inez L. Abbott, missionary of the Woman's Board of the International Congregational Church and principal of the American Girls' Boarding School in Samokov, Bulgaria, who has come to this country to raise funds for the relief of 7000 destitute families in the Samokov district. The suffering and want in Bulgaria was much greater than last year. She said that the crops were gathered last year before the model year of the crop. Winter was very dry and at the time of the winter rains the crops were very dry and such a crop could not be gathered. The lack of labor and the high price

A despatch of the 30th ult. from Paris says: "The Government of part of Europe is now recognizing the latter as a part of the United States and food of the same grain of wheat, with the same quality of soil, violence have effected the objects of the State of the United States. It could have caused a number of deaths. The wheat crop of the United States has registered below 2000. Conditions are very dry in the United States and in central France, which usually are favored by the weather. The weather in the villages, which ordinarily receive snow, is very dry. The weather in the poor is intense and death is an expected result."

A despatch from Toronto, Ont., of the 26th ult. says: "The Government will give to married women the privilege of voting in municipal elections. This now enjoyed by spinsters and widows, was ratified by a Log. 200000."

It is stated that reports from the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome indicate that the total wheat crop of the world for this year amounts to 3,569,000,000 bushels. The U. S. Department of Agriculture announces that the average production per acre of all our crops is estimated at $16.50.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

A man of affairs in a large city when just starting out on his business career, framed for himself a series of questions; these he thought important enough to have printed, and each month for a long period of years he regularly read and pondered them. He might have won great success as a financial manager of many extensive concerns without the help of these monthly monitors; all that we know is that he did win success, and that he himself felt that these questions and the practice of regularly reviewing them were important helps to him.

They were not profound questions, but simple and direct appeals to the rules of strict honesty and gentlemanliness. One was: "Have I striven hard, when provocation presented, to preserve my temper?"; another: "Have I tried as hard not to answer back as my natural impulse would have prompted me to return like for like?"; And still another: "Am I knowingly engaging in any business venture which, were all its secrets to be exposed to-day, would cause me the least shadow of regret or of shame?"; and so on. These questions never became trite to the man who framed them; it was part and parcel of his business to consider and to answer them.

There may be very few who follow a plan like the one just outlined; it would not suit the temperament of some, but there are many, very many indeed, who carry heavy financial responsibilities which concern alike their own interests as well as the interests of others, who are as scrupulously honest with themselves as was this man whose plan of queries and answers has been in review.

The salaried officer and the professional man live in a world apart from the one that we have in mind; they too have their money vexations, but they are on a smaller scale and demand a different degree of business skill to compass.

Our man of "Queries and Answers" in no sense stands alone; on the contrary, it is not improbable that every one who has had difficult problems to solve—and who has not?—has devised rules to govern his actions, which his own shrewd sense has taught him to be helpful, and so he has adopted these and lived up to them till they have become second nature to him.

An English lad a generation ago came to America with nothing but good health and a plucky spirit as capital. He died a few months since a merchant prince in a large northern city, and the rule that saved him from many a shipwreck and on one occasion from total wreck, so he often boasted to his friends, was a very simple one. For many years he superintended the opening of his morning mail, after the business had grown to large proportions, necessitating the employment of many clerks and many traveling agents, he still followed the plan, because as a young man he adopted for himself the rule of never answering a letter that provoked the least degree of anger until as he said, "I had slept on it," and what he found had done so much for himself he wanted to become a principle in the establishment for which he was responsible.

"It saved the trade in one case," he said, "that turned my business from a failure into a success; this I know to a certainty, and I believe it added thousands and thousands to my coffers," and then he added this significant remark.

"Yet I was but living up in a small measure to that pattern shown me in the Sermon on the Mount and to the truth uttered by the wise man long ago, that 'a soft answer turneth away wrath.'"

Common as a practice like that of going may be with men of affairs and with business firms, it is doubtful if any other religious Society than our own sets itself a similar task once a year or oftener.

A prominent educator in New York, a man at the time of national reputation, had his attention called to the plan of church government as carried out by the Society of Friends. He paused longest over our scheme of queries and answers, their honesty and directness appealed to him, he commented at some length on the spirit of true democracy that must lie as the bed-rock of an organization that could follow such a plan, and then almost skeptically he questioned how men and women could maintain the outward show of the Christian graces that these same queries are designed to cultivate. We need sometimes to get a little distance away from some of the practices that have become humdrum and commonplace to us, in order that we may realize what attainment they stand for.

In the days of Samuel Fothergill, about the middle of the century before last, the Discipline of the Society of Friends had grown very lax; conditions in England were sad enough, but when he came to America and journeyed as he did the whole length of our sea-board from South Carolina to Massachusetts and back, retracing his steps in some sections three or four times, and spending three years in such Gospel labor as no other Friend traveling in the ministry before or since his day has equalled, sadly irregular as were affairs in the Church at home, he found them much more chaotic here.

His suggestions for the betterment of affairs will be found in that delightful correspondence which he carried on with a coterie of Friends on both sides of the Atlantic and which included such men as the three Pemberton brothers, Samuel Emlen, John Churchman, his own brother, the distinguished doctor, John Fothergill, and some women Friends, not a whit behind the men in righteous zeal and some of them their equals in the practical suggestions they offered.

Just what marks the origin of the plan of Queries and Answers, as a part of disciplinary proceedings in our meetings for business is a little doubtful; of this, however, we may be certain, that Samuel Fothergill, in his American visit just alluded to, having previously been instrumental in instituting a series of "Queries" for English meetings, so prevailed upon American Friends that they very soon adopted the plan which directly became well-nigh universal. It naturally led to a stiffening up of disciplinary rules in some sections, and then close upon its heels came the Revolutionary War; Monthly Meeting records show numerous disownments for various offences, some of which would probably not have been issued had Samuel Fothergill been unfaithful to the call, but with the opening of the eighteenth century the Society of Friends in the east was numerically a strong body, still pushing out from already settled centres, and we find many of our present old country meeting-houses bearing date of erection about 1800.

Those who claim to have made careful research give these four facts as in part responsible for the decline in numbers in eastern meetings: (1) The sad division in the ranks that culminated about 1827. (2) The laxity in regard to outward rules and regulations, as developed out of a less sensitive spiritual life. (3) The disownments that followed, for Friends having once set themselves the task of rectifying errors and testifying against falseness, manifested a zeal strangely in contrast with what had been known a generation or so before.

(4) The tide of emigration to the west, that soon set in and was with little interruption continuous until after the middle of the century.

These historical facts have been introduced to show that the enforcement of a more rigid discipline is but one of several causes that explain the depletion of our ranks during the past century. Had the rules been disregarded, who can say but that the second reason as given above would not have caused a still more serious scattering of the flock?

Our own and a few other Yearly Meetings still adhere to the plan of Samuel Fothergill's day; we read and answer the Queries as they did then. With the lapse of time we have in several respects changed the place of emphasis, but the old Queries and the new Queries read a good deal alike. Our young people weary of them we are told. A generation back the young people wearied of them, of this we are certain. Yet now that manhood has succeeded to youth, we have no better plan to propose. Visitors from meetings where the Query and Answer plan has been discontinued come to our meetings and enter into the "exercise of the Meeting" and tell us to hold on to what we have, for they have searched and experimented and have found nothing better. We know that on Third-day of our Yearly Meeting week, young business men make a special effort to have an afternoon off, because then the "state of Society" is to be the theme for consideration, and young men have a keener interest in this than in reports of committees, memorials to legislatures, or anything else that may claim our attention. And why do they manifest this interest? Is it not because it is the most vital concern that confronts us, and is it not more than all else combined that which should call forth the best we can possibly offer in the way of counsel, and comfort, and cheer.

So long as the spiritual pulse of a meeting beats high when she settles down to consider those deep problems of life, which our Divine Master made the theme of His Sermon on the Mount, so long is there hope for the future, but when other matters, good and proper of their kind and of absolute necessity, are allowed to usurp the first place, then the meeting becomes little more than an organization, she may lose the Image, which she was designed to reflect, and fail of the real object of her creation.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"AN HONORABLE AND USEFUL CAREER."

Early in the Tenth Month of 1827, appeared in Philadelphia the first number of THE FRIEND, bearing on the title page the chief part of a clear and ample prospectus. With what interest and gratification this must have been read, we may suppose by recalling for a moment some of the conditions of that period, and placing them in contrast with those of the present. Particulars are not necessary here; but in view of some painful and disastrous events with which Friends of those days were all too familiar, we can understand that a new journal, devoted in part to illustrating "the genius and history of our Society," was opportune in its appearance. The Prospectus declares that evils had arisen from ignorance, and that "the cause of sound principles" had suffered loss thereby, and pertinently adds, "It is thus that ignorance is perpetually reviving the exploded errors of former times."

To supply in some degree the need thus urgently felt is part of the ground on which the Editors justify their new undertaking, for they have rather apologetically to admit that the number of publications then in print might already be felt to be "burdensome" (!); and they proceed at once to allay the possible anxiety on that head with the significant remark—"We may suggest that the field in which we propose to labour is still unoccupied."

But the work which they had in view was by no means confined to denominational subjects. It was their purpose to provide "an agreeable and instructive miscellany"—"a fire-side companion"—and to this end many provinces of human interest and learning were to contribute. Reference is made in the Prospectus to the variety and "intensity" of human activities, and to the growth of knowledge in science and history. "From these inexhaustible sources," say the Editors, "as instructive and elevating as they are pure and delightful, we propose to fill a large department of our paper." They also aver an intention to devote some space "to the writings of the great masters of the old English school," in which group they include Addison, Goldsmith and Cowper; but original contributions—"essays, poetry and criticism"—are solicited, and the Editors look for strong support from these sources.*

The new periodical would take cognizance of moral issues, supporting the testimonies of Friends upon such matters as lotteries, gambling and intemperance; while the great subjects of education and philanthropy, including the care of the poor, the sick and the insane, "the dumb and the blind," were not to be neglected. Provision for juvenile interest was less obvious in the early volumes of THE FRIEND than in recent ones, yet there was no conscious humor in this editorial statement: "We shall endeavor to render the lighter department of our journal acceptable to our young readers without making it frivolous.

'Happily to steer

From grave to gay, from lively to severe,' has always been accounted the great secret of winning the youthful mind to the love of virtue."

"It is an interesting circumstance that in the first number of THE FRIEND there is a poem entitled "Ocean," written at Haverhill, Mass., and signed W. It is prefaced by a complimentary editorial note taken from the Essex Gazette, in which apparently the poem was first printed. The author was then a youth of seventeen years.

The conclusion of the matter is put before us in something of a climax, and with a spirit that commands our admiration and sympathy. "In fine, we enter upon the duties of editors with feelings chastened by a sense of the responsibilities we have assumed, and of the arduousness of the undertaking, yet animated by the prospect of an honorable and useful career."

It is gratifying to find that at the end of the first year the editors were so much heartened by their experience that they were prepared to enter "with alacrity" upon the work of the second volume, and we learn too that they had not been disappointed in their expectations of help in the way of communications from their readers, for they acknowledge more than once that material thus furnished has been in excess of the space available for its use. A glance at the contents of various numbers assures us that THE FRIEND was true to its avowed purpose of being "an instructive miscellany," the scope of its interests embracing "Sketches from Pennsylvania History," "The Prose of Milton," "Doctor John Fothergill and Ackworth School," "Antiquarian Notes," and so forth.

Is it in the least necessary to point a moral in the use of the foregoing notes and transcripts? During the more than eight decades since the fair beginning of our journal (in which time there have been some crises in the affairs of the Church as well as of the nation), it has held its own with a rather remarkable degree of constancy, not only keeping for the most part its original form, but endeavoring to maintain the initial purposes of the founders. It has been a faithful visitor week by week in many Friends' homes on both sides of the Atlantic, and some even beyond the Pacific, promoting—or seeking to promote—"the cause of sound principles" both by direct advocacy and by general influence. The eighty-six volumes, neatly bound, make a collection of considerable value in a Friend's home library; and indeed it has been thoughtfully remarked that the old volumes of THE FRIEND are among the best sources of history for their respective periods.

But intellectual activities have vastly increased within a generation or two past; educational demands are growing, humanitarian interests are being multiplied; and the "agreeable miscellany" cannot by any means supply—nor did it ever profess to supply—all the literary needs of its patrons, or all the avenues of expression that might be desired. Yet, however large the room and great the service, actual and potential, for other periodicals, even of Friendly character, can it be fairly said that the field of THE FRIEND is wholly occupied, or is likely soon to be occupied, by those publications? Is it a time now to withdraw the shoulder from the burden? We think not.

One plea that we would offer, however, is for the avoidance of captiousness and careless criticism (not of friendly counsel and instruction), and for the further exercise of that gentle principle which belongs to the more excellent way; a principle that thinketh no evil, and that rejoiceth not in iniquity, nor in any supposed discovery of it. It is hoped that this paper will not let fall the banner of truth given it to display, but the Friends of Truth must now and then bear with some degree of human fallibility. Mistakes of judgment may (and do) occasionally appear—slips and oversights occur; and it may be that in some instances the language used fails to convey to the reader precisely the import intended by the writer. Still the sum total of honest effort and right purpose ought not to be disregarded.

In short, though THE FRIEND may not always have risen to its highest opportunities, or answered in full the desires of subscribers and contributors, yet it may be said that "by reason of strength" it has passed fourscore. Let now the same zeal and sympathy that marked the labor and the patronage of its early day again appear—the disposition to join together to serve its high purpose as "with one shoulder"—and we may expect that the "honorable and useful career" so confidently hoped for at the beginning will not stop short of a full rounded century at least. Who shall say that the years may not be twice told?

M. W.

JUST FOR TO-DAY

Lord for to-morrow, and I will Praise thy name,
 Keep me from vain contention,
 Just for to-day,
 Let me both diligently, good
 And duly pray,
 Let me be slow to be resentful,
 Prompt to obey,
 Help me to suffer blame
 Just for to-day,
 Let me no wrong or rebuke
 Unthinking say,
 Set thou thy seal upon my tongue,
 Just for to-day,
 So for to-morrow and its needs
 I do not pray,
 But keep me, guide me, hold me, Lord,
 Just for to-day.

—SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, Evangelical Herald.

JOY OUT OF GRIEF.

The following is clipped from the Buffalo Express by one who has been called on to put its sentiments to the supreme test. It will likely have place with many of our readers in view of what we have recently been called on to feel. Ed.

Sooner or later in every home there comes a time when it seems as if the whole world had stopped. The house is still, the sunshine is gone, and life is not the same, because death has entered and one whom we loved has gone to join the silent majority.

It is only the few who can resignedly say, "It is well." Time may teach it, but in the fulness of sorrow we can only ask:

Why?

When a summons comes to one in the very flower of activity and usefulness all that the saddened heart can say is:

Why is one whose work seems so vital to the good of others taken while another who lives for self alone is left to round out more than the allotted time?

We ask the same question that has been ringing down the ages ever since the dawn of time and the only answer is that the pattern of one life in its relation to those about it can only be judged when the whole fabric is finished. When one loved and useful member of a household goes, it is hard to remember that there are many years ahead and the baffling mystery of the summons may be made clear when all life's experiences are fitted together.

Some years ago a young life went out suddenly and in the dreary quiet that followed, when the mother was crushed under her burden of loss, she could hear no answer to her sorrowing why, could not recognize that there might be a reason as the years went by and the pattern of her life fabric became plainer, more nearly finished.

But now, the years have slipped away, life has unfolded many of its experiences—and she understands. Looking back, and still looking forward, she is ready to say: "It is well."

But it was time alone that brought clear vision, and with some the veil is never quite lifted for mortal vision.

It is well that when deep sorrows overtake us, the light may be cast upon all at once, but it is one of life's sharpest contrasts to have a gleam of morning when the heart is torn with grief and come in contact with a smiling world.

For, in personal bereavement, it seems that full, rich life's all about us, the world goes on just the same, and we alone are left in sorrow. Time does heal, but in the height of grief, it seems almost cruel to suggest that with the lapse of years there will come any measure of forgetfulness or softening of the blow.

Provisionally for the happiness of the world even when a great sorrow the time comes when the shadows break, the light may be shed upon all, though we may still be lonely and mindful of the loss, but the consolation may replace the questioning sorrow.

Some of our problems may never be made quite clear, but we may see with other than mortal eyes, but we have at least a faint hope that somehow, sometime, life's mysteries will be solved, and we shall see stand why the bereavements, why the long periods when troubles seem to come in a heap and why they fall in greater bulk to some than to others.

One grand thing stands out, clear and convincing, to all who have tasted of the bitter cup of personal loss:

When we have taken leave for all time of one we held dear, there is no regret for the pleasures that have passed between us and for every possibly word-spoken or gracious deed extended, we are thrice glad.

Next one slips over the border that there is not peace in remembering such little bits that made life brighter or some word that brought a smile.

For "THE FRIEND."

FATHER'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE BUSINESS.

CHARLES FRANCIS SAUNDERS.

It has for many years been the pleasant custom of J. M. Macfarlane, Professor of Botany at the University of Pennsylvania, to send annually to his friends and correspondents the world over, a greeting of goodwill in the form of a printed pamphlet of a few pages. In this the professor presents usually some account of quiet adventures amid natural or human scenes during the last or some previous year, embellished with such personal touches as will be especially appreciated by the friends to whom the yearly pamphlet goes. In the current issue, there is reference to his once meeting with a quaint character of the New Jersey Pine Barrens, with whom some readers of THE FRIEND may have been acquainted—Peter Hoff, whose little farm among the cedar swamps and cranberry bogs back of Sea Isle was something of a resort for botanists fifteen or twenty years ago. Here most of Peter's life had been spent and here he had brought up his family in a patriarchal sort of way. Quite untaught in a scholastic sense, he had become exceedingly well-informed through observations, in the habits and nature of the wild animal and plant life about him. His store of knowledge, combined with a wider wisdom born of a sterling integrity of character, made a visit to the Hoff farm always a memorable one.

This, by way of preface to an anecdote which Dr. Macfarlane records, and which deserves to be passed along. It was related to him by one of Peter's sons.

"Brother and I were getting on in years," said he, "and so after quiet and prolonged debate, we resolved to leave the old man and start for ourselves as house carpenters and millwrights. But we hated to speak of it to father, and feared he might feel badly. Finally, one day we agreed that I should break the news to him when we had sat down to our mid-day dinner.

"'Father,' said I, 'brother and I think of starting for ourselves, and would like to talk with you.'

"'Yes, son, speak on,' came the laconic reply.

"Plans were then unfolded and father was asked if he would give any special advice.

"'Yes, sons, I will.'

"But the meal was eaten in expectant silence, though no advice was forthcoming.

"'Well, father, we must be off to work: are you going to give us your advice?' was the renewed question.

"'Sure, sons, I will. Always remember there are twelve inches to the foot.'

The advice at first seemed trivial and childish to the sons, as they afterwards confessed; yet when they went out into the world and trade came to them, the meaning of the advice was brought home to them. As chances arose for substituting a poor grade of lumber for a proper sort in places where the difference would not at once show, or the temptation came to give short measure in place of full measure, the father's homely advice sprang vividly to mind "always remember there are twelve inches to the foot" and steadied them in the way of honest service in even small details. "Whatever success has come to us has been from living out father's advice," said the son who told the story.

BATTLESHIPS FOR CANADA!

An esteemed correspondent in Norwich, Ont., has sent us a copy of a speech in the Dominion House of Commons against the Naval Aid Bill. The opening sentences will show what an able peace advocate W. A. Charlton, a member from Norfolk Co., Ontario, is:—

W. A. Charlton (Norfolk): Before the Bill passes into the unknown future, I feel it my duty to say a few words with regard to this very important matter. This discussion, which has recurred at intervals during a period of several months, has been engaged in on the assumption that war is a necessity, and that active preparation for war is a means of preventing it. Wars have always engaged the active attention of mankind, and yet men have always believed that some day wars would cease. I am of the belief that that day has now come, and in the few remarks I propose to make will keep that consideration in view. We have heard during the course of this debate of the wonderful development in the art of building armored battleships. Eighteen nations are actively engaged in building battleships, and fourteen of these nations commenced their construction within the last twenty years. The tendency is to build larger ships all the time and to increase the number: In England there are battleships of 25,000 tons; in Japan, where they never built one of these ships until 1867, they are now building three of 27,500 tons and in some of the South American republics they have still larger ships of 28,000 tons. In the United States they never built a battleship until 1893, in 1897 they had only six, but since that they have built eighty-three. All the civilized nations are straining every nerve to increase the number of battleships they possess. Immense armies and navies are kept in readiness to fight and defend, the whole world a battlefield, war inscribed on every banner and peace forgotten, Canada alone standing out so far, like a bright star in a dark sky, but liable to fall at any moment. These are impressions that one must get in listening to the discussion which has been going on. I said that fourteen of these nations only commenced building battleships in the last twenty years. I find in that time the nations have spent for army and navy purposes the immense sum of thirty-one thousand millions of dollars—just think of it, thirty-one thousand millions of dollars wasted within the last twenty years, and the annual expenditure to-day is twenty-five hundred million dollars. That total warlike expenditure among the nations ranges from ten per cent. in some nations to nearly fifty per cent. in other nations of the total expenditure for all purposes of these nations. What is the cause of this? Why is it that there is this mad feeling of waste in all the nations? Why is it that before any naval appropriation is made in any legislative assembly in the world it is preceded by a war scare? It is because the people listen to the voice of the inhuman gods of war and of the navy leagues the world over, who are willing to traffic in the blood of their fellow-men for gain. They play one nation against another. When a battleship is built it is a notice to other nations to build. We build you build and so the mad waste goes on. Does anyone suppose that armaments are an insurance premium of peace? They are more justly called a menace to peace. It is mutual distrust that keeps the nations in arms and what more surely creates distrust than the building of battleship after battleship?

THERE is no staying quality in honesty as a policy. If the virtue is not a property of the soul itself it will wash out in very slight temptation. Though we may be theoretically convinced that in the end the right will invariably triumph, few of us are accustomed to direct our lives by such ultimate considerations. Our controlling motives are ever present.—J. M. LUDLOW.

It is not required of every man and woman to be or to do something great; most of us must content ourselves with taking parts in the chorus, as far as possible without discord.—HENRY VAN DYKE.

CALIFORNIA.

LILLA M. MOORE.

Let me tell you how the mountains
Half-surround the little California valley where I live—
To the north they tower highest,
And the sky-line is uneven
With their rugged, rocky summits.

Here it is the snow in winter
Is the deepest, and the whitest,
And, sometimes, till late in summer
Does it crown Mount San Antonio,
High he is above the others,
And with flowers in the valley
I have seen the snow-wreaths curling
In a raging storm of winter,
Up there on that hoary monarch.

Fleecy clouds go softly floating,
Far below his lofty summit
Casting broken, wavering shadows,
On the little homes that nestle
In the dim, tree-shaded canyons;
Or still lower in the valley,
Where the orange trees, and lemons
All the year, are green and glossy,
In the spring their waxy blossoms
Fill the air with rarest fragrance.

While the East is still all snow-bound,
Here, in this fair land of ours,
Come the rains so warm and gentle,
Hills before all brown and barren
Now grow green as if by magic;
And the lightly sleeping wild-flowers
Wake, and by the path and roadside
Spring and bloom in their beauty,
Pen nor brush can draw the picture,
So I send this invitation—
Asking you to come and see it,
This—the land of my adoption.

For "THE FRIEND."

THE DOUKHOBORS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

The interest Friends have felt in the Doukhobors ever since they came to America, fourteen years ago, prompts some account of their present situation, especially since they have moved to British Columbia. Such difficulties arose between the Doukhobors settled in Saskatchewan and the Canadian Government that Peter Verigin concluded to transport some five thousand of them to British Columbia in order to try their fortunes in that more hospitable climate. The vanguard of this trek occurred five years ago, while the main body followed in 1912. The fruit trees of British Columbia were very attractive, and the warmer climate with the greater variety of vegetation has proved to be a veritable Garden of Eden for these Russian peasants—after they have turned the wilderness into that garden. All would have gone well had the Doukhobors been wise enough to register their births and deaths and to have sent their children to school—which is compulsory in British Columbia. Their refusal to comply with these wholesome regulations developed such friction with the Government that a Royal Commission was appointed to make an impartial examination into the conditions and purposes of the Doukhobors.

Wm. Blakemore, Commissioner, submitted his report about a year ago to the Provincial Secretary, Richard McBride, in Victoria, B. C.

This is the latest reliable report of the conditions of these peculiar people. His points of view and his criticisms are about the same as those of Friend B. C. who left them in 1911. In Canada fourteen years ago. A few extracts from the report taken before the Commission may be of interest. The Letters Patent, creating the Commission during the session of 1912, require an "investigation into the nature, scope and scope of the authority held or exercised by the leaders, officers and ownership of property, real and personal, the solemnization of marriages, the registration of births, death and burials, and domestic relations generally, naturalization and observance of law; and generally all matters appertaining relating to the community and its social, intellectual, moral and religious life." Upwards of one thousand Doukhobors attended an all-day session, held at Brilliant, B. C., and one hundred and ten witnesses were examined at this and other public sittings, held at Nelson, Grand Forks, and Trail. The Commissioner also went to Saskatchewan and examined the settlements there. The result of all this investigation did not alter the hostility of the Doukhobors to registration, but it brought to view some very interesting facts.

Out of the 7,301 Doukhobors, who settled on the prairie northwest of Winnipeg in 1898-99, 1,500 were men. They had the control of 270,480 acres of land for farming purposes—100,000 acres of which were (in 1907) taken back by the Canadian Government, because the Doukhobors had not farmed or settled upon it as the Homestead Laws of the Dominion required.

The Report says: "It has been estimated that the cost of living averaged about $2.00 per head per month," during the first year of their residence in Canada, and that "The Society of Friends came to their aid and provisions were forwarded to the colonists and distributed just in time to prevent them from starving," during the first winter in America. "Wool, yarn, leather and lamps were forwarded from Philadelphia also tea and linseed oil of which the Doukhobors are very fond." Altogether some fifteen carloads of provisions and other supplies, including three hundred spinning wheels, were sent to them.

The Commissioner, in explaining and generously extenuating some of the vagaries of these worthy but ignorant peasants says: "One would have to be profoundly versed in the psychology of this strange people to fully understand the impelling motive of their extravagant conduct (on certain occasions), but some allowances must surely be made for the fact that they have been transplanted into a new country, with a different climate developing extreme rigors, and with all the traditions of life as different from what they had been accustomed to as it is possible to conceive. Then, remembering that they are of simple mind, and little more than grown-up children, placing implicit faith in their leaders, it is hardly open to doubt that they painted with too rosy anticipations the new life to which they were traveling.

"They expected exemption from many things beside military service, and especially exemption from bodily discomfort, privation and hardship, such as they were compelled to endure during the first winter. . . . The fact that the Society of Friends, which had done so much to establish the Doukhobors in Canada, favored education had no weight toward overcoming the hostility of Peter Verigin to it, in any of the settlements under his control. By 1907, 1000 Doukhobors had withdrawn from the community in Saskatchewan and become naturalized British subjects, and now (at the end of 1913) there are 1000 similar individual Doukhobors in British Columbia. Some 4,700 community Doukhobors are also settled in British Columbia, while 2000 Doukhobors still occupy their homesteads on the prairie near Yorkton and Rosetown, in Saskatchewan.

The Commissioner says: "It should also be remembered that once free from the controlling influences of the community, the independent Doukhobor not only complies with the registration laws and the Schools Act, but abandons most of the restrictive features of communal life, without, however, losing his hold on the simplicity of faith which before-time characterized him. The home-life remains the same—the home-training is persevered with on similar lines. Thrift and industry are inculcated, simplicity is taught, and luxuries tabooed: and while it is inevitable that the young people in particular should secure more liberty and enjoyment, there is no room for regarding the independent Doukhobor as in any general sense decadent.

The young men in particular rebelled against a system under which every dollar they earned by the most strenuous toil on the outside must be paid to the Community. To be good Doukhobors they might not even retain a cent, and if they did they were dishonest. But they could not move about among Canadians and work alongside them without realizing the hardship involved in surrendering the whole of their earnings. Each man must put $2.00 per annum into the Central Fund under the direct control of Peter Verigin.

His purchase of lands to the amount of $650,000 in British Columbia as well as the $200,000 required to transport 5000 Doukhobors from Winnipeg came out of this Fund.

[The following article is the substance of an address, delivered by Joan Mary Fry at an Elders' Conference, during Yearly Meeting in London, 1913. After several readings it seems so true to conditions in Philadelphia as well as in London that it is hoped there will be a service in reprinting it. Very particularly do we commend the portions dealing with large Meetings.—Ed.]

ELDERSHIP FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF THE MINISTRY.

It is probably one of the healthiest signs of a renewing of life in the Society that Eldership and the Ministry are so frequently discussed amongst us; it is well if we are not settling down into self-complacency, and the more keenly we recognize our own shortcomings the better.

It will be unnecessary to dwell at length on the experience of speaking in meeting; its uniqueness, its strange demands on the whole of our personality, some of its difficulties and temptations, as well as its wonderfulness, are to some extent common knowledge. One point only do I wish to emphasize: the experience has that strange quality of life, its incalculability—there is no one word to express this quality. Perhaps it may best be shown by antithesis: "I am or shall be a recorded minister, and I expect to preach all my life," or vice versa: "I have never spoken in meeting, and I never intend to do so." Both these utterances denote a position which we often assume unconsciously; they indicate a lack of sensitiveness which approaches to spiritual deadness, and both are false to the doctrine of guidance by the Holy Spirit.

Of course we are well aware that no outward arrangements can create true ministry; but, granted its source in the inner life, we have still to seek to discover what are the best conditions under which it can arise. They fall naturally under two heads: The first, those relating to the speaker; the second, those pertaining to the listener.

It is evident that obedience, receptivity, actual first-hand experience of spiritual realities, sincerity of outward life—these and many similar matters are solely for the consideration of the individual. It is for him or her to decide whether the desire to speak arises from self-centred or God-centred thoughts, for him to question whether the words are likely to reveal fresh experiences, or whether they only tell an oft-told tale that soothes like a drug instead of bracing like a wind, for him to query whether the week-day life can bear such a setting forth of the ideal as his imagination may paint. Even when he recognizes that the would-be exhortation fails to fulfil these conditions, it is still for him to weigh whether it must yet be given in shamefacedness, as a message by an unworthy messenger.

(b) But when all these and more have been settled with a view to utterance, there is the whole other set of conditions to be considered, those, namely, which are almost wholly beyond the control of the individual. Is the Meeting able to receive his message, or, if not ready, ought it to be so? Must it be given contrary to the general exercise, or in harmony with it? Is the gathering already weary of words and in need of silence? Is it prayer or exhortation that is lacking? Now it is as important that there should be a right judgment on these as on the former questions, and on these latter the would-be minister has, I had almost said, a worse judgment than other worshippers, because he cannot, with the best intentions, do away with his inclination to speak or not to speak, as the case may be; he is biased in one direction or the other, and cannot help being so. He may be intensely sensitive to the atmosphere, but the sensitive Elder, by virtue of his gift, is in the stronger position; his conception of what is good for the whole body should be more broadly based, less prejudiced by momentary and special desires than that of the minister. The more we reflect on the very nice balance between the individual and the body, between intense mysticism and solid common sense in our methods of worship, the more we are struck with the excellence of our theory; of our practice it were well to speak more guardedly. I shall return to this point again, but I believe that the weakness of our vocal ministry lies largely just here, that we think it sufficient to satisfy ourselves as regards the first set of conditions, and are content to leave the other almost out of sight. We have not sufficiently magnified the office of Elder, as being in fact the absolutely necessary complement to the free minister.

Now in order to obtain this nice balancing of duties, it is evident that a very wide yet delicate sympathy is needed for Eldership, if it is adequately to represent the whole body; if it is to foster and, to a certain extent, to call forth the ministry needed by the congregation.

I would suggest, and I do so from practical experience, that there is no more helpful instrument in the hands of an Elder than close, personal fellowship with ministers. By its means much can be done to develop a minister's gift and keep him or her in direct touch with the Meeting; the very sense of what is thus shown to be needed is a spur to the sluggishness of the natural man, very loth to urge himself along the uphill path. It would be hard to over-estimate what some of our Elders are doing in this quiet way of most natural and inspiring fellowships, or how much more is still possible on these simplest of lines.

And if the Elders are thus to be the means of balancing and enlarging the ministry, they must be in touch with currents which flow outside the doors of our quiet meeting-houses. Will the business man turn aside to enter; will the busy artisan, or the harassed merchant, find help in a worship-hour which is filled with platitudes; or will they listen to exaggerated statements of the futility of all worldly things when they are convinced that in their offices and yards, in the relations between Capital and Labor, the real fight with evil is being fought out? Thus the Elders' task of relating the individual ministry with the whole membership of the congregation cannot, we see, be limited to the Friends' circle; if the missionary spirit is to be fostered, they must be keenly alive to the constant necessity of meeting the varying needs of the world. If Paul found it necessary to be "all things to all men" that he might win some in the little world around the Mediterranean Sea, how wide must we set our doors of thought if we are to catch men in the complex excitement of modern ways? I often wonder as I pass from the thronged Bishopsgate into the comparative quiet of Devonshire House how far we are, as a body, in touch with the great world, and how far we are deluding ourselves with ideas of superiority whilst living in a seclusion which cannot bear the breath of the actual. I do not think this is the case in matters of concern for the moral and physical well-being of others, but I do think that our Elders need to encourage a ministry which shall have a wider grasp on modern problems than it often has at present. We want the broadening touch of a wise Eldership, especially in the matter of fostering, without coddling, the often faulty attempts of the inexperienced. Sometimes the inexperienced speakers are more sensitive to the newer problems lying before the Church than their more seasoned elders, and no Christian community dare stifle even inconvenient stirrings after a truer ethic, a more Christ-like society.

Thus far we have considered the positive aspect, some of the ways in which the Eldership can stimulate the best kind of ministry. Difficult as this is, the task of restraining, where restraint is needed, is even harder to perform in such a way as to help rather than to hurt. To begin with, there is the required discernment to be attained; to judge whether words are spoken "in the life," or in mere outwardness, whether they be of power or of habit, is no easily acquired capacity; that it is a most necessary one is a commonplace amongst us, and yet do we, in this matter of discerning and restraining, uphold the hands of our Elders as we should do? Can we bear to be told what is their judgment of our ministry? Do Elders shrink, from fear of hurting someone's feelings, from acting up to their sense of the true state of the case? It is probable that there is some leakage here, otherwise how could it happen that in our Yearly Meetings for Worship the Elders' plea for silence is not regarded? This is, I believe, a very serious sign, and unless we can, as a body, learn obedience to these proper demands for self-restraint, we are doomed to a feeble if lingering existence. The case of an outsider who, at Manchester, came to one of the big Meetings for Worship, hoping to find there some strong help, and was driven away by the unceasing torrent of words, is probably not an isolated one, and we know not how many may have gone forth from these over-taxed occasions without that which they so greatly needed to hear or to learn in the silence. At a time when some of the other Churches are struggling to get arrangements made for silence at certain particular services, we, who have the possibility without any getting to be done, are just throwing away our privileges.

At Yearly Meeting we have the opportunity of partaking in a great Communion Service. Does it tend to the solemnity or the worshipfulness of that service that there should be a sense of who can get a chance to ease his or her own mind? Do we not forget that God's truth is vaster than our representations of it, and that if we are true to our convictions, the Holy Spirit is, to willing hearts, the Teacher of teachers, needing no intermediary? One is almost reminded at times of Paul's strictures on the Corinthian gatherings, where he says: "When ye assemble yourselves together, it is not possible to eat the Lord's Supper." There are many considerations which might be urged to show that we have partially missed our way on these occasions of late; it might be said that the worshippers at our Yearly Meeting gatherings are for the most part well instructed in the faith, not in much need of elementary teaching; the time is short, and the press of business on the other days makes stillness a most necessary aid to worship; moreover, that when we are on the spiritual plane, when, like John, we are "in the Spirit on the Lord's Day" (and all days are His), we should be ready for some teaching which is beyond words. But there is a yet simpler consideration which I would urge, namely this: it is the Elders whom we love and trust, whom we ourselves choose—though we do not endow them—for their service, it is they whom we trust on one side, forgetting in our eagerness to speak that we want their judgment on these occasions perhaps more than on any other. The necessity for keeping a stronger hold upon our emotions in a big meeting than in a small one, and the diminished probability for most of us of being suitable instruments in a large assembly should help us to remember that disobedience to their request for silence is much more probably a bit of unconscious self-importance than of necessary courage.

Could we not, at least at one of our meetings during Yearly Meeting, have it understood that it is of the nature of a Communion Service, not an occasion for sermons but for brief offerings of praise or exhortation, and much waiting on the Lord for His own special teaching, which we can receive only by an effort of our own? If it is to be a meeting of prayer during Yearly Meeting, with an interval for prayer, it is to be an ableness and not a waiting upon the Lord. The latter tolerance will not have been a success.

And yet one more thought before we close. The same has been said that it is for the Elders to be faithful to the fellowship and their teacher, not the minister, and to lead the congregation in to them be connected to a body of men acting for the whole body of saints, not the individuality of the speakers by the wholesome touch of the continuing need; then there are certain essential, Christian spiritual subjects which behooves them to seek most earnestly to illumine, and lead those whom they are called upon to guide.

Life, as we all recognize, is by nature incalculable, it defies exact logical analysis. The old word "quick" conveys us of its inalienable variety, and we might almost say of its incomprehensible waywardness, and if this be true of the outer, how far more true of the inner spiritual life. It has been written of a modern mystic that she is one for whom life is movement; "nothing for her stands still, is fixed, or static, as we say now; the whole creation moves with the movement and communicated freedom of the purposes of God and with the outpouring of the Divine Spirit in the spirit of man." (Michael Fairless, p. 64).

Spiritual life is killed by anything which ties it down; it must have room for creative activity, and it is always escaping, if possible, from old forms and ceremonies, to find new outlets in unexpected channels. The person who is really obedient to the heavenly vision is, of necessity, constantly having to break with some of his old self; the springing up of the spiritual seed bursts through the clods of habit, and there is always a stirring in the soul that is alive. Now the special appeal of Christianity to the soul of man is intimately connected with the changeableness, so to speak, of the living spirit. All the great experiences which centre round the growth of the "new man in Christ Jesus" are processes, not completed and finished products. Atonement, redemption, sanctification, do not represent actions, once performed and crystallized into a no longer mobile past, but are terms expressive of a continued movement, a continual need, and a continual supply of that need. It may be said that the possibility of the growth of the "new man" in any soul is a sense of sin and of failure—that movement, progress, sometimes as of a tide with its ebb and flow, is a present condition of growth in grace. The child-nature, with its capacity for taking in new ideas, is as essential at the end as at the beginning of the Christian course. It is doubtless harder to win or keep in maturity, life, and probably there is no more serious drawback to the middle-aged, and especially to would-be leaders, than to forget that suppleness of soul is a requirement of the first magnitude for both Elders and Ministers; without it how shall the Divine Life have free course through the body? If humility, without meanness to be corrected, power to react to changing conditions be once lost, there must be loss, too, of usefulness to others. We may preach, we may measure others by an assailable doctrine, but we shall have passed out of the ranks of those who are being saved, day by day, a guilt will have grown between us and our fellow-men, between us and truth.

It is because Christ appeals to the live man, palpitation, with sin-struggles, overcome by passions, thrust down and yet with an unquenchable thirst for the living God, that his religion has not died down under the rubbish which is continually being heaped upon it. We all do something to add to that pile; it seems almost impossible for human nature not to do so, but we can at least recognize the danger and set our faces against the temptation.

"The Message of the Cross" is, as a recent rendering of it, "the power of God to those whom He is saving." It is not to doctrines and organizations that we must look for help, but to the growth within us of that strange, articulate, unquenchable something which we call spiritual life. The solution of our problems lies in that growth in the presence of each of us of the new man, with his new powers of vision, his new capacities for service, his ability to repent and progress, until we all come to the "measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

JOAN MARY FRY.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

A COSTLY COMMA.—"Have you your examples all right, Tom?" asked father Walker, as his son closed the arithmetic and came to say good-night.

"Near enough," was the reply, "and I'm thankful, for they were a tough lot."

"But I don't understand," said his father, "what you mean by 'near enough.' Do you mean that they are almost right?"

"Why I mean they are as good as right. There's a point wrong in one, and two figures wrong in another, but there's no use in fussing over such trifles. I'm most sure the method's right, and that's the main thing."

"Yes," returned his father, "I admit that the method is important, but it is not the only thing. Let me see how much difference the point makes in this example."

Tom brought his paper, and, after looking it over, his father said: "That point makes a difference of five thousand dollars. Suppose it represented money that some one was going to pay you. Then you'd be pretty anxious to have the point right, wouldn't you?"

"Oh, of course, in that case I would have looked it over again," said Tom, carelessly. "But this is only an example in school, and it would never make any difference to anybody whether the point was right or not."

"To any one but you, for a habit of carelessness and inaccuracy once fixed upon you will make a difference all your life, and may prevent you from ever succeeding in the business world. You may not realize it, but what employers want, and must have, is accuracy in little things, as well as in great, and, indeed, things that seem small are often far more important than they look. A comma seems about as unimportant as anything, but let me tell you a story about one."

Some years ago there were enumerated in a tariff bill certain articles that might be admitted free of duty. Among them were foreign fruit-plants. "What would that mean?"

"Why, I suppose," said Tom, "plants that bear fruit."

"Yes, but the clerk who copied the bill never had been taught accuracy, and, instead of copying the hyphen, he changed it to a comma, making it read, 'fruits, plants, etc.' It was a trifling error—not worth noticing, you would say—but before it could be remedied, the Government lost two million dollars, as all foreign 'fruits' had to be admitted free of duty. Now, whenever you are inclined to be careless, I hope you will remember that two-million-dollar comma."

Tom did not say much, but he went upstairs thinking that if a little comma could make all that difference, it might be worth while to fuss over trifles, after all.—MARTHA CLARK RANKIN

"LOST WANDERING BUT NOT LOST."—Among the stories told of the homing pigeon few have so touched an undefinable something within us as that of which "Sunny Jim" is the hero. This bird is owned in Jeannette, Pennsylvania. There for years he has had his home. Had you looked at him some day when passing his loft you would scarcely have guessed that hidden somewhere in that tiny brain lay a faculty baffling all our wisdom and philosophy. One day they put him in his box and wrote as the address which marked his journey's end, Rio de Janeiro. When the long trip by rail and boat was over he was, as one has said, "far on the other side of the equator." One sixth of the circumference of the globe intervened between him and his home.

On the eighth of (Fifth Month) they gave him his freedom. He rose swiftly into the air then, without chart or compass, set his course with unerring impulse to the north, and vanished from sight. Forty-seven days after, on the twenty-fourth of (Sixth Month), weary, but with courage unbroken, he alighted upon the landing of the loft, back at Jeannette, Pennsylvania.

No human eye followed or could have followed the path he took through "The desert and illimitable air."

The history of that lonely experience, as on and on his wings bore him over strange lands and unknown seas, will never be written. What stirred within the heart and brain through blazing days and silent nights no mortal may ever know.

Blind instinct was it? Did he follow as unconsciously some unrecognized law as the meteor does when it falls through space? We confess to a feeling of awe, to an emotion akin to that of worship, to a sense of mystery that positively humbles, as we see, in imagination, this wonderful bird folding his tired wings after the long, long flight. Bryant's exquisite little poem, "To a Waterfowl," must have sprung from some such experience. "What more can we say than,

"There is a Power whose care Teaches thy way along that pathless coast," and what more steady faith can we know than that which feels:

"He, who from zone to zone
Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight,
In the long way that I must tread alone
Will lead my steps aright."

FRIENDLY NEWS.

WRITING of a week-day meeting in one of our Friends' Schools (Friends' Select School, Phila.) a teacher of younger children quotes these expressions as coming spontaneously from several at the close of a favored meeting, "I liked that meeting," "That was a nice meeting," "That was a beautiful meeting." There seems good ground for the comment that such impressions on young children must signify a deep and abiding influence in the lives of those who are older, even though such do not express themselves at the time.

THE Evening Telegraph of Twelfth Month 29th, in writing upon "The Spirit of Good Will to Men," has the following which refers to a Friends' firm, so that the clipping seems properly classified as Friendly News.

"For instance, there is a manufacturing plant in this city which employs about three hundred men in the making of agricultural implements. That isn't a very hazardous business, but there is an assistant superintendent who is both a hard-headed and big-hearted fellow, and evidently thoroughly impressed with a sense of a superintendent's dual responsibility—to the men under him and to the firm from which he receives his salary.

"He looked at conditions as he found them and it seemed to him that they could be bettered—for employers and employed. So he worked out a plan; not all at once, but little by little.

"Of course, the firm was paying the men fair wages. Unless that were taken for a basis, anything it might have done in the way of welfare work would have been met with sneers.

"If they'd pay us what they ought, we'd take care of the 'welfare' of ourselves, all right," is the way the men would have put it; and you could not blame them for thinking so, either.

"But the wages were all right here, and so the assistant superintendent started in. First he evolved a system of sick benefits, to be paid out of a common fund to anyone who might fall ill.

"You know the old way such things were managed. If the sick man had been a 'good fellow,' somebody among his cronies started a subscription for him among their shopmates, and the sum raised was problematical. If he hadn't been a 'good mixer,' but for any reason had held himself aloof from the rest, there would either be no subscription at all—or a pretty slim one.

"But now everybody shares the same, and if any falls ill, he knows just what he can depend on in addition to his own savings.

"He has done a lot of other things, has this assistant superintendent—given the men a hall where they may hold meetings, give entertainments, etc., and whenever they want to use it, the firm furnishes heat, light and janitor service free; put in a restaurant where a fifty-cent meal is given for fifteen cents—if you don't believe that, go and try it—and done a lot of things which don't seem big enough to catalogue individually, but which together go far toward making daily work easier and more effective.

"But one of the best things has been the working out of an insurance plan on a graduated scale of age and length of service. It is really a combination of an endowment policy and an old-age pension; but the firm doesn't call it that. Pension doesn't sound well, excellent thing though it be. So the firm has recognized the objection to that title and it is known as the 'Co-operative Advanced Age Compensation.' The men pay so much per week, according to their age and the length of time they have been in the service of the concern, and what they pay is duplicated, cent for cent, by the firm. When the men reach a certain age, which is the same for all, they are entitled to an annuity for life; or, if they die before reaching this age, an annuity is paid in monthly instalments for ten years to the beneficiary, usually the widow.

"IN NO CASE IS A LUMP SUM PAID OUT, the idea in this provision being to avoid the all-too-likely chance of total loss of everything, at an age when the earning power is greatly reduced, to say the least, by those who have never before had any considerable sum in their possession. The bait for the unscrupulous is removed, and the policyholders and beneficiaries are protected as much as possible from the consequences of their own indiscretion.

"These are only samples of welfare work which is being conducted in industrial establishments all over the country. Such work is doing more to solve the difficulties between capital and labor than any other one influence.

PROFESSOR W. W. COMFORT, of Cornell University, writes to the Westonian (Philadelphia) that he would be grateful for any definite information concerning the study of the poetry of William Cowper in Friends' Schools during the last century. The following queries cover the matter under consideration: (1) When was the study of Cowper introduced into Friends' Schools? (2) In what manner and in what textbooks was his poetry read? (3) Did his poetry exercise a profound influence upon Friends' literary taste? (4) When and why was the study of his poetry discontinued?—From The Friend (London), First Month 2nd.

UNDER the presidency of A. Neave Brayshaw, the Friends' Guild of Teachers is meeting at Woodbrooke from the 5th to 7th inst. Nine years ago the teachers met under the same friendly roof, Frederick Andrews presiding; and sixteen years ago, in 1898, in its early days, the Guild also met in Birmingham, the late William Searnell Lean being then the President. This year discussions are to take place on "The Inheritance of Mental Characteristics" (introduced by Cyril Burt, Psychologist, Education Department, L. C. C.), and on "The School Leaver and the Claims of the Church" (introduced by A. Barratt Brown, Arthur T. Wallis, and A. Mabel Holdsworth). The Guild is eighteen years old this year.—From The Friend (London), First Month 2nd.

COPENHAGEN Friends a year ago tried the experiment of holding their meetings in a public room, with announcements in local papers. After the earlier weeks, when the attendance was for a time substantially increased, the numbers have shrunk again to the normal. It is supposed that the temporary enlargement was due to the hope of other small congregations of earnest dissenters of drawing Friends to unite with them; and in the case of one small group the temptation of "loaves and fishes." English Friends visiting Denmark are earnestly invited to inform themselves about meetings in that country; Danish Friends greatly appreciate the few visits they receive from English Friends.—From The Friend (London), First Month 2nd.

ANOTHER Danish friendhouse keeper and his wife have applied for membership with Friends. In their isolated position, they have been holding meetings with their neighbors. Johannes L. Sorenson is a son of P. W. Sorenson, who was admitted some years ago; he can speak and write English. His address is Stevns Fyr, pr Store Hedeluge, Denmark.—From The Friend (London), First Month 2nd.

AN old student, who says he wasted much time at Haverford and now regrets it, and who wishes to be held up as an example to others, has founded two prizes of $50 and $45 to be given yearly to Seniors who have shown the most conscientious and successful record in their college careers.

The Fund is called "The Stevns Fyr and Store Hedeluge Prizes." It means will probably be named "The Stevns Fyr and Store Hedeluge Prizes" in early years, in early years of the century. It is named after the friendhouse keeper at Haverford College, Pa.

PROFESSOR ALICE C. COOPER, who has just completed her course at Haverford, since then she has filled the position of Assistant Librarian, and will, in the fall, begin her whole career of that nature at the University of Pennsylvania. This year her return to Haverford is a special occasion, for she will retain his services as Librarian. The University of Pennsylvania will have an office in the building and will be in receipt of the contents of the Library and the relations of the University of Pennsylvania to the University of Pennsylvania. Professor Thomas has been of great service in the building of the University of Pennsylvania, and his services will make his office in the University of Pennsylvania. Professor Thomas has been of great service in the building of the University of Pennsylvania, and his services will make his office in the University of Pennsylvania.

The long connection with the College has made him a familiar name to hundreds of Haverfordians, and we are glad again to have him in service.

In this connection, it may be mentioned that the University of Pennsylvania have had very large sales—amounting to the value of the University of Pennsylvania History to a half million copies.

A GROUP of ten Haverfordians has subscribed $750 each for the care of the trees on the lawn. The chestnuts are the subjects of the plan of redemption, as are all chestnut trees in the grounds. By means of cutting and pruning many of our fine old trees in the present year, and in years, while the planting of new ones will be necessary, the University of Pennsylvania has received expert advice.—From Haverford College Bulletin.

LONDON, Jan. 6.—Henry Thomas Wake, a famous Quaker scholar, died to-day in the Quaker village of Fritchley, Derbyshire, aged 86. He was carried on the business of an antiquarian bookseller. He was about 50 years old when he was known in learned circles in the United States as well as in his native England and Carlyle.—From the Public Ledger, by Marjorie Wainwright. The Friend.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

THE Winter term opened the first of last week in fine, showing of capability was made, for at supper time, the hour scheduled for pupils to arrive, every boy with one exception was in place, and he was to be congratulated for his Carolina home; the report from the girls' wing was equally as satisfactory. A few new pupils have entered and a few could not get in, the totals of the two terms being about the same.

THE lake has been the place of greatest interest during the past school periods. The pupils have made use of the ice parts of winter since their return until First-day. Once or twice the skating was quite safe during the afternoon, but the freeze up after snow-fall has been quite suitable for evening skating, and different groups of students have come to the lake from 7 to 10.

THE transition from the autumn to the winter term is marked by few changes in the program, it is simply the returning to the old program for a fortnight's vacation.

ON Sixth-day evening Isaac Sharpless continued his course of lectures, his subject being notes from the journey to the Holy Land, and his wife around the world. Westtown boys and girls have been attending Isaac Sharpless's lectures, and this subject not only of interest to those of previous years.

ON Seventh-day evening a team of old scholars played a vigorous game of ball with the school team, and as on a former occasion, not long ago, secured an easy victory from us. Basket ball falls this year to the rear of our program, but the encouragement from the School that it has enjoyed previous years, and the large measure accounts for our team being in poor condition.

THE Literary Union meeting during the week, held in the new room, was devoted to the election of new officers. Those elected were: President, Ruth Kellum, Secretary, Edwin Hildreth, Treasurer, Henry M. Hallett, Curator, Carroll T. Brown and Theophilus A. Hartley. The Union meetings the past term have met with a high degree of excellence, comparing very favorably with the meetings of previous years, but there is no reason why the standard should be lowered.

advanced the present term. The opportunities offered for debating, public speaking, etc., are among the valuable assets that belong to the upper class pupils. The boys have just organized under the leadership of Alfred Lowry, Jr., a debating club, which will meet every Third-day evening in one of the classrooms from 6:45 to 7:30. Membership in this club is limited to the three upper classes.

The meetings in the Superintendent and Matron's parlor were resumed on Fifth-day evening, when we had an address from Augustine Dwyer on the "Voice as a Reflection of the Personality." The talk was helpful on a full of illustration drawn from our friend's wide experiences.

DURING the past month valuable additions have been made to the school library, including ninety volumes, also a generous donation of Friends' books from Joshua L. Bailey and within the past few days three volumes of peculiar interest to the lover of old books from a Friend in Ireland—these are Robert Barclay's complete Works, printed in 1692; Bury's History of Friends in Ireland, dated 1751, and the Life and Works of Richard Clarke, 1726. In addition to these, the library has had the gift of ten or more volumes for every day use, on "The Revelations of Modern Science and Invention," the gift of Joel Cadbury, the same Friend often sending to us packages of periodicals which the library is glad to have and which are not included in our regular list.

We have had no Committee Friends with us at either of our meetings for worship during the week. On Fifth-day both George L. Jones and Thomas K. Brown spoke with much feeling and directness and on First-day Thomas W. Fisher spoke and appeared in supplication.

On the First-day evening collection J. Harvey Borton spoke to the boys on "The Elements of the Twentieth Century Demands of a Business Man." This he translated to suit the case of boys about ready to leave school, and anxiously looking forward to their life work. He made four essentials very prominent—Health, Honesty, Intelligence and Perseverance, and drawing from a wide personal experience he enlarged on each of these in a way that could not but be helpful to young men. In closing he emphasized the importance of always having an ideal to copy, and he appealed to his audience to cherish and to follow that one only perfect ideal that the world has ever known, even to follow Him who is the Saviour of men.

Thomas K. Brown spoke to the girls the half-hour following, his theme being "The Right Use of Money." He applied principles to the life of a Westtown school girl in a practical fashion, which if lived up to would correct many an error that has crept into circles of society where one would think such errors could not come.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The following is taken from a personal letter and was not written with the thought that it might be published. It sounds so clear and true and is in such accord with our own feelings, that we are willing to print it—Ed.]

DEAR FRIENDS:—I have now been nearly a month away from the American Continent, but in spirit, affection and thought I am still there, resting in my mind the many places where I have preached the Word of the Lord and the many Christian homes which for the dear Master's sake have given me hospitality.

In Canada I saw something of Friends in Toronto, in Hamilton I had considerable service quite unexpectedly; I found quite a response to Truth there. I also had opportunity in Orillia and Belleville, besides a large meeting in the Y. M. C. A. in Buffalo, N. Y. I did not return to England because the doors of service were closing, I could have remained for many months longer.

My heart is filled with grief because of the removal of our beloved F. W. P. Sellow. May the Lord continue to watch over His cause and His people among us.

Edwin P. Sellow was a valiant man in Israel. His heart, life, powers were completely at the Lord's disposal. He was true to his convictions. He was to the end, no man-pleaser. Time for him was lived in the clear light of eternity. He had the heart of a pilgrim here below. Not for him the thought of tethering his own nest. He set his affections on things above, where his true interests lay. We shall see his face no more! His voice is stilled, his pen is laid down, his chair is empty. Our confidence, nevertheless, is in the One whose hand-ship to His Church is a mighty reality. He can, and I believe will, raise up others to maintain the testimony in its purity. Past generations have not used Him up, He has still words of eternal life." —

MAX I. REICH.

[The following is from the pen of W. B. Stoddard, the Washington correspondent of The Cynosure.—Ed.]

"During the last few weeks I have been forcefully reminded of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death. Several friends who have been helpful to our work have been called to their reward during the past year, but in the passing of none has your representative been made to sorrow so much as in the taking of our much beloved friend, Edwin P. Sellow, who passed from this life but a few days since. He was but sixty years of age, and it seemed, as in the taking of my beloved father, that the call came too soon! He was a rare spirit, humble, consecrated, cheerful, considerate, active, methodical and vital he had the courage of his convictions. He did not seek the approval of the crowds, but he did crave the approval of his Heavenly Father. He naturally became a leading minister in the Society of Friends with which he labored the greater portion of his life. He has been a careful reader of The Cynosure for over thirty years and has sent it to his friends. For many years he served as an officer in our Pennsylvania Christian Association. A very able pamphlet which he prepared on the Lodge question is in circulation by the Society of Friends. When coming to this city, I always looked for the welcome smile I was sure to find in the office of THE FRIEND. His death as his life was in peace. Farewell, Edwin, it will not be long until we are all on the other side. Others will come to take up our burdens and God will carry on His work."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Radium has been produced near Sellersville, Pa., from ore snt there from mines in Utah and Colorado. A recent account says: "Angus Cameron, president of the Radium Company of America, the first and only company in this country to produce the precious metal for commercial purposes, showed representatives of the press hundreds of tons of the radium ore, carnotite, shipped here from his company's mines in Utah and Colorado. In a phial, scarcely an inch in length, were seven milligrams of the precious stuff valued at $180,000 the gram."

The form to be used and regulations to be followed by individuals in making returns of income subject to the new Federal income tax were sent out on the 6th inst. by the Treasury Department. Every citizen of the United States, whether residing at home or abroad, every person residing in the United States and every non-resident alien, who has income from United States investments of $3000 or over, must make such return.

It is reported from Harrisburg that the Public Service Commission has acted promptly on the recommendations contained in the report of Investigator Dohoney on grade crossings in the State. After the report, which was the first of its kind ever made in the State, had been read, the Commission immediately instructed its investigator to prepare at once regulations for the safety of travelers over the grade crossings. Investigator Dohoney reported that 114 steam railroads cross public roads at grade in 11,763 instances, and of these 10,444 are unprotected."

A despatch of the 7th from Minneapolis says: "Every man, woman and child in the United States, according to statistics of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, consumes about one barrel of flour a year. Minneapolis millers supply about one-fourth of that barrel."

According to the annual report of the Census Bureau lately issued the population of Philadelphia in 1912 was 1,606,102, and that of Pittsburgh was 550,467.

A despatch from Harrisburg, Pa., says: "In keeping with the recent order of the State Department of Health banishing the common drinking cup, the Public Service Commission to-day issued an order requiring all railroads carrying passengers within the State to provide drinking water and sanitary drinking cups in each car. Some of the railroads have been doing this for some time."

It was stated from Washington on the 8th inst.: "His sympathy aroused by the fact that nearly 20,000 poor immigrants, after having sold their little all to come to this 'land of promise' were turned back at the door because the immigration law found them unacceptable. Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Labor, is preparing to forwarn all such prospective immigrants and save them, if possible, from breaking old home ties in a useless search for new ones. "It stirs one's heart," said the Secretary, "to see these poor souls, many of whom have disposed of all their little holdings and made long journeys over land, even before beginning the ocean trip, forced back to hardships they were fleeing from. The thing to do is to keep them from starting."

It was stated from Harrisburg on the 7th inst.: "Study of the living conditions and wages of the foreign population of Pennsylvania, and especially of the immigrants, is to be undertaken at once by the State Department of Labor and Industry, and Commissioner John Price Jackson has asked all of the women's clubs of the State to co-operate. The Commissioner to-day sent a letter to the President of every women's club, requesting that a committee be named to make a study in local communities and to collect data regarding the number, wages, general condition and families of all immigrants in Pennsylvania, especially in the industrial portions of the Commonwealth."

A despatch from Washington on the 9th says: "The free listing of beef and other food products under the new tariff is causing enormous increases in importations into the United States, judging from figures issued to-day by the Department of Commerce. More than one-half of the beef imports came direct from England."

It was stated from Cleveland on the 9th inst.: "One million workmen of the iron, steel and metal trades are idle in the United States to-day. The wage loss due to unemployment and short time is $50,000,000 a month. Two hundred and seventy thousand miners are also idle. The wage loss to these is computed at $12,000,000 a month. On the combined figures, compiled by the Daily Iron Trade, in its issue of to-day, there are 1,270,000 men on the idle list, with a wage loss the equivalent of $62,000,000 a month."

A despatch from New York City of the 9th says: "Dr. Franklin H. Martin, of Chicago, and Dr. Charles H. Mayo, of Rochester, Minn., two of the most prominent surgeons in the United States, to-day expressed their hopes in radium as a cure for cancer. Doctor Martin, who used radium extensively, stated that external cancer could be cured, beyond any doubt, by radium. He reasoned that if the substance had this effect on external cancer, it should have the same beneficial effect on internal cancer that could be reached. Doctor Mayo said that the experiments he and his brother had conducted had been encouraging. "The value of radium as a curative for external cancer," said Doctor Martin, "has already been proven. It is past its experimental stage."

It has been lately stated that a significant feature of agricultural development during the last few years has been the increase in acreage in corn and better methods of cultivation. Corn-growing clubs have been formed all over the Union. The yield per acre has been greatly increased. Southern States which a decade ago were buying the product from the West are now more than supplying their own demand. The cotton belt, suffering from the boll weevil, has become also a corn belt. So marvelous, indeed, has been the progress in corn-growing that the cereal ranks with cotton as the most valuable of all American crops.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from Panama of the 7th says: "The first passage of a vessel between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans was completed yesterday when the craneboat Lualaba passed through the Pacific entrance. The trip was not made directly in one day, but by stages, thus showing the practicability of navigating the canal. No passengers were carried."

It was stated from New York City on the 7th inst.: "More than 1,600,000 bushels of Argentine corn have been received at United States ports within the last two or three days, and upward of 8,000,000 bushels have already been imported since the new tariff placed corn on the free list. It has effectually checked an advancing corn market and finally forced a sharp decline in cash values. Fifteen more corn ships are on the way here."

A despatch from London of the 5th says: "In cases suitable for radium treatment, 150 milligrams are introduced into the substance of the growth and left there for 24 hours. Nothing is noticed for two or three days, but the pain is relieved by the 10th day. By the 15th day the growth has shrunk. From the 15th day on the growth has rapidly diminished in size. The growth is found excepting a few small pieces of scum which will require removal, and is made to move. By the 20th day the exception of the hair, the growth is gone which has done on the 10th day."

It is stated from Paris of the 10th inst.: "The Evolution, held that its duty is to record the work of French scientists who have been engaged in experiments carried out at Chateaufort, near the town of Angoulême, adjacent to Paris. Radium was used by Dr. Curie and the scum was then injected into the patients. The injections were made, each with its own apparatus. The scum, strengthened radium, is by Dr. Curie's laboratory. Beneficial effects were noted during the first 24 hours."

A REASON FOR THE HOPE THAT IS IN US.

"God so loved the world that He gave His Only Begotten Son that they that believe in Him might not perish but have Everlasting Life." Such is the reason of our hope, and it becomes a most vital matter that we recognize in this All-wise and Divine plan for the redemption of the world the Father's Blessed Will and Way revealed to us and in us by Jesus Christ our Lord. How gladly and how earnestly we search the Scriptures, almost thinking that in them we have Eternal Life and thus realize how fully they testify of Christ—the Fountain of Eternal Life. How all-important that we believe and understand this blessed testimony. We are reminded of the first message of the Risen Christ just three days after His death on the cross, to those who failed to understand the Scriptures concerning Himself. In their sorrow they were mourning the loss of an earthly benefactor who would have delivered them from their enemies. How significant and how severe to them must have been the chiding words, revealing to them their lack of understanding and their failure to believe the Written Word of the Scriptures. "Ought not Christ to have suffered and to have entered into His glory?" "And beginning at Moses and all the Prophets He expounded unto them the things concerning Himself!" How condescending to a condition of immaturity and yet how significant His reference to a condition of heart which was slow to believe the Scriptures! "Did not our hearts burn within us as He walked with us by the way and as He opened unto us the Scriptures!" How must their warm, loving hearts have ached within them as He constrained them. He thus condescended to their exceeding need and finally revealed Himself unto them. There are times when we walk lonely and sad in the remembrance of what has come to pass in these days, and wonder if in our exceeding need we shall be favored with a clear vision of our risen Saviour and of His right place in the Father's all-embracing and glorious plan of human redemption. Let us see to it that there be no condition of heart which would lead us to disbelieve that which the prophets have written and which has been so signally fulfilled concerning our risen and glorified Lord and Redeemer. In the openings of Life these things are revealed unto us and there is a perfect harmony between the testimony of the prophets and the openings of Life within us. Christ has revealed His will to us and "doing His will we know the doctrine which is the perfect harmony in all the glorious and perfect plan, which we are saved. "No man can save himself; he must come to God a ransom for him," and so in God's own way and time He has provided for us just such a Saviour as we need and thus we are thrice happy are they who doing the will of their blessed Lord find no difficulty in believing the way and wisdom by which we are made heirs of Eternal Life. There are honest, loving hearts struggling with difficulties and striving earnestly to do their part in order to rightly know and believe the Doctrine and thus be brought into the heavenly harmony of God's perfect plan concerning them, and who yet are not satisfied in the fullness of God's restoring love. My heart pleads with such as these in the light and love of our risen Lord to "Come apart with Him into a desert place" into a condition of death of our own willings and runnings and there, resting in His goodness, His mercy and His grace wait for the unspeakable revelations of His will. They who thus follow Him will not long be permitted to "walk in darkness," but shall rejoice in the light of Christ's own heavenly life, and they will be, in amazing mercy, brought into the glorious unity and harmony of God's own blessed way and work. The miracles of Scripture will no longer distress and disturb; the miracle of Christ's birth will be revealed as God's own way of making a clear distinction between mortal man and His own well-beloved Son—a distinction so necessary for the fulfillment of the glorious work assigned Him in redeeming the world. In our own experience of the redeeming power of Christ, what an amazing change would come over us—yea what a pall of darkness would enshroud our spirits could the temptation take hold of our minds and lead us to believe that Jesus Christ after all was a mere man. Our hearts do indeed burn within us as our risen Lord walks with us by the way, and we realize that He and He only has prevailed to open "The Lamb's Book of Life." Thus we see our Redeemer crowned "with the glory which he had before the world was," and again listen to the blessed words addressed to His Father in the very shadows of Getsemane and the cross. "An Eternal glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one as we are one: I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be perfect in one; and that the world may know that Thou didst send Me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved Me." The miracle of Grace—the new birth is one with the recorded miracles of the Holy Scriptures—something to be seen and understood in the visions of light, as real substance, earnestly hoped for—lessons at our hand from Him who teacheth as never man taught.

Our "waiting spiritual worship" lies at the foundation of all right progress and experience of the power of God revealed in Christ our Lord—a way of safety—a way of hope—a path of life and love and peace shining more and more brightly perfect day of Christ, in whom it is ours to live and move and have our being. Thus will it be our privilege to be brought into some small measure of sympathy and suffering with Him who poured out such full measure for us and in His love and power prevailing, will be made "more than conquerors through Him." "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me."

SUSAN COZENS.

AN APPRECIATION.

Although there are probably only a few who can remember this unobtrusive, devoted follower of the Lord Jesus, a brief notice of her may not be unacceptable to the readers of THE FRIEND.

She and her sisters were natives of Ireland, brought to Philadelphia in their girlhood by their father. He was a worthy man, leaving them a good name, and with but slender means for support, making it needful for them to exert themselves.

Elizabeth Cozens, the eldest, had passed through a severe illness, which left her infirm and with judgment somewhat impaired.

Flen, the next in age, was grievously afflicted with rheumatism, a disability which was accepted with fortitude and sweetness, for a long time she was unable to walk, and her hands became so crippled she could not turn the pages of a book. They kept a school for young children, and one would stand by her chair to turn the page as required.

Susan, the youngest, was a marvel for patience and energy; a dislocated shoulder was a deformity which must have been a keen trial to her sensitive feelings, for she was naturally high-spirited.

Beside doing the house-work and cooking, she was a tailoress; and some of the boys of sixty years and more ago thought it a hardship that their mothers required them to have clothing made by her, for they would have preferred a more modish style.

However, they cannot now regret the patronage given to add to the meagre bank account and help to maintain her self-respect. Close neighbors and others more distant gladly shared of their abundance, but delicate tact was needed in offering aid. The humble home on Spruce Street near Fifth was kept beautifully tidy. With admiration the writer has seen Susan Cozens on her knees scrubbing the boards of a flight of steps, making them as white as brush, water, sand and determination could. How was it possible for her to work so hard, carrying the coal and ashes, waiting on the invalids, doing the outside errands, always patient and cheerful?

She never seemed to take a holiday; rarely, if ever, a meal or cup of tea away from the house, though she was most regular in attending Orange Street Meeting.

After the older sisters were called away, her sight failed, but the cataract was removed, and a partial recovery enjoyed. Kind friends watched over her, and the closing days were spent in Chester, Pa.

Through mercy, this "Hidden One," doubtless heard the "glad welcome" "Good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." A. H. C.

"Whoever stands on the bottom and ground of Truth, and keeps in the meek, innocent spirit, will assuredly sooner or later prevail." RICHARD SHAKELTON.

"God knows the difference between the idle waiting of the desire to escape his will, and the honest waiting of a willing heart to have his will made plain in order to do it."

Their departure for the Pacific Slope was a notable and memorable occasion as witnessed by the Commissioner in the summer of 1912. "It was a strange sight, the conjunction of this world-old people of strong and rugged frame with child at breast and burden on back, with sturdy women and sturdier men collecting a few household goods, lingering about the station for hours in a drizzling rain, packed with the utmost discomfort into the colonist cars of a long train and whirled away a thousand miles to their new destination.

"No wonder that there were many tears and much distress, for after all, home is home and in one decade its joys and sorrows may consecrate it. . . . It was impossible to suppress a feeling of profound sympathy for a people so often and so sorely tried. For now, at the end of a little more than one decade, this people once more had to face another long 'trek,' with the same accompanying conditions as signaled their departure from the land of their birth and persecution, for in each case it meant the abandonment of home and land and without compensation. It should be noted that in passing away from their prairie homes, the Doukhobors could have the following testimony borne concerning them, to the Commissioner—"There was perfect unanimity of opinion as to the excellent character, the industry, the thrift, and the phenomenal farming skill of the Doukhobors. They were spoken of everywhere as kind, hospitable and gentle. . . . One of the leading citizens in Buchanan in commenting on the breaking-up of the local Community, told the Commissioner that it "was a sorry day for that section of the country to see the Doukhobors going away. Their little peculiarities had hurt nobody, and they were the best settlers he had ever met with." The Canadian women also "spoke in the highest terms of their motherliness and affection, of their domestic virtues, and their devotion to religion."

The title to their Saskatchewan possessions was very uncertain because they would not take out their homesteads in severalty. This was emphasized by the Government reducing their holdings from 160 acres for each family to fifteen acres for each individual. Under these conditions and others mentioned previously it was no wonder Peter Verigin should decide to order the colony to leave for British Columbia.

Dr. Patrick, of Yorkton, who has rendered the Doukhobors medical service ever since they came from Russia, says—"They do not wish to acknowledge obligation to any one outside their Community. They wish to maintain their own particular regulations, customs, laws and their own private law in the midst of the national law. Their leader is able and shrewd and quite willing to lead. The Community Doukhobors profess and many doubtless believe him to be a reincarnation of Jesus Christ. The mere fact that he may exhibit imperfections does not in the least shake their belief in him, for there is a convenient Doukhobor doctrine that a certain amount of wickedness is necessary in their reincarnated Christ, to prevent a repetition of his crucifixion. Thus in dealing with these "Sons of the Soil," as they like to call themselves, "we are dealing with a people whose conceptions are those of Russian peasants and whose leader is their Ruler, or Tzar by Divine right and whose policy, no matter how contradictory or absurd it may be to others, is to them Divinely inspired."

The marvelous results in fruit raising and preserving, for they operate two or more canning establishments in British Columbia, could only have been achieved by the abundance of Community labor. The 15,000 acres they now own and the value of which has been increased several fold by their industry, has been brought under cultivation by their communal system and nothing but praise is due for the development of so great an undertaking in so short a time.

Peter Verigin resides at Grand Forks "in the midst of a splendid orchard, with flower-gardens, kitchen-garden, lawns, stables, barns and all the concomitants of an up-to-date high-class farm home," and near him resides his local manager, Nicholas Zibiroff, an old and highly respected member of the Community and a man of rare financial ability.

They have introduced and made grape production a great success, so that twenty tons of grapes were taken from one hill side at Grand Forks during 1912. The grafting of fruit trees has also been most successful under the direction of Peter Verigin; it is said in an orchard of 50,000 young trees not one has been lost. Jno. W. Sherbinin is business manager of all the British Columbia settlements, and he has a new residence built for him by the Community Doukhobors at Brilliant on the Canadian Pacific Railroad. A concrete reservoir with a capacity of 1,000,000 gallons of water has been built at this place. Saw mills and brick-making works are also in operation and a jam factory that has had a marvelous output, considering that this trading company of Doukhobors has previously had little experience in such work.

So much for the material prosperity of this "peculiar people." But when we take up their educational side, trouble begins at once and Peter Verigin appealed to the whole world last spring against the reasonable registration and school laws of the Canadian Government. He subsidized a certain Russian, Avalenko, living in New York, to protest in the name of humanity against the "barbarous" treatment of four or five Doukhobors, imprisoned because they would not comply with the registration and school requirements of British Columbia. The Independent, of New York, published some chapters or statements from this book under the name of Peter Verigin last summer. But the puerilities of its arguments were obvious to all. Recently I have received two or three letters from Independent Doukhobors which will throw considerable light on their present situation and so may be quoted from quite freely.

Before doing this it should be borne in mind that the real strength of the Doukhobor organization, according to Commissioner Blakemore, lies in the loyalty of its women to Peter Verigin. That loyalty is so profound and so marked that there have been numerous instances where the women remained in the Community and attached to him after their husbands and sons had left it and utterly revolted from his despotism. And another point should be mentioned that Peter Verigin has held the title to all of the Community Doukhobors' lands in his own name, although he professes to share that responsibility with certain co-trustees—of his own selection.

(To be concluded.)

CHRIST WITHIN.

The Master came into my heart as Self went out at the door,
"O enter, dear heavenly Guest," I cried, "and leave me never more!"
The place was dusty and foul and dank, but sunshine entered in
As his presence cleansed and sweetened, and banished the snitch of sin.

And so all day it is Christ within—I am no more mine own;
My heart is a grave no longer since he rolled away the stone;
He speaks through my lips, and they utter what he would have me say;
He uses my hands for his service sweet in his own blessed way.

My feet he sends on his errands, and they never weary grow
Because of his strong upholding—the dear Christ who loves me so;
The fretting troubles of every day that used to vex and sting
Have vanished like troubling night-dreams in the presence of the King!

The homely work of the household, the endless tasks of the day,
Are lightened and glory-silumined because he leads the way;
The food I place on the table is a sacrament Divine,
Because he hath touched and blessed it through these poor, weak hands of mine.

And so it is Christ forever! the Christ forever and ay!
His life overflowing within me, whether I live or die;
His for the daily service, wherever he sendeth me,
And his for the joy eternal, and the final victory.

THE SPIRIT OF BROTHERLINESS.

During the past week a conference was held at the University of Toronto, Canada. It was the first of a series of International Student Conferences, the first of which was held in London, England, in 1912. The purpose of these conferences is to bring together students of different nationalities and to discuss the problems of international brotherhood. There were the first student representatives from the United States, Canada, and Mexico, and also from the British Empire, Canada, and the United States. The conference was held in the University of Toronto, Canada, and was attended by students of various denominations and of various nationalities. The conference was held in the University of Toronto, Canada, and was attended by students of various denominations and of various nationalities.

One of the greatest impressions of such a conference is the growing fact of international fellowship and cooperation. Here were students from all over the United States, Canada, Great Britain and the Orient, all facing the same life-problems and finding solutions in the same general realities. There are many reasons for this development of world-brotherhood. Increased facilities of transportation and communication are contracting the earth. We are in daily communication with New York, San Francisco, London, Shanghai, St. Petersburg, Berlin, Paris, London, and other cities. International student groups, exchange professorships, international conventions and commissions, missions, and social service are all making possible a new understanding between races and nations and classes. We of the different countries are coming to know and therefore to love one another. We are just entering into our heritage of brotherhood. We are coming to know as a spiritual fact that the world is after all one world.

A multitude of workers, inspired by this conviction and dedicating their lives to social service—the kind of service which Jesus instituted when He girded Himself with a towel and washed the disciples' feet. An army of student volunteers—five thousand of whom have already sailed, feel themselves commissioned to live their lives in our non-Christian countries, trying in some measure to incarnate for those less-privileged peoples, the message of Christianity. They are soldiers of brotherliness. The immensity of their task is only surpassed by the immensity of the Father's love and purpose for the whole world.

When this conviction possesses a man, he must become a world-citizen, with a world-patriotism. This citizenship should be the possession of every worker for peace. We, Friends, with our insistence on the claims of brotherliness, should be in the van-guard of those who have the world-vision. We cannot now be indifferent to the deep issue of life, whether they are being fought out in America or China or India, or Japan. Our interests should be expansive enough to encircle the earth, our sympathy deep and intensive enough to fill our one little corner of the earth with the radiant spirit of brotherhood. Our one little task will be dimmied if it is not enriched when we know it as part of God's world-plan. No detail can be unimportant which is an organic part of that plan, the essential which does not in some way contribute toward that plan. The field is the world, the good seed are the children of the kingdom. Our twentieth century opportunities for world citizenship mean new responsibilities of brotherliness.

We are poor, insufficient creatures; without supernatural aid can neither help ourselves, nor others, and this aid we can patiently wait for, and it will come to such in the mean and best which is the Lord's time.

EVEN a little war is a big expense. The war in Spain, for instance, that Spain is fighting the natives of Morocco, is a result of that fighting the government faces an expenditure of $100,000,000 to the national debt.

COPIED FROM THE JOURNAL OF JOHN WOOLMAN.

BY E. B. L.

One day being under a strong exercise of spirit, I stood up and said some words in a meeting; but not keeping close to the Divine opening, I said more than was required of me. Being soon sensible of my error, I was afflicted in mind some weeks, without any light or comfort, even to a degree that I could not take satisfaction in anything. I remembered God and was troubled, and in the depth of my distress, He had pity upon me, and sent the Comforter. I then felt forgiveness for my offence: my mind became calm and quiet, and I was truly thankful to my Redeemer for His mercies. About six weeks after this, feeling the spring of Divine love opened, and a concern to speak, I said a few words in a meeting in which I found peace. Being thus humbled and disciplined under the Cross, my understanding became more strengthened to distinguish the pure spirit which inwardly moves upon the heart, and which taught me to wait in silence. Sometimes many weeks together until I felt that rise, which prepares the creature to stand like a trumpet, through which the Lord speaks to His flock.

COPIED FROM THE JOURNAL OF JOHN WOOLMAN.

BY E. B. L.

Attending a Yearly Meeting at Newport, R. I., in 1760, he says:

And now an exercise revived in my mind in relation to lotteries which were common in these parts. . . . The hearts of some solid Friends appeared to be united to discourage the practice amongst their members and the matter was zealously handled by some on both sides. . . . In the heat of zeal I made reply to what an ancient Friend said, and when I sat down, I saw that my words were not enough seasoned with charity. After this I spoke no more on the subject. At length a minute was made, a copy of which was to be sent to their several Quarterly Meetings, inciting Friends to labor to discourage the practice, amongst all professing with us. . . . Some time after this minute was made I remained uneasy with the manner of my speaking to the ancient Friend and could not see my way clear to conceal my uneasiness, though I was concerned that I might say nothing to weaken the cause in which I had laboured. After some close exercise and hearty repentance for not having attended closely to the safe guide, I stood up, and, reciting the passage, acquainted Friends that though I dare not go from what I had said as to the matter, yet I was uneasy with the manner of my speaking, believing milder language would have been better. As this was uttered in some degree of creaturely abasement, after a warm debate, it appeared to have a good savour amongst us.

JOHN WOOLMAN THROUGH UNEXPECTED EYES.

One would hardly expect to meet with mention of John Woolman in Hope Farm Notes in The Rural New Yorker. The following is from the issue of Twelfth Month 20th:

"This is no day for trying to save the cost of lights. Better pull down the curtain and 'light up' and start a good blaze in the fireplace. That is what I have done, and I call it good practice. If you had your choice, what book would you take for such a day? I have been reading 'John Woolman's Journal' over again. This quaint old book fits well into a dull and sleepy day before the fire. More than 180 years ago Woolman practically started the organized protest against slavery by refusing to take out a bill of sale for a slave. I confess that there is too much light in the blood to permit me to live as this humble Quaker did, but without knowing it he was what we may call a great man.

Found in the same volume with this "Journal" I find "Some Fruits of Solitude," by William Penn. Surely, from the title, you would call this a good book for reading on a dull [Twelfth Month] day on a lonely farm before an open fire. Here is what Penn said about the education of children nearly 250 years ago:

"We are in pain to make them scholars, but not men! To talk, rather than to know, which is less wanting."

This thing of teaching children to talk without knowing what they talk about seems, then, to be about as old as language. As society puts on more and more varnish, the tendency to teach children to skim a little of everything and talk about this thin skimming seems to grow. What is a man who never knew just how to study and who picked up an "education" as one would pick a basket of chips out from a sound log, to do about selecting a proper school for his children? One school might in a few years turn his child out a brilliant parrot, fit, as Penn says, "to talk rather than to know." Another school might, in the same time, turn out a plain and rather silent man or woman who had really begun to think.

The title "Things that Matter Most," and the sub-title, "Lovers of God," found in a recent book by John Henry Jowett, seem much more to suggest our Quaker saint. We find Jowett saying this:

"And in the second place [if we would become lovers of God], we must consort with them that are lovers already. It is well that this should be through personal intercourse, if such happy privilege come our way. But if this immediate fellowship be denied us, let us seek their company through the blessed communion of books. Let me name one or two of these great lovers of God, and quote a few of the love phrases by which they describe their high communion. Let us make friends with John Woolman, and hear his speech laden with phrases of this kind: 'A motion of love,' a 'fresh and heavenly opening,' 'the enlargement of gospel love,' 'a love clothes me while I write which is superior to all expression,' 'the heart-tendering friendship of the Lord,' 'the descendings of the heavenly dew.'"

A third instance of Woolman through outside eyes is to be found in a volume of essays from the pen of George Macaulay Trevelyan, the biographer of John Bright. G. K. Hibbert in a review of this volume in The Friend (London), of fifth of Twelfth Month thus refers to this matter:

The author of "The Life of John Bright" can always rely on a warm welcome among Friends. In issuing the present collection of essays, he places Friends under a special obligation to him by his charming and sympathetic sketch of John Woolman. Naturally one turns to that first. "There are three religious autobiographies that I think of together—the Confessions of St. Augustine and of Rousseau, and the Journal of John Woolman the Quaker. . . . Each of these men gave the impulse to a great current in the world's affairs—the Mediaeval Church, the French Revolution, and the Anti-Slavery Movement. But Woolman is to me the most attractive, and I am proud to think that it was he who was the Anglo-Saxon, the 'Woolman' of old English trader stock."

The essay, though brief, is most illuminating. It abounds in happy touches:—"A Quaker Socrates, with his searching simple questions, he surpassed his Athenian prototype in love and patience and argumentative fairness, as much as he fell below him in intellect. And when the Friends found that they could not answer John's questions, instead of poisoning him or locking him up as an anarchist, they let their slaves go free! . . .

"Incredible as it may seem, they asked no one for Compensation! But then the Quakers always were an odd people." Or again: "They say John Brown in the ghost went marching along in front of the Northern armies. Then I guess John Woolman was bringing up the ambulance behind!"

The most valuable thing in the essay is its appreciation of the real significance of Woolman's work, a point we are somewhat apt to miss. The writer shows how the Anti-Slavery movement came in the nick of time, just before machinery could universalize the slave system. Had the industrial revolution been fully developed, all the world over, while men still thought it right to treat black men as machines, the exploitation of the tropics by the modern Company promoter on "Congo" lines would have become the rule instead of the exception.

MANY well-intentioned persons attempt to build a skyscraper on a bungalow foundation.

THE recent survey of the Connellsville coke region reports: "The liquor traffic is the single and most disastrous foe to the recent immigrant and industrial life of the coal and coke region. It is working ravages among these peasants from Europe. It lays a tax through waste, crime and poverty upon the whole community, and works disaster in developing the civic life."

WHAT JUST ONE WORD MAY DO.

"What can it matter in a little while,

That for a day

We met and gave a word, a touch, a smile,

Upon the way?"

What will it matter whether hearts were brave

And lives were true,

That you gave me the sympathy I crave,

As I gave you?"

These trifles! Can it be they make or mar

A human life?

Are souls as lightly swayed as rushes are

By love or strife?"

Yea, yea! a look the fainting heart may break,

Or make it whole;

And just one word, if said for love's sweet sake,

May save a soul.

WILLIAM WHEELER.

SON OF DANIEL B. WHEELER.

ANNA T. GRIFFITH.

In the concluding remarks of Daniel Wheeler's "Memoirs," the editor, his son Daniel, thus comments: "As Daniel Wheeler's children advanced towards maturity, instead of relaxing his watchful care, he felt that there was need rather of redoubled vigilance to shield them from surrounding danger. Ever anxious for their best welfare, yet deeply sensible that through Divine grace alone their youthful minds must be awakened, quickened and enabled to lay hold of a Saviour's love, he was earnest in imploring for them this heavenly gift, and diligent in watching for opportunities to impress upon them the importance of spiritual things. One instance of the condescension of the Lord in hearing and answering his prayers may be here introduced.

"As his eldest son attained the age of manhood, earnest were the cravings of his father that the Lord would direct his heart into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ." He knew well that to the natural man the things of God must ever be a mystery; and he longed that through submission to the operations of the Spirit of truth they might be opened to his understanding. "Often with paternal tenderness he silently watched the opening convictions of his inquiring mind, and, as opportunities presented, he labored to explain to him the views he had himself received. At one time the sentiments of his son on these all-important subjects were exceedingly unsettled, and he passed through deep mental conflict before he yielded to the light of Divine truth in his soul, which dispelled the doubts and reasonings by which he was assailed.

"It was at this period that one evening his father and he, being alone together, they had much conversation on the points which then pressed heavily on the mind of the latter. Before retiring to rest his father handed him the Bible, and requested him to read a chapter. He took the book and read the third chapter of Malachi. Deep seriousness overspread his countenance, and after a considerable time of silence, he repeated, 'The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in'; and He shall be 'like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap'; adding, 'yes, He shall come into his own temple, the temple of the heart, and there do his own work. I never understood this chapter before, nor saw, as I now see it, the spiritual nature of the Gospel dispensation.'

The impression thus made was not soon effaced; and it was evident to his thankful and rejoicing parent that the prophetic declaration was indeed fulfilled in his experience, that the Lord had come into his temple, and was there working to the purifying of his soul. The change which gradually succeeded was most striking; clearly evincing to those around that the day had indeed dawned and the day-star arisen in a heart long oppressed with darkness and the gloom of doubts.

In reference to this period, he stated (page 114) with much emotion: "this kind of inward peace, and the fervent prayer and faith," intimating the first experience of the soul through which he had been in the rebirth of his soul.

As a prospect of religious service in that land opened before Daniel Wheeler, he believed it right to receive an appointment under the Russian government, and on the 5th Month 5th, 1842, remarked in a letter to a friend: "Am stating undoesingly my true motive for wishing to go, it was proposed that my eldest son should be selected in head of this concern; and that, in all respect, if anything else should remain on its original footing."

Coupled with the date of Sixth Month 18th, 1842, the following lines have been preserved as addressed by William Wheeler:

TO DANIEL WHEELER.

"Tis not the tulip's gorgeous dye

That breathes the exhaustless richness

The sweetest note that charms the sky

Ascends not from the gaudiest plume

"And friendship lasting, true, sincere

May glow beneath a rugged form"

In homely strain the soul may cheer

That faints before the boding storm

"Then let me whisper, 'peace be still,'

To every anxious faithless fear;

Embrace and bless that sovereign will

That bids thee rest no longer here.

"Go where His finger points the way,

Nor tarry till He bids thee rest,

And He whom winds and waves obey

Shall bless thee, and thou shalt be blest.

"Darkness shall yield thee glorious light,

And sorrow's swell subside in calm;

Sad thoughts shall rise in welcome fight

And pain shall prove celestial balm.

"But ah! beware when tempest tossed,

Nor sun, nor moon salute thee eyes

The helm untied, the compass lost,

Lest murmur's rebel voice arise.

"Twas thus in days long since gone by

And thus when we are not, will be,

Jehovah deigned the faith to try

Of those who longed his face to see.

"Then ah! in faith and hope endure

"Till faith and hope are lost to sight

The palm of victory see thou

Resistless in Immortal's might."

By Daniel Wheeler's "Memoirs" we are informed that on the Eleventh Month of 1842, while he was in England preparing for his voyage to the South Seas, his son Charles was attacked with an inflammation of the lungs, which for a time threatened his life; the complaint had at length yielded to the means employed, when Daniel Wheeler's wife and daughter, Jane, were at the same time taken ill. The mother's disorder proved to be fever, and, though apparently of the mildest kind, it terminated fatally within nine days.

At this time her daughter, Jane, was lying in a very dangerous state from inflammation of the brain. For several days the issue appeared doubtful; but through merciful interposition she was spared, and space allowed her for the discharge of her duties of repentance and reconciliation.

At the time of the mother's death, the eldest brother,

William, was suffering from an affection of the chest, which shortly afterwards reduced him to a state of great exhaustion—as his sister expressed it, “very critically unwell.”

To William Wheeler his father wrote: “I am not surprised to hear that my dear William has been dipped again and again into a state of feeling something like that of baptism on account of the sufferings of others; for unless this was the case how should we be capable of entering into their joys and sorrows? And now that the whole weight of responsibility and care of the family devolves upon his shoulders, it is no marvel with me that this increased burden should be felt. I think this has a very instructive and significant meaning; and although in degree inferior, is notwithstanding the same in kind as that felt and witnessed by the several members of the Gospel church, where all suffer, rejoice and sympathize with and for each other. I believe that the head of a family, or tribe, when endeavoring to act under the guidance of Him who was touched with a feeling and compassionate sense of our manifold weakness and infirmities, may be favored to administer according to the ability given to the wants and necessities of those about him, entering into their feelings, and sharing in whatever conflicts may be allotted to them.”

Shortly after the mother's decease, Sarah Wheeler wrote to her father, “William has got a cold, and coughs a good deal.” In another letter, and at a later period: “Dear William's lungs are still so weak, there seems little probability of his breathing the fresh air till the return of spring; and even within doors the difference of a few degrees in temperature or the smallest exertion produces a chill that he does not surmount for days; three days when Charles was so ill this occurred, and produced pain that affected his breathing so much he was obliged to prevent inflammation and remain in bed until afternoon next day. . . . When dear William becomes unwell, I feel as though I had not one human prop left; and were it not that I have been supported especially by an Almighty but invisible hand, my feeble nature must long ago have sunk amid the difficulties with which I have had to contend; but ever blessed be my gracious Preserver! He has made good His promise and granted me strength proportioned to my day.”

THE GLORY OF GRAY HAIRS.—One of the most difficult chapters in the great art of living is to know how to grow old. To do it well indicates high wisdom. To remain young and effective in spite of the almanac is a triumph of no small magnitude. Age either transfigures or petrifies.

Health of course is quite a factor in the matter. But cheerfulness, hopefulness, and courage count for still more. And these come naturally and necessarily from an unwavering trust in God. It is very largely “according to your faith” in this as in so many other things.

If faith holds firm, the outlook will be bright, the uplook clear, the inlook satisfactory. Such a one will be full of enthusiasm and will feel like shouting victory all the time. He will have no temptation to feel forsaken and neglected. He will find plenty to do for the Lord wherever he is. He will be so occupied with praise that sadness and gloom will have no chance at him.

The evening of life to such a one brings with it plenty of camps, which shine both near and far. Both his recollections and his anticipations are so delightful that all who come in contact with him are stirred to wonder and admiration and desire to grow old along with him, so manifestly is it true that in his case

“The best is yet to be,”

“The best of life for which the first was made.”

No one who has given himself with single-eyed devotion for fifty years to the pursuit of the highest things will be so evidently crowned with glory as the final triumph draws nigh that even the dullest spectator must get some glimmer of the truth that it pays to be good. Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

EXTRACTS FROM JOHN HOOTON'S MANUSCRIPT BOOK OF DISCIPLINE, 1761/2

As is well known, there are in existence a number of manuscript books of Discipline. In some instances these belonged to meetings, in others to individuals. They are interesting on several accounts. To the historian they reflect somewhat of the moral conditions of the time to which they were addressed; to the antiquarian quaint spelling and phraseology will be an additional appeal; to the average reader they bring the ancient days nearer than ordinary historical writing and establish kinship between the present and the past. The volume from which the following extracts have been made has been kindly loaned by Rebecca E. Judkins. Several Friends have suggested the printing of such extracts and we trust the interest will not be confined to a few. The ancient spellings and capitals and the old s's have been retained.

BOOK OF DISCIPLINE.

WROTE IN YEAR OF OUR LORD, 1761/2

JOHN HOOTON'S BOOK

1762.

From our Yearly Meeting held at Philadelphia by adjournments from First Month 21st to 26th, 1719.

To the Several Quarterly & Monthly Meetings thereunto belonging—

DEAR FRIENDS—

And it is the advice of this meet^t that in speaking to or dealing with any it may be done in a Christian Spirit of Love & tendernefs, labouring in meeknefs by laying of y^e evil before them to bring such persons to a sense of it in themselves that they may be restor^d if possible & altho such are apt to oppote or be tefty while they in that condition remain, yet we ought patiently & meekly to infruct & advife them so that we may not only have a Testimony of Pease in ourselves but that it may so affect y^e Spirit of y^e Friend so spoke to as that he may be sensible we have perform^d a truly Christian Duty & an Office of Brotherly Love towards him.

And now it may be proper to let you understand that Several or most of the Quarterly Meetings having prented to our last Yearly meeting in y^e year 1704 commonly called the book of Discipline did seem upon experience & practice to want a Revival, the same was taken into Consideration & hath been accordingly revifed & as much as may be contracted & amend^d & is accordingly recommended in place of y^e former for general use.

REGULATIONS FOR DEALING WITH CERTAIN OFFENDERS.

They are to be further proceeded against as is hereafter advised and directed. Such as now Raifes either on Horie back or on foot, Lay Wages or use any gaming or needlifs or Vain Sports, or Pafs time. For our time swiftly Pafseth away, & our Pleasure & delight ought to be in the Law of the Lord. Such as are guilty of Tatling, Talebearing, Reproaching, Backbiting or Speaking evil of their Brethren or neighbours or lightly Meddling where not concern^d with y^e Affairs of other Folks. The tendency of all which being to raise up Strife & Discord, or cause disteem amongst Brethern & neighbours. Such as write, Print or Publish any Books or Writings tending to raise Contention or Occasion breach of unity among Brethren, or that have not first had y^e Perusal & approbation by y^e Yearly meeting for that Purpose—such as accustom themselves to Smoking Tobacco, Indecently & too Publickly as in y^e Streets, High Roads, or other Publick places of general or Promifcuous resort, Such as sell, Barter or Exchange Rum, Brandy, or any Strong Liquors; it being Contrary to the Care Friends have always had since the Settlement of these Countrys; that they might not Contribute to y^e abuse & hurt of those poor People which they receive by drinking thereof being generally incapable of using moderation therein, & to avoid giving them Occasion of discontent.

It is advised & desired that Friends do not buy or sell Indian Slaves; also that none among them be concerned in Importing Negro Slaves from their own Country, or Elsewhere—and it is the advice of this meeting that all Frs who have any of them do treat them wth humanity & in a Christian manner & as much as in them lies make them acquainted wth y^e Principals of Truth & inculcate morality into them.

In treating of management of matters of difference between some persons and admitting that some cases can be settled by law the regulation continues:

Such may be permitted to have the matter tried at Law or rather first determined in our Frs' way & when by content confirm'd by Judgment as y^e meets may see Occasion upon y^e matter to avise & direct; with this caution & Care that the parties on both sides concern'd, therein do still appear & behave towards each other in Brotherly Love, & in y^e setting forth or management of y^e cause, as Asserting what they apprehend their rights, that it be done wth decency & moderation, without letting in or showing anger or animosity or using any provoking or unbecoming language. For as a bitter & indecent behaviour will cause y^e Truth of our Holy Profession to be evil spoken of, so on y^e contrary a Christian, Prudent & meek deportment will bear a Becoming Testimony even in Courts, and shew that nothing but the nature of y^e cause & our common station with our Neighbours under y^e Law of y^e nation brings any of us there.

And it is our duty to seek Peace with all Men & avoid giving Provocation, or Just Offence to any, & it is advised that Friends do avoid going to Law with others not of our Profession angrily or in a Passion, or without due Consideration & good grounds & having first in a Frs' way shew'd his Opponents y^e Justice of his cause & having offer'd (when he safely may), if y^e other make any reasonable objection to put the matter to a neighbourly reference.

And as Backbiting, Whifpering & reporting anything to y^e Injury of another ought to be discontinued, prevented and utterly disused among us—If any Fr^d hear of any Scandalous words or Actions of another he ought as much as in him lies to stop such reports by discountenancing or dealing with y^e reporter, shewing the evil & Injustice thereof & then without further spreading it himself either by going to the Friend whom it concerns, or if he or she belongs to any other meeting by writing to him or her to advise them thereof, to y^e End such may clear themselves if Innocent, or condemn y^e same if guilty, & if y^e one or y^e other be not speedily done, y^e Fr^d may acquaint y^e overseers, &c.

If any shall take upon them Publickly to oppose any ministering Fr^d (who is in unity, & not disowned by any meet^g) in their Preaching or Exhortation, or keep on the Hatts or shew any other dislike against such in time of Prayer, Let them speedily be dealt wth, as disorderly Persons who endanger y^e peace & oppose y^e Brotherhood of y^e Church; unless they condemn y^e same in such manner as the meet^g may see fit or requisite, but if any think they have ought against what was sd, if they are to speak to them privately & deal with them orderly.

“God is our refuge and our strength,
In straits a present aid,
Therefore although the earth remove,
We will not be afraid.”

Is the word “succeed” so stale that we must always say “make good”? Is the word “win” so weak that we must always say “win out”?

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE FIRST OF THESE RESOLUTIONS WAS TAKEN AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FRIENDS OF THE TOWN OF BOSTON, MASS., HELD AT THE CENTRAL CHURCH, BOSTON, MASS., ON THE 10TH OF APRIL, 1880.

SINCE THE NEW YEAR, 1881, BE THE TIME OF TRADING, AND RESOLUTIONS? We reprint some original resolutions.

Here are some resolutions taken from the Yearly Meeting, which are said to have been written by an only person for guidance in family life. It observed that it make many a home a sweeter place to live in.

1. I will not be provoking, if I know it.
2. I will not be provoked, if I can help it. I will not speak till I think it over, putting myself in the fellow's place.
3. I will not be petty. I will pass over small offences, or small annoyances without fuss or comment.
4. I will not insist on my own way because it is my way. If the other fellow's is about as good, I'll take it.
5. I will say what I think, and then drop it, unless especially if it seems a case of getting hot. Arguments will convince after that.
6. I will accept advice, even if I haven't asked for it. I'll take it over, and act upon it if it is good.
7. I will let the other fellow have the last word, the larger half, and all the credit, if he wants it.
8. I will keep my nerves steady by regular exercise in the open air, getting to bed early, and avoiding anger, hurry, and overwork.

THE HORSE AND THE GUM-DROPS. It was in the early morning. The streets were in very bad condition—frozen, icy, and in many places obstructed by snow and street rubbish.

Near the top of Murray Hill rise Park Avenue and Third-fifth Street, a large, covered United States mail wagon, bound for the depot, was stalled. The gray horse was down and the actions of the poor animal were pitiful. The driver had unhitched the harness and was gently urging the horse to rise, but the animal had several times tried and failed and did not have courage to try again. He showed plainly how he felt by first laying his head flat on the ice and dirt of the street and then raising it again after half a minute's rest.

The usual crowd going to morning work had gathered around when an engineer came across the avenue, slapping his hat briskly with his morning Tribune. Pushing his way through the crowd he took in the situation at a glance and spoke to the horse and stroked him fondly on the nose. Then he ordered the driver to take the blanket from the right seat and spread them in front of the horse, & when the ice was still water he tried to rise again he would not slip with his feet, but with his shoes, nor could he injure the blanket with such slips.

The horse smelled of the blanket with interest. Next the engineer walked over to a street vendor's cart and purchased a cent's worth of gum-drops. Returning to the horse he spread the Tribune on the ice with John Mitchell's picture right side up, and then calmly placed two gum-drops on it. The horse immediately lapped up one, and soon his mouth was drooling with satisfaction. He did not swallow it, but seemed to fondle it in his mouth, as a child does to make it last. Then he took the second gum-drop.

The crowd was affected by the fun of the situation, and an engineer remarked that an Esquimaux would have been satisfied with a single gum-drop. Why not a horse? The latter, however, was an original investigator of experiments.

While the second gum-drop was being swallowed by the horse, on being gently urged, arose and stood like a gentleman on his rug, sucking his confection with apparent enjoyment.

He was harnessed in again while still being fed with gum-drops, and was asked to pull. He tried, as did his mate, but could get no hold on the slippery pavement, whereupon the engineer hied himself to the nearest telephone and notified the mail contractor to send a team to help.

Walking back, the engineer found the van had disappeared. He asked the Italian street vendor as best he could where the stalled team had gone, and by a gesture from the latter toward the North Pole, he understood that all was well.

"These gum-drops must be of the Doctor Cook variety," said the engineer to himself, as he tucked away the remainder. Then he walked off, meditating on the potentiality of the gum-drop and the blanket with the smooth-shod horse that had fallen on the slippery pavement.—W. B. HAMMOND, in Our Lamb Animals.

FRIENDLY NEWS.

THE following letter to the Editors from our friend, Catharine W. Shibley, puts such information as is at hand in regard to the death of our dear friend, Joel Bean, in a form that requires no editing:

"Knowing that many readers of THE FRIEND were sincerely attached to my brother and sister, Joel and Hannah E. Bean, I thought you would be willing to notice in your columns the departure of my brother, Joel Bean. He died First Month 11, 1914, at Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands. He was, when seventeen years of age, impressed with the religious duty to visit in Gospel love the Hawaiian Islands, and went forth with his wife, under the endorsement of Indiana Yearly Meeting. The preaching of the life, death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ, the diligent reading of the Scriptures and the preaching of the truth that 'religion is the life of God, working in the life of man' characterized his service as a minister of the Society of Friends. He died in the full assurance of peace and rest awaiting him.

Sincerely your friend,

CATHARINE M. SHIBLEY."

[The following letter to the Committee in charge of the Indian School at Tunasassa will surely be of interest to our readers.—Ed.]

TUNASASSA, NEW YORK, Twelfth Month 13, 1913.

TO THE TUNASASSA INDIAN COMMITTEE:—

Dear Friends:—We are glad that the time has once more arrived for us to address you collectively, for we feel that a common interest in a good cause has begotten and strengthened in us a feeling of fellowship and interest in you, many of whom were strangers to us, before entering into our present field of labor. This school year opened with some anxiety, and perhaps a few misgivings, as to how the many changes in the school and industrial work would harmonize, and how they might meet the views of the students and their parents.

We feel that perhaps we are not yet entirely past the experimental stage, but have gone far enough to believe that the education of the hand, along with that of the mind, is a desirable theory for developing the resources of Indian children.

The older boys have made very commendable progress in their shop work, and have produced quite a collection of useful articles. We are hopeful that as they acquire greater skill, some of the things may be saleable, and thus give them the incentive of a little income, and also assist in defraying the expense for lumber. We have recently started the girls' experimental kitchen and think they are much interested in it. Drill in gymnastics has been given one night in each week, instead of the regular evening study collection.

The boys are doing good work, though we have not attempted any very large pieces of carpet yet. Some of the girls are acquiring some skill in basket-making. Susie Warrior, an Indian woman of Red House, offered on finding that we proposed teaching the girls to make baskets, to come one day each week, and it has been a pleasure to us to see her attitude. She will have nothing for coming, not even against her earfare, saying she feels it would not be right to charge when the Friends have done so much for her people.

The cows are in good condition, but not having many fresh ones yet the butter yield is low, being about twenty-five to 25 pounds per day.

The old wooden benches were taken out of the cow barn, everything carefully disinfected, and replaced with more accessible concrete ones, which are certainly a great improvement. The open weather of the winter thus far has enabled us to do quite a little plowing, ready for the spring crops.

Colds have been very prevalent, and but few, either of the family or of the pupils, have escaped; but we feel we have much to be thankful for, that we have been spared any severe illness and that all seem improving. Just within a few days, the Indians have received their annuity, which was more than usual, they receiving $6.14 per capita; this will be a help to them, if wisely spent, just in the beginning of winter.

We feel it is due the young people of the family to express our appreciation of their efforts in the social life, as well as the work-a-day life of the School. The pleasant hour or two at the close of the days of strain and stress are a pleasure and a help along the way.

The health of the Indians on the reservation has been pretty good we think, with the exception of colds, much as we have had. Some deaths have occurred and some of the family have mostly attended the funerals, as they occur. We felt keenly the death of Fred Pierce, who was a loyal friend of the Committee, the School and its workers. He passed away on the twenty-first of Tenth Month, after an illness of near six weeks with pneumonia. His calm dignity during his sickness will long be remembered by the family, who often drove down to see the patient sufferer. We feel our loss has been his gain, and that his influence is still felt in the neighborhood. During a hemorrhage which occurred about a week before his death, his wife inquired as to his feelings about his recovery, and his reply we thought beautiful, "I leave that all with God. I have given Him my life, and I want He should do with it whatever is best." Memory recalls one evening during the past vacation, when he and his wife took tea at the School. The meal over, he arose and expressed with deep feeling his gratitude for the help and strength of the Friends to him in his struggle to help his people. He also told of feeling his own weakness, for he "had been the chief of sinners," and asked that often we might pray for him and for his family, that they might be kept in the right way. His strong, rugged face down which the tears fell unheeded seems yet very fresh before us, and we thought it a season in which the Master's presence was near.

We have had helpful and pleasant visits from Susan Janney Allen, Lloyd Balderston, Ann W. Fry, Joseph Elkinton and John G. Haines.

During Tenth Month we had 3,000 young white pine trees set out on the western slope of east hill. They were five-year old trees, purchased of the Forestry Commissioner at Salamanca.

W. MIFFLIN HALL,
MARY ANNA E. HALL.

SINCE reading the editorial entitled "The Book Committee," a Friend has gone over the records of the last five meetings of that committee to see what figures might represent their activity. In that time (about a year) 857 volumes and 2,318 pamphlets have been distributed. This distribution in the main is to those seeking Friends' literature, which is a very different matter from circulation for storage.

THE first number of Present Day Papers is at hand. It contains about thirty-three pages of printed matter, including articles by Isaac Sharpless, Joan M. Fry, George A. Barton, Edward Grubb and the editor, Rufus M. Jones. The articles might all be classed as academic and their principal appeal will likely be to the increasing number of young collegians amongst us.

FRIENDS in Haddonfield, N. J., recently held a combined meeting of their local Literary Society and their branch of the Foreign Missionary Association at the home of Rebecca and Sarah Nicholson. On that occasion, Daniel Oliver entertained the company with an account of his life and work in Syria. Very many Friendly centres in our Yearly Meeting have had a similar privilege the present season.

LAST week Joseph Elkinton spent an evening at the Estauage and gave the family an account of his trip last spring to Panama.

WITHIN the past year the approach to the Haddonfield Meeting-house, which is one of the most attractive properties held by Friends, has been greatly improved by the addition of more land to the grave-yard and opportunity, or rather authority, to clear up an unsightly space just beyond their borders. A new sidewalk has been made on Friends' Avenue, while Lake Street is being widened by the borough. To facilitate the sheds have been moved further into the yard, for which compensation was made by the borough. When the grading and other improvements are completed, the general appearance of the whole meeting-house property will be much improved.

Our friend, Wm. C. Allen, located at San José, California, still continues his active work in the interests of peace. The following form of resolution is one that he has been much interested in helping to frame. Accompanying this resolution was a note signed by twenty-seven men, most of them prominent in their respective denominations; the note is one of entreaty that those who receive it may use their influence to persuade their own church officials to sign the resolution and forward it to Washington. The twenty-seven signers represent ten different denominations. The resolution referred to is as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY CONGREGATION OF

RESOLVED, That we, the congregation of the Friends of the City of Philadelphia, has learned with profound satisfaction of the resolution introduced into and passed by the House of Representatives urging our Government to co-operate with the Government of Great Britain in the effort for international action to secure a year's suspension of the naval programmes of the great powers. We also heartily commend the endorsement of such an attempt by President Wilson and Secretary of the Navy Daniels. We earnestly endorse this resolution as the solemn expression of the purpose of the American people to do everything in their power to check the present mad and non-Christian rivalry of the nations, with its menace to the world's peace, and to relieve civilization of the burden of taxation which benefits the manufacturers of armaments, but which is depleting the peoples financially and otherwise. While working for joint action to this end we ask that there shall be no increase of our naval programme. And be it further

RESOLVED, That we unequivocally endorse the many recent utterances of chambers of commerce, labor unions, and other great secular organizations, both in this country and abroad, asking for the opening of negotiations looking towards treaties of arbitration with England and other countries.

And be it further

RESOLVED, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, and to each of our United States Senators at Washington, D. C.

Signed on behalf of said congregation,

THE FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL has opened after the vacation with pleasant promises of a good term before it. The following interesting items concerning the past term have been received:

Our lecture course this year has included "A Trip Through the Tropics to Panama," by Joseph Elkinton, and "The Indians of Paraguay and Brazil," by John Hay. Both of these lectures were illustrated with lantern slides.

Through the efforts of the F. S. S. sub-chapter of the College Settlement Association, nearly $500.00 were raised and turned over at the end of the year for the use of the College Settlement in Philadelphia.

Marion Meigs, wife of the late Dr. John Meigs, for many years Head Master of the Hill School, Pottstown, Pa., spoke recently to our older girls on "The Power of Influence." A little later the same afternoon, she spoke before a meeting of our teachers and parents on "Some of the Responsibilities of Parents: A Plea for Idealism in Sex Education." She made a very strong appeal to all of us and we cannot but think the Hill School fortunate in having her inspiring and helpful leadership.

The F. S. S. Alumni Association held its annual meeting and dinner at the School on the evening of First Month 2nd. The following officers were elected for the coming year:

President:—Benjamin R. Hoffman, 1895; Vice President:—P. Donald Folwell, 1900; Secretary:—Anna Crothers, 1906; Treasurer:—C. Christopher Morris, 1900.

Directors:—A. Edgar Freeman, 1897; Harold S. Miller, 1910; Helen M. Leonhardt, 1911; C. Edwin Bartlett, 1901; Marion Crothers, 1909.

Following the dinner there were several speeches, most of them impromptu. Charles E. Gause was the principal speaker. His subject was:

"The Friends' Select School." P. Young, H. C. Young, C. E. Blodgett, W. W. Gause, and J. H. Gause were invited to make a few remarks to introduce the speaker.

Terms were announced, and the Friends' Select School was opened, whether that is the correct name or not, when the school opened on First Month 2nd.

The meeting of the Trustees, although the Friends' Select School, which they are managing, is not theirs is the Friends' School, by the Principal of the school, the readers, and all an interest in the time to time.

Friends living in Atlantic City had felt for several years that children.

In the year 1900 the Committee of the Education Department, and interested Friends. The Committee generally considered the need to provide desks and other equipment for the Meeting-house.

A Friend from Wilmington, who was a teacher in the Meeting, who was a teacher in the Meeting, was called to take charge of the Meeting.

The sub-committee, having seen the need of a resident committee, and the names of five Friends. This committee for thirteen years. Ann, who was appointed (as at first) appointed by the Board.

The school opened in Ninth Month with sixteen pupils. In two months the school of the third month, Bertha E. Jones, of which she had charge for six years in the success of the school.

The school proper, during the first year, the room and the Kindergarten in the small room were mounted upon individual platforms and room over First-days.

At the close of the first year the need of a suitable building, and the urgent necessity of a suitable building, mission to build an addition was granted by the Trustees, contributions were solicited, plans commenced. Three large rooms were provided which for a time met the requirements. At the end of the year the Kindergarten and the classroom, in conjunction with the large room.

Three years ago a member of the Committee, the basement into a gymnasium, and the addition into the whole building of the year, added greatly to the school. The school into four departments: Kindergarten, Primary, Intermediate, and Senior. Six teachers are employed, four of whom are members of the Society of Friends. At the present time is ninety-three, eight of whom have been in the school for twelve years.

From the very first the school has been a success. These have been greatly appreciated. The present courses of public lectures. The room could not accommodate the students away.

Many expressions of appreciation from the community held by the school. The national Committee for their assistance.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

The First Month Visiting Committee was with us last week, coming on Third-day evening; most of the Friends remaining until Fifth-day; there were in attendance: Charles S. Carter, Joel Cadbury, J. Henry Bartlett, Alfred C. Garrett, Walter Brinton, Elizabeth S. Smedley, Mary M. Lewis, Susanna S. Kite, Mary C. Roberts and Jane W. Bartlett; Zebecia Haines and Sarah W. Cooper were unable to be present.

We have had real winter weather during the past week; three degrees below zero was the lowest record; a high wind made it much more difficult to heat the buildings comfortably; one day (twenty-four hours) nearly nine tons of coal were consumed under two 100 H. P. boilers at the power house; naturally more is required than formerly on account of furnishing heat to the north side boys' rooms.

SKATING has been thoroughly enjoyed by most of the pupils, much of the time out of school, afternoon and evenings, though both last Seventh-day and the one preceding it, were warm until evening, necessitating a closed lake until night; this, of course was disappointing. From the standpoint of health, skating has a decided advantage over sledding, in that there are no wet feet, causing their toll in colds, to those imprudent enough not to care for them. The lake is so large that the various games played on it do not interfere with those who wish to indulge in regular skating.

The ice-house on Sixth-day evening was nearly two-thirds full of blocks about six-and-a-half inches thick; having been frozen during low temperature, it is of unusually good quality; we shall hope to continue the harvest as soon as weather conditions permit.

The lecture on last Sixth-day evening was by Charles R. Toothaker, of the Commercial Museum, West Philadelphia. Subject: "Cotton"; it was profusely illustrated by lantern slides beginning with the seed, and going through various stages including views of the interior of the great factories which make up the cotton of commerce.

A SOCCER game was played last Seventh-day on the Westtown field between a Moorestown, N. J., team and the first School team; the score was one to one, and a lively game at that.

The basket ball team played in the evening in the gymnasium between a group, mostly old scholars and the school, resulting in defeat to the latter; this game is not emphasized here as much as during some previous years.

The new house under construction on Walnut Hill for the benefit of the orchard department is painted outside and is in the hands of the plasterers; the barn foundation is still not quite finished; it is the intention that these two buildings shall be completed by Third Month 15th, in time for active field work to begin promptly on or about Fourth Month 1st.

Wm. Bacon Evans addressed the boys in collection First-day evening concerning human reasoning as compared with Divine guidance; he read portions of numerous poems and sonnets from different authors bearing on the subject. Ethel L. Cary spoke to the girls on self-indulgence and self-control; it was full of practical helps, giving warnings concerning many practices to be avoided in order to become good and noble women.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A FRIEND and valued subscriber desires to find the poem from which the following lines are taken:

"Till all things sweet and good,
Shall seem my natural habitude"

The observation that the lines apply to our lamented Edwin P. Sewell seems to us fully justified.—Ed.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Washington of the 12th says: Secretaries of the Department of Commerce have discovered that the loss in cotton production, due to the boll weevil, has totaled 10,000,000 bales. Placing a value of only $70 on each bale, the monetary loss reaches the huge sum of half a billion dollars. The actual loss, however, would be very much above even that stupendous figure, for, as pointed out by Director Harris, the loss resulting to him in the failure of farmers to plant cotton because of the fear of the boll weevil never can be estimated."

It was reported from Bristol, Pa., on the 12th inst.: "A Health and Happiness League has been formed here with a membership of more than 260 children. Classes have been formed in which nursing, sewing and domestic economy will be taught. There will also be a class for Boy Scouts. Each member of the league found guilty of using profane language will be reported to the leader of his class, have a trial, and if found guilty will be expelled from the organization."

The Bureau of Health of this city has issued a bulletin advising the public against pneumonia. It says: "Pneumonia thrives in cold weather, not because cold weather in itself causes this or any other disease, but because in cold weather people seal themselves up tightly indoors in an effort to keep warm—to the dangerous exclusion of pure, fresh air, so necessary for health. As soon as we have the kind of weather in which uninformed and indiscreet people do this, we have the evil effect shown in a rapid increase in the number of deaths from pneumonia. Don't forget that good general health, maintained at a high standard by right living, is the best possible safeguard against pneumonia or any other infectious or contagious disease."

A despatch from Denver, Col., says: "For the first time in Colorado, cancer has been cured by radium treatment. The treatment was applied by Dr. J. P. Kelly, with the radium in bromide form obtained from the Colorado School of Mines. Doctor Kelly declares that since the application of the treatment all inflammation has disappeared and the patient is in perfect condition."

It was stated from Trenton on the 12th inst.: "The problem of stocking New Jersey with game has been virtually solved by the satisfactory results obtained at the State game farm at Forked River. The Commission says that a good supply of fish is assured by reason of the distribution of 4,000,000 fish in the streams of the State last year and 800,000 more at the fish hatchery near Hackettstown. The enforcement of the Federal law protecting migratory birds will undoubtedly have good effect the Commission believes, and so increase the game of the State that the threatened extermination of many species will be averted."

The recent order of Secretary Houston, of the Department of Agriculture, prohibiting the importation of potatoes because of foreign potato diseases, makes timely statistics just prepared by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce showing the imports and exports of this food product for a long term of years. Since 1900 there have been imported virtually 37,000,000 bushels against 16,000,000 bushels exported. The high record importation was in 1912, when 13,750,000 bushels came in, following a short crop here in the calendar year 1911. Of these 12,500,000 bushels came from Scotland, Ireland and England.

A despatch from New York City of the 12th inst. says: "Mayor John Purroy Mitchell to-day fired a blast that virtually completed the greatest waterway in the world. The last formidable barrier in the Catskill aqueduct was removed and the tunnel opened through which 700,000,000 gallons of water daily is to pour into this city. Completion of the system, the Mayor said, would remove all possibility of the city of New York ever suffering a water famine. It was said the average supply would be more than 100 gallons of water daily for each person in the city."

It is stated from Washington that the House Good Roads Committee has reported a bill appropriating $25,000,000 Government funds for assistance to the States in the construction of good roads. Apportionment to the States is to be made on a basis of population, acreage and rural mileage. Each State is to appropriate for roads annually an amount equal to that allotted to it by the Government.

It is mentioned that United States Senators Kenyon, of Iowa, and Pomerene, of Ohio, and Governor Cox, of Ohio, have joined in urging a nation-wide campaign against hog cholera, to be started by a congressional appropriation of at least $1,000,000. Both of the Senators favor the appropriation to eradicate a scourge estimated as causing an annual loss of more than $40,000,000.

It is stated from Chicago that a new field of endeavor is to be invaded by women with the change contemplated by the Illinois Central Railroad. Gate-men, the employes who have collected, pinched and criticized tickets, are to be replaced by gatewomen. The women will be uniformed and entrusted with the same duties now performed by the men.

President Wilson has issued an appeal to the American people, as president of the American Red Cross, for funds to assist the people of Japan, who are suffering not only from the earthquake, but from the failure of crops. The President's appeal is as follows: "Our sister nation of Japan is suffering from two very serious disasters. The failure of crops in the northeastern part of that country has brought hundreds of thousands of persons face to face with the terrible misery of slow starvation, and in the southwestern island of Kyushu a sudden great volcanic eruption has carried death and desolation to large numbers in a thickly populated district. I appeal to the humanity of our American people that they may give expression to their sympathy for the suffering and distress of so many of their fellow-men by generous contributions for their aid. Such contributions can be made to the local Red Cross treasurers or sent directly to the American Red Cross, Washington, D. C."

A despatch from Boston of the 18th says: "Records show it is many years since such havoc was wrought among vessels of the coastwise fleet as that following the blizzard along the New England coast last week. The gale wrecked one steamship, six schooners and a barge, according to the record of disasters up to today. Numerous other vessels suffered severe damage and were left little short of wrecks. The property loss is estimated at nearly a million dollars. Only one life was lost, while 161 persons were brought safely to shore."

It is stated that last year the American farmers lost $1,250,000,000 through the depredations of insects according to figures compiled by the Department of Agriculture. Much of that loss was suffered in the South.

Many cases of total blindness will be prevented by the operation of the new State law requiring every case of inflammation of the eyes of infants to be reported to health authorities by the physician or midwife attending at childbirth. Immediate medical attention for the child is also provided for. Director Joseph S. Neff, in his weekly health bulletin, lays emphasis on the fact that 30 per cent. of the cases of total blindness in this city have their origin in inflammation of the eyes at the time of birth.

A despatch from Garden City, Kansas, says: "Forty sections of land have been purchased for several hundred Russians when the Santa Fe Railroad plans to colonize here. In the first party of eight families there were 27 persons. The immigrants are brought direct from the fatherland, and each family has at least $1000 more than is needed to pay for the land."

FOREIGN.—A despatch of the 12th inst. from Paris says: "Central Europe is experiencing the most severe winter in a generation. The blizzards of a fortnight ago, after abating somewhat, seem to have returned with renewed vigor. In Eastern Russia 150 deaths from the cold were officially reported yesterday and stories of peasants devoured by wolves are numerous. St. Petersburg is in the grip of a three-foot snowfall, with communication almost cut off and food supplies low."

A despatch from Sofia, in Bulgaria, says: "A striking illustration of the terrible human waste in war is furnished by the census taken of the new Bulgarian territories acquired by conquest. The male population of that portion of Macedonia allotted to Bulgaria was reduced during hostilities from 175,000 to 42,500. In Bulgarian Thrace, only 225,000 males remain out of a total before the war of 494,000, while in the district of Mustapha Pasha, where fighting raged long and fiercely, only 4000 males are left out of 33,000."

It was stated from New York City on the 14th inst. that arrangements for the importation into this country of thousands of tons of beef and other meat products from the Argentine Republic, Australia and New Zealand have been completed by a syndicate of American capitalists, whose identity has not been disclosed. The syndicate has leased for 21 years, with privileges of renewal, four large warehouses with an extensive water front, giving facilities for steamship piers and railroad connections. The entire property to be utilized will be about 16 acres.

Earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and tidal waves, with consequent destruction of property and loss of life, has called the attention of the civilized world to the plight of Japan. The need of relief is augmented by the failure of the crops in the northern part of the Island Empire, which has already taxed to the utmost the resources of the Government. It is reported from Tokio that Kagoshima, last week a prosperous city of 60,000, is in ruins. Even stone buildings collapsed under the weight of the hot ashes. Nearly all of the industrial and business concerns escaped.

A despatch from Paris of the 18th says: "We should not be the worst cold snap in 50 years holds southwestern Europe in a tight grip. Temperatures are low as far below zero. Fahrénheit. have been registered by the Department of Hautes-Loire, where conditions are steadily growing worse. All the canals and rivers of Belgium are frozen, and hundreds of barges with coal from Germany are stranded. Three hundred lighters in Antwerp harbor are frozen in."

RHOADS LEATHER BELTING

If a belt breaks and stops the machine you know something of the trouble, but hardly anybody knows how great the loss.

If a belt stretches and stretches, you know the bother, but who knows the loss from reduced speed and output?

Rhoads Belts require few take-ups. They are so thoroughly stretched in the making. They give uncommonly long service, chiefly because of our toughening process and skillful assortment of the leather to admit no piece that would make a weak spot.

Our booklet "Efficient Belt Service" gives striking evidence from the experience of users. Let us send it to you and also a sample of our Tannate Lace Leather. It is a great stop-saver.

THE EVEN BALANCE.

"Holding truth in an even balance" is a very familiar phrase in Friendly circles. It represents at once an attainment and an ideal. The attainment is fairly general in the Society, self-possession and a judicial temper being specified as Quaker characteristics. Those on the other hand who consciously hold it as an ideal, probably feel that only by tireless effort can they maintain their standard, so prone is human nature to quick judgments and to prejudice. Some consideration of the even balance as an ideal and of means better to realize it in human conduct is the subject proposed for discussion in what follows.

The laws of evidence, particularly as they relate to judicial decisions, have often been said to present the most difficult part of the study of the law. Even in professional circles, however, a mere mastery of the laws of evidence will not guarantee the judicial point of view. Were it otherwise a general public would be more willing to let lawyers solve their difficulties without an appeal to a court or to a judge. The "even balance" in the world of ordinary affairs thus not only represents the very apex of a highly elaborated system which is classed as one of the learned professions, but is also regarded as a very special gift. As an introduction then to any inquiry concerning the attainment of the "even balance" in our individual characters, it is well to reflect upon what is involved in the process of judging upon the purely human plane. If by methods of quiet introversion and self-possession, we can acquire a measure of the judicial character it is well. We can, however, be quite sure that this intuitive character does not come upon any in violation of well-established laws. In the apostle's representation of the case "some by nature do the things of the law", but this in no wise discredits the law or a conscious effort to learn the law.

Probably nothing is more fundamental in treating evidence than the entirely patent fact that it must be gathered, must be heard, must be digested before we actually make a decision. How full of tragedy the world is because there are so many cases judged before they are fully heard! The first requirement then to attain the "even balance" at which we aim is a habit of seeking and weighing evidence. In one of the great business houses of Philadelphia a young man found himself in a clerkship located for his work near the head of the firm. Day by day dozens of persons sought interviews with this chief of many departments and responsible employer of scores of workmen. A few brief moments of courteous hearing was almost always granted to the callers and then assurances of fair consideration generally terminated these calls. So rarely was a decision reached at once that the young observer became aware that he had before him a spectacle of a most valuable business method. Those who presented projects of doubtful merit rarely appeared a second time, those who were not afraid to face the results of an investigation would come back to find that it had been made and that the proprietor's judg-

FROM the minutes of North Carolina Yearly Meeting of Friends held at Cedar Grove, Woodland, Northampton Co., N. C.:

We have been dipped into a deep sense of our responsibilities as members of this body. If we are to feed the flock of God we must first have a supply ourselves of the Heavenly food. We cannot feed out that which we have not.

If we are "the salt of the earth," as our dear Saviour described his followers to be, we must submit to the preparing hand of God, be willing to have all the impurities purged away in order that we may become fit for use.

We were afresh entreated, as much as in us lies, to attend all our meetings, to so shape our business affairs as to be able to do this, and to tenderly admonish such as are remiss in this duty. Whether we are light-bearers or those who care for the lights, we are alike dependent on our Heavenly Father for the necessary ability to perform aright our part of the work.

While we value very highly rightly anointed ministry, prayer and praise, we feel that these spring forth from true, silent worship. Therefore we were afresh reminded of the importance when gathered in outward silence, of an inward engagement of each individual, as saveth the prophet, "Be still and know that I am God," and again, "Keep silence before me, O islands, and let the people renew their strength, let them come near, then let them speak, let us come near together to judgment." It is in the true silence, from books and speech and men apart, we may come to the still witness of the heart.

The sweetness of true unity was dwelt upon, and the words of the Psalmist revived, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments." When real unity, the anointing love of God, exists in this body it extends, as it were, to the skirts of the garment, the whole meeting feels it. It is like "the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore."

Then let none of us dwell unduly upon our weaknesses, but let us rather forget the things which are behind; and, stretching forward unto the things which are before, "Press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

Oh that each of us may be clothed with humility as with a garment, for, "The meek will He guide in judgment; and the meek will He teach his way." Yea, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

ment was at least based on his consideration of evidence. Very unlike this is the method in forming many of our private opinions. Perhaps in no direction is a contrary practice better illustrated than in the average parents' judgment of teachers or of schools. Their point of contact is through a child or through children who add to an immaturity of view the impulsiveness of strong feelings. So we have sweeping approval or severe condemnation without any adequate ground for either. As familiar as the old Greek fable is, constantly in our everyday life we are misled by the man who would sell us a house by submitting a sample brick. There is of course nothing that is not commonplace in these considerations. The only possible point in reviving them here is to question whether just such simple facts are not fundamental in developing the subtle quality of human character that we have in mind when we say a person is one who seems "to hold truth in an even balance".

The larger relationships of this quality of "the even balance" to our Society as a whole are not so simple and not so easily attained as we might suppose. The failures of our two hundred years have mostly been failures of "balance". George Fox was very soon called upon to deal with Ranters, and that trouble in some form has been with us ever since, for what were Ranters but those who exaggerated the doctrine of guidance to the point of depreciating the guidance of any one but themselves? In matters of doctrine as well as of practice the same thing has ever been true. We have had no division and no difference in which some principle—true enough in its proper relationships—has not been misapplied, and often made to distort our whole system of "godly doctrine".

The serious question, the only question worth raising, is how as individuals and as a Society we are to maintain the "even balance of truth". It is well for us to remember all that is involved in forming the judicial temper, as indicated above, and to cultivate as much as possible the habit of seeking evidence and of sifting it. We are quite inexcusable not to exercise our gifts and our faculties in this direction to the limit of our opportunity. With all this done we may still be impulsive and one-sided. The mistakes of our past have been mistakes on the human plane. Often instruments that have been "highly favored" in some directions have made these mistakes. One thing we can say about them all. By these mistakes they have misrepresented Him in whom is fullness of wisdom and knowledge. The whole situation, the whole question, is how to secure the "fullness". At every hand it is whispered that these are critical times—that many changes have come upon us—that many are coming. Knowledge is much more diffused than it was. Religious records are weighed and tested and compared. Truth is challenged at every turn. There is danger of losing the balance even in resisting these upheavals. One refuge, however, is un-failing: Jesus Christ as an experience, confirming Jesus Christ revealed in all the Scriptures, is the fullness of our knowledge, however little, however poor, that knowledge is—the fullness of our wisdom though we be "as babes". If we can keep under this power we shall be safe. If we are led astray we are led away from Him. So while at first thought it may not seem like a very definite solution of the questions raised in regard to the "even balance", the final word on this subject—it is a word to each of us rather than from us—is that it is involved in the reality of our Christian experience. As individuals, as a Society, we shall regain our balance where it is lost, maintain it where we have any favor that way, by a growing life of an actual Christian experience. John Henry Jowett has said the Gospel is the greatest executive force ever known in the world of affairs. In seconding this view we would supplement it and say the Gospel is also the greatest judicial force in the world. In either case, however, it must be that the Gospel shall claim the whole of ourselves—body, soul and spirit, or we shall fall short of the completeness that was in Him who made the Gospel a living fact.

J. H. B.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE CHRISTIAN ARMOR.

"For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

The Apostle, being made a witness of the overthrow of the kingdom of Satan within himself, through the powerful operation of the spirit of the living God, and knowing the wiles of an unwearied enemy, was constrained to counsel his brethren. He failed not to warn them of the dangers that lay in their way, by no means assuring them of an easy conquest over the powers of darkness, but rather apprising them of the exceeding strength of the enemies they had to oppose, under a sense of which he in another epistle enjoins them to put on the whole armor of God, that they may be able to stand against the wiles of the Devil. "Stand therefore having your loins girt about with Truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of Peace, above all taking the shield of faith, where-with ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked." He also felt the necessity of minding closely his own standing, lest after having preached to others he should become a castaway. When we consider the many things at the present day, to draw us aside from a steadfastness in the Truth, the many paths that would entice the feet of the unwary traveler, which at first view seem to deviate but little from the path of safety, but which bring those who pursue them to the chambers of death, how exceedingly vigilant and watchful we ought to be. Otherwise he who by his arts prevailed over our first parents, and who from that day to the present time, has been unrelenting in his efforts to allure to destruction the children of men may succeed in inducing us to believe that things are better with us than they really are. Thus will he lull us into a fancied security, obtain an easy victory over us, and lead us captive at his will.

It was through a remarkable display of Divine power that our forefathers in religious profession were raised up to be a people—and were enabled steadfastly to uphold the standard of righteousness in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation. And though there may seem at the present time to be but little suffering required or attendant upon walking in the Truth, if we are so favored as to have our eyes anointed with the eye-salve of the kingdom, we shall see the standard which has been given us to display, because of the truth and the depth to which we as a people have fallen in the midst of a day of easy profession of the name of Christ. If we would be His true disciples we must leave all and follow Him. "Ye are they who have continued with me in my temptations and I appoint unto you a kingdom even as My Father hath appointed unto Me" was the language of our Lord addressed to His despised disciples. The same language will doubtless be applicable to such in this day as are found faithful to Him, preferring to dwell with His lowly seed even though under oppression, to being made in any degree partakers of a false rest or rejoicing which they cannot feel to be from Him.

Let us then "gird up the loins of our minds, watch and be sober," and in a time of mournful degeneracy from the life and power of Godliness be duly awakened and brought to a sense of the dangers which attend us, lest unhappily we should sleep the sleep of death and by disregarding the day of our visitation, the things which belong to our peace be forever hidden from our eyes.

The Lord will have a tried people. "I have refined thee but not with silver, I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction." And if it is our happy privilege to be of this number it must be by yielding ourselves to His Divine disposal. Thus shall we be made willing to suffer whatever He may permit to come upon us for our allegiance to His cause. Though His way may be in the sea and His path in the great waters, yet in His adorable mercy He will still condescend safely to lead His humble dependent and obedient children. "For the Lord's portion is His people, Jacob is the lot of His inheritance. He found him in a desert land in a waste howling wilderness. He led him about, He instructed him, He kept him as the apple of His eye. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings, so the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange God with him."

The Lord is the same. His power is the same. He changeth not, His glory will He not give to another, nor His praise to graven images. As in days past, He preserved Daniel in the lion's den, and the faithful three in the burning fiery furnace, even so He is now able to sustain His poor afflicted yet faithful children, so as not to suffer a hair of their heads to be harmed, while standing for His testimony. And as they follow Him who is their spiritual Moses the Lord from Heaven. He will give them victory over all their enemies, and strengthen them to put to flight the armies of the aliens by means of weapons which are not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God. Thus shall be brought into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ, to whom, with the eternal Father, be given all worship, all honor, and all praise both now and forever.

Voldemar Kruglak is living at Thrums, B. C., near the Community Doukhobors and claims to be an Independent Doukhobor. He addressed me because Peter Verigin gave him to translate a letter which I wrote to Peter last spring in response to the latter's letter to me, accompanying a copy of the book mentioned above, as protesting against the Canadian Government.

This letter evidently set V. Kruglak to thinking, so he withdrew from Peter. He tells his own story so well I shall quote from his letter dated a month ago (Eleventh Month 26, 1913).

"Your welcome letter, in which you express your honest opinion about Peter Verigin, ruler and deceiver of Doukhobors, to hand. I read your letter with great interest and satisfaction. I read it to the Independent and to some Community Doukhobors and it did make a deep impression. I would like to translate it into Russian and include it among other 'human documents' I am gathering.

"From the Russian literature I know how your father and Friends generally were interested in the welfare of unfortunate Doukhobors; how you tried to help them materially and spiritually. And I can tell you that all the Doukhobors with whom I come in contact and spoke about their early days in Canada remembered the kindness to them of all Friends and especially of the brotherly love and affection showed to them by your father, who certainly was a big-hearted man.

"I am sure that the memory of your father will go from one generation of Doukhobors to another.

"It is a great tragedy that the Doukhobors should suffer for their ideals and escape the tyranny of the Russian Government only to be deceived and exploited by their shrewd, heartless despot Peter, who combines in himself the power of Tzar and 'holiness' of the Pope."

V. Kruglak was brought into sympathy with the non-militant principle of the Doukhobors by reading Count Tolstoy's writings. He separated from the Russian-Greek Church and came by way of England to New York City, where he became naturalized, and published some books in the Russian language, e. g., "A Guide to Russian Tourists and Emigrants to America," and acted as correspondent for certain Russian newspapers. He became acquainted with Peter Verigin five years ago by correspondence and also with V. Chertkoff, who idealized Peter Verigin's leadership. In 1912 he resolved to join the Doukhobor settlement in British Columbia—removing thither with his wife and three little boys after first making a visit of inspection. He had read much about the "back to land movement" and was well satisfied by the conditions he found in the Northwest as to farming. He says: "I have spent with Peter Verigin ten days, as his personal guest. He kept entertaining me and I went with him through several settlements.

"I could not come into contact with the masses (of the Doukhobors), being always surrounded by Peter's lieutenants, I did not see the real conditions of their life. But I was disappointed not to see any schools in their settlements.

"When I came back to New York I wrote Verigin that I believed in educating my children and that I would come to British Columbia to live near the Doukhobors, but independently. I moved to Brilliant, B. C., with my family and lived for one month in their largest settlement. This time I had the opportunity to see the life of the Doukhobors through my own spectacles! I had worked two months in Verigin's main office where I learned many horrible things about Verigin's 'methods.' I found that the Doukhobors are living in the worst kind of slavery. Then I moved a mile away and openly revolted against Peter. I have gathered from different sources valuable information, documents, facts, 'ukases' of Peter to his people, photographs, etc., and I have nearly finished a book about this Peter Verigin and his down-trodden, illiterate slaves, the Doukhobors, which I wish to print in Russian, although I have no means to publish my work at my own risk and expense.

"At present I do my best to enlighten English and Russian readers about the real Peter Verigin and I have published several strong articles about him in the Canadian and Russian press.

"I also started a campaign to compel Peter Verigin to establish schools in Doukhobor settlements here and I think I will succeed in this. If I had the means I would print here weekly Russian bulletins with the object to enlighten the Community Doukhobors and to advocate his removal from his position as an autocrat.

"Also it is necessary to do some missionary work among the Independent Doukhobors, for instance—their children are receiving certain knowledge in the local English schools, but they are growing without any religious ideals. Their parents also do not follow the old religion of the Doukhobors and do not adopt any new ideals. Now as the principles of the Friends are the nearest to the traditions and teaching of the Doukhobors it would be a good plan to translate into simple Russian a history and teachings of the Friends' Society and distribute it among all the Doukhobors.

"Here at Thrums, B. C., are hundreds of Independent Doukhobors struggling for existence, as they did not receive a cent from P. Verigin (when they left the Community). They are good, sober, hard-working people.

"They badly need here a social center, a library of good books, night school for adults, co-operative store and also a place for religious meetings. Their little five-acre farms are not paid for yet! Then, again, if we could assist somehow those who wish to leave the 'Verigin Society' there would be few left in his Community.

"Peter Verigin, here in British Columbia, is legally and actually a sole owner of everything, even of the cheap cotton pants which he gives to every Doukhobor once in a year.

"He collects all the earnings of the Doukhobors.

"In conclusion, allow me to thank you and all Friends for remembering my unfortunate countrymen, the Doukhobors. And I do hope that the Truth and Freedom will be victorious after all.

"The many Doukhobors to whom I read your letter, had asked me to send to you and to your venerable mother and family their brotherly love and best wishes as well as to the Friends.

"You are welcome to use my letters at your discretion for your esteemed paper, THE FRIEND; only I beg you to improve my spelling and syntax as I got my English by self-education. I will be glad to receive a copy of your paper.

"The thinking majority of Doukhobors fully realize and appreciate all your Friends have been doing for their sake; and I have met boys who were educated in schools supported by Friends.

"I believe that the Doukhobors will be saved only by education and by education of their children. There are already, as I told you, about 3000 men, women and children who have left the Doukhobor Society and become law-abiding citizens of Canada, and even of the Doukhobors in the Community, the majority are for education of their children. About two years ago Peter gave his consent to open an English-Russian school at Brilliant, B. C., and there was not enough room to accommodate all the children, whose parents were glad to have them taught in school. Verigin saw that eagerness and after six months closed school for good!

"But I was assured by a high official that the British Columbia Government now clearly understands that P. V. alone is responsible, and to meet the situation in the coming Legislature there will be introduced a special act which will help the Government to establish schools in Doukhobor settlements.

"It is very sad indeed to see the rising generation of Doukhobors as Peter sends his young men to work for him outside, in saw mills, at camps, among the worst kind of 'Lumber Jacks' or on the railroad gangs with the low-class Italians. They soon learn to discard the old ideals for new vices. They learn to drink, smoke and to use profane language!

"Among this younger generation I would like to do some missionary-educational work—to translate and distribute religious, temperance and other literature, which you and Friends will send me. Also to fight superstitious belief in Peter Verigin.

"From time to time P. V. tries the faith in him among his followers. Last year he commanded that all women and girls should cut their hair short and they did it. Just now P. V. made more severe command:—all men, women and children must every Sunday walk in the snow to meeting-house barefooted.

"P. V. after walking barefoot in snow took at home a warm bath as preventative, but many of his ignorant followers caught severe colds and are now sick in bed."

One of the Doukhobors whom I met in Saskatchewan, eleven years ago, writes me recently: "Your letter was read by my younger son, who is ten years old and who is in the third year of the English school. He reads and writes English nicely, as well as his sister, who is fourteen years old. Five years ago I left the Society of Peter Verigin ruined, just like others who left and who, leaving now, are penniless. I thank you very much that you have always in your letters advised me to go away from the brutal despot, Peter Verigin, who prevents the people from seeing light. Although I had a very hard time after I left his society, I thank God that I left it then not now."

"Here in British Columbia the Doukhobors are in such (sad) condition, for when they are leaving the Community Peter Verigin does not give them a cent.

"The deceived Doukhobors and recorded all the lands and everything in his name only . . . but in spite of it people love freedom even when they are exhausting themselves in the struggle for existence. The Doukhobors under Peter are in real bondage as slaves."

"He commanded them to build large houses like the military barracks in Russia. In each house there are 40-50 people.

"Inconvenience and congestion in the houses lead to quarrels and sickness, and Verigin has forbidden medical aid, as he also forbids education of children, which is most harmful to the Doukhobors.

"Voldemar Kruglak has lived about seven months among the Verigin people, studying them thoroughly, and he convinced himself that if benevolent people would not help the Doukhobors to be freed from P. Verigin's bondage, he will oppress them for long time to come.

"The struggle with Peter is necessary. Now, I wanted to ask you, my dear brother Joseph, knowing your aspiration to bring light into all dark corners of the world, is it not necessary to oppose Verigin? I ask you to submit this question before the Friends' Society.

"In the opinion of V. Kruglak to free the people and to show them the road of civilization it is necessary to give them a literature and V. Kruglak has ability for it, but it is necessary to have means for printing and distribution among Doukhobors in the Community.

"My good neighbors would gladly give assistance, but we are unable, as upon our backs did not yet heal the wounds firstly made by the Russian Government and afterward by Peter Verigin.

"All the Doukhobors remember your help and wish forever to be your thankful friends, but P. Verigin puts obstacles to it."

From the above it seems as if an opportunity was once more extended to Friends to aid in the enlightenment of this benighted, but honest-hearted people. Peter Verigin himself gives us the clue. Their enlightenment means their emancipation.

Concerning marriages the following occurs:

.....
 —that no reproach arise, or occasion be given, by any intemperance or immoderate Feasting, or drinking, or by any unfeemly wanton discoursing or Actions; But that all Behave wth such modesty & Sobriety as becomes a People fearing God—and in order thereunto & for y^e assistance of these Immediately concern'd, let there be two Men Fr^{ds} & two Women Fr^{ds} appointed by y^e Monthly meeting where y^e Marriage is allowed, to attend y^e same, & take care as much as in them Lies that all be done & that all behave as is above advi'd, and if by them or any other Fr any thing to the contrary is observ'd, that they speedily or as soon as with conveniency & decency they can take such aide as make such breach upon good order, Moderation or Modesty & in Brotherly Love & tenderneſs admonish & Caution them to a better behaviour & to be more watchfull of their Words & actions; & that y^e s^d Fr^{ds} do make report to the Next Monthly Meeting, whether this advice concerning y^e decent & orderly management be observed or not.

 And whereas at some Burials where People come some considerable distance, there may be Occasion of some refreshment, yet let that be done wth such moderation, & y^e behaviour of all Fr^{ds} be with such gravity, & Solitude as becomes y^e occasion, & if any appears otherwise let them be reprov'd & dealt wth as is advi'd in case of misbehaviour or indecencies at Marriages; & it may be further noted that any Excess in this case & y^e making so solemn a Time, as this ought to be & really is its own Nature to appear as a festival must be Burdensome & grievous to y^e sober Christian which will of Course be Under a far different Exercie—at such times Fr^{ds} are desired therefore to have great care herein, & use all endeavours everywhere more & more to break off, from & avoid that offensive & unfuitable Custom of Large provisions of strong Drink, Cakes, &c.—y^e formal & repeated servings & offers thereof, this indecent & indirect custom & practice hath run to such excess that invitations being made to greater numbers than their own Neighbours Houses can contain, y^e very streets & open Places are made use of, for y^e handing about Burnt Wine & other strong Liquors besides y^e indecency above mentioned.

In the "Yearly Meeting Epistle from Burlington from Penna. & y^e Jerseys from y^e 15th to y^e 10th of 7th moth, 1722," the following advice is given:

That, Fr^s beware of any Imprudent, noisy & Indecent behaviour in Markets & other Publick places. For it is degrading to us as men of common Civility, & greatly unbecoming y^e Professors of Christianity. The awful Prudent & Watchfull conduct of our Fr^s in early days, did, & such always will, Preach loudly & extend Silently to y^e notice of many.

That, Fr^s keep their Authority of all their meetings in y^e Wisdom of God & unity of his Spirit, & keep out of all Contentions & Personal Reflections & Smitings. Also, keep down & out of all Heats, Passions, & doubtful disputations, & suffer no turbulent Contentious Quarrelsome Person among you in ordering y^e affairs of Truth, that y^e same may be managed in y^e Peaceable & tender Spirit & Wisdom of Jesus Christ, wth Decency, Forbearance, Love & Charity to one another.

The following paragraphs are extracts from sundry Epistles which are to be regarded as Discipline.

Yearly Meeting Epistle, Philad^a, 7th moth, 1723.

Whereas by y^e last years Epistle from London. It is advised That Parents who have Children to give in Marriage may not make it their chief care to obtain for them large Portions & Settlements of Marriages, But rather be careful that their Child^r be joynd in Marriage with Perfons of Religious Inclinations, Suitable Disposition, Temper, Sobriety of Manner & Diligent in their Business, which are things Essentially necessary to a Comfortable Life in a Married State.

As to what is Propos'd from Phila. Quarterly Meet. that none among Fr^s may apply to any Person pretending foreknowledge for y^e discovery of hidden things. Tis y^e direction of this meeting that there be a Caution in y^e Epistle to y^e Quarterly & Monthly meets against all such mean & detestible Practices.

And by y^e same Epistle is recommended That such Fr^s as are concern'd in y^e affairs of y^e Church, at Quarterly, Monthly or Particular Meetings, be careful to act therein in y^e Wisdom of God, whereby they may be Exemplary to the Young, who may be Esteemed Members thereof & attend the same: And as such Young Perfons are found to be Qualified with a real sense of Truth on their Spirits, & subjection thereunto, & thereby made capable to come up to a service in their respective Meetings; Fr^s are desired to Encourage & bring them forward therein, whereby they may be helpful to y^e Antients.

By y^e foregoing it may be observ'd how young people ought to be Qualified to act in our Meetings for Discipline. Now that all our youth may be fitted for that Service: It is y^e advice of this Meeting, that Parents & Guardians watch over their Children & train them up in y^e fear of God, & bring them to Meetings of Worship, causing them to behave themselves orderly therein; & when they Arrive to a Capacity of acting in y^e affairs of Truth, Let them be Encouraged to come up in their respective services.

And as such young People as have been educated in y^e way of Truth & make Profession with us, if they do not Continue in welldoing, but frequent scandalous or Tipling Houses & Delight in Evils & vain Company & Communication or shall use Gaming, or Drink to Excess or Behave Rudely, or such like Enormities, or shall Decline our plain way of speech or imitate y^e Vain antic Mod^s & Customs of y^e Times, the men wth their extravagant Wigs, & Hatts set up in three Corners, & y^e Women with their Immodest Dresses & other Indecencies mentioned in the Epistles of caution against Pride, &c., It is our advice & Earnest desire, That Parents & Guardians, whilst such Youth are under their Tuition, do retram them & not Indulge, nor maintain them in such Pride & extravagance.

It is also to be observ'd, That y^e God & Fountain of all our Mercies has opened & is Opening in divers of our young People a Divine Spring of Living Ministry, therefore our Earnest desire is that both Ministers & Elders may be as Nursing Fathers & Mothers to those that are young in y^e Ministry; & with all care & diligence advide & admonish them; & if they see Occasion reprove them in a Tender & Christian Spirit; observing y^e Rules of our Discipline & Counsel of Fr^s in that respect, as also exhort them frequently to read y^e Holy Scriptures & earnestly to seek y^e mind of y^e Spirit of Truth to open y^e Mysteries of those Holy Writings, & as they keep in y^e Patience & submission to y^e will of God, & stand Faithfull & abide in y^e Simplicity of y^e Gospel & be Exercised in their Proper Gifts, keeping down to y^e Openings of divine Love & Life in themselves, they will witness a gradual growth & be contented to wait for it in y^e Will of God, & not Strive to extend their Declaration further then they find y^e Life & Power of God to bear them.

And we further advide in Tender Love, that all Fr^s when they come to religious Worship may know a Travel & right Exercise of Spirit, which will drive away all drowsiness & Indisposition of mind, so will God have y^e Worship of his own Establishing, which is Perform'd in Spirit & Truth, y^e Rewards of w^{ch} are Life & Peace. But those that give Way to a heavy, Sleepy Spirit, are as Spots & Blemishes in our Feasts of Charity & Hindrances to y^e Weak, as well as great Weights & Burdens to y^e Faithfull, & are giving renewed Evidence against themselves of their disregard to y^e Worship of God by doing his Work Negligently.

"ALL THINGS WORK TOGETHER."

Don't get confused, bewildered, disheartened. Remember it says, "All things work together." Your pathway may be lined with thorns sometimes. Don't get discouraged.—you will enter the ways of light and peace and joy a little later on. You may now and then wander in dark valleys where ragged rocks and threatening clouds hang over you, and where the most malignant testings of your strength of heart and your strength of character assail you. Don't be discouraged. You will soon come out upon the delightful uplands of God's love and favor where every thing will minister to your faith and your hope and your joy. The thorns and the beetling rocks and the threatening clouds and the dark valley's seem necessary in bringing into greater relief the "delectable mountains" of God's light and favor,—as the dark and somber spots in a landscape are necessary to the grandeur and splendid beauty of the scene. It is not one thing alone, it is all things "together" that make our Christian lives glorious and the final outcome "Good." The hard things and the dark things cover only a very small part of life after all. To hear the old veteran relate his experiences you might suspect that he had spent half his life in the midst of the smoke and thunder and death and hell of battle. But by careful inquiry you discover that he was in the war only a couple of years, and was actually under fire only a very few times. All the rest of his life has been filled with peace and joy and good fellowship. O, those dreary days of darkness and death! It seemed that God's heart of love had stopped beating in sympathy with us! But how few those days were in comparison with the hundreds and hundreds of days that have been flooded with light and love and joy unpeakable. Of course, a few black threads run through the loom of each of our lives. If we look only at those black threads the pattern will not be very pleasing. But if we study the combined effects of the many silver threads of joy and the many golden threads of love with those few scattering somber threads of sorrow and suffering,—we can see more clearly the meaning of the little text, "All things work together for good to them that love God." G. R. SMITH, in Baptist Commonwealth.

MALVERN, PA.

WILLIAM WHEELER.

SON OF DANIEL B. WHEELER.

Under Second Month 16, 1834. To her aunt, Sarah wrote: "William desires his love to thee, he would have liked to add something, but all the exertion of which his feeble frame is capable, is devoted to the concern of which he has the management, and the weight of which is at present so great as to weigh him down with care. The loss of the foreman of course adds to this, and Charles's confinement also removes for the time an invaluable helper. Happily we have all one Helper who can never be removed." We obtain a glimpse into the work in which Daniel Wheeler, his coadjutors and successors, were engaged by a paragraph in the Appendix to his Memoirs, viz: "The land placed under Daniel Wheeler's care in 1818 consisted chiefly of certain parcels in the immediate vicinity of Petersburg, the cultivation of which to private enterprise appeared impracticable, on account of their barrenness or their marshy nature. At the time of D. W.'s departure in 1832, about three thousand English acres were in full cultivation, on part of which fifteen farms had been established, varying in extent from thirty-five to one hundred and five acres each. About 2700 acres more had been drained, the cultivation being either left to other hands, or was in progress, when D. W. resigned his appointment. Besides the improvement thus effected in the neighborhood of the capital, the most satisfactory evidence of the utility of the undertaking had been afforded by the extensive adoption of various implements and methods of culture heretofore unknown in Russia, and by the consideration which agriculture and rural economy in general had obtained. The suggestion of letting out land to free tenants had not met with all the success that could have been desired." Prior to this, Stephen Grellet tells us in his Journal: "The Emperor Alexander had employed some persons to drain extensive morasses near this city (of Petersburg), but they did not understand their business, and sought only to make money, so that under various pretences they expended considerable sums, which induced the Emperor, after his return from England, to desire, if possible, to have a member of our Society to undertake the management of such works, believing that he could rely on the faithfulness and uprightiness of such persons, and he wished also to have near him a man of religious principles, whose example might have a good influence on others." To Stephen Grellet and William Allen "the Emperor spoke in strong terms of his regard for Daniel Wheeler, and considered his coming to Russia as a blessing to the people. 'It was not,' he said, 'the cultivation of morasses, nor any outward object, that led me to wish to have some of your Friends come and settle here; but a desire that, by their genuine piety and uprightiness in life and conversation, an example may be set before my people for them to imitate, and your friend Wheeler sets such an example.'"

That William Wheeler shared in his father's concern to "walk in wisdom toward them that are without" is indicated in a letter from him to the latter recounting some of their experience during the trying period of illness and death in their home circle and outside of it: "I have seen many marvelous things before, but the series of wonders that has last passed under review appears to me to exceed all its precursors, and I feel that we occupy here a very responsible post, surrounded as we are by those of other denominations, who eye us narrowly, and I am earnestly desirous that we may be enabled so to conduct ourselves as to give no just cause of offence to the well disposed of any class."

Eventually William Wheeler's health became so much impaired that he left Russia for his native climate of Great Britain, residing for a time on the Isle of Wight. Here on the twenty-fourth of Eleventh Month, 1836, when about thirty-five years of age, he yielded up his useful life in this world only to be transferred, as there is strong reason for believing, to a more enduring portion in a "City which hath foundation, whose Builder and Maker is God."

In a letter to Phebe Clapp, First Month 21, 1841, Sarah Wheeler thus alludes to her brother William: "Of the closing days of his life we have indeed comparatively few details beyond the ample assurance, conveyed by the kind friends who surrounded his dying bed, of the preparedness of the departing spirit for the scene upon which it was about to enter. Indeed, his life, though comparatively short, had been such as to leave us without a doubt of his being an heir of that salvation of the blessed fruits of which his daily walk among us had borne such unequivocal testimony. For the last few years of his life the all-pervading influence of Christian principle was most strikingly exemplified from day to day, and combined as it was with a strongly marked natural character, great powers of mind, and remarkably penetrating judgment, the influence which he exercised over all around him was such as I have rarely seen equalled in any other instance. The clearness of his spiritual vision was indeed remarkable. 'The eye being single, the whole body seemed truly full of light,' and it seemed given him at seasons not only to discern the path appointed for himself to walk in, but he was made extremely helpful to others in their Zionward journey. I have heard him remark that he believed his avocation was that of a parlor preacher, and most powerfully did he exercise it on many memorable occasions, in which his clear religious views and the bearing of those views upon practice were most eloquently set forth. In losing him we seemed to lose a second father, as well as a most tenderly beloved companion and friend, for during my dear father's long absences from home, he had so completely filled his place among us that we naturally referred to him at all times, just as we should have done to a parent, and relied most implicitly on his counsel. I have sometimes been ready to think that he was taken from us to prevent our resting short of that Heavenly Counsellor from whom all his wisdom and strength were derived, and hard as it was to resign him, I have thought at times that even this cup of exceeding bitterness was dispensed in mercy. Never can I forget the feeling of desolation and dismay that seemed ready to overwhelm our little remnant when we found that he had actually been taken to his Heavenly home. We were till then comparatively untutored in the school of sorrow, and those to whom we should naturally have looked for support under this overwhelming trial were in distant lands, unconscious of our sufferings. But He, whose compassions fail not, was Himself our helper and brought us through these deep and troubled waters, with our faith renewed in his Almighty Power."

At this time, Daniel Wheeler and his son Charles were in the South Pacific, and in the "Memoirs" the affecting event of William's death is thus recorded: "It was whilst at Sydney that Daniel Wheeler received the deeply affecting intelligence of the death of his eldest son, William Wheeler, who had succeeded his father in his agricultural concerns in Russia. He died on the twenty-fourth of Eleventh Month, 1836, at the Sand Rock Hotel, near Niton, on the Isle of Wight, to which place he had resorted for a more genial climate; his illness was a consumption, which rapidly terminated his life. The first intelligence of this event came to hand in a public journal, and proved a keen stroke; but was borne with much Christian resignation. The life of William Wheeler had been marked by watchfulness and prayer, and a conscientious regard to the pointing of Divine wisdom in the discharge of his religious duties, as well as by an active and diligent attention to his concerns in business; his end was eminently crowned with peace, and an humble and confiding trust in redeeming mercy." Fifth Month 30, [1837].—A letter has reached us by way of Hobartton, from our beloved Joshua, conveying the long anticipated confirmation of the painful report already in our possession, that our dear William has finished his earthly course. Although we have lost what never can be regained in this world, yet the accompanying particulars of his last days administered great consolation and relief, and raised in my heart a tribute of humble thankfulness to the great Preserver of men, who indeed 'loveth his own unto the end'; at once removing all my doubts and causing me in the depths of distress to triumph with admiration at the loving kindness of the Lord to the poor and to 'him that hath no helper.'"

THE CHEYNEY OPPORTUNITY.

The announcement of a new principal, Leslie Pinckney Hill, at Cheyney, Pa., was printed in THE FRIEND some weeks ago. He and his wife have now been for some time in charge of the Institute. They came from Manassas, where their six years' experience had put them in the forefront of educational work. Previously they had both served in important positions at Tuskegee, so that their outlook is of the broadest. Their choice of Cheyney meant that they put teacher-training in the first place in consecrating themselves to lives of service. A member of the Board of Managers suggested to them that they make a statement of their view of the Cheyney Opportunity while the work there is yet fresh to them. The following, prepared by the principal's wife, Jane Clark Hill, has a ring of earnestness, and a vision of promise for our seventy-five year old work that should be acceptable to Friends.—Ed.

Far back in the last century Friends laid the foundation for the public school system in the State of Pennsylvania. Those pioneers believed in democracy, and when they formulated their program it made provision for colored youth in the city of Philadelphia. This course in those days required courage, fortitude and adherence to lofty principle. The Institute for Colored Youth began its work in 1836. It was Richard Humphreys who had a clear eye to the future of the colored race. He saw that this people, relatively few in numbers then, but destined to increase mightily, would need leaders. Consecrated teachers were to be trained, and they were to know not only books, but agriculture and trades as well. Hence his benevolent bequest for the founding in the City of Philadelphia of the Institute for Colored Youth dedicated to the training of colored teachers. Hence, also, the stream of cultivated and competent men and women who for more than seventy-five years have been going out from this place of sound learning to increase respect for their race and to safeguard America's most cherished institutions.

With the passing of years the trend of thought and practice in education throughout the nation has borne steadily, however slowly, in the direction of Richard Humphreys' vision. Today education for industrial activity and for food production—that is, in trades and agriculture—is everywhere in requisition. With this new demand there has come naturally an acute need of teachers who have enthusiasm for the soil and the practical knowledge that can make two blades of grass grow where but one grew before. In response to this need the Board of Managers ten years ago moved the Institute for Colored Youth from Philadelphia to a hundred acre farm at Cheyney. It continued to train high-grade teachers for the regular classroom work, but it undertook also to develop instructors in domestic science and art, in manual training and agriculture. In every section of the country Cheyney graduates have been as successful in these new fields of activity as they were formerly in purely academic work, in which they still achieve high records.

But now the movement back to the land, the natural reaction against the congestion of city life, the general recognition of the need of increased productiveness of the soil, the rapid introduction, even in the most elementary schools, of courses in agriculture—all these things have created a demand for teachers of agriculture far in excess of the supply. Cheyney has held tenaciously to her clear aim of developing a high grade of Negro teacher. She has held to this aim in the face of criticism and misunderstanding. Results have justified her. The times are now calling her to a new field of leadership, and she cannot hesitate. Agriculture is going to be a greater and surer resource for our people as the years go by. Cheyney must produce the apostles of this new Gospel. No time is to be lost. She has the land, a competent faculty, and a sharply-defined purpose. She lacks facilities. A modern agricultural building and equipment is an immediate and an imperative need. Something more than ten thousand dollars has already been promised for this agricultural foundation, and one of the ablest scientific agriculturists our race has yet produced has been engaged to take up this special work within a few months. Forty thousand dollars more must be found without delay. Here is opportunity for an investment that will yield big results.

A second urgent need, inseparable from this, is that of a dormitory. Cheyney has at present an exceedingly small enrollment of young men, because she has practically no men's dormitory. The great cause which this school serves demands more virile, consecrated men, and provision must be made for them. A dormitory with accommodations for at least fifty should not be postponed. Such a home for carefully selected young men in training for high leadership is vastly more worth while than prisons or houses of correction. The heart of the South is still troubled, and the mind of the South still perplexed with the Negro problem. The North stands aghast at the tremendous colored influx from the South and the consequent rapid creation of many new problems north of Mason and Dixon where formerly no problems existed. No thinking man dares to dream that all is well. What is the solution of the problem? Among the many answers heard across the land, Cheyney says, "Consecrated Leaders." It is for these that she now earnestly asks equipment and housing.

It is our privilege to pray the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers, but it is equally our duty to make sure that we are using well the instrumentalities which He has already provided. Such an instrumentality is Cheyney. We must make this school a much more efficient agency for Christian citizenship in our American democracy. A strong agricultural foundation and a men's dormitory will do it. Cheyney has a splendid past. We must insure its future. Can you, will you help us? Will you do it now?

EDWIN P. SELLEW.

In the death of this estimable minister of the Gospel, the Friends lose a valuable and influential member of their denomination. As editor and publisher of THE FRIEND he exerted a wide influence. Because of his years of service in the Free Methodist church and his sympathy and friendliness toward our people, it is due his memory that a more extended notice of his death and sketch of his life should appear in these columns than was given in the brief personal note of the twenty-third of [Twelfth Month]. The following facts are furnished us by his brother, Bishop Walter A. Sellew:—

"Edwin Patterson Sellew died in a hospital at Philadelphia, [Twelfth Month] 11th, of internal cancer. He was operated upon, but without avail. He was for many years a Free Methodist preacher. He joined the Genesee conference on trial in 1868 and was appointed to the Tonawanda circuit. He then served in succession Belmont, Lockport and Sweden. In 1872 he was transferred to the Susquehanna conference and served in that conference Rome and Binghamton. In 1876 he was transferred to the New York conference and served there Rahway and Windsor, serving as chairman for two years. In 1876 he located and was in business at Dunkirk, N. Y., for some few years, but soon after that he joined the Friends, or Quakers as they are ordinarily designated. He has been a minister in that denomination since that time. For many years he has been the publishing agent of that denomination, and for some years he has been the editor of THE FRIEND, their official organ.

"The funeral was held in the principal meeting-house of the denomination at the corner of Arch and Fourth Streets, Philadelphia, and that large building was filled with sympathizing friends. It was said that about fifty ministers of the Friends' denomination were in attendance. His body was brought to Fredonia, N. Y., for burial in the family lot in the cemetery at that place, where three of his children are buried who died while he was living in Dunkirk. His wife, who survives him, was Virginia Jones, the daughter of William Jones, a Free Methodist preacher well known in the early days of our denomination. They have two living children, both grown and married.

"He retained to the end the spirituality and simplicity of his life, and among the Friends was a constant and powerful advocate of the doctrine and experience of holiness. He died in peaceful triumph after six or seven weeks of great suffering, which he bore with constant patience. I visited him about three weeks before he died and spent two days with him. He carried the same happy smile for every one and for all conditions that was always so characteristic with him."

AN ANSWER TO PRAYER.—On one occasion Dr. Barnardo was placed in great financial straits. Funds were low, and had been so for a long while. Sometimes the contributions fall off for weeks together, so that a deficiency may occur running into three, even four, figures. The bill for bread alone is about $1000 every twenty-four hours.

The summer months were within sight, when supplies always slacken. For many days prayer was made unceasingly that the God and Father of the fatherless would graciously supply His servant's need. For a time there was apparently no response, and then the answer came in the most unlooked-for fashion. But how? One day, when he was more than usually busy, and was vainly trying to obtain a few quiet moments in his room in order to get through some writing that needed to be done at once, a visitor was announced, who said that the doctor did not know her, but that it was very important that he should grant her a personal interview. It is, of course, the rule at Dr. Barnardo's, as in all establishments on a large scale, with which managers are not able to dispense, that assistants relieve the head by attending to all business and calls, that can be dealt with equally well by them as by him; and his co-workers are kind and competent, who relieve him as much as possible. In this instance, however, no one would do but Dr. Barnardo himself. "I must see him," the good woman said. He left his room to pass through the hall entrance where his visitor sat, amid the coming and going of messengers and porters, and the arrival and dispatch of packing-cases and goods, to go into an apartment beyond, to see other persons who were also waiting to see him, when this visitor accosted him, "You are difficult to approach, sir." "Not exactly," said the doctor, kindly and gently; and then he hurriedly explained that his assistants, who were friendly and attentive, took off his hands all the calls they could, but as she was very anxious and particular to see him, he would speak to her presently.

In a few minutes he had finished with the other callers, and this good woman, a perfect stranger, came in. She had the appearance of being a person in quite a humble rank in life, but did not delay in unfolding her business. "I have some money for you," said she, and she forthwith opened a small handbag and took out and handed him a £1000 Bank of England note (about $4,850), with the remark that she gave that sum because he never turned away a destitute child. She then took out a second Bank of England note for the same amount, and presently a third, stating that she was familiar with every detail of his work and that she admired his cottages at Hford, and the rule not to dress his children there in uniform, thus avoiding the workhouse-stunt and badge. In breathless wonder and amazement Dr. Barnardo held those three £1000 notes in his hand, and he found it difficult to speak. Would the good unknown donor give him her name and take a receipt? "No," she said, she would not, her knowledge of the whole work satisfied her. She would neither give name nor address, and she excused herself and at once went away, leaving Dr. Barnardo to his bewilderment of joy and gratitude.

He never knew who his visitor was. The whole interview was an affair of only a few minutes. He had heard of such things, but till now he had never had the delight of experiencing them. The first moments of surprise over, other persons were awaiting him. Two were well-known workers in the Lord's vineyard, whom he called into his room. To them he related the brief story of what had just happened, and they with him knelt in thanksgiving and prayer to the Father of all mercies, who hears when his children cry, and knows what they need.—From the "Life of Dr. Barnardo." FRIENDLY NEWS.

An official bulletin furnished by the Penna. State College, gives twenty-two as the number of Friends on their list. Presbyterians have the largest number at the college, viz: 535.

Two small booklets have come to the office from England. One is No. 17 in the Series of Friends Ancient and Modern, published by the London Friends' Tract Association. The subject, John G. Whittier, is treated as "poet, reformer, mystic." The author, Ernest E. Taylor, has put his matter in very readable shape, and has shown a correct knowledge of persons and places in the States beyond many who write on the other side. Best of all, he seems to have caught some of the spirit of our earnest, genial poet and to have imparted it in his writing.

The other pamphlet contains sixteen pages of verse with the poetic title—Hope-Stars for 1914 and After. The author is Frederic Sessions of Gloucester and Kenil. The fifteen titles present an attractive variety. We propose to print one or more of the poems in THE FRIEND.

FRIENDS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION held a well-attended meeting at Friends' Select School last Sixth-day evening the twenty-third of First Month. The plan of holding these meetings in the evening after a supper in the school dining-room has resulted in an increased attendance and interest.

The Child's Leisure Time was presented in sprightly papers by Annie B. Gidley and Ruth Evans Rhoads. Egbert S. Cary discussed the Problems of the Summer vacation in an informal but informing talk. All three speakers deplored the tendency of the age to reduce initiative in child life to a minimum. It was refreshing to hear an account from Ruth E. Rhoads of a modern household in which the old-time idea of making children active partners in the home activities was concretely presented.

Considerable discussion followed the three assigned exercises and the meeting gained in life from this feature. We hope to print a further report next week.

The Meeting [for Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting at a recent session] sanctioned the expenditure by the descendant of Judge Fell, who is part owner of the property, of £1400 for alteration of Swarthmore Hall. The property is now held jointly by this lady, who is a direct descendant of Judge and Margaret Fell's daughter Rachel and by trustees who represent Friends. The property is held by the former, but it will ultimately come to the Friends' trustees for £5,250 plus improvements and less depreciation. £2,625 of this is already advanced on mortgage. Possibly the Hall may not come into the complete possession of Friends for fifty years, but Friends may have the opportunity of using their option at any time. Some money is already in hand, but it was the desire of the late Thomas Hodgkin and also of the present trustees to have the total amount at call, so that when the Meeting thinks the time opportune an appeal for about £4,000 may be expected.

In a recent issue of THE FRIEND mention was made of Friends' Meetings for Worship having been resumed in Pittsburgh. A communication from a Friend resident there gives this further information. On the twentieth of last month, there was a meeting of the Quaker Round Table, twenty-one being present. The meeting was one for organization and discussion and no papers were read.

The members who reside in East End of Pittsburgh had twenty to twenty-two miles going and returning, and Wilkingsburg members about twenty-five miles to attend. I mention this to show the distances traveled. Our Crafton and Brighton Road Friends also had long trips.

The next morning the second First-day morning meeting was held at 424 Dequesne Way, some twenty being present. Emma Sellow Roberts spoke, as did also two others who were present, one a member of our Yearly Meeting now resident in Pittsburgh.

THERE was a notice of The Annual Monitor in THE FRIEND a few weeks ago. We are glad to reprint the following in regard to it and to include several other news items from The Friend (London) of First Month 16th.

The Annual Monitor.—There could be no lack of material for the editor of The Annual Monitor in such a year as that covered by the new volume, about to appear. The biographies and portraits of the notable Friends who passed away in 1912-13 are of peculiar interest and value. The records of such men as Joseph Sturge Fry, Thomas Hodgkin, Jonathan Hutchinson, Ellwood Brockbank and Henry Stanley Newman, and of such a woman as Ann Ford Fowler, diverse yet with an underlying unity of faith, give the volume a distinction which is not always possible. From the journal of Ann Ford Fowler (see Bardsley) a pathetic and instructive description of early spiritual struggles is quoted, indicating much depth of character and great earnestness in the search for the Way. Other biographies, of Samuel Beck, Daniel Doncaster, Emily Frances Gilkes, Ellen Mary Glaisyer, Louisa Kitching, James Tange, etc., tell of a like aim and faithful service in many different walks. We hope that the editor, Francis A. Knight, will receive ample encouragement in this labor of love which he has so ably performed since the death, a few years ago, of the former editor, William Robinson. The total number of deaths recorded is 318, with an average age at death of 65 years, the same average as in 1911-12, and two higher than in 1910-11.

The publisher, John Bellows, Eastgate, Gloucester, asks us to state that the publication has been somewhat delayed owing to an unforeseen hindrance. It is hoped that the delay may be of short duration, and that Friends who have ordered copies will receive them not later than the 24th inst., possibly a little earlier. The price is 1s. 6d., postage extra; and the volume may be obtained also of the Editor, Wintrath, Winscombe, Somerset.—The Friend (London).

NERVOUS STABILITY.—In an excellent paper, full of suggestion, read at a meeting of the Parents' Educational Union held at London University last week, Dr. Helen Webb, a Friend, dealt with the relation of mind to matter. It is a truism that modern life is a rush, and nervous diseases have aogue which would have astounded our grandfathers. We seem to be far from any general remedy for this state of things. Dr. Helen Webb, however, pointed out that all through life nervous stability owes nearly everything to a well-furnished mind, and that those who keep in touch with vitalizing ideas continue their mental growth far into old age. As she said, the provision within ourselves of a rich store of interests containing all kinds of things, both new and old, makes it easy to cultivate a habit which more than any other at our voluntary command gives sanity and balance—the habit of turning thought at will from one subject to another. A danger of mental poverty is a liability to dwell on one grievance to the exclusion of all other thoughts, while the broad-minded man possesses mental reserves upon which he can draw in times of strain and stress. In this connection, Dr. Webb emphasized the value of the quickened interest in social well-being as tending to give mental balance, for everything which takes people out of themselves makes for that end. We may rejoice therefore in the enlarged views which our Friends' boarding schools are now cultivating in the scholars, by the definite study of social questions, by camps for poor children, by lectures, and in other ways. And probably when the children of Friends return home fired by the enthusiasm of the day, there is not that cheek which Dr. Webb suggests is often their experience in other homes, to their mental and physical loss.—The Friend (London).

THE son of William Ingle (a Friend of South Australia, who suffered imprisonment in the summer for non-registration of his son under the Australian Defence Act) was sentenced last month to fifteen days' detention at Fort Largs for refusing to drill. W. J. Tilliduff, of Adelaide, who reports the case, says that the boy told the magistrate that he was not a cadet, as the area officer had registered him unknown to his father or himself, and "he would not drill because he was a Christian." The same Friend writes that he has witnessed the summoning of cripples, sick lads, and others, and that the magistrates appeal to the (military) area officer as to what they are to do with the conscript. "In fact the area officers are judges, jury, and accuser, all in one."—The Friend (London).

A PEACE STUDY TEXT-BOOK. Readers of The Friend will remember that about a year ago William Wilson contributed some half-dozen papers dealing with the attitude of Christ towards Peace and War. This book revisits, revises, and very considerably expands those papers, and is set in the slightest degree in the nature of a reprint. It claims to be a Peace Study Text-Book. We may say at once that we know of no book dealing with the many and varied problems of Peace and War which is as suitable for such a purpose as the one under review. A text-book usually succeeds in being fairly comprehensive but often fails in depth. This book, however, is both comprehensive and deep. The author unhesitatingly faces the many intricate problems that confront the Peace advocate, considering them from every point of view—from the religious, ethical, social, and economic. And the treatment of all of these is such that the book is a complete whole and in no sense straggly. There is a preface by Dr. Rendel Harris.—The Friend (London).

THERE was a good attendance of Young Friends, as well as of others, at the Quarterly Meeting at Belfast on the 4th and 5th insts. Report was made of the wide circulation of the advice issued by the last meeting to its members in view of the present crisis in Ireland. (See Friend, Tenth Mo. 10, 1913). It is estimated that the whole collection of extracts from it have appeared in at least 2,000,000 copies of newspapers at home and abroad, while some place the figures much higher. It was inserted in the leading daily newspapers of the United Kingdom, generally in a conspicuous position, and the query was suggested whether any other number of a Friends' meeting for discipline anywhere had ever attained such a circulation. It was stated that cordial appreciation had been expressed of this temperate statement by the Society in Ulster of the non-militant principles of Friends, at the present time, when such extensive military preparations are being made throughout the Province. In view of the prospect before Friends, continuance in earnest prayer was enjoined that the disaster of civil war may be averted. It was decided to send an address to the Prime Minister, urging that no opportunity be lost of arriving at some settlement that would avert the threatened calamity.—The Friend (London).

THE following striking sentences are from a recent address made by A. Neave Brayshaw to Friends' Guild of Teachers. "Two of the essential elements of spiritual life are in danger of being overlooked—inspiration and reverence. Our dread of mistakes, and even of enthusiasm, makes us distrustful of inspiration, to the starvation of souls; and the independence of mind which we cultivate runs riot when unchecked by reverence."—The Friend (London).

WESTTOWN NOTES.

THE weeks pass in an ordinary family with comparatively little to distinguish one from another; with a large family such as Westtown represents there is a monotony of routine also, but probably more of variety falls to our lot than to most.

Our chief concern is with lessons and the school-room duties, and these are the very items we say the least about. When Seventh-day noon comes and books are laid aside for 36 hours, the real family life shows at its best. Last Seventh-day the 24th was a fair sample. The rain was falling, not in a drizzle, but in an actual downpour when dinner was finished, and the prospect that it would continue for hours was reached. The mother who has a family of four on her hands for a wet afternoon is sometimes at a loss when the query is put: "What is there to do?" The problem at a large boarding school of more than fifty times the size of the family in question calls for initiative and resource of no ordinary order.

We would have been glad for any of the friends of Westtown to have inspected us last Seventh-day, when the outward conditions were almost as unfavorable as they could be; we believe our friends would have carried away with them the impression that the afternoon and evening were profitable periods and that the teacher's most difficult tasks were not those which represent him in a classroom, with a group of boys and a dis- about him working out some set lessons, but rather in planning and carrying out the details that make up the happy family life of such an institution.

"Christ and War." By William E. Wilson, B. D., Lecturer at Woodbrooke, Warden of Kingsmead Hostel. (James Clarke & Co., 1s. net, and 1s. 6d. net.)

tion. It would entertain some of you to know the details of such an afternoon as last Seventy-eighth, but it would ask for more space than we have to give. Our object is gained if we have called attention to the true relation this kind of school-keeping holds to the mere bearing and explaining of lessons.

We had no lecture on Sixth-day evening, it being the date of the meeting of the Friends' Educational Association in Philadelphia, and several of the teachers were absent from the School on that account. There will probably be a lecture on the 30th, Dr. Holmes, Dean of Pennsylvania State College, being the speaker scheduled for that date.

The boys and girls who have elected to enter the "Declamation Contest," at the present writing over seventy in number, are active in their preparation. Ellen C. Carter has spent the past week at the School and has met at separate periods almost all who have entered the contest.

The date fixed for the "finals" is Second Month 28th, when we hope hundreds of the School will visit us as they have on similar occasions for several years past.

We have made all the use we possibly could of the skating during the week, and should conditions favor it there is a definite prospect of an exhibition of skilled skating to be given by two or more of the best skaters in America. This is done in the interest of good skating, and if carried out as expected will offer such a treat as Westtown ice never saw. The matter is under the care of one of the committees of the W. O. S. A., and when conditions are favorable notice will be given through the Bulletin Board at Friends' Institute and otherwise.

We have had none of the Committee with us during the week, except that William Evans made us a social visit on Seventh and First-days, which was very welcome.

On First-day evening Rayner W. Kelsey, of Haverford, spoke in "joint collection," taking for his topic "The Choice of the Best." His line of thought was that those things in life which bear the stamp of the "best" cost us much, that they never deprive others of the same privileges with ourselves, that they develop no selfishness, and that they make us men and women more ready to give out than to take in. It is false philosophy to suppose that he who sets this as his goal does other than adds to the world's total of knowledge and righteousness.

CORRESPONDENCE.

REPLYING to the question asked on page 358 of last week's FRIEND, we must turn to Whittier's poems as we so often do for the thought that best expresses our feelings, and find in "Andrew Ryfman's Prayer" the lines:

"Until all things, sweet and good
Seem my natural habitude."

Perhaps the rather halting rhythm of the poem has made it less of a favorite than others; it is full of a lovely Christian spirit. The entire passage may be quoted.

"If there be some weaker one
Give me strength to help him on;
If a blinder soul there be
Let me guide him nearer Thee,
Make my mortal dreams come true
With the work I fain would do,
Clothe with life the weak intent,
Let me be the thing I meant,
Let me find in Thy employ
Peace that dearer is than joy;
Out of self to love be led
And to heaven acclimated,
Until all things—sweet and good
Seem my natural habitude."

WILMINGTON, First Month 25, 1914.

SOME historical statements in the article in No. 26 on early Declarations of Faith, are challenged by our friend Norman Penney. We gladly reprint the statement he makes: [E.]

It is now quite certain that 1675 was not the date of the first Yearly Meeting of Friends in London, and I think that our Friend Augustine Jones will not agree with [THE FRIEND] that the first Yearly Meeting in America was held at Newport, 1672. It will be seen on reference to "The Journal of Friends' Historical Society," vol. ii, p. 63, that Yearly Meetings were held in London years prior to 1675. Our Yearly Meeting minutes commence in 1672, and it is now an established fact that our Yearly Meeting has been held without a break from Second Month, 1668 (see Journal of F. H. S., iii, 79).

In 1911 Augustine Jones stated that New England Yearly Meeting was the oldest Yearly Meeting in the world, the date of establishment being given as 1661 (see Journal of F. H. S., ix, 688). This has been challenged on behalf of London Yearly Meeting, now so-called, which was certainly held in Bedfordshire in 1658, and probably at other places prior to that date. Thine sincerely,

NORMAN PENNEY.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A recent despatch from Washington says: "Pennsylvania, along with other States, will receive $10,000 a year unconditionally from the Federal Government to aid in the diffusing of information on agriculture by the terms of the Lever co-operative agricultural extension bill. The measure has passed the House. Any State will receive from the Federal Government an amount equal to an appropriation made by the State for the extension work, but each State receives $10,000 unconditionally."

It was stated from Washington on the 20th: "Appearing to-day for the fifth time before a joint assemblage of the two houses of Congress to furnish information 'on the state of the union,' President Wilson delivered his carefully prepared address in advocacy of legislation to supplement and amplify the Sherman anti-trust law. The doctrine laid down by the President was expressed in a sentence: 'The antagonism between business and Government is over.' The concluding words of his address were: 'We are now about to write the additional articles of our constitution of peace, the peace that is honor and freedom and prosperity.'"

A despatch from Los Angeles, Cal., of the 21st, says: "Rain to the value of millions of dollars to southern California has come down the last three days, and reports from every section south of the Tehachapi indicate that the present precipitation is one of the most beneficial in recent years. Virtually every crop produced in southern California is receiving the greatest of benefit from the steady rain, and orange growers, truckmen and ranchers unite in prophesying one of the most prosperous years in the history of the Southwest."

It is stated from Wilmington, Del., that a letter was authorized sent to President Wilson by the Delaware Peace Society at its annual meeting, expressing the approval of the Society in the effort which the President has made in connection with maintaining peace between this country and Mexico, and securing arbitration and peace treaties between this and other nations.

A despatch from Columbia, S. C., of the 22nd, says: "The South Carolina General Assembly to-day went on record as favoring the repeal of the Fifteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, which, in effect, gives colored people the right to vote."

It is said that the first shipment of corn from the Argentine Republic, consigned to Philadelphia, is expected to reach this port next month. Although it will be the first Argentine corn received in Philadelphia, it will not be the first shipment to be received in the United States. Several cargoes have been received in New York.

A despatch from Washington of the 22nd, says: "Renewal of general arbitration treaties with 16 nations will be taken up by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at its meeting next week."

A despatch from Princeton, N. J., says: "A student laundry is the latest enterprise upon which the Princeton students have embarked. For several years there has been a students' pressing establishment and last year the students' shoe shop was organized. The new laundry has already met with great success. A number of women in town who are glad to earn money in this way do the work of washing and ironing. The student solicits the trade, collect the clothes, see that they are properly marked before sending to the washwomen and then have charge of returning the clean clothes. The promoters of the plan have met with such success they have been forced to limit the number of students whom they may serve."

It is said that the protecting wing of the Federal Government would be extended over every chicken, duck, goose and turkey shipped in inter-state commerce under a bill introduced by Representative Diefenderfer, of Pennsylvania. The measure authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to see that food and drink are supplied to all poultry in shipment within 24 hours of the time they are crated. At 24-hour intervals inspection must be made to remove the dead and separate the sick from the healthy poultry.

It is stated from Davenport, Iowa: "Appropriations of $190,000 for a system of Federal levees along the Mississippi River are recommended in the report of the Mississippi River Commission, which has been transmitted to Congress by the War Department, with the department's general approval. Millions of dollars worth of property can be saved from flood damage by these levees, the report states."

FOREIGN.—It is reported that volcanic eruptions and earthquakes caused a terrible loss of life in the southern part of Japan lately. It seems to have been the worst volcanic disaster since the destruction of the city of St. Pierre by the Mt. Pelee volcano in 1902.

A despatch from Brussels says: "The International Peace Union, whose headquarters are here, is arranging to ask all the peace societies of the world to send telegrams on the same day to provisional President Huerta and to Venustiano Carranza, the Constitutional leader in Mexico. These are to request the warriors to agree to an armistice, pending which their rival claims and the real interests of Mexico shall be submitted to arbitrators."

It was stated from London on the twentieth of First Month: "The task of securing greater security for ships at sea and their passengers was dealt with in a thorough manner by the International Conference on Safety at Sea, which came to an end to-day. The delegates of 14 nations this afternoon signed a convention laying down regulations for the future. The president told of the arrangements made for ice patrol, ice observation, reporting of derelicts, regulation of the speed of vessels during fogs, lighting of ships, life-saving apparatus, wireless code signals, water tight compartments, fire prevention, double bottoms, drills and inspections and steering apparatus. He did not give out the full text of the convention, which must first be submitted to the various Governments."

A despatch of the 23rd from Athens, says: "A severe earthquake occurred to-day at Lepanto. Almost every house in the town was more or less damaged and the fortress partially wrecked, but nobody was injured."

It is stated that the city of Kagoshima in Japan and the adjacent territory was the scene of an awe-inspiring spectacle during a volcanic eruption and tidal wave which wrought great havoc there, beginning First Month 12. Kagoshima, last week a prosperous town of 60,000 inhabitants, now lies in ruins; even its most substantial stone buildings collapsed under the weight of the hot ashes which fell upon them. At the same time that the volcano Sakura-Jima was sending forth its destructive stream of lava, cinders and gases, the volcano Yarigatake began to send out a cloud of ashes over Matsumoto, but the damage suffered there was only slight.

A recent statement says: "The southern part of western Europe is having its worst 'cold snap' in 50 years. At Marseilles the mercury touched seventeen degrees. At Madrid a woman was frozen to death, and 40 persons have been hurt by falls on icy pavements to which they were unaccustomed. All the canals and rivers of Belgium and Holland are frozen."

It is said that the International Geographical Congress has just issued a pamphlet giving results of a study of the supply of coal in 61 countries. The conclusion is that there are more than seven trillion tons yet unmined, while the present consumption is about one billion tons a year. It would seem, therefore, that the world still has coal enough to last 7000 years.

To Scriptural Truth

ALICE MARY HODGIN—Editors—SAMUEL F. HURNARD

A monthly magazine devoted to Bible Study, etc., published by some Friends in England to bear witness to the fundamental truths of our faith.

The programme for 1914 (seventh year of issue) includes Bible Study on the Minor Prophets by Rose Hurnard. A series of articles by Frank W. Challis, M. A., on "things most surely believed among us":

The Bible—Supernatural, not natural.

The Duty of Christ—Christ is God.

The Death of Christ—A vicarious sacrifice.

The Resurrection—A fact.

The Faith in Christ—The only way of salvation.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

We are mailing a copy of this week's FRIEND to thee, containing an editorial by D. H. F., which we hope will have a careful reading. We desire to add to our list of subscribers, and believe there are not a few who would find the weekly visits of THE FRIEND to their homes a benefit.

"THE FRIEND" AMONG FRIENDLY PERIODICALS.

It will probably surprise most of our readers to be told that there are twenty-six papers that are published by those under our name. A list of them would entertain many of you, but it is hardly germane to the topic we have in hand. This list of twenty-six does not include the so-called school and college papers of which a dozen or more could be named to increase the total, neither does it include any educational or historical bulletins. Of the twenty-six, most are weekly and represent the special interests of a definite type of Friend or the interests of those in a fixed and circumscribed territory of country; there is one Quarterly and the newly established Monthly Present Day Papers; with the exception of the last named, the youngest is perhaps The Fellowship Papers, a bi-monthly of forty pages, managed and largely supported by younger people.

It is not our intention to pass on any of this long list of periodicals. We are more or less familiar with them all, for with but few exceptions they come to our table with greater or less regularity, and in appearance at least have grown somewhat familiar to us. Of the whole group the Philadelphia FRIEND is the oldest, for a weekly to find itself nearing the mark of four score years and ten is a remarkable record in a country where "change" is supposed to spell "progress," and where "newness" is too often synonymous with the "best."

A little more than six months ago THE FRIEND made a few slight changes in its appearance; we believe it altered none of its principles, and we are confident no one has charged us therewith. Even the small changes that were made have not been adopted without giving them the careful consideration they demanded, first on the ground of principle and then on the ground of business efficiency. Our late Friend, Edwin P. Sellow entered into all the propositions that were advanced with great earnestness, and allowed nothing to pass without a fair challenge of judgment. With others he was first and above all else concerned that the paper should be an advocate of Quakerism on the old lines, that the principles and practices that it had stood for these eighty-seven years should be maintained. A few of our subscribers expressed to him their concern lest we too were spelling "progress" by the shorter word "change", and we are conscious that they have scanned us very closely, but with this close guardianship we have always felt a large measure of kindness and righteous concern.

We believe we have not been less alert to do our full duty, because actuated by a deep sense of right and of responsibility, than by the sense that they are watchful of our steps. In the sudden removal of Edwin P. Sellow from the share of responsibility which he so generously and willingly shouldered, we feel naturally an increased zeal to maintain the standard, and are glad that others who, like himself, are known among Friends as exponents of the ancient ways, are willing to help us.

Of the changes contemplated in THE FRIEND six months ago and alluded to in issue No. 51 of the last volume we recall nothing that seems to have been stated too positively. All the features there outlined have not been realized and probably will not be for some weeks hence, many of them, however, have been in good degree responded to and the prospects for the future are hopeful.

It is no easier task to edit an eight-paged weekly than one-halt as large again, it is easier to omit items of current Society interest on the plea that none have been sent in than it is to request Friends to furnish them; it is easier to quote largely from a standard Friends' journal than to secure an original paper on some topic of a religious nature that savors of problems of to-day and appeals to the world of things with which we are now surrounded; it is easier to say to all who ask to have advertisements inserted,—"No, we do not allow such"; it is easier to cull from our exchanges readable and appropriate cuttings and fill our columns with these, than it is to furnish signed papers, but we know that this is not what is wanted, nor what is needed.

THE FRIEND is read to-day because our subscribers enjoy the element of freshness that goes with it. A few weeks since there came a letter from North Carolina with a query in regard to a certain paper; by a later mail came a note from Gloucester, England, referring to another article in the issue of the same week, and illustrations paralleling these could be given. We mention it simply to encourage those who help us.

Six months ago when the American Friend was removed to Richmond, Indiana, it left the field in Philadelphia and vicinity clear for THE FRIEND. No other Conservative Yearly Meeting issues a weekly, and one by one the other Yearly Meetings south and west of us are dropping their distinctive publications, with the seemingly reasonable excuse that the American Friend should occupy the field, we have our serious doubts as to the result of the move, but have no voice in the solution of the problem. With the advent of Present Day Papers claim may be made that the field is no longer clear. We feel that it is. The new publication is more in the nature of a journal than a weekly paper. It will naturally circulate among a different class. Its publishers claim for it no definite sectarian bias, and it will not concern itself with those matters of importance that naturally and properly belong to a religious weekly.

The so-called "Contributors to THE FRIEND", a title which has to be translated and when correctly translated reads: "the owners and managers of the enterprise", wish that THE FRIEND should be subscribed for by every family of Friends in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Once a month a copy goes to every family, so far as we are able to keep our list perfect; this is the so-called Temperance number, when Friends' Temperance Association for a small consideration fill a page or more of the paper, and a copy goes not only to our subscribers but to a list furnished by the Association, which list, as just stated, is supposed to include the entire membership.

This list includes many who do not subscribe, but who possibly need only the invitation from us to become regular and full subscribers. Many of you doubtless have your library tables already loaded with papers and magazines, but we believe you would find in the weekly visit of THE FRIEND to your home something that you would come to value, and we in return would be helped by your support, and from among you, in the near future it may be, would come some of our most valuable contributors.

Toward the close of the editorial referred to in an earlier part of this essay two matters are mentioned. One dealt with the two dollar charge made for the paper as contrasted with the charge but little in excess of this that is made for much larger weeklies and those that have behind them great resources of scholarship and money. We used this expression six months ago—"To the other class, who sometimes wonder why two dollars are charged for a paper that so sadly compares with our thirty-page weeklies that cost but one dollar more a year, etc. . . . It is unfair to institute a comparison between us and one of the dozen truly excellent weeklies that find a welcome to our homes."

A man of much wider knowledge in the realm of religious journalism than the writer of the above statement asked the office of THE FRIEND to furnish the list of the twelve weeklies alluded to; a partial list was prepared and mailed to him, and for answer came the reply that we had done well, but he believed a full answer at this stage of the history of religious journalism was an impossibility; in other words, he did not believe the list reached the dozen mark.

The other item near the close of the editorial alluded to had regard to that class who entertained honest fears lest THE FRIEND in its acknowledged departures, should advocate doctrines and practices which would compromise those for which it has always stood. Nothing but time tests a man's declarations, and this is what we ask of you. We state again and state it with no reservation that the paper is to stand an open advocate of those fundamental doctrines of Christian living and thinking that it has always stood for.

There are Friends in every community of those who pass under our name, who cherish the old ways and who would welcome a return to old practices; to these THE FRIEND would be a welcome visitor, and many of you in return could give us of your valuable experiences; again, there are many in the smaller and larger communities of Conservative Friends, who sympathize with the views advocated in our columns, to whose homes no distinctively religious journal comes week after week, whose boys and girls are growing into manhood and womanhood without the advantage that could so easily be theirs, and which seems almost a natural birthright.

We hold strongly to the conviction that controversy is out of place in our columns. It does little good and much harm. A conversation between man and man, or a written letter intended for only a few eyes, where the topic is one of controversy, often is helpful, but the present does not seem to be the time to cultivate such a spirit through the columns of a weekly paper. The best way to discourage it is to avoid indulgence in it.

A QUERY.

"Are you concerned faithfully to uphold our testimony to a waiting, spiritual worship and to a free Gospel ministry exercised in dependence upon the Head of the Church and under the immediate authority and prompting of His Holy Spirit?"

Faithful testimony to waiting, spiritual worship means that every soul of us shall yield his spirit to the Spirit of God, and wait with yearning for power from on high to live by His wisdom and love. We recognize with thankfulness that such a concern exists in measure in many of us. But like Paul we have not attained to the fullness of blessing, and in love we would incite one another to strive to enter in more fully.

Our testimony to free and inspired Gospel ministry means not only readiness to listen, but a prayerful desire that those who minister may be moved and helped by the Holy Spirit. And, further, it means that every soul shall be alert to respond to such prompting in himself, withholding nothing that is called for. Let us submit ourselves to be searched and shown wherein we can more fully bear our testimony.

THE BOOK COMMITTEE.

Several months ago we received the following sketch of the origin of the Book Committee of our Yearly Meeting. It has never appeared in print, and containing as it does much that will be informing to many readers of THE FRIEND, we are glad to give it place.

A recent editorial in THE FRIEND called attention to the important work this Committee has accomplished in the past; a note in a more recent number referred to the active service it is now engaged in and we have good reason for thinking that the near future has important work to be carried forward through the same channel.

Since the writing of the editorial alluded to, we learn that the Committee is considering the advisability of issuing in vest-pocket form, on thin paper, the essay on Stephen Grellet, which first appeared in Vol. 4 of "Quaker Biographies," and which was written by Alfred C. Garrett. This is exactly in line with the main thought of the editorial, and if the idea originated before the editorial was written so much the better.

Within the past few weeks two very suggestive letters have come to THE FRIEND, showing that the statement was not inaccurate that, "With competent men and women in our ranks to do the work, and with each year a reading public more and more ready to take what we have to offer them, if what we offer is made attractive to the best cultivated taste of the present date," there is a widening field of influence for this important Committee.

ORIGIN OF THE BOOK COMMITTEE IN THE MEETING FOR SUFFERINGS.

There does not seem to have been a special Committee set apart for the continuous care of printing, purchasing and the disseminating of religious writings for our Representative Meeting until the year 1802. The Friends named below had been occasionally requested to perform certain duties in this line, and on the seventeenth day of the Twelfth Month the following minute was recorded:

"The printing and spreading of religious, instructive books continuing to be a necessary part of our duty, the Committee at several times heretofore separated to the service, viz: James Pemberton, William Wilson, John Elliott, Jonathan Evans, Thomas Morris, Thomas Stewardson, Nathan A. Smith, David Bacon and William Savery is continued to attend to night openings for usefulness therein; and a number of Penn's 'No Cross, No Crown,' being procurable at a reasonable price, and some other religious tracts being mentioned as much called for, the Committee is authorized to purchase the first and to seek for and report whether the others are to be had."

This Book Committee, in the Third Month of 1803, reported, "That as there was an opening for spreading the knowledge of our religious principles in divers parts of Europe, particularly France and Germany, they had agreed to propose for the consideration of the meeting that the sum of one hundred pounds (Pennsylvania currency) be transmitted to Lewis Seebom at Pymont, to be appropriated in translating and printing in the German Language, as many of William Penn's 'Rise and Progress' and Mary Brook on Silent Worship, as will amount to that sum. That those Treatises be printed here in the French Language, to the number of one thousand each. And we think that the 'Rise and Progress,' if printed in English, might be usefully distributed in many parts of this continent. We have purchased two hundred of Elizabeth Webb's letter, at four pence each, and one hundred and fifty of Penn's 'No Cross, No Crown,' at six shillings each, to be deposited in the Chamber at Fourth Street for distribution as opportunities may present." The "Chamber" thus alluded to was in the Friends' Meeting-house, on the east side of Fourth Street, below Chestnut, and being found to be too damp for the storage of the books, they were removed in 1806 to a room over the Committee-room of the Arch Street meeting-house, and in 1822 it was directed "that this room should be fitted up so completely as to afford due arrangement for the several treatises therein deposited, and also for the reception and preservation of such of the works of our friends as were by a minute of a former meeting directed to be procured."

This room was one of several into which the apartment now used as a luncheon-room in Arch Street Meeting-house was at one time divided; these rooms were furnished with lounges for the comfort of women Friends between meetings. The books of the Friends' Library (now in its greatly enlarged condition occupying the premises at 142 N. Sixteenth Street), were at one time shelved in one of these "chambers" and were removed to the second-story of the Book Store, 304 Arch Street, after its erection. And when the Girls' Select School building in St. James Street, near Sixth and Market, was destroyed by fire, these Arch Street rooms served as temporary class-rooms until better accommodations could be procured.

The publications of the Book Committee continue to be stored in the rooms of 304 Arch, and in the lower floor room of 302 Arch, with some prospect now (1913) of the erection of a new and larger building on the same site, but extending further south.

At a Yearly Meet^s held at Phila. in y^e 7th mo., 1747, y^e following rules were order'd to be Transmitted by y^e Clerk to y^e several Quarterly meet^s within y^e Verge of y^e sd Yearly meetg, to y^e End y^e same may be added to y^e Book of Discipline & put in Practice as Occasion may Require.

That y^e Overseers of y^e Respective Monthly Meeting or other weighty Fr^s be careful to deal with such as are engaged in Lotteries of any kind, such as are concern'd in y^e Importation of Negroes or in buying them after they are Imported, such as are in y^e Practice of giving Rum to excite

People to bid at Vendues, and those who take Dram given at such times.

Avoid joining with such as may be for making Warlike Preparations, Offensive or Defensive, but that upon all Occasions by demeaning ourselves in a Christian and peaceable manner we demonstrate to y^e World that our Practices when put to y^e trial correspond wth our Principles.

It was directed that at least once every three month several Queries should be answered, among which are the following:

1st. Are Fr^s careful to attend their meet^s of Worship both on first Days & other Days of y^e Week appointed for that Service, & are they Carefull to meet at y^e time appointed; do they refrain Sleeping in Meet^s, or accustom themselves to Snuffing or Chewing Tobacco in Meetings.

2nd. Do Fr^s keep Clear of Excess either in Drinking of Drams or Other strong Liquors.

4th. Do Fr^s keep Clear from Tatling, Lalebearing, Whifpering, Backbiting & meddling wth matters wherein they are not Concern'd.

Do Fr^s observe y^e former advice of our Yearly Meeting not to encourage y^e Importation of Negroes nor to buy them after Imported.

At a Yearly Meeting held in Phila., Ninth Month 20-26, inclusive, 1755, occurs the report of a committee to revise the Queries. They proposed fourteen Queries which with some alterations and omissions are much like those now in use. Among these Queries is one asking if Friends are clear of buying and importing Negroes and "do they use those well which they are Possesed of by inheritance or otherwise, endeavoring to train them up in y^e Principles of y^e Christian Religion."

Lastly it is further Recommended that all Contention & Personal Reflection be kept out of our meetings, that all Fr^s be careful to keep out of Heats & Passions & doubtful Disputations & that we suffer no Turbulent, contentious Perion amongst us in Ordering or managing y^e affairs of Truth but that y^e same be managed in y^e Peaceable spirit & Wisdom of Jesus with decency, forbearance & Love to each other. Elders, Overseers & all others, active in the Discipline [are incited to be] Zealously concern'd for y^e cause of Truth & Honestly to Labour to Repair y^e Breaches too obvious in many Places that there may be some well-grounded hopes of y^e Primitive Beauty & Purity of y^e Church being gradually Restored.

It was also unanimously agreed "that in such Quarters where Monthly meetings of Ministers & Elders have not been already settled they ought without further delay be Etablished & agreeable to the Rules of our Discipline that solid Women Elders should be appointed to sit therein & the following Queries were agreed to be proposed at such Meeting:"

Then follow Queries addressed to meeting of Ministers & Elders. Among these is the following:

Are they Peace makers in Families & in the Church not Concern'd in raising or Spreading evil Reports against any, nor Busybodies where they have not Proper Buifness.

It being represented to this Meeting that in some Places in New Jersey where Distraint hath been made of some goods of Fr^s for not Paying Fines to excute them from Serving in y^e Militia or other such Warlike services, y^e Officers after Sale of them, have offered to return to y^e owners the Overplus after deducting y^e Fine & Costs & some doubts have arisen in y^e minds of some newly convinced Fr^s whether they should receive it or not; After a reasonable time of attending for Counfel & true Harmony appearing among us, it was Unanimously agreed that in all such Cases Friends should rather suffer Cheerfully than accept such overplus, by which they may Fall short of Maintaining our Peaceable Testimony in its Primitive Authority & Purity, unless in such Cases where without any Change of y^e Species the Officers will return y^e same goods they distrain'd or any part of them.

At the Yearly Meeting of Fr^s held in Burlington for Penna.

& y^e Jerfeys during the year 1750, a request was received from Shrewsbury Quarter to be informed Whether a Watch be a Military Service y^e Meeting after being Inform'd y^e Nature of y^e Watch intended by them, and a time of solid consultation & waiting for y^e counsels of Truth, agrees that Such a Watch is a Military service & inconsistent with our Christian Testimony & that no Friend should either in Person or by Paying others be concerned therein.

At the Yearly Meeting held at Burlington, 1758, it was stated "to be the sense of this Meet^s that y^e care & Concern of Elders, Overseers & all Faithfull Friends should be manifested & true Love & Christian Tenderness in order to y^e Convincing Such who in y^e Late time of Trial have Erred by Contributing to y^e furnishing of Waggon, &c., for y^e Conveying Military Stores w^{ch} is a Military Service & have thereby brought a heavy Burthen on y^e Church, yet wth great Patience & forbearance to Such as have a sense of & Regard for this Concern of their Brethren.

After a Weighty Consideration of y^e Circumstances of Fr^s within y^e Compa^s of this Meet^s who have any Negro or other slaves y^e Accounts & Proposals now sent up from Several Quarters & y^e Rules of our Discipline Relative thereto much Time having been Spent & y^e Sentiments of many Fr^s Expressed there appears an unanimous concern Prevailing to put a stop to y^e Encrease of y^e Practice of Importing, Buying, Selling or keeping Slaves for Term of Life or Purchasing them for such a Number of years as Manifest that Such Purchasers do only in Terms & not in Fact, avoid y^e Imputation of being keepers of Slaves.

This Meeting very Earnestly & Affectionately Intreats Fr^s individually to Consider y^e Present Circumstances of these & y^e Adjacent Provinces, w^{ch} by y^e Permission of Divine Providence have been visited with the Devolating Calamities of War & Bloodshed so that many of our fellow Subjects are now Suffering in Captivity, & Fervently desires that excluding Temporal Considerations & Views of Self-Interest we may manifest an humbling Sense of these Judgments & in thankfulness for y^e peculiar Favour extended & Continued to our Fr^s & Brethren in Profession none of whom have as we have yet heard been Slain or Carried into Captivity, would Steadily observe y^e Injunction of our Lord & Master "To do unto others as we would they should do unto us," Which it now appears to this Meeting would induce such Fr^s who have any Slaves to Set them at Liberty, making a Christian Provision for them According to their Ages & Capacities & in order that Fr^s may be generally Excited to the Practice of this Advice Some Fr^s have now Signified to y^e Meeting their being so fully devoted to endeavour to render it effectual that they are willing to visit & treat with all such Fr^s who have any Slaves. The Meeting therefore approves of John Woolman, John Churchman, John Scarborough, John Sykes & Daniel Stanton undertaking that Service & desires some Elders or other faithful Fr^s in each Quarter to accompany & assist them therein & that they may Proceed in y^e Wisdom of Truth & thereby be Qualified to administer such advice as may be suitable to y^e Circumstances of those they Visit & most Effectual to obtaining that Purity w^{ch} it is evidently our Duty to Prefs after. And if after y^e Sense & Judgment of this Meeting Against every Branch of this Practice, any Professing with us should Persist to Vindicate it & be Concern'd in Importing, Selling or Purchasing Slaves, y^e Respective Monthly Meetings to w^{ch} they Belong should manifest their disunion with such Persons by Refusing to permit them to Sit in Meetings for Discipline, or be Employ'd in y^e Affairs of Truth or to receive from them any Contributions toward y^e Relief of y^e Poor or other Services of y^e Meeting. But if any Cafes of Executors, Guardians or Trustees or any others should happen w^{ch} may subject any Fr^s to y^e necessity of being Concern'd w^{ch} such Slaves & they are Nevertheless willing to Proceed according to y^e Advice of y^e Monthly meeting they belong to—Wherever such Cafes happen y^e Monthly Meetings are left to judge of y^e same in y^e Wisdom of Truth, & if Necessary to take y^e advice of y^e Quarterly Meeting therein.

At a Yearly Meeting held in Phila. for Penna. & New Jersey in 1750 in a report to that meeting a committee requested "that y^e Yearly Meeting may again recommend to y^e Inferior Meet^s a Diligent & Watchfull Care over their Particular Members & that they Humbly seek for best Wisdom to Enable them to restore y^e Weak, Convince Gainsayers & to Place their Cenfure on y^e obstinate & irreclaimable."

THE PRESENT SITUATION OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN THE CITY AND THE OUTLOOK FOR THE FUTURE.

About three hundred Friends joined in a Tea Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, on the evening of First Month 26th. The subject printed above was presented from several points of view. The following brief paper by Alfred G. Scattergood solicited for publication will enable Friends who did not get to the meeting to enter into a measure of sympathy with the difficulties that confront city Friends.—Ed.

Friends will please bear in mind that although I was born a member of North Meeting, and later became a member at Twelfth Street, I am now an outsider, so to speak, in this matter, and the thoughts which I have set down with not too much confidence, form only a bare outline, which is intended to be merely suggestive.

One of the first points to present itself in a consideration of the subject before us is that the present situation is not peculiar to Friends. The movement out of the city into the suburbs and country has been participated in by members of most organizations, and it is to me, therefore, a somewhat hopeful thought that there are many other churches and activities of various kinds all around us which are solving this same problem or endeavoring so to do. The condition, it should also be noted, is not a temporary one. It is difficult to believe that there will ever be a return to that part of the city, at any rate, in which the three Monthly Meetings are situated.

However strong may be the ties which bind people to their old surroundings, when their place of residence is changed (especially if it be from the heart of a city to a suburban locality), these ties, to some extent, except in very rare instances, will be weakened just as inevitably as the new surroundings will involve new duties and responsibilities, which latter cannot be easily evaded, even if desired. The Discipline accelerates this tendency by advising Friends to change their certificates of membership when they leave the bounds of one Monthly Meeting and move into those of another. If we are to maintain any strength of membership in the city meetings, it would seem desirable to alter or withdraw this advice.

In my opinion, the serious side of the situation is the meeting and the meeting properties. The activities carried on by the meetings, or which are, as it were, collateral to them, when not actually under their care, will be managed by suburbanites in greater or less degree. There will be nothing new in this, for at present many members of important committees of management and the like, reside and have membership out of the city proper. Where necessary, the provisions of Charters and Articles of Association or other rules defining the qualifications of members of committees and so on, can be changed.

Let us turn, then, to the Meetings themselves, and to the meeting-houses and properties belonging to them. North Meeting, after many years of the utmost faithfulness on the part of a comparatively small number of members, most of whom were non-residents, devoted themselves to the work of the meeting at considerable personal inconvenience and sacrifice, is about to be laid down. To many this result has seemed inevitable—only a question of time—for several years past. The problem there is what is to be done with the meeting-house. No doubt it could be sold, and the money thus realized invested for the benefit of other city meetings; but the question as to the duty of Friends to keep it and use it as a Friendly Centre or Settlement House in that neighborhood has been suggested, and will no doubt be enlarged upon by others to-night. This plan is certainly worthy of the most careful consideration.

There are left, therefore, the two Monthly Meetings, one held in this House and the other in the House on Twelfth Street below Market Street. What of them? So far as the matter of Friends residing near the Meeting-house goes, Philadelphia, or Fourth and Arch Streets, Monthly Meeting, seems even now to be in much the same case as North Meeting, and it seems inevitable (unless there should be an unlooked-for increase in the number of new members from this section of the city) that this Monthly Meeting must, before a great while, settle its problem in much the same way. The alternative, it seems to me, is for its members and those of Twelfth Street Meeting, which for the present, on account of its more central location and convenience to the Railway Terminals, is somewhat better off in point of membership and accessibility, to decide to form one Monthly Meeting, to be known as Philadelphia Monthly Meeting. To my view this seems the only course to follow; perhaps not at once, but before many years have gone by. All Friends living in the city proper and in West Philadelphia should form the membership of such a meeting, and care should be taken to guard against the formation of a West Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, which should undoubtedly weaken this meeting, and which should hardly be necessary on account of the excellent transportation facilities now provided.

The problems, "Which property, if either, to give up," and "In which House to hold the meetings for worship and business," are hard to solve. Probably no one here can easily imagine how the Society could carry on its affairs without using both of these properties. Yearly Meeting would not seem Yearly Meeting held elsewhere; and we must remember, this is the only House we have in the city capable of accommodating the Yearly Meeting; in addition, it is in almost daily use for Committee Meetings—altogether, it seems, a property vital to the Society. May we not also have a duty and responsibility to retain these grounds, very much in their present condition, for the sake of the surrounding community, and possibly of opening up a portion, under proper restrictions, as a Rest Centre for women and little children?

If the retention of this House and property, in addition to the Twelfth Street property, should prove too heavy a financial burden, as might easily be the case, for the proposed Philadelphia Monthly Meeting to carry, it would seem to me that other meetings of the Yearly Meeting might, with propriety, be called upon for help. I have no doubt of the response.

Regarding Twelfth Street—for a good many years we have heard the proposition to build there a large, as it were, office building, capable of supplying all the needs of the city meeting, as well as rooms sufficiently large for holding the Yearly Meeting. In it, too, the Book Store could find accommodations; there could be lodging-rooms and restaurant for transients and others, and the activities of the Institute could be carried on there—in short, a huge sort of affair, which would be the headquarters of all the Society activities in the city.

This certainly seems business-like, but it has never appealed to me. There would be lacking a certain atmosphere we now have, and it would, to my conservative mind at any rate, seem strange indeed to go to the Yearly Meeting House in an elevator! This, however, is a plan that must be thoroughly considered along with others. As to giving up the Twelfth Street property and depending entirely on Fourth and Arch Streets, it now seems so out of the question as not to be worth mentioning.

As a plan with which to begin discussion, therefore, let me briefly state my conclusions, which are:

- (1) Retain North Meeting-house as a Friendly Centre for Settlement Work.
- (2) Consolidate the two remaining City Monthly Meetings, holding meetings for worship and business at Twelfth Street on account of its greater convenience, but retain Fourth and Arch Streets property for Yearly Meeting and Committee purposes, as well as because it is a valuable breathing space in a congested business section bordered by the crowded homes of poor people, who have little or no fresh air or sight of trees and grass.

FLORIDA NOTES.

A week of perfect weather with the mercury between 50° and 70° F., has been thoroughly enjoyed by everyone coming from the frost-bitten north, where zero temperatures have been reported over wide areas.

As the weatherman has not yet learned how to control the elements, we are truly thankful for Florida, where we may revel in its sunshine and flowers—such roses one scarcely sees at home. The orange and grape-fruit crop is not equal to that of last year, but the trees are beautifully laden with their golden fruit. The increase in growth of a grape-fruit tree in one year is remarkable—sometimes six feet in circumference or even diameter of the spreading branches. The limbs frequently bend down to the ground with five to seven grape-fruit in one bunch. Oranges are selling for a dollar a box on the tree and grape-fruit at more than twice that figure.

On the nineteenth of First Month a consensual auto party decided to take a trip on a typical Florida stream—the Wekiwa River—about twenty miles from Orlando. This river starts at Clay Springs, which are strongly impregnated with sulphur and iron and maintain a temperature of 80° F. the year round. A comfortable launch was provided and we headed down the stream, with stately cypress trees surrounding the Florida jungle on either side. Lily pads occupy the greater part of the surface of the water, so our craft kept carefully to the open way where the current ran swiftly. The scenery is fascinating, because unique, and one watches for surprises at every turn of the channel.

We were fortunate enough to see a deer swimming and gracefully feeding upon the lily pads. A little later an alligator slipped off a log, upon which it had been sunning itself; so we were kept on a keen lookout. A white crane stood motionless upon a stump, while many great blue herons, with their long legs extending stiffly behind, crossed our bow.

Alligators and water moccasins hold undisputed sway in the impenetrable jungle so far as human interference goes—but our captain said he lately saw two alligators here in mortal conflict, with their jaws locked and scarred all over; one of the combatants had his tail decidedly shortened by the bite of the other. These creatures move with almost lightning rapidity when a dog or pig comes within reach of their powerful tails. With a sweep that must stun its victim with one blow, the prey is instantly brought into the alligator's capacious mouth—from which there is as little chance of escape as from a steel trap. Both captor and captive immediately slip into the water and a violent, twisting motion breaks every bone in a surprisingly short time. Alligators travel overland at times, and at a pace that would test the powers of a man to equal. Dr. Christ, of Orlando, was driving along a country road recently, when he came across an alligator of considerable size, which he succeeded in lassoing with a strong rope, and brought it to Orlando in his auto alive. It can now be seen in the basement of his sanitarium.

Spring has put forth its first tints here and our ride on the Wekiwa will long be remembered as one of the most interesting and satisfying excursions we have ever taken in Florida.

Joseph and Harriet Rhoads proposed this trip, and we had the pleasure of having in our party two tourists from Massachusetts.

One of the privileges of living here is to enjoy the cosmopolitan character of the visitors. Yesterday a group of four called—coming from as many States of the Union—and today a man and his wife from Michigan, who were exploring the town for the first time, were very interesting. On First-day last a company of thirty-two gathered at the home of our friend, Geo. Abbott, and a precious meeting we had, when the felt Presence of the Saviour was realized by all. These meetings for worship have a service in this city that is appreciated by all who attend them. The comfort of them lasts for many days, and more than justifies the effort to worship in spirit and in truth by silent waiting upon our Heavenly Father when situated at a distance from a regular Friends' meeting.

In the afternoon, J. and H. R. accompanied the writer to a colored school some five miles distant. The day was all we could wish and the sunset colors over a lake were enchanting.

The students of the Robert Hungerford School represent the average Florida Negro home, and the results of Tuskegee Institute in producing the founder of this worthy institution. His wife is now Principal, and she had the sixty-five boys and girls who are boarding at the school assembled in the chapel. They listened most attentively and were all, with only four exceptions, said to be committed to the Christian life. The whole problem of the support of the colored schools in the south looms large. The appropriations from the Southern States is pitifully inadequate, and the men and women in the North who have contributed so generously in the past are fast passing beyond the vale. The colored people have accumulated some property, but they have not come to an independent condition and have not been educated to give of their limited means for educational purposes. Even Tuskegee is feeling the decline of support, so it is not a surprise if the smaller schools also feel the pinch. We were pleased to see decided improvements in this school, both in equipment and the teaching staff during the past year. Thus we can recommend the Robert Hungerford School at Eatonville, Fla., to all who wish to assist in the education of the colored people here. Mary C. Calhoun is carrying a heavy burden since her husband died and she is carrying it nobly.

A splendid garden and a saw-mill with a printing-shop and a wheelwright-shop give evidence of the practical part of this industrial and preparative school. The well-kept condition of all the large school buildings, admirably located on the campus, leave a most satisfying impression upon the visitor and show what one colored man and his wife can do in a dozen years, with no means to start with, but real ability to organize and teach their race the essentials of civilization. To-night it is my intention to tell these students how the Panama Canal looked a year ago, and I believe they will have as clear a comprehension of the making of that Canal as any similar group of white children.

If the white and black leaders of education would get together and consider their problem as the same and work at it side by side, there would be an immense gain. Some efforts of this kind are in operation, but the whole spirit and system of segregation will result disastrously to both races.

With the possibilities of individual freedom and development given by our Republic to every capable citizen, and the general world-movement toward a truer democracy, any effort to discriminate unjustly against any race or nation will inevitably and eventually result in a struggle for the expression of pent-up energies and rights, instead of that co-operation which the Christian religion always cherishes and requires.

WILLIAM WHEELER.

On reviewing with calmness the provision which has been made for every exigency of the case, I was constrained to acknowledge that had it been practicable, I could not have made any arrangement more satisfactory to myself, so that while I am enabled to say Amen, so be it, to this dispensation of His Holy Will, who wrought the work, I can rejoice in the sustaining belief, and give thanks at the remembrance of His Holiness, that the loss sustained is only ours; to the dear departed soul it is eternal gain, through the tender mercy of God in Christ Jesus.

And now, some things which at first sight only seemed to aggravate and add to our affliction, appear to have formed a part of the great whole which has been vouchsafed, by having in degree prepared our minds for the mournful event, of which we were afterward to be more fully informed. Although the tidings received through a channel so unexpected and abrupt, plunged us at once into deep affliction, as a stern harbinger of woe; yet even this could afterwards be viewed as a blessing in disguise, gradually to lighten the weight of an overwhelming reality, and lessen the density of the gloom about to envelop us. 'By watering, he wearieth the thick cloud,' saith Job; so 'doth the tear of affection, when shed in meekness and submission, soften the heart's keenest anguish, until the dark cloud of grief dissolves into resignation to the Divine will, and is sanctified to the praise of the glory of God.'

For some days my dear Charles could not divest himself of the idea that such a report might have got into the newspaper accidentally, and without any foundation in fact; but this slender ray of hope was of short duration.

Sixth Month 11th (First-day).—Since the 30th ultimo my pen has been laid aside as to a record of passing events, either outward or inward. My harp has been hung, as it were, upon the willow, and my lips have been sealed; but at seasons my heart has been softened by the love of God, and my peace has been permitted to flow as the stream of a mighty river, sheltered from every ruffling blast, and too strong to be impeded by trifles. In the meeting this evening a word of encouragement was spoken to the poor and needy that are hungering and thirsting after heavenly food, and looking to the Lord alone for their soul's nourishment: verily the Lord will hear them, and they shall be fed."

In his Journal, pages 522 and 546, we have two entries of Daniel Wheeler concerning visits to Burlington and his friend Stephen Grellet.

First Month 28, 1830.—Reached Burlington as it became dark, and were soon conducted to the abode of dear Stephen Grellet. Remained here over their preparative meeting on the 31st and had an opportunity of calling on many Friends.

Second Month 1st.—Took leave of the family, where my residence had been delightful, and which reminded me of dwelling in a nest of turtle-doves. Friends of this place appear to live in much harmony, and have not witnessed many of those afflicting circumstances in which many other meetings have shared.

Third Month 10th [1830].—Went to Burlington, and spent the night at the house of dear S. and R. Grellet. In the evening many Friends came in; and we were comforted together by the life-giving presence of the gracious Master."

It was probably on the latter occasion that the following circumstance occurred.

After some social and pleasant exchanges between Daniel Wheeler and Stephen Grellet, the latter asked Daniel if he would be willing to have read, at that time, a letter from Prince Papoff, of Russia, concerning the death of William Wheeler. Daniel Wheeler paused, and then assented, provided a young Friend (whom he named) would read it. She had lately met with a close bereavement in the death of the person to whom she was engaged to be married. She yielded to the request—probably reading it under deep feeling. A solemnizing religious opportunity ensued.

Daniel Wheeler consented to a copy being taken by Stephen Grellet's daughter, Rachel, and her friend, M. L. N., with request that it go no further. As these Friends are now all deceased, the daughter of M. L. N. ventures to admit it to publication.

It may be prefaced, that several times in the Memoirs of Stephen Grellet, "Papoff" is mentioned who is, quite likely, the writer of this letter, although in the copy it is spelled "Popoff" and in the printed account "Papoff."

In an account of the visit to the Minister of the Interior, among others alluded to as being of the company was "Papoff, Secretary to Prince Galitzin."

"Eleventh Month 20th [1818].—By appointment, we spent two hours this morning with the Prince Alexander Galitzin and Papoff. . . . We had a precious season with them in silent retirement before the Lord."

"Twelfth Month 5th.—We dined at John Vennings; the Prince Galitzin, Papoff, and Paterson were the only strangers besides us. "I felt very low in the prospect we had of paying a visit to Michael, the Metropolitan of the Greek Church. The Prince Alexander has encouraged us in it, and kindly offered to make way for it. . . . We accordingly went to his residence. . . . Papoff accompanying us."

As it was only about eighteen years after this, that the death of William Wheeler occurred, it seems not unreasonable to surmise that the Papoff mentioned was the author of the letter, copy of which is here subjoined.

"Copy of a letter to D. Wheeler from his son William's partner, Prince Papoff in Russia soon after [William's] decease."

"My Beloved Friend:—Ever since you have engaged in that most important work to which you have been called, I did not venture to trespass on your time, in taking up your attention by my letters, but there is a time to be silent, and a time to speak. It would be suppressing every feeling of sympathy were I now to be silent, were I not to attempt to express to you how much I consider myself sharing your grief, feeling deeply the great bereavement we have suffered. 'Yes! my dear friend, great as your loss is, I can also sincerely say, I have lost a friend, such as I have no other—and I feel the bereavement as keenly as if one of the nearest kindred, a father or a brother, had been taken from me; nay, in proportion as the bonds of the spirit are stronger, and surpass every natural tie, those to whom we feel ourselves united in spirit are endeared to us in a way that cannot be compared to the common relation that kindred stand in, one to another.

For the last five or six years, dear William was particularly near to me—our attachment seemed to increase with every season we had communion together, and truly I can say I looked up to him as a counsellor, as a parental friend, seeing the rapid advances he made in true wisdom, leaving behind him those who had been roused to a sense of truth long before him.

You will be acquainted with all the circumstances that had of late still more intimately connected us, and what happy prospects I enjoyed of seeing him join me in this place to be co-workers in a field of labor which Providence seemed to have allotted to us. The thought of it was my greatest comfort amongst the many difficulties I have had to strive with, and we both so fully anticipated it, that the sudden accounts I received of his being no more a sojourner in this vale of tears, seemed almost incredible, and I scarcely could realize the idea of having lost him. Great as the shock was, yet having been informed of all the particulars concerning his latter days, of his peaceful end, and of the favor of Divine blessing, having been showered down upon him so abundantly and so strikingly—I could not but praise the Lord for his signal mercy vouchsafed to dear William; nay, the feelings of sorrow and pain were, for a time, so completely hushed, that it seemed almost, as if some distant sensation of the Eternal, incomprehensible, the unspeakable bliss he now enjoys were in a measure participated by me. If it has been so with me, how much more will it be the case with you, his dearly beloved father, and dear Charles.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WILKINSON, of the American Prohibition Society, in behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

OUR ALLY IN THE FIGHT. Remember that great word of Matthew Arnold: "There is a power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness." Structurally the universe exhibits a positive, distinct moral trend. To-day is better than yesterday and to-morrow will be better than to-day, because the power making for righteousness is unceasingly making war upon selfishness, wickedness and the tiger in man.

This invincible power is the ally of those fighting to abolish the liquor traffic. The final result is not a matter of uncertainty. The destruction is sure; as was the destruction of slavery; of that traffic which converts into cash profits, the peace of the home, the promise of the child, and the strength of manhood.

It is a winning fight—not because of our strength—but because the forces making for the betterment of the human race are on our side.—American Issue.

RESULTS.—The call of the age is for "efficiency." The popular demand is "results." The claim of the liquor interests is that the propaganda of the no-license people is inefficient, that the "results" of their campaigns are unsatisfactory. The claim is taken up, to some extent, by people who long to see the "liquor power" crushed, but who lack the faith to believe that present methods will lead on, finally, to the result desired. In common with liquor men, they seem not to see that these local contests, these diversified methods of attack, these "efforts to accomplish the impossible," are but parts of a nation-wide campaign, reflections of a world-wide movement, indications of the universal forward tendency to outlaw and suppress those institutions and social customs that are a menace to the human race. The campaign has nowhere ended, the methods are as varied as the needs of localities, and the time has not come when "results" should affect us greatly either to elate or dishearten. Men whose experience and knowledge qualify them to read the "signs of the times" are of one voice, whether they be for liquor or against it, that the time is nearing when saloons will be abolished, and the trade in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes will be outlawed.

RESULTS IN DELAWARE COUNTY, as shown by the decision of the license court, are typical of the results to be expected where the no-license people are restricted and hampered by statutes such as the Brooks High License Law of Pennsylvania. After an enormous expenditure of effort, as explained in this column last month and previously, the temperance workers have the following achievements to their credit, viz:

First.—An agitation for no-license that has reached every home and every work-shop in the county, compelling a consideration of the liquor question as it affects the community.

Second.—The consideration of the subject by the Court (both Judges sitting at most of the hearings) for the space of three weeks, during which time the saloon and the liquor business were kept constantly on the defensive, because of the nature of their "finished product" and their unsavory reputation amongst public-spirited and self-respecting citizens, who testified freely and forcefully.

Third.—The presentation daily, in the public press of Philadelphia, of the evidence pro and con, in a manner far from comforting to the liquor interests, and decidedly illuminating to the lukewarm and indifferent.

Fourth.—The withholding of all licenses, and consequently the closing of all the saloons in the county for more than a week, pending the completion of the testimony and the reviewing of the same by the Court. It was found that one week of "no-license" is quite long enough to prove many of the contentions of its advocates.

Fifth.—The refusal of thirteen licenses out of a total of ninety-seven applications. No applications for new licenses were filed. Amongst the decisions of the Court were some surprises, but it would be useless as well as impolitic to criticize the action of the Court. The saloon-keepers who were disappointed will do enough at that, inasmuch as the charge of favoritism is but natural where the dispensing of a "special privilege" is vested in a single individual. One year hence the liquor men will, perhaps, be able to show aggregate sales equal to any year in the past, and emphasizing the last achievement of the campaign at the exclusion of the four greater achievements preceding it, will find miserable pleasure in charging us with having accomplished nothing. But the people are rapidly becoming convinced that the liquor traffic is an enemy, and their mistrust of it cannot be allayed. The movement in Delaware County is significant. The demand for a local option law in Pennsylvania, like the demand for prohibition in states where sentiment is more advanced, is persistent and insistent. "There is a Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may."

A SIGNIFICANT ACTION was that of the Board of Trade of Pittsburgh in adopting a resolution favoring the passage of the bill now before Congress proposing to submit to the State legislatures the question of national prohibition. In view of the prominence and influence of the municipal body taking this action, the circumstance appears to be unprecedented. The resolution refers, first, to the building of a cottage for inebriates to cost $25,000, approving the same, together with the resultant expense of maintenance, as much annually, perhaps, as the initial cost. But from this as an illustration, the resolution sets forth to considerable length the economic burden of the liquor traffic, and the desirability of its immediate reduction and speedy annihilation. With the Pittsburgh Board of Trade establishing the precedent, let us hope there may follow many more similarly stirring declarations of the economic burden and the social course of this greatest of all "special privileges."

A DECLARATION (in part) set forth by the Anti-Saloon League of America in National Convention assembled at Columbus, Ohio, 1913:

"We declare our settled conviction that license and regulation are inadequate to exterminate the liquor traffic. The license system, instead of eliminating the evils of the traffic, has become its last and strongest fortress.

"The liquor traffic is national in its organization, character and influence. It overflows the boundaries of States and refuses to be regulated or controlled. It is a federal evil; a national menace, too powerful for State authority, requiring national jurisdiction and treatment. It claims for itself a special right and privilege asserted by no other interest in all the land, however great or powerful—a right and privilege incompatible with free government—the right and privilege to infract municipal ordinances at will, to violate and break legislative resolves and enactments, and to set aside the constitutional provisions of sovereign States. . . . We therefore declare for its national annihilation by an amendment to the federal constitution which shall forever prohibit throughout the territory of the United States the manufacture and sale and the importation, exportation and transportation of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage. Trusting in Almighty God, we call upon all patriotic citizens to give their support thereto."

A MODERATE DRINKER CURED.—In a biographical account of John Brown, of Harper's Ferry fame, written by his son Salmon, is the following anecdote of the cure of a moderate drinker. It appears that John Brown, while living near Meadville, in the northwestern part of Pennsylvania, was in the way of keeping a barrel of whiskey in his house and taking an occasional drink. The account states: "A tavern-keeper was to have a barn-raising and father was to be there. The tavern-keeper needed more liquor and sent to Meadville by father, then scarcely in middle life, for a three-gallon jug. The liquor cost twenty-five cents a gallon. On the road from Meadville father became thirsty and began taking 'nips' from the jug. He was accustomed to drinking from his own barrel, and did not think the practice wrong. On the way to the barn-raising father realized that liquor was getting hold of him and he became alarmed. He afterward spoke of the occurrence frequently: He reasoned that if liquor would lead him to drink from another's man's jug it was surely gaining control over him—a thing he could not allow. Coming to a large rock by the roadway he smashed the jug upon it, vowing that he would not be responsible for his neighbors' drinking at the barn-raising, where accidents might happen. He paid for the liquor, and when he reached home rolled his whiskey barrel into the back yard and smashed it to pieces with an axe. No liquor was allowed about the house afterward."

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

LEANDER AND MELISSA.

GRACE STONE FIELD.

Leander Alexander and Melissa Jane, his wife,
In yonder little country town pursued a quiet life;
Where everyone knew everyone within a circle small,
They spent the springtime of their youth, the serene and withered fall.

Leander Alexander always said it was a shame
That people of so mean a sort within his knowledge came.
For Jones was stinky, Brown was haughty, Robinson a sneak,
And of the ladies J. B., R., 'twere better not to speak.

The villagers were all a stupid, shiftless, lazy crew,
Each man was evily disposed, each woman was a shrew;
The children were on mischief bent, and sure to grow up bad,
"Which was to be expected with the parents that they had."

Now, strange to say, Melissa Jane, upon the other hand,
Found good in every person round about her in the land;
For every one was bright and kind and lovable and sweet—
"To have such neighbors and such friends was just a lifelong treat."

Perhaps you won't believe me, and I know it sounds a hoax,
But Melissa and Leander knew the very selfsame folks!
—Youth's Companion.

WHERE HORSES ARE UNKNOWN.—Annie Coope, a missionary to the San Blas Indians, in subscribing for Our Dumb Animals, says that a few copies were sent her by a Massachusetts clergyman, and the magazine proved such a delight to her boys, as well as to herself, that she felt she must receive it regularly.

The San Blas Islands are situated about one hundred miles from Colon, Panama. On the islands are a few cats, dogs, hens, chickens, and one pig, but no horses, cows, goats, or sheep; only the few inhabitants who have been to Colon have ever seen a horse or other large domestic animal. Many of the young men are, therefore, greatly interested in pictures of these animals. Just now they are looking forward eagerly to the proposed importation of a cow.—Our Dumb Animals.

EXCUSES.—"Roger, do you think that a good excuse for not doing some thing you ought to do, is as satisfactory as to have done the thing itself?" father Brook asked his younger son, who had a fertile genius for "explanations."

"Why," said Roger, "one seems about the same as the other."

"Well," replied his father, "it will be a great step forward when you find out that they are totally different things! A good excuse for not having prepared your lesson at school may save you from punishment, but no excuse will put an atom of knowledge into your head. You may have an excellent excuse for having poor health, but no good health will be given in exchange for it."

"I never thought of it that way before," said Roger, looking thoughtful.

"Usually," continued his father, "excuses are only excuses. What we really want to do, we find a way to do. When you had your heart set on building a wireless station, you were particularly busy at school, and you were doing errands in the afternoon to earn money, so you had no time to spare. But you got up very cheerfully at sunrise for weeks to get the time you wanted."

"It wasn't hard to do," said the boy.

"No, for you really wanted to do it," his father replied. "Any one can find at once some good reason for not doing a thing he don't want to do. It's as true of men and women as of boys and girls. We hear of some struggling, philanthropic enterprise that is blessing the entire nation. Workers are needed, and we say to ourselves, 'How I should love to work in so noble philanthropy! But I haven't time to do half the things I ought to do, and surely I should not be justified in attempting more!' Or money is called for, and we say, 'I wish I could give, but I really can't afford it. Surely it isn't honest to give money you can't afford to give.' Every one can instantly produce a perfectly good reason for not doing what he isn't keen to do."

"It's a very convenient faculty," said Roger, with a chuckle.

"It's not to be laughed about," answered his father. "It's one of the most dangerous capacities of human nature. If, whenever we left undone something that we ought to have done, we had to face squarely the fact of our own failure, there would not be half the evil there is in the world. But we blind our eyes to our own culpability; we even justify ourselves. We trifle with our moral sense, until our moral sense grows dull and blind, and we grow poorer and weaker—and we don't know it."

"I make no more excuses," said Roger, soberly.

"They are weak things to make to any one," replied his father, "but they are especially dangerous when we make them to ourselves."—Youth's Companion.

NEWS ITEMS.

ALFRED C. GARRETT has an instructive article in a recent number of The Haverfordian on "The Function of the Church."—American Friend.

An article of some length by Joanna Mott, in The Chicago Live Stock World, of Twelfth Month 24, deals with the progress of religious thought. It thus concludes: "The rites and ceremonies and struggles recorded in the Old Testament were outward, but then, as now, the heart must be right toward God, or mere performances become an abomination to Him. They stand as types of spiritual truths for us. For ages to come the more man develops, the more he may be able to see in these wonderful Scriptures, their deeper meaning ever being opened by the help of the same Spirit that gave them forth."

The annual report of the Pennsylvanian for 1913 has recently come to hand. It contains the following gratifying statement: "Since every report heretofore has closed with an urgent appeal for purchase or building funds, it gives the Board unqualified pleasure to announce that the mortgage of $5000 has been paid off. For the generosity of friends who lifted this burden we wish to express the deepest gratitude. The gifts have, in most cases if not in all, meant more than mere kindly response to appeals—they have seemed the proof of a genuine interest which has shown itself willing to make some sacrifice for a work which seemed worthy of it."

JOEL BEAN.—"As a shock of corn cometh in its season," our esteemed friend Joel Bean, of San José, California, passed peacefully away at the home of his daughter Catharine Cox, at Honolulu, Hawaii, on the 11th ult. There, we understand, he had been for some time past, lovingly nursed by both his daughters, who last month were hoping that he was slowly gaining strength. He suffered no pain in this last illness, and it had been a great joy to him to be with his two daughters. So, at the age of eighty-eight, ends a life which has been marked by its strong convictions, its deep ministry in our meetings, and its sweetness of disposition. It is, of course, many years—some forty, we believe—since Joel and Hannah Bean visited this country, but they are still affectionately remembered here, and many Friends in England followed with deep sympathy the circumstances of Joel Bean in some recent years' ago, commencing with the treatment he received by his Yearly Meeting. Next year we hope to give some account of the life and work of our late Friend. —The Friend (London).

First Month, 1914.

THE German translation of John S. Rowntree's "Faith and Practice" has been completed and is now issued in book form. The translation has been made by Margaret Stahlin, the lady who so successfully translated extracts from the Journal of George Fox into German. A great deal of pains has been taken with the translation by several English Friends and some German readers, and we hope the book may have a useful circulation in Germany.—The Friend (London).

OUR Friend, John Gilbert Baker, F. R. S., the world-famous botanist and horticulturist, who for so many years was keeper of the Herbarium at Kew, was last week the recipient of an address of congratulation on his eightieth birthday. In course of a chat with a representative of the Morning Post, J. G. Baker gave an interesting account of his early life, at school and subsequently, and reminiscences of his work at Kew. "From the age of nine to twelve he was at Ackworth School and then, till he was fourteen, at Bootham, York, where his interest in botanical pursuits developed rapidly. "I entered into the pursuit with such enthusiasm," he says, "that before I had been at the school twelve months I won a prize for the best collection of plants, and was thereupon made curator of our little herbarium. The headmaster, John Ford, was not, so far as I am aware, specially devoted to scientific study, but several of the teachers were ardent botanists."—The Friend (London).

A REGULAR meeting of the Friends' Educational Association was held at 140 N. Sixteenth Street, First Month 23, 1914. The minutes of the preceding meeting were read and approved.

The subject for the evening was: The Child's Leisure Time. Annie B. Gidley opened the meeting with a delightful paper on The Leisure Hours of a Boarding School Child. She said that among the many other problems of the anxious modern parent, the following would be found on the pages of a crowded note book: Find out how Johnny should spend his leisure time. But too often in the process, the adjective is lost sight of and the child finds out that his leisure time has been planned for him. Leisure time should be that time not definitely planned for. Children need to get away from their elders to think, and if we cheat them of this by planning every moment for them, we shall find that they think little and collect their thoughts never!

The problem is a little different in boarding school because it is complicated by large numbers. The girls at Westtown are divided into three classes:—

1. The little girls who play old-fashioned games, who do a little reading and sewing and very occasionally play with dolls.
 2. The older girls who spend their leisure time in athletic games. Time so spent isn't properly leisure time at all.
 3. A few who spend their leisure time in reading, writing letters, etc.
- The rest feel hurt if a Seventh-day evening is unplanful for. Annie Gidley just here read a daily theme written by a member of her English class which reflected very distinctly this attitude. She then suggested some ways in which to teach these dependent children to use their time wisely and well.

1. Begin at six months of age and give the child only one toy, until he has learned to play with that in a variety of ways.
2. Live more slowly.
3. Keep out of doors more.
4. Have plenty of books close at hand.
5. Teach a little philosophy of life as the child develops.
6. Always let the child think and plan for himself. Children who are not afraid of their leisure time are likely to develop into people with more poise and they will never forget the slow, happy, growing time of youth.

The Problem of the Short Vacation was presented by Ruth Evans-Rhoads. She felt that the great difficulty with the short vacation is that there is not enough time in which to rearrange the family machinery. In the summer vacation a regular schedule is followed with work in the mornings and play in the afternoons. The best thing to be done in the short vacation is to substitute for lessons some definite task like hemming, bed-making or cooking. She recommended to the truly Spartan mother, the plan of dismissing her servant so that the over-indulged and too highly civilized modern child may have the benefit of a very practical domestic experience. She closed her paper by saying that all children are happiest when they feel that they have had to do a thing and have done it. This has its effect, not only now, but in later life in obedience to the Heavenly Father.

Egbert S. Cary caused a laugh at the beginning of his talk on the Summer Vacation by saying that this seems to be the time for parents to find out what is wrong with the school life and correct it. Certainly this is the parents' opportunity to work on the three problems that present themselves so insistently in connection with the modern child, the problems of (1) Independence; (2) Self-reliance; (3) and Initiative.

Formerly the problem was for the boy to find time to do what he wanted to; now it is for the teacher to find something for the boy to do. Dr. Gulick has said that the whole situation is epitomized in the attitude of the modern boy toward baseball. Fifteen years ago it was impossible to find a corner lot without its baseball team. Now-a-days the modern boy prefers to pay a quarter to go and watch a team of professionals!

The speaker assigned several causes for this condition.

1. Too many babies learn to walk with perambulators.
2. The kindergarten is carried too far.
3. The move from country into city or suburban life plunges the boy into unnatural influences.
4. In the small families of to-day, each individual child gets more than his share of attention and worry.
5. Too large a proportion of the family income is spent on pleasures and artificial relaxation.

In the discussion that followed, several interesting points were brought out which it may be well to enumerate briefly.

1. The desirability of hobby work. It gives employment for the child's leisure time as well as being of great educational value.
2. The average child has too much money to spend. If he had to manufacture his playthings it would afford employment for the leisure time as well as training for the hand and eye.
3. There ought to be farm schools in connection with summer resorts, where children might receive practical training.

At the close of the discussion the meeting was adjourned.

FRANCES C. FERRIS,
Secretary.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

It has been with great regret that the Westtown family has observed the ice on the lake gradually weaken, until, at this writing, it has almost vanished; with neither skating nor sledding, and no regular schedule of out-door games, some more real winter would be welcomed.

"It's an ill wind that blows no one good;" while too warm for sledding and skating, the mechanics have made fine progress with the Walnut Hill buildings; the horse lacks only the white coat to finish that part of the work, unless it might be that a portion of the cellar was unfinished; the barn is partly under roof, so there is no question but that, so far as buildings are concerned, operations in the orcharding department can begin in earnest when spring opens.

The lecture on last Sixth-day evening was by Dr. Arthur Holmes, Dean of the Faculty of Pennsylvania State College; subject, "The Power of Ideals in Character Making." The personality of the man, and the forceful presentation of his topic, were impressive, to say the least; he has had large experience in dealing with students, and knows much about human nature.

Boys to the number of about twenty have for some weeks past held conferences in Room "A," on First-day evenings with George L. Jones, with the idea of getting into closer touch with spiritual truths; naturally, the older pupils attend, and we are very glad to note the continued interest in the good work.

At the usual First-day evening collection, Edward C. Wood, of Camden, N. J., speaking to the boys concerning the conference recently held in Kansas City, Mo., by the Volunteer Student Body for the purpose of spreading Christianity throughout the world—some 5000 delegates were present at the meetings. A brief account of the proceedings, which have been printed in the public press, were listened to with much interest.

RICHARD C. BROWN addressed the girls concerning the establishment of the kingdom of Jesus Christ as the Messiah; it was a large subject to treat in a half hour; vital points in Christian teaching were covered in an instructive and interesting manner.

An old-fashioned sociable was an event of last Seventh-day evening; seven groups of pupils were scattered about in various places, two of them going to teachers' houses down the east lane; apparently, a happy hour or more was spent by all the parties; for some time past, these gatherings have been held in two groups, one in the library, the other in the gymnasium.

The Westtown dairy certified milk has been going to Philadelphia for about three months; for two months past it has had decidedly lower bacterial counts than any of that class going to the city; four bottles sent recently to the Pennsylvania State Dairymen's Meeting at York, won first prize; these were also of the "certified" brand.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A late paper says: "The moving stairway, or escalator, which has been in construction for the last few months at the foot of Market Street, in front of the Pennsylvania Railroad ferries, has been put in operation, and carried thousands of passengers to the north-bound elevated tracks."

It has been recently stated that thirteen thousand more persons owned the Pennsylvania Railroad at the close of the year than at the beginning, so that now nearly ninety thousand shareholders are directly interested in its management. The wide distribution of the shares of the corporation insures a widespread interest in the efficiency and the economy of its administration.

A despatch from Washington of the 19th says: "Constitutionality of the Pennsylvania statute of 1909, designed to protect wild birds and game, by forbidding unnaturally foreign-born residents from possessing a shotgun or rifle, was sustained to-day by the Supreme Court."

It was stated from Boston on the 26th: "The continuance of the work of the World Peace Foundation, established by Edward Ginn in 1910, is assured by a provision of his will, will, made public to-day. The abolition of war through education in the advantage of peace is the object of the foundation."

It is stated from Savannah, Ga., that Savannah bakers are using the parcel post for cheap, prompt delivery of bread to points in Georgia, Florida and South Carolina, within 150 miles of Savannah. In several cases, customers who will have no bread but that which is Savannah-baked, are being served in other States.

In a recent discussion among medical men, Doctor Burnam said the increasing number of cancer cures was largely attributable to the recent use of radium. He said he had visited the principal European centres where radium was employed, and that everywhere there was a scarcity of the substance. Doctor Burnam said that not only was radium of value in the treatment of cancer, but that it could also be employed for rheumatism and certain blood diseases.

It was stated from Washington on the 19th: "Congress was urged to-day by Dr. Howard A. Kelly, of Baltimore, and other eminent radium experts to monopolize for the benefit of cancer sufferers the radium-bearing ores in the public lands. Doctor Kelly asserted there was immediate necessity for Federal action from the standpoint of the medical profession. He told the committee of several recent cases in his own experience where radium has made possible complete cures of cancer and declared that radium in the public lands should be extracted by the Government and turned over to the hospitals of the country."

A recent despatch says: "Farm animals in the United States First Month 1 were valued at $5,891,229,000, the Department of Agriculture announced. Horses numbered 20,962,000, an increase of 395,000, and were valued at $109,324 a head. Mules numbered 4,419,000, an increase of 63,000, were valued at $123.85 a head. Milch cows numbered 20,737,000, an increase of 210,000, were valued at $53.94 a head."

It is stated that no packages of 50 pounds weight may be carried by the parcel post a distance of not more than 150 miles, and that books will be admitted to the parcel post for distribution after Seventh Month 1.

A despatch from Washington of the 28th says: "With a view to standardizing all the commercial varieties of vegetables grown in the United States, the Department of Agriculture, through its Bureau of Plant Industry, announced to-day that any one having an unknown variety of vegetable for which correct identification is wanted may obtain such information from the department."

It is stated from Newark, Del.: "Before they can teach in the rural public schools of Delaware the next school year all teachers must pass an examination on the subject of agriculture, which has been made a regular study for the seventh and eighth grades. State Commissioner of Schools Dr. Charles Wagner has issued a bulletin to this effect, in which he says: "Teachers holding certificates valid during 1914-1915 that do not include the subject of agriculture must be prepared to pass an examination in that subject should they accept a position that requires them to teach it before a county superintendent will sanction their appointment. The course in agriculture to be given this summer at Delaware College, if passed by the student, will count for credit on a teacher's certificate."

A despatch of the 29th from St. Paul, Minn., says: "Mild weather this winter is saving citizens of St. Paul $3,500,000 on coal bills, it is estimated. Dealers say the sales have been the smallest in many years. It is estimated that residents of the Northwest, whose coal comes from the head of the Lakes, will save $20,000,000 if present indications are fulfilled."

It is stated that there are nearly 3000 bison in national parks, etc., in this country and in Canada. The American Bison Society is interested in preventing the extinction of these animals and in trying to foster their propagation, it is said to be meeting with success.

A recent despatch says: "The United States Hay Fever Association held its midwinter meeting to-night. P. A. Maignon, of Philadelphia, told of the discovery of the hay fever germ and said this would lead, he believed, to the early cure of the disease."

On the 30th ult., a collision occurred off the coast of Virginia, between the steamship Nantucket and the Monroe of the Old Dominion line, by which 41 persons lost their lives.

FOREIGN.—A recent despatch from Paris says: "The long-continued cold, especially in the central districts of France, is bringing numbers of wolves, frantic with hunger, out of the woods. The temperature in Paris has shown a slight improvement in the last day or two, owing to the brilliant sunshine, the mercury to-day standing above the freezing-point for the first time in many days."

It is stated that the population of Cuba is 2,387,000, according to the new census. The Secretary of the Interior submitted a report to this effect to President Menocal to-day. The population in 1907 was 2,048,980.

London, according to the latest figures, is the most healthful of the world's big cities. The death rate there is 13.52 per year for each 1000 of population. New York is a close second with 13.77. The rate in Berlin is 14.39; Chicago, 14.68; Paris, 16.38.

A despatch from Japan says: "The volcano Sakurajima, which recently caused such widespread destruction, was again in eruption to-day. Three hundred refugees from Sakurajima were buried under a falling cliff in a neighboring village. A hundred bodies have been recovered."

Appeals have come from the Balkan region for help for the suffering and freezing people, who have lost their all in the recent wars. Complaints from Queen Eleonora, of Bulgaria, to the American Red Cross. Her winter is unaccountably severe and is causing great suffering.

It was stated from China on the 29th, "Confucianism was re-established to-day as the State religion of China by act of the Admiration Council, which has taken the place of the recently dissolved Parliament. The Council passed a bill prescribing the worship of heaven and of Confucius by the President of the republic. The measure was submitted to the Council by President Yuan Shi-Kai himself. It is said the religious freedom in China, however, is guaranteed by at least a dozen treaties with different nations."

RHOADS LEATHER BELTING

If a belt breaks and stops the machine you know something of the trouble, but hardly anybody knows how great the loss.

If a belt stretches and stretches, you know the bother, but who knows the loss from reduced speed and output?

Rhoads Belts require few take-ups. They are so thoroughly stretched in the making. They give uncommonly long service, chiefly because of our tanning process and skillful assortment of the leather to admit no piece that would make a weak spot.

Our booklet "Efficient Belt Service" gives striking evidence from the experience of users. Let us send it to you and also a sample of our Tannate Lace Leather. It is a great slip-saver.

A PRESENT-DAY MESSAGE.

The original Friends, we are told by those who have made a careful study of the history of the religious movement of the seventeenth century, were an off-shoot of the seekers of that time—a name in itself suggestive of what they were. Not satisfied with the husks that had served some, these seekers sought for the kernel of life within the husk, and when there came among them, first one and then another, whose eyes had been anointed to see beneath the surface, and whose spirits had come into such close touch with the Divine Spirit, that they had held sweet and satisfying communion in their own souls, with the Father of Spirits, the treasure that they sought for had become a realization.

A rich store-house of experience is the record of early Friends along this line. They were neither deceived, dismayed nor disheartened, though false prophets came among them to lay waste their faith, though their own trusted fellow-workers fell away from the truth, and though trials of every sort came upon them, their confidence in what had been shown them grew stronger and stronger. No portion of their legacy speaks more clearly of their steadfastness of purpose and clear conviction of truth than their complete surrender of self to the cause they had embraced. They had a definite, clear cut belief, not something assumed as such to be followed or not as convenience or outward circumstances influenced them, but a sort of belief that was so genuine and so tense that they surrendered all things, even life itself as Paul expresses it, "for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus [their] Lord".

A willingness to yield up one's life rather than sacrifice a jot or a tittle of that which they had accepted shows the type of character of the seventeenth century Quakers better than anything else that has been recorded of them. Though they lived at a time when controversy ran riot, and many among them wrote fearlessly and oftener than not with words not "mellowed with the message of love", they were not as a rule shrewd questioners. Doubts and misgivings in others, when they grew to proportions that seemed to breed heresy, they assaulted most vigorously, but their work was a building up, not a tearing down. They felt intensely; they knew by heart-knowledge the simple teachings of their Master; they had followed Him in spirit through heights and through depths;

He had supported them when all outward props had fallen. He had gone with them into the foul dungeons, whether their closest earthly friends had failed to go; He had made the death bed of many of them to be a glorious realization of His ancient promise of abiding power.

The early Friends' outlook upon life was anything but narrow, but he stood firmly by the safe law that there is no such thing in morals and religion as the middle ground of vantage. To him a line, definite and tightly drawn, separated between right and wrong; day and night, light and darkness, were two separate conditions, one did not merge into the other so that it might be possible to stand with one foot in each, and swing at ease to the position promising greatest satisfaction.

"He walked by faith, and not by sight,
By love and not by law;
The presence of the wrong or right
He rather felt than saw.

"He felt that wrong with wrong partakes,
That nothing stands alone,
That whoso gives the motive, makes
His brother's sin his own.

"And, pausing not for doubtful choice
Of evil great or small,
He listened to that inward voice
Which called away from all."

As there were Seekers at Preston Patrick, at Firbank Fell, in the dales of Yorkshire, among the hills of Westmoreland and Cumberland, in the villages and cities all over England, to whom George Fox and his associates, men and women, were drawn of the Lord to minister, so there are seekers to-day, everywhere, impelled by a power that they cannot resist, and which they would not resist if they could, thirsting for a fresh revelation of God, almost ready to say with King Agrippa,—“Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian”, but they turn from the twentieth century realization of the Christian church with a feeling of dissatisfaction. They have been doubters and quibblers all their lives; the platforms upon which they have stood have been broad and ample, but they have not been firm, they are seeking for that which has above all else the element of endurance, and the Quaker message of two hundred and fifty years ago, whether they recognize it by name or not, appeals to them as no other message does. Some of these come from groups of men whom we have learned to shun, they have long-sounding titles, they have read profound books of philosophy, and some of them have written such, but there are among them those who know; they have failed to find the Fountain and who are willing to make this knowledge a "new starting place".

Nor does this class embrace all the seekers; there are many entangled by the meshes of tradition, family ties and outward circumstances, who yield freely of their silver to support the church of their former adoption, and who are glad at heart to know that a part of what they offer filters down through the various avenues of disbursement till it reaches the really needy, but as the weeks follow on there is that within them which revolts against much that they encounter. Were there a George Fox raised up to-day with the spirit of reform as keen and as just, and with a life as Godly as his, and were he to assail our latter day weaknesses and shortcomings as George Fox assailed those of Cromwell's time, some of these men would rally to the standard of the modern Fox.

A Religious Society of Friends with its discipline to support, its corporate life to live out before the people, its committees to man, its reports to elaborate, in short, its varied work to do, is not a George Fox of 1654 with sixty other preachers of like intensity pouring out of the north of England to overrun the whole countryside.

We have to face facts as they exist, and the organization, needful as it is, has its drawbacks when we confront conditions as outlined above. None the less there is no real cause for misgiving on our part. The task is great, but not too great for each one to render his share to its solution. The demand is greater upon us than ever that we let no bushel hide our candlestick, but that it have a place of advantage whence its light may shine widely forth.

The little meeting-house by the roadside whose shutters are closed on First-day mornings, not because no Friends live nearby, but because, it may be, no Friend feels that he is strong enough to assume the responsibility of the meeting, should open its windows and let in the light of day, and with it, if one man or one woman is faithful, will come another Light, that has cheered and blessed with its radiance fathers and mothers who long ago were laid at rest in the little graveyard close by, and will cheer and strengthen their sons and daughters to the last generation if they have the faith and faithfulness of their fathers and mothers. This special testimony bearing in the maintenance of a small meeting, did not fall in the scope of George Fox's experience, but it is one that peculiarly belongs to us of to-day, and we lose a wonderful opportunity in not embracing it.

But why cite examples? Each follower will have his own road; they will not be identical, but all will converge in the end toward that one central station which is the final abiding place of all Christians, who having followed no cunningly devised fables, yield themselves to the guidance of the Inspeaking Voice and follow on.

To such a one it has been written—"Nothing is unimportant, nothing is trivial, because the Light Within is either growing stronger with each moment, each action wrought, each word spoken, or waning into darkness, and ceasing to fall athwart the footsteps of Christ across the world, until its gleam is merged in the eternal radiance of Heaven."

Abraham Lincoln was devoted to the verses that begin:—"Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud!" Not, however, because each man's experience was not a new experience to himself. We repeat our fathers' words, our voices are the echoes of theirs, but they are our own, and should spring from virgin soil with each of us. As there were reforms in George Fox's day, so there should be reformers to-day. We have advantages of freedom of speech over him, the world about us wants the message he gave forth, and who knows that the call is not as insistent as it was two hundred and fifty years ago?

The outworn rite, the old abuse,
The pious fraud transparent grown,
The God held captive in the use
Of wrong alone,—

These wait their doom, from that great law
Which makes the past time serve to-day:
And fresher life the world shall draw
From their decay.

O, backward-looking son of time!
The new is old, the old is new,
The cycle of a change sublime
Still sweeping through.

ITALY AND CO-EDUCATION.

Systems of separate education are in the main relics of monastic systems. It is interesting to see how a country like Italy under the impulse of the modern spirit of progress has torn away from the past in this matter.—Ed.

PARIS, France.—The fact that the co-education of boys and girls obtains throughout Italy is not one generally known. The manner in which this system was introduced into that country is told in an exceptionally interesting article by Louise Cruppi in the Temps.

Co-education in Italy, she says, was not brought about by the action of Parliament, it was merely the result of circumstance. At the time when the convents where girls received their education closed, the parents were at a loss how to provide for the education of their daughters. One mother, however, solved the difficulty by asking the headmaster of the boys' school which her son attended to take her two daughters as pupils.

The master assented, and in Turin, and soon in the other cities of northern Italy, the practice of sending the girls to the same schools as the boys spread rapidly. When the time came for the innovation to be extended to southern Italy, where women do not enjoy the same freedom as in the north, there was some hesitation on the part of the authorities.

A trial was made at a school in Naples and the results were found to be entirely satisfactory. What this means to the development of Italy can hardly be realized, for in the days of convent education, secondary and superior education for girls were unknown. To show how wedded to the system of co-education the Italian public has become, it is sufficient to quote an incident which occurred in Milan, in 1902.

At the Beccera school an attempt was made to establish a section for girls alone, attendance at which instead of at the mixed classes was to be made obligatory. A protest was immediately made by the parents, who argued that at least they should be allowed to choose which their daughters should attend. In a few years' time the number of girl scholars in the girls' section had become so small that it was found necessary to close the section and revert entirely to the co-education system.

At present in Italy there is but one school entirely for girls, the Regina Elena in Rome, and the number of pupils inscribed on its books is small. Co-education gives the Italian girl a great advantage over her French sister in the matter of the adoption of a profession, and in the north of Italy where the girls are extremely studious the advantage is by no means neglected.

EIGHT years ago there was only one girl in the country who could write eighty-two words a minute on a typewriter, and keep it up for an hour. She won a prize for speed and accuracy in 1906, held her supremacy for four years, and in 1909 raised the number of words to ninety-five. Then in 1910 a man wrote 100 words a minute. He kept the lead for two years, but lost it in 1912 to a girl who wrote at the rate of 117 words. This year another girl has taken the prize with a record of 125 words a minute. This marvelous increase in speed—a gain of more than fifty per cent. over that of 1906—is due as much to improvements in the typewriting machine as to greater skill on the part of the operator. The modern machine responds more quickly to the touch than the early ones, and works more freely.

Do not desert your work, but pierce into its heart, exalt it to its loftiest conception, if you would be more holy.—
PHILLIPS BROOKS.

FIRE-PROOFING COTTON.

LLOYD BALDERSTON, JR.

A warm object exposed to cool air becomes cool. The particles of the warm object are moving back and forth very rapidly in very short paths; that is, they are in vibration. These vibrations, far too small and rapid to be seen in any manner, set the light-bearing ether into vibration, and thus the heat-energy of the warm body is given out as radiation. The term radiation includes all ether vibrations given off by bodies which are warm or hot or shining, as well as wireless telegraphy waves. Any of these vibrations may be called waves.

The air interferes with the vibrations of the ether which is among it, so to speak. In the case of light waves, which are extremely short, the hindrance is slight. So it is in the case of the wireless telegraphy waves, which are very long. Those which lie between, such as are given off by warm bodies, and those that are hot, but not hot enough to give light, are much more hindered by the air. In thus putting brakes on the ether waves, the air becomes heated, and we say that it absorbs the radiation. Heat is thus transferred from the warm body to the air.

If the surrounding air is at rest, that near the warm object soon becomes warm, and the object loses heat more slowly. The fact that heat passes from a warmer to a cooler thing more rapidly when the difference of temperature is greater is called Newton's law of cooling. It is a very familiar fact that the human body loses heat to cold air more rapidly than to warm. In order to keep warm, then, we wish to keep the air next to our bodies from changing too rapidly. Clothing does this.

Leather would not make good underclothing, because its smoothness would permit it to fit too closely to the skin, and so leave no room for a layer of warm air. A kid glove is poor protection against cold. A "wooly" lining adds much to the warmth, largely because of the air thus enclosed among the fibres.

Fine metallic wires woven into cloth would make very bad cold weather clothing, because when the inner side of a garment received heat from the body, the heat would be rapidly conducted to the outside and carried off by radiation, since metals are good conductors of heat. Wool and other animal fibres are poor conductors, or, as we are more apt to say, good non-conductors. Wool makes warm clothing partly because it is a non-conductor, and partly because a fabric made of it has many fine fibres sticking out over it, which imprison a layer of air, which becomes warmed by the heat of the body.

Cotton is inferior to wool as a non-conductor, and it also tends to make smooth fabrics, so that in general cotton clothing is not so warm as woollen. Not many years ago some ingenious man found a way to pick the surface of cotton goods and so raise a "nap." The cloth thus made resembles flannel. It is nearly as warm as woollen flannel of the same thickness, is very much cheaper, and is less liable to injury in washing. It has the serious disadvantage of being very easy to burn. If a lighted match be held against a woollen fabric, the place touched by the flame is charred, but the fabric does not blaze up. Cotton or linen goods burns pretty freely, and cotton flannel flares up very quickly because of the fine hairs over its surface.

As the use of cotton flannel increased, it was found that the number of deaths and injuries of children from their clothing catching fire was rapidly increasing. There was serious talk in England of prohibiting by law the manufacture and sale of cotton flannel. The manufacturers strongly objected, holding that such a law would be not only a great injury to them, but a great hardship to the poor, who cannot afford woollen clothes for their children.

One great firm determined to make if possible a cotton flannel as safe as wool. They employed William Henry Perkin to find the way to do it. Those of us who are sometimes called upon to solve problems in practical chemistry and do not succeed at the first trial, are apt to think that a genius is one who by instinct knows the right way to do a thing, and does it that way the first time. It is very comforting therefore to find that nearly ten thousand tests were made in the series of experiments conducted by this gifted veteran chemist before full success was reached.

A piece of cloth may be made fire-proof merely by dipping in salt water and drying. Salted fabric attracts moisture, so as to become damp and sticky. It is harsh to the touch and in other ways unsatisfactory. Beside, the salt washes out. Any process, to be acceptable, must leave the goods as soft as before, and not make them attract moisture, and the fire-proofing material must not wash out. It must not leave any such substance as lead or mercury in the cloth, because even the minute particles rubbed off in ordinary wear would poison the wearer. Most active poisons are not soluble in water, but many insoluble substances, if brought into contact with the moist skin, are acted on in such a way as to be able to do us harm.

The problem thus presented is much like that of dyeing a fabric. Often two substances, both of which are soluble, act on each other to form an insoluble substance. If a piece of cloth is dipped in a solution of one of them, and then into a solution of the other, the insoluble substance may be formed in the fibres in such a way that it cannot be washed out. Even if a dye could be found which made the cloth fireproof, it would not be satisfactory as a general method because much of the cotton flannel is used white. The experimenters therefore tried to find what we call a white dye which should at the same time prevent the fabric from burning freely. Of the great number of things tried, some were not fire-proof, some attracted moisture, some spoiled the softness of the material, and many which were successful in all these ways would not withstand repeated washing.

In the process finally adopted, which meets all the requirements, the material is first passed through a solution of sodium stannate, a compound of sodium, oxygen and tin (Latin, stannum, tin). It is next dried by passing over heated copper rolls, and then passed through a solution of sulphate of ammonia and again dried. The two chemicals act upon each other to make sodium sulphate (Glauber salt) and oxide of tin, the ammonia escaping. The fabric is now washed to dissolve out the Glauber salt, dried and finished.

The oxide of tin is so firmly fixed on the fibre that a hundred washings do not remove it. Indeed, it seems probable that the tin oxide and the cotton actually combine chemically, so that the fabric is changed in a manner reminding one of the tanning of skin. Not only has this process no injurious effect on the goods, but actually increases its strength by about twenty per cent. It will therefore wear enough longer to be worth the increased cost of two cents a yard. This entirely unexpected result is an instance of poetic justice, which it is perhaps not irreverent to call providential.

There are many examples of indirect benefits flowing from effort put forth to conquer a difficulty. The most familiar example is that of the weeds which compel us to cultivate our crops. So the fight against temptation and other hindrances yields rich reward in developing the fibre of character. Whether or not we believe that there is any necessary connection between struggle and indirect reward, let us rejoice that this determined effort to remove a serious danger to children has been crowned with such complete and gratifying success.

"Many served the Lord as well,
Hearing what He had to tell—Servants both of Jesus they,"
Servants in a different way,
May we too His servants be!
In us may He gladly see
Choosers of the better part,
Mirthful hands with Mary's heart.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE QUALITY OF BEING INCONSPICUOUS.

On reading in THE FRIEND of Eleventh Month 27th, the article entitled, "How Nature Protects," and being freshly impressed by the wisdom of the all-wise Creator in so providing for these creatures, my mind was directed along a rather different channel of thought than that which either the writer or myself had expected, by the following quotation: "There is no quality more generally useful to an animal than that of being inconspicuous." It looks evident that this protective inconspicuousness in the animal creation is in order that the individual may survive and that each generation may be enabled to beget another generation even stronger than itself. Each animal has its own particular place to fill in the kingdom and each one is protected in a peculiar manner, by coloration, size or habits according to its mode of life, locality, strength of muscle or other weapons of defense. So it is from the weakest form to the king of beasts that the one influences the other, by playing a part in the great work of the creation. Better and more effectually can this be done because of the quality of being inconspicuous.

And here begins that other part of the lesson as it came to me. Man who was made higher than any other form of animal life, given the intellect with which no other creation of God was endowed, made even in the likeness of God, may learn a lesson from this very point. Each tabernacle of clay which contains a living soul has an individual work to perform, which no other one is intended to perform in just that same niche. And can he not best do it by possessing that quality of inconspicuousness which hides all self and the desires of the natural man within the protective nature of Christ? It does not hide the individuality, any more than protective coloration hides the individuality of the dumb animal, but it enables the individual to do in the best and strongest way that work which is allotted to him. For having our natures hidden in Christ—that is, born into him, will not only enable us to do our own part of the work, but will enable us also to beget a generation stronger and more powerful in the work of advancing Christianity than any generation has heretofore been, when it may be said in fulness, that the children of men are indeed the sons and daughters of God. When this is our opportunity, should we not grasp it, and beware of that tendency of self-exaltation which grows so easily within us? Not intentionally, often is this, but little by little, by praise or wealth or over-ambition of self, we lose sight of the real motive of life which is that of being hidden in Christ, and attempt to come out in our own strength from under the inconspicuous covering. This will leave us unarmed and unable to meet the darts of the enemy. Each human being, whether seen or unseen, whether by silence or by speech, by poverty or wealth, by low degree or high degree, has an important part to play in the great work of the creation. Of the human being we cannot say as definitely as we can of the dumb beast: Better and more effectually can this be done because of being inconspicuous. But we can say that as each one becomes willing to be so ruled by an unseen power as is the beast, or in other words, become as little children dependent wholly upon an all-wise Father, then could we understand the force of the word "because" concerning the human race also and say, in truth: Better and more effectually this is done because of the quality of being hidden in Christ. Whittier expresses it thus:

"With that deep insight which detects
All great things in the small,
And knows how each man's life affects
The spiritual life of all,
He walked by faith and not by sight,
By love and not by law;
The presence of the wrong or right,
He rather felt than saw."

M. D. S.

WILLIAM WHEELER.

"May we not with perfect confidence give way to the hope, that that Gracious Father who doeth all things well, will through the power of his Spirit, whenever the distressing account reaches you, support you, comfort you—nay, even make you triumphantly to overcome the pangs that human nature feels on such an occasion, and enable you to praise that Holy Name, through whose mercy your first-born is now an heir of glory, of eternal bliss. I have no doubt about it, and these lines have not therefore the intention to mourn with you over the death of our dearest William, but to join you in thanksgiving, in praising the Lord, for the great and mighty work he has done in bringing a youthful mind so soon to maturity, to fit him by so short a course of Christian warfare for the heavenly state where nothing that is impure can enter. Oh! my beloved friend, was there in all your life a greater cause for glorifying God than this striking instance of Divine favor evinced to you.

You will receive the testimony of friends about your son, which you will have cause to value more than all I can say; this will tell you what a scholar the departed has been in the school of Christ. It cannot but be gratifying to the feelings of a father, to see his anxious cares, his earnest prayers, his exhortations, his pious desires have not been in vain, have been so evidently accepted; yea, the utmost he could desire has been granted, and will cause your every feeling to exclaim, "What shall I render to the Lord for all his goodness."

To the natural eye it may appear gloomy, that after such a dedication as you have evinced in the service you are engaged in, such distressing accounts must reach you, perhaps in distant regions, perhaps in reaching the native shore in joyful expectation of meeting the endeared object, after so painful a separation, but to your spiritual eye it will have a different appearance.

There is no cause for gloominess, no cause for lamentation in the dispensation; it is all glorious. The more you examine into all the particulars, the more you will see the Divine hand, leading and preparing, caring and protecting and finishing in a way that cannot be mistaken that is so striking, so altogether lovely, that I, at least, never saw the like. Who can search out the depths of wisdom in his decrees? Who can foresee all the glorious results that may yet follow out this event? His ways are past finding out! and there is not, I doubt, half yet revealed, what mercy is yet in store, in this very dispensation.

What he now doeth (what the whole meaning of it is) we know not, but we shall know hereafter. It is enough now to know that your William has entered into glory; that is a theme which to a Christian father is not a mournful one.

I trust dear Charles will share the same feeling; he, no doubt, will feel the shock coming so unexpectedly, so unlooked for, as keenly as we all have felt it, though he has through long separation, in a measure, been weaned from that endearing intercourse with the departed which those dear relatives enjoyed who had the happiness of being his immediate companions; but even to them strength has been vouchsafed to submit to the Divine will, and to praise the Lord for his loving kindness manifested to dear William, they have felt wonderfully supported, particularly Sarah, who, we must all say, lost most. You will receive their letters, they will give you all particulars.

I have no more to say about it. It is the Lord's doings. Before you close your eyes, I trust you will have cause to exclaim, "Lord, here am I, and the children which thou hast given me."

I rather think your further steps will be directed homeward, and in that prospect, I refrain from saying anything about the undertaking at this place. Perhaps I may have the happiness of seeing you here, if not, we can converse by letter about it. Farewell, my honored friend, my kindest love to Charles."

As confirmatory of the surmise which his Russian friend thus discloses concerning Daniel Wheeler's attitude of spirit, let us recur to his own words when the tidings were still fresh in mind—under date of Sixth Month 18th, 1837:—

"Since last First-day, various have been my trials and provings, but the Divine hand has sustained through all; and by letters now received from England I am greatly comforted, inasmuch as the belief so strong in my heart, of the mercy and compassion of my God, is more than ever confirmed as regards the close of my precious William, in several particulars far more abundantly than I could have conceived; and above all, in the certain evidence that He hath crowned him with everlasting life. I had nothing more to ask. 'The Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping, the Lord hath heard my supplication, the Lord hath received my prayer,' and the kingdom and the power and the glory are his forever."

How beautifully does this correspond to his earlier remarks quoted elsewhere! as he said with emotion, "This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting."

On Tenth Month 1st, 1836, he records: "Left the vessel at Portsmouth, and, after writing to inquire where the wreck of my family were sojourning, crossed the Isle of Wight to Niton, where I was comforted by the particulars I gleaned of the close of my precious William, and I had an opportunity of acknowledging personally the Christian kindness of several whose hearts had been opened to administer to the comfort of his last days.

"Spent a solitary evening at the hotel, and occupied the chamber whence his immortal spirit had returned unto God who gave it, purified, I humbly trust, through the blood of Jesus, and prepared for an admittance into the everlasting kingdom." In conclusion, let us recur once more to W. Wheeler's own words in these following lines which evince the reverent and aspiring attitude of his soul:—

Jesus, my Lord! to thy dear name,
Thro' utmost earth and sea and skies,
Raised by the Spirit's holiest flame,
May clouds of sweetest incense rise.

Jesus, my Lord! Thy boundless love
A seraph choir could never tell,
Too weak to bear thro' realms above
Thy triumphs over death and hell.

Jesus, my Lord! where'er I roam,
Throughout thy universal reign,
Oh make this beating heart thy home,
Thy glorious Spirit's hallowed fan.

Jesus, my Lord! when reached the verge
Of time's uncertain darkling scene,
Bid me from Jordan's wave emerge
And see thy face as I am seen.

W. WHEELER.

[THESE remarks seem to me calculated to stimulate parents, and for their intrinsic value I copy them; also in connection with sketches of individuals of the Wheeler family to show the method of training in a family where such precious spiritual fruits were borne.—A. T. G.]

THE TESTIMONY OF A SON TO HIS FATHER'S HELPFUL INFLUENCE.

FROM THE "CONCLUDING REMARKS" TO THE "MEMOIRS OF DANIEL WHEELER" BY HIS SON.

It is far from the intention of the editor to attempt any elaborate delineation of the character of the subject of these Memoirs; this he thinks will be best gathered from the correspondence and memoranda which have preceded. There is, however, one feature on which he hopes the reader will bear with him, whilst he offers a few remarks, which appear to be called for by the peculiar opportunities for observation which he enjoyed, viz.: the mingled fidelity and tenderness with which his beloved father sustained the responsible character of a parent. In reverting to this particular, those who enjoy the privilege of a filial relationship feel that they have abundant cause to rise up and call him blessed.

From their early years the benign influence of his devout and pious spirit was forcibly felt, and it is now a mournful satisfaction to the survivors to recollect that their earliest impressions of good were associated with the affectionate counsels of their departed father. His was not the language of precept only, that of his strikingly consistent example was still more powerful. It was impossible to observe from day to day the thankful, cheerful, humble frame of mind which he so uniformly manifested, his watchfulness to check every rising of improper feeling, and, above all, the deep reverence and filial love which pervaded his heart towards the great Author of every mercy, without being made sensible of that blessed and all-pervading principle which regulated the daily tenor of his life.

STONY BROOK MEETING, NEAR PRINCETON, N. J.

JOSEPH S. MIDDLETON.

Stony Brook is a good-sized mill stream, rising back of Lambertville, and flowing past Princeton, through the Millstone to the Karitan River. It turns Worth's mill, near the meeting-house, whose original projector was Joseph Worth, in whose family it was kept until recent years.

The meeting-house is situated in a quiet spot near a large grove of fine old forest trees. It is surrounded by a well-kept yard, and strangers visiting the place would little suspect that the meeting was laid down more than thirty years ago. The burial-ground, too, is in good condition and the frequent use of the lawn mower shows that this city of the dead is not neglected.

As early as 1606 Benjamin Clarke, whose father had previously settled at Perth Amboy, came to this section and took up 1,200 acres of land along Stony Brook, about 10 acres of which he sold in 1700 to Friends for a meeting-house and grave-yard.

Other Friends' families soon afterward came here, among whom were those of Stocken, Olden, Worth, Wright and Horner. Richard Stockton in 1676 came to Burlington, his son John settling near Stony Brook, where he bought 5,500 acres in 1704. John's son Richard was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and was buried in the yard near the meeting-house in an unmarked grave.

As was usual in early Friends' settlements, the first meetings were held at central private houses. "At a Monthly Meeting held at Chesterfield (Crosswicks, N. J.) the 7th of Tenth Month, 1710, the Friends at Stony Brook were granted liberty to hold meetings for Divine worship either at the house of Benjamin Clarke or Joseph Worth."

Thomas Chalklev writes in his Journal, in 1725, "About the latter end of the Third Month, I went to the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders for the County of Burlington, and from thence to Stony Brook, where on the First-day we had a large meeting (in Joseph Worth's barn) which was crowded with people, and was a solid, good meeting." Edition of 1749, page 149.

Application having been made to the Monthly Meeting in 1724 for advice and assistance to build a meeting-house at Stony Brook, the matter was referred to the Quarterly Meeting in the Twelfth Month, 1724, which advised that a house be built of stone, thirty feet wide and thirty-four feet long, to cost about two hundred pounds, and Friends of the Quarterly Meeting were requested to forward contributions to assist them. The house was finished in 1726.

This meeting-house is about a mile southwest of Princeton, and some ten miles from Trenton. To reach it, take a trolley car at the corner of State and Broad Streets, in Trenton, passing through the village of Lawrenceville, to a piece of woods on the southern side of the grounds where the conductor will let off passengers in front of the meeting-house, about two hundred yards distant.

Through the misfortune of a fire in 1759 the building was damaged so much that it became necessary to take it down and rebuild, which was done in 1760, on the same foundation, at a cost of £238. 5s. 11d, the expense being shared by the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings.

The meeting-house is of note in many ways to Friends, as the centre of one of the earliest settlements in this section of New Jersey, antedating the Presbyterian meeting-house in Princeton by thirty-seven years. A peculiarity about it is that it is not located on a public road, but is reached by a lane of considerable length leading from what is known as "The Quaker Road."¹⁸

The seating capacity is about one hundred and fifty below and eighty above, the seats above, rising, but without backs. An arched ceiling of wood hangs from the rafters, a peculiar and interesting feature. Open fire-places, now closed, were originally used for heating, but a large wood stove later on. There is but one high seat in the gallery on either side of the aisle, which is reached by steps at the ends. As this was not a Monthly Meeting, there is no division between the two sides, the men Friends withdrawing to the school-house near by to transact their business meetings; there is, however, a partial division in the youths' galleries, as the younger element then as now needed to be kept in restraint, when out of view of the Elders.

On the west end of the grounds near "The Quaker Road" a frame house was built in 1781 for the residence of a school-master, or as a convenient home for the teacher of Friends' children. Not until 1800 was a school-house built, a one-story frame, 16 by 24 feet in size, located at the northeast corner of the burial ground, near the meeting-house. Owing to want of use and decay this was taken down in 1901. The furnishing was somewhat peculiar, there being a long desk on each of the three sides of the room, at which the scholars sat on benches without backs, facing the centre of the room. These desks were on a raised platform eight inches high, the lower floor being for the recitation benches. The teacher's desk was at the right of the entrance door, and a wood stove in the centre. As was the custom in olden times, Friends' schools had their rules and regulations, which were read occasionally to the scholars; some of these quaint and interesting to latter-day views are embodied in the following:

"No distinction must be made between the rich and poor by teacher or trustees. The daily sessions must begin at eight and two o'clock from Fourth Month 1st to Tenth Month 1st, and one-half hour later the remaining six months, four hours to each session, the master shall speak the plain, grammatical, Scripture language, and require it on all occasions from the scholars, who must be clear of the use of evil words and actions of all kinds, he shall suffer no scholar in the school who has the itch or any other infectious distemper, he is expected to attend Midweek Meetings with the scholars, he is not to withhold correction when it is needful, but not to strike any tender place, especially the face, to enjoin punctuality, and silence unless when saying lessons or speaking to the master, to always be tenderly affectionate to the teacher, and never provoke your companions, to be courteous to them and never to make trifling complaints, nor forward in divulging what passes in schools."

(To be concluded.)

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

For "THE FRIEND."

THE STORY OF BILLY AND BESSIE RYAN.—There lay in a little room, a top back in a miserable wreck of a house, one of several that formed a filthy court in the most slimy and unsavory region of St. Luke's parish—a decent, working widow of about forty-five, who was helplessly ill and could barely move hand or foot. At a glance a visitor could see that the room, though devoid of every comfort, was neat and kept scrupulously clean. The woman had struck her leg and the blow had caused a wound which had formed into an ugly and festering ulcer. As long as she was able to walk she had gone as an out-patient to the nearest hospital. There she lay in the dripping, dreary days of the late autumn months, unhelped and helpless.

But her chief care was about her children, little Billy and Bessie. She prayed to God for them. She had under her pillow a leaf of a well-known weekly Christian paper containing an account of one of Dr. Barnardo's cases of rescue, which concluded with the statement that No destitute child is ever turned away from his door; and the poor soul in her distress took this leaf, read it over and over again, and asked the Lord that her little ones might be taken in there.

Let us now see how little Billy fares on the first night of our story.

"Matches, sir?" said a piping, timid voice to a gentleman who hurries out of Moorgate Street Station, thinking of the business transacted at a board meeting of a Society in which he was interested. And he glanced down at the shoeless feet of the little fellow who stood by in the murky, fitful light of that damp night. "Matches, sir?" he repeated, making bold because the gentleman had turned and looked at him. "Two a ha' penny? (one cent). Two boxes a ha' penny, sir. Buy 'em, sir!" persisted the diminutive seller, as he kept beside the gentleman who was hurrying home. Then he added, in order to make the more sure of doing business, "Could give yer three, but there aint much profit!"

At this the gentleman paused, and took a good look at the little street merchant. But the gentleman must himself tell us what further took place in this interview, and what it led to.

I saw a sight, common enough, alas! in London; a little street vendor, shoeless and stockingless, his bare feet well muddied, his trousers ragged, his jacket torn. Trousers and jacket were all he had to cover him from the drizzling rain and the shivering fog. A queer little old patched cap was perched on one side of his head in a knowing fashion, pathetically at variance with the sad lines of his face. The child looked to me about eight years of age; but I guessed him to be about nine, for he was of stunted growth.

"Sold much to-day?" I inquired. He shook his head.

"Six boxes ain't much; only t'ree ha' pence for the lot."

"Who sent you out?"

"Mother."

"And why does mother send out a little chap like you?"

"She can't help it; she's werry bad."

"Where is she?"

"Home."

"Anybody else there?"

"Sissy."

"Do you make much money?"

"Sometimes, if I'm lucky."

"Are you often lucky?"

"Not 'xactly often; I wor in real luck yesterday."

"How's that?"

"Such a nice gemman came along, and says he, 'You are a pore little chap,' and he gave me a shilling. Oh! he wor a nice gemman, he wor!"

My young companion had wasted no words, and now, when such emphasis was laid upon this particular gentleman, I felt sure he was being held up for imitation!

"Why don't you go home with your three ha' pence?" I continued.

"BETTER a little in peace and with right, than much with anxiety and strife."

"Taint no use," said the boy. "Taint no use going home with littler nor sixpence."

"Must you always have sixpence?"

The little head was nodded quickly and emphatically. Clearly sixpence was the irreducible minimum!

At this gentleman's request the little fellow told him where he lived. "Come on with me," the gentleman said, "and I will see your mother. I am a doctor, and perhaps I can do her some good."

By this time our readers will have divined who this gentleman was—Dr. Barnardo himself, now hurrying on his errand of mercy, guided by the pattering feet of Billy.

On reaching No. 13, Plough Court, St. Luke's, where the mother and two children dwelt, the little fellow led his visitor up a flight of creaky and filthy stairs, holding him tightly with his own small, thin hand, and then, on reaching the back room on the top floor, ran in first. The doctor waited outside. In a few moments the door was thrown open, and a weak voice said, "Come in, sir." Dr. Barnardo found the room literally devoid of furniture. "There was no chair to sit down on; no table to fill up the bare floor space. Yet there was a marvelous air of peace and even of comfort in that empty garret! All, for instance, was wondrously clean. And one felt that there was a decent and gracious air about the place that spoke well for its human occupants." A poor, decent-looking woman lay on a heap of rags on the floor. A few words of sympathy and explanation led to the telling of her simple story. But the doctor did not, as yet, say who he was; neither had the family any idea. "By the side of the woman stood a little girl of about six years of age—'our Bess,' she called her, a bright-eyed, winsome little lassie."

When the suffering woman was asked why she did not go into a hospital, the answer she gave made the visitor regret that he should have made the suggestion. "What would become of the children?" said the poor woman. "Billy might do for a bit by himself—he is a brave lad! But our Bess—." And then the poor mother broke down in tears, but in a moment she had recovered herself, and her then calm and resolute face revealed where Billy got his bravery.

"Well, then, why not try to get the children into some Home or Refuge, while you are taken to the hospital and properly treated?" "Ah, yes sir!" she replied eagerly. "That's what I would like; but then I don't know how to set about it."

"Look here, sir," continued the woman, and she put the leaf about one of Dr. Barnardo's own Rescues in his hand, saying, "Read that, sir! I have been hoping and praying that God would let Billy and Bess get in there. I know they'd be safe, and they'd both be together, and then I'd go in cheerful to the 'ospital!"

Her visitor felt with deep emotion that he could not keep her longer without telling her who he was. "My name is Barnardo," he said, and forthwith informed her that he had a great many boys and girls like hers in his charge, and that was why he had asked her little boy to bring him to her; and now, if she was willing, he would take Billy and Bessie and keep them while she was away.

With wonder and amazement, and tears the poor mother called her children, "Billy!" and he was promptly at her side, "Bess, dear!" and then, holding the two children in her trembling hands, she said, "This is the gentleman that has all the little boys and girls. I told you God would hear me, and now He's just sent him here to take and keep you both until I am well again."

There promptly followed notes of various names and addresses that the woman supplied that the doctor might verify the facts and assure himself that she was without friends who would help her, and that her case was entirely genuine, though the air of truth her whole story wore made inquiry almost a formality. He saw to the immediate needs of the family, and left, but not until he had got Billy to tell again the story of the "nice gentleman."

"Now, Billy, what shall I do to be like the nice gentleman?"

Shall I give you a shilling now? or shall I take you to my own Bessie into my Home and send you to her to be like her?"

Billy hesitated, but not so Bessie. The words were straight out of the doctor's mouth, when little Bessie, about six years of age, doctor and placed her tiny hand confidently in his, "Billy" said slowly, yet firmly, after some thought, "It is rather well, I think it would be nicer to have the shilling; but I'll go with you, sir, all right." Ere much time had passed, one of the doctor's good women helpers was seeing to the wants of the patient, and providing food and fuel and a few garments for the children, whilst he was obtaining an order of admission to the hospital for the poor sufferer herself, who he felt belonged to the "household of faith."

That is how Billy and Bessie came to be added to Dr. Barnardo's family of over seven thousand boys and girls, who look to him as their father and friend. From Dr. Barnardo's Life. Copied by A. J. G.

NEWS ITEMS.

ULSTER FRIENDS AND THE POLITICAL SITUATION.—As stated a date night ago, Ulster Friends in their Quarterly Meeting at Belfast on the fifth of First Month, appointed a Conference to be held at Lisburn on the 22nd, "to consider the conditions now existing, and which may accrue to the legislative measures for Ireland now in progress, with a view to assisting Friends to decide what position they should individually adopt during the present crisis." Edwin Spence, Albert Shonold, Charles Benington, Samuel A. Bell and P. Murray Bass were appointed a committee to arrange the Conference.

A large number of Friends from all meetings in the Province gathered accordingly. The meeting commenced with a period of silent waiting upon the Lord and the offering of vocal prayer that Friends might have a deep sense of dependence upon Him. In the ensuing discussion, it was felt by almost all that Ireland was on the eve of a very serious crisis in her national history, and that unless there was a change in the present political outlook bloodshed and civil war were almost certain to take place. It was felt that Friends might, and probably would, have their Peace principles severely tried, as they were in Ireland over one hundred years ago, and more recently during the American Civil war, and in our own time on the Australian Continent and in New Zealand. Many younger Friends were present, and were encouraged to be faithful to the teachings of our Lord in respect to taking life, faithfulness which they were reminded that it might often require more moral courage to carry out than to observe the discipline of a volunteer corps.

A three hours' solemn and, it was felt interesting and helpful, Conference was concluded with vocal prayer.—The Friend, London.

THE NEW "WOOLMAN."—While wrong or opposition remains anywhere, John Woolman will not be out of date. To be introduced to him in new dress and by a sympathetic non-Friend is always a pleasure, and one which we have enjoyed in reading the Life recently prepared by Teignmouth Shore, son of the late well-known Canon of Worcester of that name. This is no mere reprint of the Journal, though that classic furnishes the foundation of the book, but the author has gathered from recondite sources at Devonshire House and elsewhere facts and descriptions which have enabled him vividly to paint in the background of the picture of this eighteenth century saint.—The Friend, London.

The following is an editorial note from the Westminster for Second Month: A press of other work of a kindred nature has made it seem wise for the Editorial duties of the Westminster to fall to other hands. In accordance with the withdrawal of Davis H. Forsythe from the task which he has generously performed for four years or more, the Publication Committee take this opportunity of expressing their sense of satisfaction with the character of the work he has done for them. We are assured of his interest in the Westminster, and as time permits we are confident of his continued help and encouragement. In the interval until an Editor is elected the duties that have been performed by him will be shared by the Publication Committee.

WASHINGTON, Second Month 6th.—George Vaux, Jr., of Philadelphia, was re-elected chairman of the Board of Indian Commissioners at its session here to-day. F. H. Abbott, of Washington, was re-elected Secretary. F. H. Abbott said more than $250,000 a year could be saved to the Government by giving the Indian limited representation in the expenditure of his money. Successful operation of a sawmill by the Menominees was reported. Co-operation between the Indians and forces both outside and inside the Government was advocated by the board as a solution for the intricate problems involved in the civilization of the Indians. Representatives of Indian tribes and missionary organizations urged harmony.—The Public Ledger.

The account of Abington Quarterly Meeting is abridged from the Lodge of Second Month 6th:

The Abington Quarterly Meeting of Friends met yesterday at Coulter Street, Germantown.

Reports were sent in from the Monthly Meetings. The roll call showed all but two of the representatives present.

The nine Queries were read and the Answers summarized to be sent to the Yearly Meeting.

The report of attendance of meetings was good. Germantown showed great activity and life. At its midweek meetings there is an attendance of 325 students.

Regarding temperance, the appointed committee reported that it was still laboring with the small number of Friends who continued the use of alcoholic beverages, and the outlook was encouraging. The committee was continued.

The subject of harmful diversions called out remarks from many Friends. George Warner reported that the committee had conferred with Director Porter about the increasing number of shows and entertainments of questionable character. The Director said that it was not in his power to stop the evil, but that he would endeavor to watch and curb it.

In the Women's Meeting there was a discussion about the widespread temptation to various forms of gambling in the games played for money and prizes. At the close of the meetings a lunch was provided in the parlors.

A TELEGRAM to our friend, William Evans, has announced the death of ELIZABETH EDGERTON, wife of Jesse Edgerton, of Damascus, Ohio, at her home, on Second Month 6th. These dear friends were in attendance at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1912, and were warmly esteemed here.

At Haverford College the Friends of the two upper classes are meeting once each month at the home of President Sharpless for a discussion of the things of Quakerdom. "Doctrines" and "William Penn" have been the subjects of two of the meetings. The group is usually attended by from fifteen to twenty and interest has been high.—The American Friend.

At New Garden Monthly Meeting, Pa., held on the fourth inst., Zehede Haines was granted a minute for religious service within the limits of New England and New York.

UNDER the auspices of a committee of the Monthly Meeting on the dissemination of Friends' views, a lecture on "Old-Fashioned Quaker Principles and Present Day Opportunities," was given on First Month 23, in the Eutaw Street Meeting-house in Baltimore, by William C. Dennis, of Washington, D. C. There was a good audience, many of whom were not Friends. The lecturer maintained that old-fashioned Quakerism was essentially a spiritual democracy, based upon individual relations with God, and out of this relationship grew the distinctive testimonies of the past, most of which are especially adapted to the needs of to-day. The lecture was highly appreciated.—The American Friend.

[The following is clipped from the Evening Bulletin of Second Month 4th. We are not at all sure the words quoted are rightly attributed to Stephen Grellet. Perhaps some reader can say.—Ed.]

"I SHALL PASS THROUGH THIS WORLD BUT ONCE."—The New York Herald to-day prints the following special from London: "I shall pass through this world but once. Any good thing that I can do, therefore, or any kindness I can show to any human being, let me do it now. Let me not defer nor neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

"These words, written on the wall of the out-patients' hall, caught the eye of Prince Arthur of Connaught as he was passing through the new building of the National Hospital for Diseases of the Heart. He inquired who was the author, but nobody in the hospital could tell him.

"The quotation in which Prince Arthur of Connaught became interested is attributed to Stephen Grellet, originally Etienne de Grellet de Mabillier, who was born in Limoges in 1773, and died in Burlington, N. J., in 1855. He was a Quaker missionary and philanthropist, and was of a wealthy and noble family.

"Originally a Catholic, he was educated at the military college at Lyons, and at the time of the Revolution he was attached to the bodyguard of Louis XVI. After the guillotining of the King, Grellet escaped and came to America, where, in 1795, he became a Quaker.

"During the yellow fever epidemic in Philadelphia in 1798, he was untiring in his work for the stricken. A little later he became a successful business man in New York, and after 1800 he traveled as a missionary in many parts of the United States and Canada. Later he made two missionary tours in Europe, personally addressing the Tsar and the Pope on the subject of religion."

TUNESASSA NOTES.—SNOW fell in driving flakes all day and night on the sixth of last month. It was reported from the lumber camp, five miles above, that more snow fell in the woods than has fallen in several years. They are using eight teams of horses to draw the logs from the wood and twenty more are wanted to do the work.

On the thirteenth the thermometer dropped to — 35° in the morning and — 28° at noon the preceding day. Some of the Indians had trouble to keep warm, but we whites were comparatively comfortable. The water pipes broke in several places about the buildings, including those at the barns. The ice harvest has been very good this year for us. The water in the pond not being deep enough for us to use the saws we took all the ice we needed from the Tunesassa Creek, which flows through the meadow south of the buildings. The ice-house was filled with thirteen-inch ice.

During the cold winter evenings the family has been enjoying indoor games, an occasional Indian visitor being sometimes added to the company. Sleighing has been exceptionally good. All wagons and pleasure vehicles have been put on runners. The family have been out sled-riding, some going in the evenings, some in the afternoon, as we could not all leave home at once. The boys and girls were taken to the lumber camp on sleds one afternoon; they enjoyed it immensely, but a cold wind and driving snow somewhat detracted from the pleasure. The last week has been warmer and the snow is mostly gone. The river is full and the ice has mostly floated out. We expect some colder weather later and hope the warm spell will not last too long.

Several hogs and about 200 or 250 bushels of potatoes have been sold, leaving about enough for the school's use.

Our present superintendent and family are expecting to leave about the middle of Third Month. John Bradley and family are expecting to take their places as new Superintendents on the fifth of Third Month. We are very sorry to have our old friends go, but will give the new heads a hearty welcome.

Second Month 2, 1914.

THERE was a pilgrimage to Plainfield Meeting, Plainfield, New Jersey, under the care of the New York Joint Fellowship Committee, on First-day, Second Month 8th. A conference on the subject, "What Lack I Yet?" was held at 2.30 p. m.—The American Friend.

At the Kennett, Pa., Monthly Meeting, held in Second Month, it has become the practice to hold an afternoon session, more or less informal, when members may have an opportunity to discuss the interests of the meeting. On Fourth-day, the 4th inst., about twenty-five had lunch in the meeting-house, and from 1.30 to 2.30 listened to a fellow-member from another Monthly Meeting on "Some of the Functions of the Monthly Meeting." The remarks which followed showed a genuine interest on the part of the membership in their meeting affairs.

AN EPISTLE FROM MT. LEBANON THREEMONTHS' MEETING

To the members of the Society of Friends in Australia and New Zealand.

Dear Friends:
Our deep sympathy and Christian love go out to you in the difficulties you are bearing for the sake of the God of love, revealed unto us through Jesus Christ our Lord, to Whom His faithful servants witnessed, among them George Fox and other members of our Society who bravely suffered to proclaim Jesus Prince of Peace. You have by your hardships reminded us anew of the spirit of self-sacrifice and suffering, which has been in danger of being forgotten among us, since for many years Christians in the Lebanon have had no special trials and hard circumstances of this kind to endure. You have not only shown that true Christianity stands immovably and at all times for peace and love of men, but you have also given evidence of the unchangeable nature of Jesus Who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. You no doubt realize that what the participation of war consider to be a loss, to you in your hardships is in reality a great gain. Thus you are teaching the nations that man is created to reflect the nature of God, and in so doing he must be ready to suffer anything for what he believes to be right and Christ-like.

A JOHN WOOLMAN BRIDGE ACROSS THE DELAWARE.—A bill to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a memorial bridge in memory of John Woolman, the Quaker preacher of a century and a half ago, to connect the city of Burlington in the State of New Jersey with the city of Bristol in the State of Pennsylvania, was introduced in the Legislature last night [the 19th ult.] by Burlington County's Assemblyman, Robert Peacock.

Congressman Palmer, of Pennsylvania, will take up the matter of building the bridge from a government standpoint, and will take such measures as he deems necessary in Congress to aid in getting government support in the building of the bridge. The Pennsylvania and New Jersey Legislatures will do all in their power to have a bridge erected here and one at Camden connecting with Philadelphia, the latter to be known as the William Penn Memorial Bridge.

If the plans of the lawmakers of New Jersey and Pennsylvania are approved by Congress, the work will be carried out under the direction of the said commission and under the supervision of the Secretary of War. The Government engineers of the War Department have already examined all the details of the contemplated construction and have reported favorably to Secretary of War Garrison, who appears to be heartily in favor of the bridge.—The Intelligencer, from the Burlington, N. J., Enterprise.

FRIENDS' HIGH SCHOOL (HOBART).—The annual breaking up of the Friends' High School took place on the 17th ult., and a very large number of parents, old scholars, and visitors were present—the large lecture hall being filled to overflowing. Alfred H. Brown, a member of a deputation from the Society of Friends in England, occupied the Chair. The proceedings were opened with a recitation by one of the classes, after which the Principal (E. Innes Gower) read the half-yearly report, which showed the school to be in a very satisfactory state, both as regards the standard of work and the number of pupils, there being 250 boys and girls, 47 of whom were boarders. The latter do not come from Tasmania alone, but from all parts of the Commonwealth—three came from New Zealand. The Principal drew attention to the very full curricula of secondary schools, comprising many diversified subjects in addition to the three R's and English. The curriculum of the Friends' High School had been somewhat altered by dividing up certain special subjects and re-classifying the pupils. Besides the laboratory work, carpentry, nature study, etc., an ambulance class had been started under the management of W. Royce Johnson; there were also drawing classes, and a commercial class. The School Literary Society had had a very successful season, and much praiseworthy work had been done.—The Australian Friend, from The Mercury and Daily Post.

UNDER THE TITLE—Difficulties Besetting Australian Quakerism, in The Australian Friend, we call the following:—

I think there is something in Quakerism that loves a small meeting, where we all know one another and can gather in a closer bond of fellowship, and foster a spirit of loving brotherliness and personal interest in each other that is impossible in large city meetings. Here, too often, the opportunity for social intercourse between the members of the same family, or the same social circle, is actually detrimental to the unity of the meeting. Strangers, and simple and unaggressive people, incline to slip away unnoticed, which they could not do from a gathering of half-a-dozen Friends without, at least, a handshake and friendly greeting.

To start a small meeting needs faith and courage, as well as the spirit of Quakerism. All that is needed, is two Friends brave enough to make a beginning. Let us remember that if we have a real call to this work (which is entirely evidenced by the clear vision of its necessity), we do not stand alone. Underneath are the sustaining rocks, and we are not so fearful of personal loneliness. Our courage is not in our own hands. The Master. He will not permit any man's hand to be lifted up against him.

THE MOORESTOWN FRIENDS' REUNION.—On the 11th ult. (1891) the Friends of Moorestown held a reunion at the Friends' Meeting-house, Moorestown, N. J. The general subject of the reunion was "Christian Unity and Cooperation, which, on some occasions, is known as "In the United States," Henry W. Roberts, D. C. (1891) and England," by Edward L. Robie, Jr. In Foreign Missions, by K. K. K. A. Warrington. "The Haverford Federation of Churches," was presented by Anna Rhoads Ladd.—The American Friend.

[The following account of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting is copied from one of the great city dailies. It gives the main points of the meeting with accuracy and shows a sympathetic attitude toward the Society which Friends must appreciate.—Ed.]

FRIENDS IN PLEA FOR LARGER ATTENDANCE.—QUARTERLY MEETING URGES MEMBERS TO MORE FREQUENT PUBLIC WORSHIP.—OPPOSES "TALK-BEARING"—USE OF NAME "QUAKER" BY MANUFACTURERS REFERRED TO AS SYNONYM FOR PURITY.

Interesting discussion concerning matters vital to the Society of Friends was a feature of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, held at Fourth and Arch Streets yesterday [Second Month 3rd]. This is the last session before the Yearly Meeting to convene in Fourth Month at the same place. The nine queries were read and answered at this time in preparation, therefore, of the three Monthly Meetings of Philadelphia, Haverford and Muncy sent answers in writing. Representatives were present from these same meetings as well.

In considering the first query regarding the attendance of meetings, there was regret expressed at the smallness of some, although the business meetings were generally well attended—the meeting held at Twelfth Street House was especially noted as having larger and more interesting attendance than previously. Friends were advised to give up some temporal matters in order to gather at the house of worship—keeping the heavenly above the earthly.

It was in answering the second query on maintenance of love and unity, and the discouraging of talk-bearing and detraction that perhaps the most expression came in the women's meeting. It was felt that real unity meant something more positive than the mere absence of quarrels or differences; it must be the result of a Christian fellowship. The spirit of unity was deemed of far greater importance than the mere expression. It was the spirit which underlies the talk-bearing and makes it possible which is to be avoided and thus make the harsh words impossible.

Attention was called to the little courtesies of life, the giving of which means much. Catherine Shipley spoke of the need of extending a welcome to young men, especially, who come to meeting. It was felt there was need of greater watchfulness to maintain true simplicity, and the tendency toward eulogy at the time of funerals was deplored.

Attention was called to the apparent fact that the name of this denomination stands for the highest type of purity and integrity, as is evidenced by the name "Quaker" being used by manufacturers; and it was manifested by the duty of members to see that the standard was not lowered. The matter of punctuality at meetings for worship was also touched upon somewhat in detail; the need of settling into the quiet directly on taking a place therein was emphasized, the ability to worship being recognized as immediate.

A joint committee of men and women was appointed to consider a change of hour of the Quarterly Meeting, that one more convenient to all may be chosen. Representatives were named from each Monthly Meeting to attend Yearly Meeting.

Preceding the business meetings, which were held separately, a meeting for worship was held jointly in the west end of the meeting-house. The silence was broken by prayer by Joseph Thomason, following which Benjamin Brown, of North Carolina, spoke at some length, dwelling on the need of watchfulness on the part of parents over those entrusted to their care. Catherine Jacob spoke briefly, and attention was called by another Friend to the fact that the scales by which God weighs his people are not those by which they weigh themselves.—The N. E. American.

THE QUEEN OF BULGARIA'S THANKS TO FRIENDS.—Writing to H. H. M. Wallis from the Palace, Sofia, on the 13th of First Month, the Queen of Bulgaria sent a letter of thanks to him and to Friends for the relief work carried out during the past year or more. The Queen, who is the second wife of King Ferdinand, was the Princess Eleanora of Reuss-Kostritz, and was married in 1908. The letter was as follows: "Although I am aware that it is against the tenets of the Society of Friends to desire or accept words of recognition for their many good and charitable works, yet I feel that I must express to you, my dear Mr. Wallis, how deeply grateful I am for all that you and the Friends have done to relieve so great a number of our unfortunate sufferers from the war, more of whom, but for your helpful charity, would even now be without food and warm clothing so direly needed. May God bless and reward you and all the generous givers, the memory of whose true and Christian sympathy and ready helpfulness will for ever remain living in our grateful heart."

"ELEONORA."

From the Friend (London).

WESTTOWN NOTES.

The general health of the School at the present writing is excellent, the classes have been very little interfered with on account of slight ailments and there has been no contagion to make an inroad.

On Seventh-day, the 7th, about half the pupils went home, the first of their two vacations of this kind the present term. The three next Seventh-days have been scheduled for some time past as dates for the Elocution Contest, and most of the boys and girls want to be present then. The so-called "preliminaries" began on the fifth and will continue until the twenty-first. The number whose names now actually appear on the programs is seventy-seven, some few of these may have to give up on account of illness or some unexpected circumstance, but all are prepared for their respective parts. The total exceeds the largest previous record by about a dozen.

The evening schedule for this and next week has been arranged so as not to interfere seriously with the preparation of the to-morrow's lessons. The time for recreation immediately after supper has been shortened; this is followed by a study period, and then the contest occupies three-fourths of an hour, from 7.45 to 8.30—the bed-time for the younger children.

The plan of life at Westtown for the period after supper has been somewhat improved the past winter and may rightly claim a few words of description. There are many things that naturally belong to the leisure moments of the girls which properly find no place with the boys, so that the task of planning for the latter is much greater than it is for the former. The time from supper to study period on the boys' side of the house used to be a time to be reckoned with by the officer in charge, it is now one of the quietest and most pleasant parts of the entire day.

It is made easy for the boys to gather in small groups in the collecting room to play one of a half dozen popular games, which while not condemned by the authorities, were too noisy for the restricted quarters of the parlors, this relieves the congestion in the parlors, and gives everybody an opportunity to take part in what he wants to do. Five or six copies of a Philadelphia evening paper are furnished; on one evening the "Kusie Club" meets, on another the "Literary Union," on another the "Debating Club," and still another the weekly lecture; then certain evenings the Library is open until 7.30, as also the Museum, under the oversight of a teacher, and each evening the teacher in charge of the shop is on hand to superintend the work of any boys who prefer to spend the hour with tools. We have had very little basket-ball in the evenings this winter, but regular enforced gymnastics in the open shed in the day-time has more than compensated for what the other claimed for itself.

On the sixth we had another choice lecture. Frederick Motson, widely known as an accomplished lecturer and artist, gave his lecture on "Mexico and Her People," which probably several of the readers of THE FRIEND have heard in Philadelphia earlier in the winter. He devoted a half hour to a discussion of the Mexican situation and spoke with the authority which comes from first-hand actual experience, and then for an hour and more he showed us a series of Mexican views, all of them colored by himself, and many of them as fine and delicate in finish as we have ever seen.

The "Literary Union" devoted its meeting on the fourth to the general topic of winter sports and pastimes, and incidentally brought out some interesting facts in regard to Westtown's past records of skating and sledging; the Union suspends its meetings for two weeks in order to give place to those taking part in the elocution contest.

The first-day evening collection on the boys' side was addressed by Herbert V. Nicholson on "Influences in College that Foster the Christian Life;" the girls were addressed by Edith W. Wildman on "Friendships."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Dr. Samuel C. Dixon in a recent talk on the subject of colds has said "Excess of clothing, contrary to popular belief, is not a preventive. Indeed, chest protectors or similar articles of clothing weaken the natural resistance. General care of the body, daily baths to keep the skin healthy, fresh air, both day and night, and the avoidance of fatigue, are the best preventives. Colds are caused by certain bacteria which find their way to the mucus membrane and cause an active inflammation. It is particularly important to observe cleanliness to avoid transmitting the infection to others. Sterilized cheese cloth, which can be burned, is an excellent substitute for the handkerchief."

A large company of women has lately been engaged in endeavoring to promote woman suffrage at Washington. It is said their appeals are principally an argument for the creation of a House Committee on Suffrage, though they also will endeavor to elicit some comment from the President as to his personal attitude on the suffrage issue.

It is stated that reports of the Natural Highways Protective Society showed that 581 persons were killed by vehicles in the streets of New York last year.

A despatch from Harrisburg of the 1st inst. says: "The average cost of feeding the 8,000,000 residents of Pennsylvania for one year, according to James Foust, Dairy and Food Commissioner, is about $90. This makes the total amount spent for food for the people of the State $720,000,000 annually."

It is stated from Chester, Pa., that the Philadelphia Quartz Company, believing that the efficiency of the working man is increased by total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, has offered the employes of its plant in this city an inducement to enter into an agreement to abstain. The company agrees to give a 10 per cent. increase in wages to the men who sign the pledge. William A. Stanton, general manager of the plant, the originator of the plan, is greatly pleased with the response of the employes to the offer. With no hesitation nearly all of the 300 men employed at the plant signed the agreement and at the next pay day will receive the increased wage."

The Department of Agriculture issued a statement in which it was said there were 7,395,000 fewer food animals in this country than in 1910.

A despatch from Seattle of the 2nd says: "Two million pounds of frozen beef and mutton, the first shipment of this kind ever sent from Australia to Seattle, arrived to-day on the British ship Waimata. Officers of the company importing the meat say regular shipments will follow."

The New Jersey Assembly has passed a resolution submitting to the vote of the people an amendment to the Constitution granting women the right to vote. The measure passed the Assembly by a vote of 49 to 4.

A despatch of the 4th inst. from Chicago, says: "Woman suffrage leaders were elated to-day when it became known that fully one-third of the eligible women voters of Chicago yesterday registered under the new Illinois suffrage law. Their figures show that 450,000 women in Chicago will be eligible to exercise their franchise for the first time on the 24th inst. Unofficial returns show that 153,897 women have registered."

A despatch of the 5th inst. from Washington says: "A threatened loss of $200,000,000 in hogs during the present year from hog cholera led the Senate to-day to agree unanimously to a bill appropriating $500,000 to fight the disease. Cholera kills 90 per cent. of all the hogs that die from disease, according to Department of Agriculture experts. The attention of farmers is to be called to the importance of promptly administering anti-hog cholera serum."

It is stated that both President Wilson and Secretary Bryan have said to-day that the United States Government had taken steps for calling a third international peace conference to be held at The Hague. It was indicated by Secretary Bryan to-day that the scope of this program would be broad enough to permit consideration of the principle embodied in the new series of peace treaties that he has been negotiating. This principle is set forth in a stipulation that when two Governments are involved in a controversy that threatens to result in war they shall suspend hostile action for a fixed period, during which an effort shall be made to adjust the controversy through a board of arbitration.

A despatch of the 5th from Washington says: "The tenth of the series of peace treaties negotiated by Secretary Bryan in behalf of the United States was signed at the State Department to-day, the other contracting party being the Government of Denmark, for which Constantin Bruun, the Danish Minister in Washington, appeared as signatory. Secretary Bryan signed for the United States. This treaty involves a new feature of the plan for adjusting international disputes. This new feature is that questions in dispute referred by the contracting parties to an international commission for adjustment may be finally arbitrated by The Hague Permanent Tribunal of Peace. Peace treaties along the lines of the Bryan plan were signed yesterday at Tohran between Persia and the United States. The terms of similar treaties have been agreed upon between the State Departments and the representatives in Washington of Switzerland, Costa Rica and Santo Domingo."

According to a recent statement there are 20,000 men in Boston who are without work. It is proposed that the State begin the construction of highways to give relief to the unemployed.

It is stated that the business of the express companies has been stimulated by the reduced rates that went into force on the 5th inst. Francis F. Flagg, vice-president of the American Express Company, has estimated that the number of packages handled by his company has increased about 10 per cent. owing to the new rates.

FOREIGN.—H. Charles Woods, who has recently made a tour of the Balkan Peninsula, says: "Only those who have traveled in the Near East can realize the misery which has followed the recent Balkan wars. During my recent journey in Albania I visited an incomplete barracks and other buildings in which 750 refugees had taken shelter from the bitter winter cold. These poor creatures were huddled together so closely that it was impossible for them to lie down at night. Absolutely no means were available for even the most rudimentary methods of sanitation. The present situation in Bulgaria is exceptionally bad because the country is completely drained of money. To make matters more acute, the State had to provide for the wives and children of 100,000 men who were killed in the war."

It was stated from Paris on the 4th inst.: "Paul Schmitt, an engineer, has succeeded in constructing an aeroplane with extraordinary lifting capacity, which he claims will revolutionize long-distance tours and also make an aerial omnibus service feasible. In a trial of the machine, with seven men aboard and carrying an aggregate weight of a ton and a half, the new air craft rose to a height of about 5000 feet in half an hour."

A despatch from London on the 2nd says: "The first strike of teachers in the British Isles began to-day in Herefordshire, and 70 out of the 120 elementary county schools are closed in consequence. The teachers demand a minimum salary of $500 per annum, an increase of $50, and say they will remain out until they gain their demands."

NOTICES.

THE ARCH STREET PROJECT.

During the past year the several Quarterly Meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have been called on to consider a building project forwarded to them by the three city Monthly Meetings. Such an appeal for co-operation has been unique; in our recent history there have been no precedents to guide the action of the Quarterly Meetings, and it is not surprising that such steps as have been taken, have been taken with caution and reserve. In two of the Quarters the specific act of co-operation for which an appeal was made has been postponed. The project itself and the reactions of the Quarterly Meetings to it present some points of general interest. The effort to express these points is not inspired by the Committee and does not represent any other view than that believed to be the function of each member of the Yearly Meeting.

In a sense, for about two hundred years Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has been a guest in the city at Yearly Meeting time. Whether we are sensible of it or not this has produced a relationship of guest and host somewhat deeply imbedded in our institutional life. The passing of Friends' residences has brought dining-rooms and teas and liberal arrangement for entertainment in boarding-houses at the expense of invisible benefactors. We may pay for our Yearly Meeting lunch, albeit we perceive that the charge is inexplicably small, but none of us country folk fail in the final analysis to understand that our presence annually at Yearly Meeting means a heavy outlay of time and strength and money on the part of the few remaining city Friends. Into the larger matters of the maintenance of properties, of housing and lighting and heating, it is likely we do not as a rule make much inquiry. These provisions have descended to us, and if it became a question of right we might contend that they are now in part ours. As a matter of fact, they are all Society privileges and burdens, and the more widely they are shared the better for our organic life.

This matter of sharing responsibility in our view is the first point involved in the Arch Street project. It is expressed very modestly in the Committee's report, but their appeal is undoubtedly an appeal for a larger corporate interest. Instead of a few members acting for the whole, it calls upon all to come into a conscious participation in responsibility. Is the project itself then one that merits such a general interest? Our own special interpretation of it must in good part answer this question for us. If we regard it as a plan to provide for the "comfort and convenience" of Friends we shall have one answer; if we see in it an intelligent forward movement for efficiency in the work of the Society, we shall certainly have another. Unfortunately, the former view has been apparently much exaggerated, and free discussion of Fourth and Arch as a residential or lodging centre has obscured the main object of the proposed improvement. This is not at all surprising, for the concern under which the original committee was appointed had to do with the proper accommodation of Yearly Meeting Friends in the city. This bare proposition, however, is not one of "comfort and convenience" alone. In good degree it is itself a measure of efficiency. This is an age with Friends when the young have come into greater interest and activity, but a most important item of our Society's resources is the matured judgment of older Friends. This item of resource gives us weight and influence beyond computation, and the provision to have such Friends in good numbers reside during Yearly Meeting week upon the meeting property would add greatly to the cohesion of the body and to the success of its work. This provision for residence, not unlike the modern settlement idea, would not be valuable, however, at Yearly Meeting time alone. The committees of the Yearly Meeting, the Representative Meeting and its various committees are in activity the year round. A fair proportion of the Friends in these appointments are of the class known as "older members." Their multitudinous services now too often involve journeys to the city, two or three hours of committee meeting and a return to their homes the same night. They are taxed and the service discharged under a sense of pressure. What would it mean to the service (the service of Truth) if these Friends could come quietly to the city the day before an appointment and stay until the day after? Can any one question the gain in efficiency? And what an aggregate of increased efficiency a year of such opportunity would present!

And yet the lodging features of the Arch Street project are at the best only incidental features. The building itself is planned for the administrative and executive work of the Yearly Meeting. As such it is to take the place of an out-of-date plant, worn out and inconvenient. This in its present state represents an investment of about $30,000. As a business proposition, what expenditure must one expect to make to replace such a plant with one in every respect modern and well equipped? This administrative building it seems is the central fact of the Arch Street project. It is not a question of establishing a new centre of Quakerism in the city. The Yearly Meeting centre seems fixed for some decades yet. Nor is it a question of a proper location of a boarding home. The boarding features are subordinate to large question of efficient city activity for a Society largely absent from the city. And, finally, it is not a question of city Friends seeking financial assistance from out-of-city Friends, although there might be some justice in that situation after so many years of contrary practice. Doubtless the Society resources in the city are equal to the project, but the whole body does need to combine, and to combine sympathetically in an effort of this kind. A new building at Arch Street should be peculiar amongst Friends' buildings in the city. It should be said that every member of the Yearly Meeting had made a contribution to it. Thus the work of the Yearly Meeting and of the Representative Meeting would really become more nearly the work of the body at large.

One thing more may properly be said. The establishment of a modern administrative plant would merely put the Society of Friends in line with other religious denominations in the city. This does not of course mean that we would then be imitators of them. They have been forced to meet changed urban conditions in this way. If we do not do so the alternative would seem to be the transfer of the city interests, so far as possible, to one or more of our suburban centres. Probably no one seriously contemplates that. J. H. B.

THE REAL NEED.

When I made my first journey round the world I went home and wrote a book in which I laid great stress upon the need of an increase in the number of foreign missionaries. When I returned from my second tour, I laid stress upon the need of a great army of native workers, sons and daughters of the soil. When I came back from my third extended journey to the East, I was much led to see that I had taken a very superficial view. What we need is not so much an increase in the number of missionaries, nor so much a vast army of native workers; what we need is the discovery of the hiding of God's power and the secret of the releasing of that power. We need more workers through whom God shall have his opportunity. Here and there He is accomplishing through one worker what many workers could not accomplish where the hiding of His power is not discovered.

Since then I have found the same thing exemplified all over the home field. God has his ways, and they are not always our ways. One of the most striking passages in the Old Testament is the one representing God's eye searching up and down the world trying to find a man whose heart is right toward him, that he might show his power through that man. The discovery of that secret is the great thing needed all over the world to-day in our Christian enterprise, the discovery of the secret which enables God to find the object of his quest, that he may realize his consuming desire and show himself strong.

BERTILLOU ON ALCOHOL AND MORTALITY.—Jacques Bertillon, the famous statistician of Paris, has just published a remarkable study of mortality in the various vocations, in which he concludes that trades exposing workmen to alcohol are the most dangerous of all, irrespective of the element of mechanical danger. He ranks alcoholism among the principal causes of mortality. It should be noticed that Dr. Bertillon's investigations were made in France, where, according to the Hearst newspapers and the trade papers of the liquor traffic, the use of light wines has solved the alcohol problem. Striking, indeed, is the fact, reported in this study, that railway enginemans fall into the class of lowest mortality! The management of the state railways of France forbids the sale of alcoholic drinks to anyone employed by the railways.

For "THE FRIEND."

"KNOWING CHRIST."

A MEDITATION.

An article, lately re-published in THE FRIEND, contained, with reference to Christ, the following sentence, which impressed the present writer with peculiar force—"To know Him—there is the essential thing, it is something infinitely more true than to know of Him."

How true that it is "Infinitely more!"—inasmuch as it not only saves us from destruction, and confers upon us Eternal life, but more than that: does it not also introduce us to a sacred and personal intimacy with our beloved Lord, realized in the secret of the soul: a confidential relationship enjoyed by our ransomed spirits alone with Christ, into which—when we have "shut the door"—none other can intrude, to disturb or mar the sweetness of the Heavenly interview.

Surely nothing less than this wealth of meaning was intended by our beloved Lord, when He so affectionately said:—"I know Mine own, and Mine own know Me; even as the Father knoweth Me, and I know the Father." And again, long afterwards, offering to our poor humanity His own Divine companionship with a love, whose open arms "would all mankind embrace." He said:—

"If any man hear My voice, and open the door, I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with Me." Can we help exclaiming:—"What an unspeakable blessing it must be to enjoy favor such as this!" Is it possible to contemplate a subject more majestic than this high privilege? For is not our Lord the expression, the manifestation and "Image of the invisible God?" the activity of whose wisdom, love and power, peoples with splendor the limitless abysses of the midnight sky; and fills with life the countless individual poems of the world of animated nature! But, in addition to all this, is He not the Divine executive authority with whom we have to do? For Himself hath said:—"The Father judgeth no man; but hath committed all judgment unto the Son; that all men may honor the Son, even as they honor the Father."

The thought arises—yet perhaps one hardly needs to ask oneself the question:—"Is it wise to dishonor such an One by neglecting the proffered blessedness of thus knowing Him?" It is alluded to—as many of us are no doubt aware—more than fifty times by New Testament writers. And the three different words, in different forms, which they make use of to describe it, seem to exhaust all possible shades of meaning suggested by the words "To know."

The most important of the three is one—a compound word—which is more significant and comprehensive than them all. "Specialized knowledge" is what it implies, according to a modern authority,* and it is said to mean, among other things, to discover, find out, know again, recognize, come to a sense of, to become conscious of, etc. It may be noted that this is the word used by Matthew, in recording that solemn declaration of our Lord:—

"No one knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son willeth to reveal Him." And there and then (as here and now) our Saviour offered rest to the heavy laden who would come to Him and "Learn."

The Apostle Paul invites the Ephesians to this very "knowledge" of the Son of God as leading up to: the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Again, using the same word, Paul prays that the Colossians, "May be filled with the knowledge of His will, in all spiritual wisdom and understanding, that they may know the mystery of God, even Christ, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden."

Further, he urges them to "Put on the new man which is being renewed unto knowledge—this same 'knowledge'—after the image of Him that created him." How he congratulates the Corinthians, that they came "Behind in no gift." And why was that so? Was it not because they waited—like the Friend—"For the Revelation?"

*Dr. James Hope Moulton.

In the first eight wonderful verses of the second epistle of Peter this significant word occurs three times, he says, "Grace (favor) to you and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord, seeing that His Divine power hath granted us all things that pertain unto life, and godliness through the knowledge of Him that called us by His own glory and virtue, whereby He hath granted us His precious and exceeding great promises, that through these we may become partakers of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through desire." And then follow the glorious nine—"Muses" of the classic dream—but activities of the inner Temple, energized by our Lord enthroned there:—"Diligence; Faith; Courage; Knowledge; Self-control; Patience; Godliness; Love of the brethren; Affection. If these things are ours, and abound, says the Apostle, they make us to be not idle nor unfruitful to this "Knowledge" of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Yes, for may we not hope to realize in our own experience the fulfillment of His "precious and exceeding great promises" with regard to all things that pertain to our life—our existence—and our godliness, promises, that shine so attractively among His own recorded words—which, as we may probably remember, fill seven thousand nine hundred lines of the revised New Testament—promises proved and tested by the faithful during the course of nineteen hundred years.

If we believe, obey and dare to trust Him, may not we become inwardly "conscious" of the warmth of His loving presence? Sometimes it may be by a sudden glow of tender feeling that makes our eyes fill, as we "come to a sense of" His will, and our duty, or His own compassionate regard, as we see our "state" before Him.

May we not come "to know again" more and more intimately His "still small voice," unheard by the outward ear, and be permitted "to recognize" the promptings or suggestions that come from Himself, when things have to be said, or done, for the health of our body, or our soul, or concerning the affairs of our life in this world, as well as for the advancement of His kingdom—His reign in the hearts of men.

If on our part "Giving all diligence"—keeping at it—we press on, "growing in the favor and knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ," what can hinder, in our own experience, the magnificent consummation urged by Paul upon the Christians of Ephesus, in his prayers for them, that "The Father of glory, the God of our Lord Jesus Christ" may give unto us a "spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him"—this same special knowledge, "having the eyes of our heart enlightened, that we may know what is the hope of His calling, what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints; and what the exceeding greatness of His power, to usward who believe, according to that working of the strength of His might which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and made Him to sit at His right hand in the Heavenly places; far above all rule and authority and power and dominion and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and He put all things in subjection under His feet; and made Him to be head over all things to the Church, which is His body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all."

May it not then be ours "according to the riches of His glory to be strengthened with power through His spirit in the inward man, that Christ may dwell in our hearts through faith, that being rooted and grounded in Love, we may be strong to apprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth"—and knowing the ineffable love of Christ be "filled unto all the fulness of God"—filled, with the overflowing gifts of His Divine munificence, filled with Life and Truth and Love, the manifestation of His own bright presence.

Alas for those of old who refused this "knowledge!" Paul tells the Romans what became of them. He says:—

"Because they refused to have God in their knowledge, God gave them up to a reprobate mind . . ." Then follow unutterable horrors, veiled, it is true, from us; but "all things are naked and open before the eyes of Him with whom we have to do."

Turning away from such forbidding gloom, in view of the glowing language of the Apostle, are we not justified in indulging the delightful thought that ours may be this "light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" and though just now it may be in "earthen vessels" and "our power is not of ourselves," yet, through "the excellency of the power which is of God," this treasure "in us shall shine on through time; and on in ever-growing splendor to all eternity.

JOHN S. KLEISS.

PRESTON READING ROOM.

For over twenty-five years the little village of Preston, with the activities which have centered in its Reading Room, situated not many hundred yards from the Haverford Friends' Meeting House, has been a subject of great interest to the members of that meeting. Prior to that time Friends had taken a more or less active part in First-day School work, Temperance and Sewing classes, and had become increasingly impressed with their responsibilities as neighbors to this little community of artisans and mechanics, many of whom were intelligent and industrious people, but whose church affiliations were lightly held or lacking altogether, and whose children were growing up with the usual faults of village children, who have no proper outlet for their youthful energies. And so in the spring of 1889 a meeting was held to consider the subject, and a committee appointed to raise funds for a building to be used "for the moral and religious welfare of the neighborhood of Haverford Friends' Meeting."

This committee was so successful that in a little over a year an attractive, commodious building, well equipped for the work contemplated, and costing nearly $5,000, was formally opened. At the same time an Association was formed, and in process of time duly incorporated, to take charge of the same.

According to the Constitution, any adult willing to accept its conditions, and pay the annual dues of $2 for the up-keep of the work, was eligible for membership, but the Board of Managers, in whom was vested the control and direction of the property, must be members of the Society of Friends.

This Board made report of its work to an annual meeting of the Association, and also to Haverford Meeting Association, an organization which fulfilled many useful purposes before the Monthly Meeting was set up in 1904.

The original building contained three large rooms and hallway, well-lighted, and a good basement. To this was added during the winter of 1907 a well-equipped gymnasium at a cost of about $2,000. This last has always been under the care of the students of Haverford College, who have conducted classes in it for young men and boys.

The whole building is in charge of a janitress, selected with reference to her ability to impart a home-like air to the place, and to control unruly spirits, while sympathizing with the needs of children and young people. The Association has been unusually fortunate in finding these qualities well developed in the three incumbents who have held the position.

The building is closed during the morning, but is opened at noon, and the janitress is on hand from then until 10 p. m., ready for whoever may need her help. She is generally to be found in the Reading Room proper; here, on clear afternoons, the sunshine streams in through the southwestern windows, and at the long tables, if school is out, are generally seated small groups of boys or girls, playing games, or reading the papers and periodicals, which are near at hand. The room just back of this, and capable of being thrown into it, is furnished with chairs sufficient for seating fifty or sixty people comfortably. Here are held the First-day evening meetings, now under the charge of the Y. M. C. A. of Haverford College, First-day School, Lyceum, Literary Societies, Young People's Clubs, Lectures, Mothers' Meetings, Sociables and numerous other activities, for in no two years of its existence have the activities of the place been identical. The effort has been to meet the present need, and also to make use of any teaching gift which might be in our midst. Thus classes in Stenography, Bookkeeping, Arithmetic, Dressmaking and Cooking have each received attention—the last being made possible by a good cook stove and appropriate utensils in the third room, and the presence among us of a Drexel graduate. In this case a charge of five cents was made to cover the cost of materials used, and at the end of the term a prize was awarded for the best loaf of bread. In the basement nine benches were installed with the necessary tools, and for several years a very successful class in carpentry was conducted by a student of Haverford College, who has for many years since been at the head of the Manual Training taught in the Public Schools of Denver, Col., and more than one of the boys, so instructed, is now making his living by the trade.

At one time great interest was taken in a Coal Fund, whose object was to encourage householders to put aside, through the summer months, any money they could spare, to be used when work was less plentiful, for buying coal. The coal was bought by the carload, making some reduction in the price of a ton, and a great saving over the bucketful method. A Mothers' Saving Fund, and the Theodore Starr Saving Fund, for the children's pennies, have all served a good turn.

The work for the past few years has been much curtailed, owing to changed conditions in the neighborhood, and at present it seems as though, if the Reading Room is still to perform a service to the community, it will have to be along different lines. The population is now made up largely of colored people and Italians, among whom joint work is impossible, and much thought has been given as to how the situation should be met.

At present it is proposed to turn over the property to a Play Ground Association, which will have control of a plot of ground adjoining the new High School building, soon to be opened.

The building will still be useful for Reading Room purposes, and Friends will continue to be interested in its administration, though they will retain no exclusive right to define its scope.

It is felt to have filled a useful place thus far in its history, and to have ministered fully as much to Haverford Meeting as it has to Preston, and it is hoped that a still more useful future is in store for it.

LYDIA C. SHARPLESS.

OVER-EMPHASIS OF SOCIAL SERVICE.

Dean Shailer Mathews, President of the Federal Council of Churches in America, issues a warning against the substitution of social service for spirituality in the church. He says:

"Picnics are not the equivalents of prayer-meetings and Sunday school baseball leagues have not yet developed into revivals. A Protestant church cannot be an ethical orphan asylum; it must be a home in which souls are born into the newness of life. True, the church wants its ministers to be alive to the needs of the hour. . . . Yet most of all, do Americans want to be assured of God and immortality and the worth of righteousness. When they ask for 'the bread of life' they will not be satisfied with treatises on eugenics."

Christ enjoined social service and plainly taught that his treatment of men in the last day would depend on their treatment of each other here. And yet he laid the emphasis on the new birth, on the supreme love for him out of which all love for one's fellows and all true social service flows.

There is little doubt that there is a tendency in many places to substitute the outer service for the inner principle of the Gospel. The supreme passion for saving the souls of men is the one thing needful for the church of to-day, and all the social services, the sweet charities that have characterized the Gospel in the generations of the past will beautify and sanctify our own.

Paul puts the emphasis on the saving Gospel as the supreme thing when he says: "For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." (1 Cor. ii: 2.)—From The Christian Herald.

Among the teachers in this school were Cyrus Betts, Joel Taylor, Ann Wall, Harriet Nicholson, Mary C. Bennett, Sarah H. Clarke, Louisa M. Bennett, Isaac Craft, Ann Folwell, Mary Craft, Mary Ann Taylor, B. G. Uptide, Sarah Eliza Martin (Warren), Meribah Martin (Thorpe), Mary Ann Martin (Applegate), Caroline Nelson and Clara Smith. Of these, Eliza Warren, at an advanced age, is still living (1913.)

When Friends formed a settlement one of the first acts was to provide a suitable place for the burial of the dead. A small plot was early selected from the ground purchased from Benjamin Clarke for that purpose and enclosed with a board fence, which was kept up until 1859 when the burial ground was enlarged to half an acre and enclosed with a substantial stone wall costing $1,148.47, with iron gates at the entrance.

Some not in membership with Friends having been allowed to bury within the yard, and placing head-stones not in accord with the rules and regulations of the Society, the Monthly Meeting at Crosswicks, in the Third Month, 1708, appointed "A Committee, to visit such of our members or others the relatives of the deceased, as hath placed or might place any Grave or Tombstone at or near or over any of the graves of the Deceased in our Burying Grounds, and endeavor to prevail with such to remove such unnecessary and superfluous ornaments."

In the Eighth Month, 1709, this committee reported, "They had gone through the business and the expense attending removal of the same, paid to Grave Diggers was eighteen shillings, 9 pence, which the Treasurer is directed to pay."

A mute reminder of this is a headstone taken out of the yard, now to be seen in the foundation wall of the dwelling-house placed there when the addition to the east end was built about 1840, other stones were lying around until a recent date. As late as 1851 the Preparative Meeting of Stony Brook made a minute prohibiting marble Grave Stones in the yard. At the present time they are in general use therein, as in other Friends' grounds, the Clarks, Oldens and others continuing to use it as a place of burial. This stone is placed in a horizontal position in the wall, the lower part broken off.

The Preparative meeting was laid down or discontinued in 1878 and an indulged meeting allowed to be held at the house of Martha Clarke in Princeton until her death; now Stony Brook meeting is but a memory. The property at the meeting-house was for a long period left in the care of the Clarke family until 1911, when, on account of declining years, the last survivor of the family, Elizabeth B. Clarke, requested Chesterfield Monthly Meeting to take charge of it and release her from responsibility. Through his interest in the place and from motives of public spirit, Walter H. Olden, a descendant of Friends, joined with a Committee of the Monthly Meeting in the renovation and restoration of the graveyard. Graves were sunken, stones were awry, the surface irregular, with much of it overgrown with weeds, briars and bushes. The Meeting had it all dug over and levelled, removing forty wagon-loads of refuse, leaving a clean, smooth surface seeded in grass. Walter H. Olden collected from families not Friends $398, with which he had two hundred and ninety headstones, mostly field stones, re-set in concrete to a depth of about two and a-half feet, thus making a permanent setting against frost, etc. Many more headstones were found than expected, having sunken in the soil or were covered with weeds and briars. To Walter H. Olden Friends feel thankful for this interested service. Charles S. Olden, who was Governor of New Jersey during the Civil War, was buried here, his grave marked by a plain marble headstone.

In 1842 Samuel Craft sat head of the meeting with David

Clarke next, Elizabeth Craft and Julia Clarke on the women's side. Samuel was the father of Isaac Craft, Mary Craft, Jane Craft Moon, Hannah Craft Haines (Minister), and Edith Craft Collins.

Of the ministers, might be mentioned Benjamin Clarke and Elizabeth Craft. Here also frequently appeared Thomas Middleton, who was blind, having lost his eyesight about 1776. In 1781 he married Mercy Forsythe (the widow), his second wife. The Monthly Meeting records "that he died in 1803, aged ninety-three years, having been a minister forty-seven years."

Chesterfield Monthly Meeting has a prospect of holding an appointed meeting for Divine worship in this ancient meeting-house, early in the coming summer, no meeting having been held there since the meeting was laid down and the house closed. This concern has been brought about by a desire for such a meeting by some who attended the school when children and others who feel interested on account of various ties in connection with the place during the past.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

TO TEACH OR NOT TO TEACH.

The Society of Friends in Philadelphia has always believed in education. Large sums of money have been left from time to time to educate those among our members who could not themselves afford the privilege. The Friends' Educational Association has made it easy of recent years for any and all of our young people to obtain a college education. It may truly be said that no one desirous of college training is unable to enjoy it, on the most liberal and gracious terms. Not only have Friends made it possible for all of our own members to be well educated, but they have, through the establishment and maintenance of excellent schools, made a first-class schooling possible to hundreds of other young people who have in this way received "A guarded, religious education" at a price far lower than the ordinary private school of the same grade of excellence can offer. Notwithstanding the splendid educational opportunities open to our own members, notwithstanding the excellent schools attended by many who are not Friends, there is, nevertheless, a great probability that the next generation will be unable "to keep their children under the care and influence of those in membership with us," because there cannot be found a sufficient number of well-trained, inspired young Friends to teach the youth of our own Society, to say nothing of those other children whose parents have desired for them the simple and excellent education our Friends' schools have always afforded.

This scarcity of teachers cannot be accounted for on the grounds that there are now fewer young men and women Friends going to college than previously, for never have there been so many of our young people in college. Never have we been able to boast a greater number of well-trained students than to-day. Nor do I think the scarcity can be accounted for by the fact that the teaching profession is poorly paid. Truly there is no fortune in school teaching, truly it is difficult to provide for one's old age by saving any of the small salary, but the growing sentiment in favor of pensions is overcoming some of these difficulties, and besides, if the truth be told, our finest youth are not mercenary. Filled with the twentieth century ideals of service, they care more for the work than the money involved. We cannot fall back on financial reasons as the only or even as the main facts in the problem. There are, it seems to me, two reasons for this scarcity, or to express it more accurately, one reason having a positive and a negative side.

This is, above all things else, an age of service. Every college class-room, every school building, every lecture hall, every inspiring sermon, rings with the call to service, the call to save and to make of one great brotherhood all classes and conditions of men. The courses in social and political sciences have been for years the most crowded in all our Universities. No young person who has spurned mediocrity, but bears and responds to the great twentieth century slogan of the "Brotherhood of Man." Filled as we are with zeal and enthusiasm we desire on leaving college to be at once in the thick of the fight, and we throw ourselves into so-called "social work." To the young person leaving college, this form of service and this alone, affords an adequate expression of the fire within. This, then, is the positive side of the reason for the scarcity of teachers, and the negative side is more dreary and depressing. Our young people look upon teaching as a dull and stupid occupation. Many a time have I heard a girl say, "Oh, yes, I am teaching this first year, but only until I can find something more interesting to do." Or again, I have heard one young teacher say to another, "With all our splendid education we ought not to be teaching, we ought to be doing bigger things, things that would count and make us grow—instead of drudging along year after year." The truth of it all is, most of us think teaching is dull. Even the enlightened parents speak of their children's teachers as "poor things, I certainly am sorry for them;" while the gay and worldly parent, although having a respect for the teacher's education and training, simply regards her as a being entirely outside her own class. How often have teachers of my acquaintance been asked out to dinner by these very parents and been made acutely aware of the sentiment which led to their invitation: "We must have the teacher to dinner." To a really keen young person nothing is more to be shunned than stupidity. An occupation that is termed "dull" or "monotonous" or "deadly" is doomed at the outset.

I must say that I have some sympathy with this point of view. I myself turn hastily from stupid things. Many a time, as a teacher worn with the unequalled weariness of a day of failures at school, I have looked at other teachers dressed in plain gray suits trudging off home with an armload of papers under their arms, and have said to myself, "I shall not teach another day if I am going to be like that when I am their age." But the next morning on the way to school comes the exhilaration of conquering the difficulties that overwhelmed yesterday; for the problems dealing with school children have always the glorious possibility of solution—have rather always the possibility of glorious solution! And that teacher who yesterday looked so drab and gray has changed over night. She, too, has donned a new dress for body and mind.

Friends, there are magnificent opportunities in school teaching. These which I mention are but few, believe me, of the many that other teachers will think of as they read this paper. The act of teaching itself may be a vital help to the higher life of mind and spirit, because we have to know something before we can teach it. This means that we have to study, read and do much actual work. But if after hours of study we have once felt that thrill of pleasure which comes on realizing that we have gained a new light, a new vision of our subject, then, however weary we may be, we have the supreme satisfaction of knowing that we are making progress intellectually and spiritually. To realize that instead of sitting back and growing lazy and dull, instead of becoming comatose, flabby, ignorant and indifferent, we are actually increasing our mental and spiritual power—to realize this is one of the sure results of teaching. If we cannot teach without knowing something, neither can we teach without knowing that something definitely, clearly and logically. This clarifying of our own ideas is another means of vastly increasing our intellectual and spiritual power and usefulness.

These two advantages of teaching may be called the selfish opportunities of the despised profession, but the unselfish opportunities, the social service possibilities, are so much greater that I mention the above only in passing. The children seated before us may be the intellectual, social, political, spiritual leaders of to-morrow, and we may have the chance in large measure to say what shall be the measure of their greatness, what the limits of their power. Blessed with the advantages of good birth and wholesome environment, the children in our Friends' Schools present almost unlimited possibilities. It is for us to say whether they shall grow up into citizens having the larger vision of service as politicians, lawyers, doctors, or whether they shall never rise above the level of mediocrity. If in the nature study class we have awakened a thrill of interest in out-of-door life, if in the Civil Government or History Class we have awakened the desire for clean, righteous government, if in the Literature Class we have opened to one child the door of imagination, given just one glimpse into the realm of "sweetness and light"—if we have done one of these things that child can never again be the same as he was before he came to us. Surely the opportunity of saving the lost, of giving another chance to the boy born in a bad environment, of lifting up those who have been crushed by hard labor, by greed, by the oppression of the rich and selfish, is not greater than the opportunity of lifting to new and unreachd levels, of filling with inspiration and power, lives, which because of their splendid inheritance, because of their unspoiled purity, can in their turn lift the burden from hundreds of their fellow-men.

Truly the possibilities of teaching are so stupendous that we may well falter before them. Ever must we ask ourselves, "Am I a fit person to lead these young leaders, have I the vision and the courage for the task, have I above all things else that undaunted purpose which shall shine out above discouragement, above drudgery, leading me to the goal of perfect service—the service of making Christlike men and women?" Without this sublime ideal we can be neither teacher nor social worker worthy of the name. Friends, the answer to the problem of the scarcity of teachers lies within us. If we weigh once more the possibilities of service in this profession, surely more of our young people will hear the call, more will be filled with vision, for "without the vision the people perish."

THE VALLEY WHERE THE HEARTSEASE GROWS.

(PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.)

There's a green and happy valley,
Carpeted with blossoms sweet and bright,
Between the Valley of the shadow
And the Palace Beautiful on yonder height.

'Tis a place of holy rapture,
Filled with Angel-Anthemns all day long,
Where streamlets from Celestial Mountains
Swell the thapason of the heavenly song.

In that Valley of the Lowly
There are mossy seats where Pilgrims rest,—
Trees of Life with autumn fruitage,—
Glimpses of the radiant City of the Blest.

Though profoundly deep that valley,
Yet it glistens with the "Gain of Loss,"
For Souls who reach its quiet leisure
Have passed Getsemane and borne their Cross!

A LETTER FROM JAPAN.

It has been suggested to me that the readers of THE FRIEND would enjoy a short account of scenes and experiences in Japan, given by a person who has difficulty in classifying herself as either tourist, missionary or teacher.

Perhaps the word "friend" would best describe her position, and as the word "friend" may be written with a capital "F," the point of view may have an especial interest to the readers of this periodical.

Two months of sojourn in California was a fitting preparation for the voyage across the Pacific and life in Dai Nippon. After the election excitement of the fall of 1912, it would seem as if the newspapers of California had little to record save the items concerning the passage of the "Alien Land Bill," the "yellow press" and even the more reputable papers of the State were loud in their utterances in favor of making that bill a law, and to read the headlines of these papers made one wonder at times whether life even in quiet Saratoga [Cal.] were not filled with peril. On the other hand, when I attended the commencement exercises at Stanford University in the spring, I could not help but notice that the greatest amount of applause during the entire morning was given to the young Japanese students, as they went up to the platform to receive their diplomas. California may be alarmed at the threatened inroad of the Asiatics, but she cannot help admire pluck and hard work whenever and by whomsoever these may be manifested.

Personally, the problem to my understanding is largely one of economics, and if the incoming Asiatic were to ask the same price for his labor as his Caucasian brother, and raise his manner of living to American standards, there would be much less objection to his presence in the State. But this is a question for experts to pass upon.

The delight of a summer voyage across the blue waters of the Pacific must be experienced to be appreciated. Calm seas, blue skies, bright moonlight nights, and pleasant companions were my portion, and the trans-Pacific voyage will always be one of my most delightful memories. On the First-day morning, when we were approaching the Hawaiian Islands, but were in ignorance as to what hour we might reach land, we felt the beauty and truth of the lines of Whittier:

"I know not where his islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care."

About eleven days after our stay in Honolulu, we were approaching the shores of Japan. Fuji was hid by the clouds of sunset, but the narrow coast line with sloping sides of blue and purple hills and the twinkling lights from many beacons, all welcomed us into the broad and safe harbor of Yokohama.

Since then, in every sense, we have been among friends—old friends, new friends, and even friends of a casual meeting. The ties of old fellowship were found as strong and binding as ever. The new friends were most considerate and anxious for our welfare, and even the conductors on the trolley lines, and the jinrikisha men all seemed solicitous that the stranger should have the greatest care and form the best possible opinion of Japanese courtesy and hospitality.

In such a brief article as this much must of necessity be left unsaid, but how the mere names of the places visited will bring up visions of beauty in the days to come!

Kamakura will be remembered not only for its colossal statue of Buddha, calm and dignified as some gallery Friend, and full of the victory won by deepest introspection, but it will be remembered also by its curving sea beach, by the men at work gathering drift wood from the surf, and by the line of pine branches against the clouds at sunset.

Hakone gave us a vision of Fuji at sunrise, with the great mass of the mountain reflected in iridescent colors in the mirror-like surface of the lake below. During the journey from Hakone to Miyanosita we also experienced the delight of travel when carried aloft in a comfortable chair, on the shoulders of four men, a sensation which reminded us of pictures of Queen Elizabeth and her courtiers, of the Pope in St. Peter's in Rome, and also of the ever-ubiquitous Teddy in Africa.

Nikko is a remembrance of gorgeous red-lacquered temple buildings, elaborate in carving and color, set amid great cryptomeria trees, upon green hillsides, down which tumbling streams rush with a noisy exultation.

Tokyo and Mito are places of work, or rather on my part, the watching of work. Such splendid gifts as are being poured forth, freely and lovingly, on this Island Empire! Men and women are devoting their best thought and endeavor to try and help solve the problems, which must arise, amid all this complexity of a new civilization.

The spirit of true altruism, which after all is the spirit of the Master, seems to vitalize all the Friends here. Such problems and projects as are discussed—How best to educate the young women of Japan?—How best to combat the spirit of scepticism now abroad in the land?—How to fight tuberculosis?—How to put the hospital work upon a stable foundation?—And how best to show the Japanese people that we, as Americans, still desire the welfare of their nation?

All of these problems are being fully and freely discussed, and the various crises in the work are being wisely dealt with. What may be called "patriotism for the Kingdom of God" is manifest among all workers. Amid all these problems, the discouragements and the discomforts—and these last are many and dispiriting—there is a real spirit of enthusiasm in the air. At the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Friends' School, there was much thankfulness for what had already been gained, and also a firm resolve to make the future as full of fruitful service as the past had been filled with faithful seed-sowing.

This is a very brief resumé of the impressions of a transient traveler—Japan is a wonderful nation, its scenery is full of natural beauty, and its people are sincerely desirous of learning the best that civilization can teach them. The old religion may be fitly symbolized by the pathetic row of battered stone idols along the river bank at Nikko. They are "the forgotten gods." May we all join in showing the people of this country that what hitherto they have ignorantly worshipped is in reality the loving Father of us all, as He has revealed Himself to us in his Christ.

THE BRAVE FIELD-MOUSE.

A TRUE INCIDENT.

Through grass new mown
We scampered on
Across the fields to meet,
You scarce would guess
Our Friendly dress
Restrained our thoughts from fleeing.

The Sabbath hour
With quiet power
Subdued each wayward fancy;
We heard sweet words,
Our choir the birds,
Our preacher good Aunt Nancy.

Yet at the close
We gladly rose
Each little weary maiden;
We skipped about
And in and out
Through benches lately laden.

My sister Bess
Stood motionless,
Then clasped her hands demurely,
Her eager quest
A mouse's nest
Found fashioned most securely.

In cushions grey
There snugly lay
Five tiny trembling creatures;
Within each hand
They soon were spanned,
What joy was on our features!

But, oh! her fear,
As, creeping near,
Poor mother mouse deserted us;
She could not run,
Yet dared not come,
She stood transfixed and eyed us.

When I lay
Then strong of prey
Forgotten, I was
As silent as Within the
We knew not she could be so
Hush so
She crept about
The old lady from the
From hand to Within her
She bore them beyond the

And when the first
Had safely passed
Into her safe possession
The mother mouse
Escaped from

H. P. MOORE.

A BOY WHO KNEW HOW. An American boy, nineteen years of age, once found himself in London where he was under the necessity of earning his bread. He was not like many young men in these days, who are "willing to do anything" because they know how to do nothing, but he had learned how to do something, and knew just where to go to find something to do; so he went straight to a printing-office and inquired whether help was needed.

"Where are you from?" inquired the foreman.

"America," was the answer.

"Ah!" said the foreman: "from America. Can a printer come from America?"

The young man stepped up to one of the cases, and in a brief space set up this passage from the first chapter of John: "And Nathanael said unto him, Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, Come and see."

It was done so quickly, so accurately, and administered a delicate reproof so appropriate and powerful, that it at once gave him influence and standing with all the office. He worked diligently at his trade, refused to drink beer or any kind of strong drink, saved his money, returned to America, became a printer, publisher, author, postmaster-general, member of Congress, signer of the Declaration of Independence, ambassador to royal courts, and finally died in Philadelphia at the age of eighty-four. There are more than one hundred and fifty counties, towns and villages named after this same printer boy—Benjamin Franklin.

A VISIT TO THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—Half-term holiday was in sight. What should the elder children do with it? Ruth was privileged this time to decide, and Ruth was emphatic for the British Museum. Her brother, too, was quite willing, though the South Kensington Museum would have been his choice. Hitherto the Zoo had been our ideal, but now something more grown-up and educational suited her taste, for was she not twelve years old? The eventful day drew near, and it was noticed that "Why and What at the British Museum," and A. R. Habershon's book on "The Bible and the British Museum," were much in request. I thought it a good sign, for I own to having had some misgivings about this visit, lest the children should after all be disappointed with the fragments of ancient remains of a long ago past, which might seem to have no interest in competition with those of everyday home and school life. The longed-for day came at last, and was warm and fine with enough wind to assure us that no dismal fog would be lurking over the city. After visiting St. Paul's and getting a fine view of London from the Stone Gallery above the great dome, we reached the British Museum about 1.30 p. m. Soon we were plunged into galleries of strange and unfamiliar objects—South Sea Island costumes, implements and pictures, then Maori weapons and carvings, or, again, curios from Japan. These were very attractive, but we pressed on and were soon in the Egyptian gallery. Robert, book in hand, was eager to find some of the special exhibits named in "Why and What," and great was their joy when a discovery was made to which the book had given them a reference or a clue. He is the happy possessor of a Bible with plenty of notes and pictures at the end of it, and to my surprise he would often exclaim, as he recognized among the slabs and carving, objects which are pictured in his Bible. They seemed to be old friends just taking on added importance and reality.

We were on the look-out for anything which touched our Bible history, and the British Museum is kind in this direction. We soon found the Moabite stone, which tells of King Omri, and remembered that Ruth was "a Moabitess." We got familiar with such mouthfuls as Shalmaneser and Nebuchadnezzar. It was here in the Assyrian Gallery that Ruth gleefully found the stone carved with figures of men swimming with bladders to support them. Further on we gazed upon the famous sculptures from the Acropolis, and tried to imagine Paul beholding these triumphs of human skill in all their perfection of beauty in his days, and yet counting all these things and every earthly advantage which he possessed as but loss for the excellency of Christ Jesus his Lord. Now the glory has departed from these magnificent buildings, and the name of the once despised Paul is honored, while the "Christ Crucified" whom he preached is proclaimed in every nation as the Saviour of the world. We looked at the hard, cruel face of Nero, and thought again of Paul and the great company of martyrs who suffered death at the command of this Roman emperor. A hasty visit to the precious manuscripts of our loved Bible and our time was gone. We could not do justice to these, and had to leave them for some future day. The British Museum proved a great success; and that it has left a deep record in the children's minds is the conviction of

NEWS ITEMS.

The following is taken from an appeal for contributions put in circulation by the Managers of the Western Soup Society. The nature of their work is so much misunderstood and so often characterized as pauperism, that we are glad of a clear statement that leaves no doubt that in object and method they are using up-to-date educational methods.—[Ets.]

The Managers of the Western Soup Society, 1613 and 1615 South Street, Phila., desire their contributors to become better acquainted with the social settlement, educational and uplift work being done by their Society. They have preserved the corporate title of their Society on account of the traditions connected with the name, and the long and honorable relief work which had been carried on for nearly seventy-five years, we believe our methods of work will justify our asking for liberal contributions from the charitably disposed persons of Philadelphia.

1.—All cases applying for relief are thoroughly investigated; records of the family and individual compared with the records of other organizations and no relief work is extended to any unworthy applicants.

2.—Two classes in sewing are conducted of white girls with an average attendance of twelve in each class.

3.—Three classes in cooking for colored girls are conducted with an average attendance of ten pupils in each class. The food and material for these classes are supplied without charge by our Society. The colored classes are under the expert care of teachers from the Drexel Institute.

4.—Two classes of old colored women meet weekly to sew and to have a pleasant afternoon.

5.—A bath-house is conducted throughout the year for men, women and children for which a nominal charge is made for such service. Tubs in the laundry are at the service of any women who have no place to wash their clothing.

During the summer months, the families are under the care of our Visitor and are encouraged to save something each week and deposit it in a savings-bank. Employment is procured wherever possible, and in many cases the families are soon again self-supporting, as they were only needing temporary help with proper advice.

We should be very glad to have any of our contributors call at the Soup House to see the excellent work which is being accomplished by our Society.

PHILADELPHIA, First Month, 1914.

GENERAL INFORMATION TEST AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.—The results of the General Information Test given to the pupils of Friends' Select School were announced this morning. The test was given without previous notice in place of two consecutive periods of school work on the ninth inst. All the pupils in school except the five youngest grades took the test, which consisted of one hundred questions on a great variety of subjects of general interest.

Each paper was carefully marked and graded on a per cent. basis. The highest score was made by Morris J. Rosenthal of the Senior class, whose paper was marked 88.2. The average grade of all the papers was 37.8, the boys' papers averaging 41.2 and the papers of the girls, 36.

Among the remarkable statements made in reply to some of the questions were the following:

David Lloyd-George has been "bombarded by suffragets;" he has a wonderful estate in New York where he keeps boys who have committed some crime.

"Rabindranath Tagore is Chief Engineer of the Panama Canal."

"S. Weir Mitchell is the youngest mayor New York ever had."

"Philadelphia is in Chester Co."

"Pennsylvania is called the Keystone State because the founder of it belonged to the Keystone Party and was a Quaker."

FROM "THE OLNEY CURRENT," OF FRIENDS' SCHOOL, BARNESVILLE, O.—Our present efficient Superintendent and Matron, Joseph C. and Elizabeth B. Stratton, will retire from their duties at the close of the present school year. We believe their long and valuable service at the school has been appreciated and we are loath to see them go. But we believe it is in accord with the Divine plan, that individuals are being prepared to take up all right positions of responsibility and trust; therefore with hope for the future we will welcome their successors, Edmund S. and Eliza D. Smith.

THE EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.—The Educational Association convened at the Boarding School on the afternoon of Twelfth Month 27, 1913. There were present all of the teachers engaged in teaching monthly meeting schools in Ohio. Whatever may be said of the quantity or quality of the Yearly Meeting's interest in educational matters, this one hundred per cent. attendance of the teachers shows that there is no lack of interest on their part. There were also in attendance teachers from Philadelphia, Atlantic City, Westtown and Tunesassa, besides a number of parents and other interested visitors.

The president, Charles P. Morlan, in calling the meeting to order, stated that it is the work of the Association to bring together teachers and parents, so that the problems that come up all the time can be discussed on an equal plane, and so that we may see what we are most in need of, in an educational way. That these meetings may prove most helpful, there must be a clear and definite ideal, and all interested must have the same ideal.

The formal program of the afternoon consisted of a paper by Elizabeth Whitacre on "Teaching English," a report by Anna Walton of her recent visit to the primary schools in Ohio, and a talk by J. Wetherill Hutton.

The paper, which appears elsewhere in The Current, was full of practical suggestions and workable theories. It and the other exercises, as well as the discussion, took on the nature of very helpful "shop talk." In fact, the whole meeting might be characterized as a practical utility meeting, of special value to teachers and to those parents and committeemen who desire to keep in sympathetic touch with the educational methods which are, or ought to be, applied to their children.

Anna Walton, because of her large and practical experience in school methods and conditions, always commands attention. But this time her address was of unusual interest because of the fact that her remarks were based upon actual observations which she had made during a tour of all the Friends' schools in eastern Ohio.

She stated that she made the trip because of her interest in the schools—pupils, teachers, parents and committee friends.

In comparing Ohio schools with those of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting as to size, the statement was made that there is one family school within the limits of the latter Yearly Meeting of only three children and one Preparative Meeting school of only seven children, thus showing that Friends' schools can be maintained independent of numbers.

Among the hopeful signs noted in her tour of the schools was the desire of parents and teachers and commitment to get together to discuss the subjects of mutual interest.

An important question to be discussed is whether or not our schools are meeting the needs of the children to-day as efficiently as the schools of the past. We should contrast the schools of forty years ago with the schools of to-day. The life of to-day is so much more complex and competition is so much keener that the methods of forty years ago would fail us to-day. It would be impossible to make a good living on the education of forty years ago. Hence the question: How can we meet these needs?

Time is very precious in the school-room, especially in the primary school-room for the youngest pupils. Time lost in the first grades may be time lost forever. The child should have, in the first six years, the tools which will make him well equipped to go on easily.

On the subject of grammar the speaker said that the invariable attitude of children towards this subject is one of dislike. This leads us to ask: Are we presenting grammar in the right way? Many children are not ready for technical grammar when they take it. One teacher when asked how she injected so much enthusiasm into her grammar students, replied that she made them feel during the grammar period that there was nothing in which she was as much interested as grammar. And after all, this is the key to successful teaching in all branches. The teacher must have the enthusiasm himself.

In reading we were told that the child must be given practice in thought-getting and in thought-giving; that there is such a thing as a good recitation in reading where the child has not read at all, but merely told what he has read. There ought to be much more practice in reading aloud at home.

Spelling books were advocated as being preferable to poorly selected lists of words.

Interest in writing is stimulated by selecting specimens and sending them around to other schools for comparison. Competition by schools is much better than competition by individuals.

In physiology the speaker praised a tendency to teach less physiology and more hygiene. The Gulick series and Woods-Hutchinson books were recommended.

In closing, much stress was laid on the importance of presenting all these subjects so that they shall minister to the needs of character building. The boys and girls of Ohio Yearly Meeting, we were told, deserve the best. They ought to have, from the very beginning, training in self-dependence and self-reliance.

Teachers and committees must keep the schools before the people in the different neighborhoods as much as possible; have "get-together" meetings. Committees ought to make their reports to the monthly meetings as interesting as possible. Hold school meetings in the school-house.

Wetherill Hutton, in the course of some very interesting observations, laid special stress on the value of preparing primary children for entrance to the Boarding School. He stated that one of the Monthly Meeting schools is particularly good in this line, and that if all the schools were equally efficient, the number of teachers at the Boarding School might be decreased owing to the better classification of beginning students.

A doctor's examination in the primary schools was urged. The deplorable lack of training in drawing was alluded to.

Much interesting discussion followed the regular program. But space forbids its reproduction here.

Apropos of the need of supplementary and general reading in the schools, it was stated that the Salem school is contemplating the formation of a Library Association. The practicability of a circulating library for all the schools was also discussed.

The question of supervision of our primary schools claimed a large share of the discussion. Supervision, it was asserted, would result in greatly increased efficiency in the schools and a saving in time in making the transition from the primary to the Boarding School.

The question was asked, Who is to do the work of looking after the schools and making them uniform? One answer to this question was to the effect that a member of each school committee, a member of the Boarding School committee and a member of the Educational Association should get together and see what can be done towards making uniform the work of the schools.

It was again brought forcibly before the Association that one of the greatest needs, if not the greatest need, of our Yearly Meeting school system is a superintendent, appointed by the Yearly Meeting, and given the direction of the Yearly Meeting's committee on education.

BENJAMIN J. THOMAS.

GEORGE R. McGINLY has put in circulation a reprint of an article by MAX E. REICH in THE FRIEND, entitled "Enthusiasm for Jesus." It makes a neat little tract and an edition of 5,000 copies will insure ample distribution. It is intended to put it into the hands of the older children in Friends' Schools.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.—Keeping up past record of Friends as standing for temperance, the Concord Quarterly Meeting held at Monthly Meeting-house, instructed the clerk to send a communication to representatives in Washington asking their support of the national constitutional prohibition amendment. This matter was introduced by Benjamin F. Whitson, of Moylan, Pa., near the close of the meeting and elicited hearty support.

All the appointed representatives from the six Monthly Meetings of Chester, Goshen, Concord, Wilmington, Birmingham and Lansdowne were present except one.

In answering the usual Queries, some discussions occurred on various points. The giving of prizes as an inducement to buy goods was another matter claiming attention, the practice being greatly deplored.

A committee appointed to inquire into the use of liquor among Friends made the report that less than a dozen of the total membership of the Quarterly Meeting used it even occasionally, while two of the constituent meetings, Concord and Lansdowne, were declared absolutely clear of such use, the latter having the largest membership of young men.

A list of ministers and elders who died during the year was read, showing four, the oldest having attained the ripe age of one hundred years, others being well past the four score and ten mark.

It was reported that three schools were maintained under the care of their respective meetings. There is a total of 151 children in the Quarterly Meeting, forty-six of whom are in attendance at educational institutions outside of Friends.

ETHEL DE LONG, of the Pine Mountain Settlement School in Harlan Co., Ky., spoke most delightfully before Friends' Select School on the afternoon of the twelfth on "Life in the Kentucky Mountains." Her descriptions were true to life, and the needs and longings of the mountaineers were brought close home.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

ASIDE from the regular school duties, the most prominent feature of the past week has been the interest in the "Preliminaries" of the oratorical contest. On Second, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh-day evenings, interesting programs have been enjoyed in the gymnasium. Much of the present week will be likewise occupied (45-minute periods) before all the contestants will have been heard.

It is generally conceded that the judges have no enviable task in selecting four girls and four boys for the finals to be held near the end of the month.

ON Third-day evening Lou Westcott Beck, of California, gave his illustrated lecture, "A Prospector and His Dog." He was accompanied by his splendid Siberian bloodhound, who, we were told, had been instrumental in saving the lives of thirty-two men, most or all of them prospectors in Death Valley and other places in the western deserts.

THE lake is again frozen over, and skating has been indulged in until the deep snow with its forbidding crust interfered, the latter making it almost impracticable to clear the snow away with the scoops.

A fine sliding track was made on Seventh-day afternoon extending from the girls' tower to the lake; weather permitting, some lively sport will be enjoyed here during the present week.

OUR water supply has been seriously affected by a break in the mill race at the old "wheel house," probably started by a musk-rat; a gap some fourteen feet deep and eight feet wide at this time of year, with frozen surfaces to deal with, makes mending difficult; temporary repairs are under way. Pupils were advised that, according to an old letter on file here from an early Superintendent to a committee Friend in Philadelphia, the latter was requested to send out a dozen tin basins as the eighty boys had only two broken wooden bowls for their washing; the supply of water came from a pump and to get it required muscular labor.

Our farther lavatory use of water has had to be curtailed for the time being, as the "air lift" yields a limited supply.

On First-day evening Daniel Oliver addressed the pupils in joint collection in the library, giving good sound advice emphasizing duty, economy and self-control; the duty of concentrating one's self on the business at hand, leaving other people's matters alone—economy of our resources, spiritual, mental and physical—and the control of self even when circumstances make that difficult; these and other qualities are necessary in order to make good men and women; this is probably the last message that we shall have from our valued friend for a season, as he will soon be sailing for England.

We were favored with the company and gospel services of George M. Warner at meeting last Fifth-day.

CORRESPONDENCE.

At Concord Quarterly Meeting, held at Media, the 10th inst., the subject of the manufacture, sale and use of intoxicating liquors having been under consideration, it was the united judgment of the Meeting that the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes would, if ratified by the necessary three-fourths of the States, conduce to the health and prosperity of all the people. Accordingly the clerk of the Meeting was instructed to forward to the Pennsylvania Senators and Representatives in Congress for Chester and Delaware Counties a copy of this minute, requesting them to give their unqualified support to the Joint Resolution introduced by Richard P. Hobson, of Alabama, for the submission of such amendment.

A DESIRE has been expressed by several Friends in Germantown Meeting to make some study of the present social order. Accordingly a few meetings have been arranged with a view to presenting certain phases of this subject for open discussion. It is planned to take up at first the problems of Wealth, Poverty, Unemployment, etc., this discussion to be followed in the course by other meetings on subjects looking towards the further Christianization of present conditions. The introductory meeting, at which Morris E. Lewis will open the general subject, will be held in the Committee Room of the Meeting House, Coulter Street, on Sixth-day evening, Second Month 20th, at 7.45 o'clock. All who are interested are invited to attend.—Anna Cope Evans, Natalie B. Kimber, Morris E. Lewis, C. Reed Cary, Edward G. Rhoads, Francis X. Maxfield, Esther Morton Smith, Agnes L. Tierney, Bernard G. Waring, Harold Evans.

While Dr. Cadbury's house has been building at Honglok, he himself has been substituting for a physician in Canton, at the Kung Yee Hospital. The expected advantages accruing from this special work are explained in the following extract from one of his recent letters:

"I keep very busy at the Kung Yee Hospital. My work has been very wearing in many ways, and my own personal expenses have been much higher than they would have been living at Honglok. On the other hand, living alone with only Chinese as my friends and intimates, I have learned to know and love them better. I have learned to speak Chinese more easily and I think I understand the Chinese character better. I have also learned to realize to a greater degree the awful misery and sorrow that fill the lives of many who have not learned the restfulness and peace that come from faith in God. Immortality is ever present and has caused untold suffering among the people, so that the rich among whom I mingle are unhappy as the poor. To these the only hope is a personal knowledge of Jesus Christ as their Saviour from sin. The difference in those who know Him and follow Him is indeed very marked."

"WHILE writing for me you how much I enjoy reading THE PHILADELPHIA FRIEND. There is a true, sound ring in its columns respecting the mystical yet so real union of the Divine and the human in the person of our blessed Lord and the need and preciousness of His atonement."

Bismarck, County Armagh, Ireland.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is reported from Pittsburgh that orders for 10,000 steel cars have been placed with various steel companies by American railroads lately. They will require 200,000 tons of steel.

In a recent address in Philadelphia, Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, editor of The Crisis, said: "There were 10,000,000 colored persons in the United States only a generation removed from slavery, most of whom were suffering from racial prejudice, ignorance and poverty."

It is stated from Dover, Del., that I. T. Cooper and Charles L. Terry the latter a well-known fruit expert, will install 2000 stoves in the peach orchards on the Cooper farm, near here, where they have 10,000 peach trees. The stoves, which are known as smudge fires and for which crude oil will be used as fuel, will protect this year's crop from frosts.

It is stated that in respect to the question of the cost of living the Department of Agriculture has made the statement that since 1910 there has been a decrease of 7,305,000 food animals in the United States, and in the same period the population has increased nearly 7,000,000.

The bill to keep out immigrants who cannot read and write has passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 210 to 140. A similar bill passed the last Congress but was vetoed by President Taft. This bill provides that immigrants, to be admitted, must be able to read and write some language.

A number of mothers in this city have lately made application for assistance under the provisions of the Mothers' Assistance Fund, created by the compensation act passed at the last session of the State Legislature. More than 750 mothers, some in person, others by letter, applied for pensions at the headquarters of the trustees of the fund.

A despatch from Macon, Ga., of the 9th inst. says: "The Central of Georgia Railroad has doubled its number of experiment farms in this State. The company now owns 26 tracts, where the latest scientific methods of agriculture are taught and demonstrated. Authorities of the road say they have shown that a profit of $18.50 can be made from land valued at $27.50 an acre—a return of 67 per cent. on the initial investment."

It has been lately stated that more than 15,000 unemployed men and their families in Philadelphia are being kept from starvation by the Salvation Army, the Volunteers of America and Gospel mission societies scattered throughout this city. The bread line is the longest known in Philadelphia since the days of the last Democratic administration.

It was stated from Washington on the 11th inst.: "Treasury officials to-day issued a 90-page booklet, sent it to collectors of internal revenue, in the expectation that it will clear up many of the misunderstandings concerning the income tax law, which have arisen throughout the country. It is made clear that persons who have a net income of less than $20,000, all derived from investments and upon which the tax has been withheld at the source, shall not be required to make any return."

A despatch from New York City of the 12th says: "Wireless press messages between Germany and the United States were exchanged for the first time early to-day by means of the Sayville, Long Island, station of the Atlantic Communication Company."

A despatch from New York City of the 10th inst. says: "The completion of the first English translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew by a body of Jewish scholars representing all shades and schools of Jewish thought and learning was celebrated to-night."

It was stated from New York City on the 10th inst.: "A shipload of colored men and women, mostly farmers and their wives from Oklahoma, were in New York City on the 10th inst. on their way to the west coast of Africa, where they expect to found a colony. More were expected from Galveston and the West, and it was said that 86 were coming from Boston."

A despatch from New York City of the 10th inst. says: "An earthquake, lasting from 15 to 30 seconds and disturbing particularly what are geologically known as the Devonian and Silurian sections of the north-eastern parts of the United States, took place shortly after 1.30 to-day, being especially severe in the central and northern parts of New York State. Virtually all of New York State, including this city, felt the shock, and New England generally, lower eastern Canada, and parts of New Jersey and eastern Pennsylvania were shaken. In Philadelphia, four light shocks were felt."

of the General Assembly to-day passed the Fortner bill, prohibiting white persons from teaching in colored schools. Amendments to the measure adopted provided "that the provision of this bill shall apply to closer intimacy of the races," and that the bill shall include "white nurses employed in colored hospitals or to nurse colored patients at any hospital or sanitarium."

It is stated from Springfield, Ill.: "Supplies of typhoid vaccine have been sent by the State Board of Health to its county agents, of which there is one at each county seat. This vaccine is to be supplied free for immunizing any resident. It can be obtained by any physician upon application and the signing of a receipt. He then must report to the State on its use. The last General Assembly made an appropriation for this State-wide health precaution."

FOREIGN.—It is stated that in Europe there are to-day women professors in the Universities of Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, France, Greece and Russia, as there were in Italy since the early days of the Renaissance.

One from Stockholm, in Sweden, of the 8th says: "Thirty thousand Socialists held a demonstration to-day in front of the Government offices against increasing the expenditure for armaments, and demanded that the ministers should work rather for peace and fraternity."

It has been recently stated that William Marconi announces another marvelous development—the lighting of an incandescent electric lamp at a distance of six miles by a wireless current. The bulb was connected with a wireless receiver attached to the aerial of an ordinary wireless plant. A transmitter six miles away was connected with a 100-horse-power battery. As soon as the power was applied the bulb was lighted."

A despatch of the 11th from Havana says: "A strong earthquake felt at 2 o'clock this morning at Santiago de Cuba created great excitement among the population."

The first cargo of Argentine corn ever brought to this port lately arrived from Buenos Ayres. Local grain brokers said that, with the movement of South American corn into the United States, they expect to see the end of manipulation of prices by speculators in the West.

The English Parliament met in London on the 10th inst. It is stated that the King's speech relating to the Irish question was of great importance and interest.

RHOADS LEATHER BELTING

If a belt breaks and stops the machine you know something of the trouble, but hardly anybody knows how great the loss.

If a belt stretches and stretches, you know the bother, but who knows the loss from reduced speed and output?

Rhoads Belts require few take-ups. They are so thoroughly stretched in the making. They give uncommonly long service, chiefly because of our toughening process and skillful assortment of the leather to admit no piece that would make a weak spot.

Our booklet "Efficient Belt Service" gives striking evidence from the experience of users. Let us send it to you and also a sample of our Tarnote Lace Leather. It is a great stop-saver.

SOME irregularities in the delivery of THE FRIEND continue to be reported to the editors. The Post Office Department has been appealed to in both Philadelphia and Washington. They have given courteous attention to the complaints, but seem powerless to correct them. At no time since the beginning of the year has the paper been late in leaving 207 Walnut Place on Fifth-day afternoon. Mostly it has left in advance of the scheduled hour. Mail at the pound rate very gets attention after the matter at a higher rate. Where want the assistance at the office of THE FRIEND with exchanges and in some homes for which we can speak, bears out the assumption that we are not the only paper that suffers. We hope Friends will continue to keep us informed of these irregularities. It may be well also for them to protest through their home offices.—EDS.

"PRIMITIVE AND IMPROVED CHRISTIANITY."

The application of the word improved to that which is conceived to be perfect in itself may at first sight be rather startling; but it will not be seriously disconcerting when we reflect a little upon the probable meaning of the expression, and especially when we learn (or remember) that it was used by that "ancient worthy", Thomas Story. Those who are acquainted with the writings of the early Friends are familiar with William Penn's definition of Quakerism—"Primitive Christianity Revived". The correctness of this estimate receives confirmation in the present day from the verdict of the late William James, who asserts that "the Quaker religion" was "a return to something more like the original Gospel truth than men had ever known in England"; and he adds, "So far as our Christian sects to-day are evolving into liberality, they are simply reverting in essence to the position which Fox and the early Quakers so long ago assumed."

But Thomas Story, it seems, would have gone farther than William Penn, though in reality there can be no doubt that those two well-instructed men and close friends were of one mind as to the religion which they had both embraced, and which they had realized in unquestionable experience. The phrase referred to was used in a conversation with the Earl of Carlisle, when Thomas Story offered to show that the religion which was reproachfully called "Quakerism and error" was "no other than primitive and improved Christianity"; that is, we may conclude, Christianity better understood and applied, more largely and accurately interpreted in life, than it had been by the generality of believers, even in apostolic times.

In line with Thomas Story's appreciation is the sentiment expressed of latter time, that the Society of Friends at its beginning (or in its early years) was as a body the purest that the world has ever seen, because not only was the Gospel again shown in primitive purity, but the Church was freed from those influences of paganism and Judaism which beclouded and corrupted the earliest Christian societies. One can hardly read the book of Acts, or Paul's letters to certain of the churches, without becoming aware that there was practiced amongst some of those first professors of the Christian faith much that was not Christianity. Accordingly, many of the authoritative statements of Christian doctrine and practice were called forth "for proof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness", from the inspired apostles to their less enlightened brethren. Even in these words, however, we have sometimes to distinguish between the temporary and the permanent, as well as between the letter and the spirit.

The testimony of Scripture points to revelation as in some sense and some degree progressive, and that not without reference to the ability to receive it. What said the great Teacher Himself? "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." "Howbeit, when the Spirit of truth (or the Comforter) is come, he will guide you into all truth." "He shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you."

We may then agree with William Penn, that the work of any revelation would not be to destroy "the scriptures of truth", but to fulfil them. He also signified that the children of Light did not profess to have a new Gospel, but a new revelation of the old. It is no contradiction of this, that when George Fox had been taken so far into the spiritual realm that even the creation seemed to have "another smell", he thus describes the phenomena of his own experience, and states the general truth that he thought deducible from them: "Great things did the Lord lead me into, and wonderful depths were opened unto me, beyond what can by words be declared, but, as people come into subjection to the Spirit of God, and grow up in the image and power of the Almighty, they may receive the word of wisdom that opens up all things".

Apart, however, from extraordinary visions and revelations, that which Professor James calls "the Quaker religion" was, he says, "a religion of verity, rooted in spiritual inwardness." Now if Christianity is anything at all, it is just that—a religion of verity, rooted in spiritual inwardness; for both verity and inwardness belong to the new (and everlasting) Covenant. It is no wonder, then, that the word truth came to have so large a place in the phraseology of Friends, and that the name "Friends of Truth" was synonymous with "Children of the Light". Neither is it strange that they enjoyed a blessed fellowship as the result of walking in the light, and living according to the truth.

This brings us to the practical side of their faith, concerning which William C. Braithwaite has made the following observations, after describing their work as publishers of truth: "The most potent message, however, was given by the daily life of these first Friends". . . . "It was this power of Quakerism to penetrate the whole of life that was the greatest of its credentials. None could dispute the validity of a Christianity which resulted in consistent and Christ-touched lives. In such lives, amid all their imperfections, the Inward Light was justified of its children". Wm. Braithwaite also remarks that "in their resolute obedience to all the demands which the light made upon them, and in their sure insight into truth, the early Friends have never been surpassed."

The question may not unnaturally arise—Will they ever be surpassed? Conditions are changing; reforms are growing in the world (and Friends have ever had a part in these); but though knowledge or insight be increased, one feels that in the matter of faithfulness the early Friends could hardly be surpassed, so that as regards them the watchword for us—"Whose faith follow". This, however, is not equivalent to saying that Christianity had reached its highest expression and perfect fulfilment in all things, for the principle of "growth in the truth" may have a place in the progress of generations as well as of individuals. Such, evidently, has been the view of many of the Lord's prophets.

About the year 1755, when Mary Peisley was in America, she addressed to John Pemberton a letter in which some remarkable expressions appear. Without the least intention, as she says, "to derogate from the real worth" of the "sons of the morning", she comes out boldly in these words: "Yet I am not afraid to say, and give it under my hand, that it was and is the design of God that his people in future ages should make an improvement on their labours, and carry on the reformation even further than they did. . . . That day has begun to dawn in which the Sun of Righteousness will rise higher and higher. . . . And what if I say in the faith that is given me, that God has designed to carry some of this generation, in these parts of the world, higher and further in righteousness than their forefathers were carried, even such as were honorable in their day, and are fallen asleep in Christ."

Is there any evidence that Mary Peisley was rightly impressed as regarded the work in prospect for some of that generation? The Society at large, especially in parts of America, was not then in a flourishing state in some respects, yet there was a noble band of laborers for all that; and in connection with this prophecy, such names as John Woolman, Samuel Emlen and Rebecca Jones pass in a goodly procession.

But mark: the Gospel day was to rise "higher and higher", and the reformation to go further in succeeding years than in those that were past. This cannot mean, then, a return to beggarly elements—to rudiments of the world. The Christian life will continue to be one of self-renunciation; it must still be rooted "in spiritual inwardness". The way of light is the way of consecration and simple obedience, for the eye of the faithful servant is unto the hand of his Master. Amid all the stir and traffic of the world, and the calling of many voices, it is essential that we know the sound of "the true oracle". If we can be quiet enough to listen, and patient enough to wait, we may yet find that there is somewhat for us to hear.

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

The General Information Test at the Germantown Friends' School was given as a surprise when the school collected after the vacation on First Month 5th. The usual amusing answers were given to some of the questions, and the averages were carefully worked out for the various classes and for the boys and girls.

While the test is prepared primarily for the High School pupils, the Intermediate classes are always eager to take it. The averages for this year run about the same as in other years. The highest record in the school was made by a Senior boy with a grade of 80, and the second best by a girl of the First Class with a grade of 88.5. It is also interesting to note that the class averages grade down naturally from the Senior to the Seventh class and, as in previous tests, the boys in each class almost invariably lead the girls, sometimes by a margin of 25 per cent.

Copies have been sent to some persons who corresponded with the school about the test a year ago and, from their answers, it seems likely that the examination will be adapted and used extensively in certain sections by Principals of schools and by Superintendents of Education. The New York Independent is again expecting to publish the test in whole or in part.

An interesting lecture was delivered on First Month 20th, by Seumas MacManus, the Irish writer and story-teller, who told very happily a number of excellent animal and folk stories of Ireland and explained the Irish custom of listening to the storyteller around the peat fires in their little cabins.

An important feature of the school this year is the morning collection talks by pupils and by outside speakers who are able to bring us fresh and original points of view. A considerable number of boys and girls have addressed the school on topics of timely interest and we have had valuable talks from Frederic H. Strawbridge, and from three of the members of Mayor Blankenburg's cabinet, with regard to their respective departments in the city administration, namely: Morris Llewellyn Cooke, Director of Public Works; George D. Porter, Director of Public Safety; Alexander M. Wilson, Assistant Director of the Bureau of Health and Charities.

The usual entertainment was given by the Primary and Intermediate classes before the vacation, and we had our French and German poems appropriate to the season as in former years.

Earlier in the autumn a very creditable elocution contest was held between the Sixth and Seventh classes, eight pupils being chosen from each class after self-conducted contests by the two classes. The elocution contest for the older pupils follows in the spring.

The nature study exhibition was particularly creditable this year. The contest was open to the Intermediate pupils and hinged upon the choice of the best collections of wild flowers, moths and butterflies. The work done by the boys in collecting and mounting the butterflies was especially creditable and was surprising in its extent, some boys turning in many very beautiful frames that they had made this summer. The best collection of wild flowers was made by one of the younger girls while in the Bavarian Tyrol last summer.

The Pastorian, a school magazine, continues under the care of the older boys and girls, who conduct a dignified and creditable paper, entirely free of advertising, the school feeling that most advertisements in school papers are given through the enthusiasm of old scholars or by tradesmen for fear they will lose patronage, and so not representing good business methods.

The most interesting new feature in our school year was an art exhibit in the school gymnasium. This was made possible by a traveling loan collection from Braun, Clement & Company, the famous European photographers. The gymnasium was converted into a beautiful gallery by the appropriate hanging of three or four hundred of the great masterpieces of the best artists. All of the classes made full use of the exhibition and, from the Primary to the Seniors, studied the various pictures, schools of art, etc., appropriate to their years. Many of the pupils learned much about the merit of the best pictures and had their taste along such lines developed. Several friends of the school became interested, and as a result of the exhibition, seven large photographs will be presented to the school.

The boys have had an active football season and have done remarkably well in the face of many discouragements at the beginning of the year. A splendid spirit was shown in the development of a team that won the majority of its games by good margins. The girls had an enjoyable hockey season. The Belfield grounds, not far from the school, were engaged for their games and practice during the autumn. This is the first time they have had a regular field for this purpose.

The basketball season has already started with excellent spirit. The attendance of both boys and girls on the voluntary gymnasium afternoons is larger than ever before in the history of the school.

Class-room work is more difficult to estimate, but, so far as one can judge, the school is enjoying a good year in achievement and in spirit.

JEREMIAH AND EZEKIEL.

SUSAN S. KITE.

(A PAPER READ AT WESTOWN FIRST-DAY EVENING COLLECTION, FIFTEENTH MONTH, 1913.)

I was very much interested a few years ago in a course of lessons we had in our Bible school in Germantown on the two prophets, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. People, I think, are apt to like Isaiah best among the prophets, but there is something so very personal in the book of Jeremiah that it seems to me that it appeals to one more. One can't help being so very sorry for the poor man in his afflictions and lamentations.

We are told that we may consider the book as almost an autobiography, although some parts of it were no doubt written by another hand, probably that of his friend, Baruch.

F. Billeys, in speaking of Jeremiah, says that "he has always a fascination for Christian hearts because of the close similarity that exists between his life and that of Jesus Christ. Each of them was 'a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; each came to his own and his own received him not, each passed through hours of rejection, desolation and forsakenness.' The Jews have always regarded him with great veneration. 'Amid the names that shine as stars in the hemisphere of Old Testament Scripture there is not one more brilliant than his.' Another writer says of him: 'Jeremiah fills a large and unique place in the succession of the prophets: in pure spiritual vision and attainment, he must be pronounced the greatest of them all.'

He was the son of a priestly house, living in the little village of Anathoth—which was also a priestly village. The priests lived together in certain cities and from thence went up by turns to minister in the Temple at Jerusalem.

We find the account of Jeremiah's call in the first chapter of his book. When the Lord spoke to him and told him that He had ordained him a prophet unto the nations, he answered: "Oh! Lord God! behold I cannot speak for I am a child." But the Lord said: "Say not, I am a child, for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak." He told Jeremiah not to be afraid for He would be with him—and then He put forth His hand and touched Jeremiah's mouth and said, "Behold I have put My words in thy mouth." Jeremiah was probably quite young at the time he received his call, though not literally a child. He was naturally timid and sensitive and especially shrank from the burden he was summoned to bear. He would much rather have been commissioned to speak of the loving-kindness and tender mercy of Jehovah instead of which he had to denounce kings and priests and prophet as well as the people, and tell them of the woes which were coming upon them. "The word of the Lord came" to him first in the early days of King Josiah, while the country was still steeped in the moral corruption of Manasseh's reign. We are told that Manasseh was the most wicked and impious king that Judah ever had—and that from his time the kingdom rapidly declined. His son Josiah, however, "did that which was right in the sight of the Lord"—and began in the twentieth year of his age to bring about a reformation in his kingdom by destroying the idols and the places where they were worshipped. Then he began to repair the temple and while working there the priests found a book of the law of Moses. This was taken and read to the king and he was so much impressed with its contents that he proceeded at once to carry out the commands therein contained. The regular services of the temple were again instituted, and outwardly the people conformed.

After Jeremiah's early denunciations he appears to have been silent for about eleven years. The evils which he had foretold did not come upon the people during the reign of good King Josiah. Jeremiah makes almost no reference to the king's reformations—though he must have been in sympathy with them at least in a measure—but he doubtless felt that it was largely an outward conformity without the inside of the cup and platter being cleansed. He seems to have ceased to believe in a state religion. He felt that religion must be an individual work—he looked forward to the day when Jehovah would write His law in the hearts of the people and not on tables of stone.

As we have said, the awful predictions of Jeremiah had failed of fulfillment and he felt himself discredited as a messenger of judgment and his mouth was shut. He complained to Jehovah that he had become a laughing-stock all the day—every one mocked him. He made up his mind that he would speak no more in the name of the Lord—but the Lord's word was as a burning fire shut up in his bones and he must speak. After the sad defeat and death of King Josiah by Pharaoh Necho, King of Egypt, at the battle of Migiddo in 608 B. C., the state of the kingdom went rapidly from bad to worse, and Jeremiah set himself to stem the tide of reaction which set in under the unprincipled kings who followed. Jehoahaz, the second son of Josiah, reigned but three months when he was carried away by Pharaoh, who put his older brother, Jehoiakim upon the throne. Jeremiah speaks of Jehoahaz, as of his father Josiah, with kindness and sorrow: "Weep sore for him that goeth away for he shall return no more nor see his native country." Jeremiah's terrible predictions of coming disaster were beginning to be fulfilled. A plot against him was discovered in Jerusalem—so disappointed and heart-sick that no one would listen to his warnings, he returned to his native village thinking that there he would be safe and find the sympathy and affection for which his sensitive heart hungered. But it was not to be. His priestly relatives had winced beneath the denunciations of their young brother and they conspired under a show of fair words to take his life. He tells us the Lord gave him knowledge of it, and he seemed unable to understand why the Lord allowed such things to come upon him. He queries: "Wherefore doth the wicked prosper?" He felt grieved not only for his own apparent undeserved calamity, but also lest the people should think it was better to worship the gods of the surrounding peoples than a god who thus treated his faithful followers. Josiah was the one God-fearing king of his time, and he was slain by his enemies, and Jeremiah was a devoted servant of God and his life was one long agony.

TIME may be money, but it's a poor substitute for a bank account.

CHRIST'S KINGDOM.

Isaiah 35.

The solitary place shall smile,
The wilderness be glad,
The arid desert's burning water
In verdant robes be clad,
And lovely flowers upspringing there
Shall glow in fadefless bloom,
To charm the eye and load the air
With beauty and perfume.

The glory of the lofty hills
Of Lebanon shall lie
With Carmel's wealth of beauty there,
To greet the ravished eye,
With all that Sharon's dewy fields
Of excellence afford,
And overspreading all shall dwell
The glory of the Lord.

Then shall the blind eyes open wide,
Then shall the deaf one hear,
And music burst from unsealed lips
In cadence wild and clear.
Then shall the lame man walk and leap,
As the hart upon the hill,
Exultant in his new-born strength
His joyous pulses thrill.

And there a highway shall be made,
"A way of holiness,"
Which naught unclean may travel in,
Nor feet of sinners press.
No lion shall go up thereon,
Nor any beast of prey,
But there the feet of the redeemed
Shall tread its shining way.

And there the ransomed of the Lord
Will Zion's courts surround
With songs of angel sweetness,
With joy and gladness crowned,
For there shall be no sorrow more,
No sickness, no decay,
For grief shall all be turned to joy,
And sighing flee away.

AIMWELL SCHOOL.

The many changes in the Friendly neighborhood of Sixth and Noble Streets have not disturbed the old meeting-house standing sedately within its high brick wall. Firmly these foundations were laid in 1837, and within its spacious room were gathered great numbers of concerned Friends.

Now a little gathering is held on First and Third-days, and at the midweek meeting the children of Aimwell School outnumber the members. Here in the old meeting-room truths have been spoken that have never been forgotten by these young minds, and we are reminded by old pupils of certain "sermons we had when I was at school that I have never forgotten."

Some effort has been made to have the children understand the reason for the quiet meeting as practiced by Friends, and an endeavor to teach the help of individual spiritual prayer and communion. After meeting, children of the older grades are asked to write a few thoughts that have been especially helpful to them during the hour of worship, or to tell something of any message heard, always connecting it with the name of the minister.

The following from a girl of thirteen, who has recently been called upon to bear the loss by death of a loving mother, is given as an example of the thoughtful answers found in many of the "Bible Blank books." "I had many meeting thoughts as Hannah P. Morris, Susanna Kite and Benjamin Vail spoke to us. When we are sad and unpleasant and discouraged, we must go to our Heavenly Father and He will cheer us again. This thing I have tried many times, and have found it is true."

Recently one of the old pupils who spent but nine months under the Friendly sway of Sixth and Noble Streets Meeting, acknowledged that meeting was distasteful at first, but she soon came to love the quiet hour, and has since, when tried and worried, sought out a Friends' meeting for the quiet strength she gets in the spiritual communion.

And so with the passing of North Meeting, Aimwell School children will miss the spiritual life from the concerned members and attenders, but they will carry with them more than many of our Friends realize of the true Quaker desire to commune with their Heavenly Father in silence and at any time for guidance and strength.

Seldom has the daily attendance at the School been as satisfactory as during the present term. The Public School Grades are followed in the school work as far as possible. Much individual attention and extra work is necessary in many cases, but when some progress is noted, we feel repaid.

Sewing, cooking and gymnastic classes are instructed by special teachers and we endeavor to make the work practical. A girl of twelve remarked: "Mother is glad I take cooking, for I can now get meals at home." A note from an interested parent finished with this: "Catherine made very good pumpkin pie and gingerbread all alone last week." Requests of this kind are frequent: "May I copy the recipe after school? I want to make biscuits at home for supper." These and many similar remarks have been heard this term, showing the practical use of the course given by Drexel pupil teachers to our girls.

A Friends' Select School graduate is employed in our Gymnastic Dept. The careful training in the Gymnasium, together with outdoor games, is a great factor in the good health of our girls, and the class spirit in the outdoor and indoor games leads to fairness and thoughtfulness toward others.

The sewing department is under the care of a public school sewing teacher, who has fully entered into the spirit of the school. The aim is to lead the child to make useful garments, and foster the love for this necessary accomplishment, that the present child may say, with as much pride as many of our alumnae do: "Oh, yes, I make all my own clothes!" The training of the whole child claims our attention at Aimwell. Though often very poor, the girls are encouraged to try to help some one else, and at special times families have been supplied with fruit, vegetables, cereals, etc., through the gifts of the children. Also, twenty-seven dolls were given to the very poor of the Western Soup Society, and through the efforts of one of our former pupils, fifty dolls and nine baskets of food were sent, the latter mostly to Aimwell families.

Thus we trust that "service for others" is becoming a part of these young lives, and we only hope the tiny seed may fall into good ground. L. B. C.

"BLESSED are the peacemakers for they shall be called the sons of God."

The peacemakers are not cowards, who avoid the difficult issues of life, but the whole-makers and the harmony-makers. They are not passive, but aggressive and efficient champions of health, wholesomeness, and perfection in all the varied relations of life. Their dominant aim is to bring peace and harmony and completeness into their own life, into that of the family, into the economic world, and into all departments of organized society. Their aims and methods, therefore, are the same as those of God himself. In striving to do the will of God they show their kinship with Him and so win the Divine title that Jesus gave them—"the sons of God."

PASSING UNDER THE ROD.

How trying the process by which we are brought
To bow to the will of our God:
What care He bestows, yea what wisdom and love
Are seen in His dealings, when making us prove That 'tis well to "pass under the rod."

He knows that when all things go smoothly along
We refine on this wilderness sod:
And therefore He chooses by crosses and woes,
Bereavements, temptations, afflictions and foes,
To make us "pass under the rod."

O discipline painful, yet needful, that we May constantly wait on our God;
If necessity drove not, we seldom should go,
And much loss of His Spirit and Presence should know,
If we did not "pass under the rod."

How often we look at the worldlings around,
Each making some bauble his God:
And in moments of darkness the soul seems to say,
As we watch their rejoicing: "Tis well to be they,
For they never 'pass under the rod.'"

THE AWAKENING OF A PEOPLE.

THOMAS DAVIDSON.

"The mills of the gods grind slowly,
But they grind exceeding small."

In endeavoring to depict something of the conditions in the north of Scotland when Columba began, A. D. 580, his missionary labors there, we have largely to draw upon imagination, colored and directed, however, by some facts that have come down to us. For long it was a moot point whether the people of that part of Scotland, then, were of Celtic or Teutonic race, but the discovery, in the archives of Cambridge University, of the "Book of Deer," and researches of Gaelic scholars, seem to establish the fact that these people, the Northern Picts, were Celts, and that Gaelic was the language down to the shores of the German ocean. The present-day names of many of the places bordering on the sea, and even of the rocks and headlands, are derived from the Gaelic.

When Columba, with his disciple Drostan, who is said to have belonged to the Royal family of the Scots, came to Aberdour, they were received by the Mormaer, Bede the Pict, and "were given that place to dwell in." But Aberdour not satisfying them—it is a bleak and exposed situation and would be liable to the incursions of pirates—Columba asked for another place twelve miles inland on the banks of the River Ugie. Bede demurred at first, but later on, when his son was dangerously ill, he consented, and requested the prayers of the missionaries for the child's recovery. The child did recover and the Columban Monastery was established at Deer. After a time, Columba moved on towards Iona, leaving Drostan to continue the work, which he did with much self-sacrificing diligence. After his death he was canonized, and more than a dozen "Churches" have been dedicated to him. A memorandum in the "Book of Deer" states that certain lands were given to "God and to Drostan," which were to be free from exactions from Mormaer and Toisech (Overlord and Chief) "to the day of judgment."

In speaking of a Columban or Culdee Monastery, we must not think of great buildings like those erected in later times by monks of the Romish church. The Culdee Monastery was simply a village settlement under monkish rule, where fugitives were sheltered, and the sick tended; and where sons of Chiefs and Gentlemen of the Clan, if they desired education, might come and be instructed. From these settlements the monks went out among the neighboring clans preaching and teaching as they had opportunity, and wherever a chief was won over another little settlement would spring up. The message of these pioneers was largely mixed with superstition, but underneath there was sufficient spiritual truth to enable the Church to grow and to spread, and ere long the profession of Christianity covered the whole country. During the ninth and tenth centuries they suffered much from the incursions of the heathen and warlike Norsemen, but even among the Scandinavian peoples Christianity was making its way, and after the Battle of Cruden in 1012, when the Scots and Picts under Malcolm MacKenneth defeated a large army of Danes under Canute, afterwards King of England, the eastern coast was free from any serious incursions of Northmen, for those who came after came to settle rather than to plunder. About this time small trading and manufacturing communities of Teutonic race began to establish themselves at the river mouths, or where there was a natural harbor. These settlements afterwards formed a league for mutual help and protection, known as the Northern House, and after the marriage of King Malcolm Caenmore with the Saxon Princess Margaret (Saint Margaret) their influence rapidly increased.

Saxons fleeing from Norman oppression, and later discontented Normans also flocked north, and were encouraged by the kings to settle in fertile districts, where their superior knowledge of weaving and handicrafts placed them in positions of affluence and influence. These Normans brought their military knowledge and ruling ability, and the Kings were not slow in placing many of them in positions where they could bring the turbulent clans into at least a measure of subjection and order. Later still, Flemings came and established agricultural and manufacturing colonies, lace-making being introduced by them.

Saxon, "the tongue of the Sassenach," being now the language of Court and commerce, the old musical Gaelic began to recede. That kindly tongue, which, Ian Maclaren says, has nineteen variations of "darling," would still be crooned over the cradle, though the little one would also acquire the Teutonic dialect of his trading and fighting father. The old language had to give way, but the old feelings had still to find expression, and to-day the northern Scottish mother has a long string of terms of endearment at her command, which she supplements by turning the whole of the diminutives to a like use, and backing all up by a flexibility of tone that is a language in itself. Perhaps in no part of the world is there more self-sacrificing love shown than by these Scotch mothers, and nowhere, I believe, do mothers reap greater reward in the affection of their children, and especially of their sons.

Queen Margaret's zeal for the introduction of Roman discipline and Saxon custom proceeded from a genuine desire to spread a higher civilization, and to correct abuses, but it was at the expense of freedom; and the monks of Rome, who supplanted the Culdees, were soon no better and, because stronger, probably more harmful than the easy-going native monks had been. It is a curious fact, that at the very time when Queen Margaret was so diligently endeavoring to introduce Saxon customs into the Celtic Church of Scotland, Gundred, daughter of William the Conqueror, was also zealous for the introduction of Norman usages into the Saxon Church of England. An inscription on her tombstone, at Lewes in Sussex, states, in Latin, that "she introduced the balsam of Christian manners into the Churches of England." Probably the Saxons no more appreciated the Norman customs thus imposed than did the Culdees the Saxon usages forced on them. David the First, also canonized, son of Malcolm Caenmore and Margaret, followed in his mother's footsteps and was almost lavish in his grants of land to the new religious orders and to the Church throughout Scotland, so that one of the succeeding monarchs, when revenue was rather scant, dubbed him "That sair sanct for the croon."

During the reigns of the last three Celtic kings, the Alexanders, the people of the Lowlands made much progress, towns increased, trade flourished, and the burgh communities attained to a good degree of freedom and prosperity; but when Margaret, "the Maid of Norway," grand-daughter of Alexander the Third, died on her way to Scotland, the country was thrown into the turmoil of a disputed succession, and then came the long struggle with England which culminated at Bannockburn in 1314. Exhausted by this war, with a weak central government, a turbulent nobility, and an increasingly corrupt church, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were not times of much progress, but with the advent of the sixteenth century, though the defeat at Flodden was a great set-back, a new life began to be felt, and before the century had much more than run its first quarter, echoes of the stirring events in Germany and Bohemia were heard, and in many earnest souls a living response was felt. Persecution soon arose, but, as elsewhere, "the blood of the martyrs became the seed of the church," and, after Archbishop Beaton had burned Patrick Hamilton in 1527, he was sarcastically advised to burn the next in a cellar, as the smoke from Patrick Hamilton had infected all it blew upon. A spirit of enquiry and unrest was abroad and could not be suppressed, and in 1560 Protestantism became the religion of Scotland as by law established. In the north, however, the change was a very slow business. Some of the better educated monks, and many of the priests, accepted the new order of things, and a fair number of the nobility and gentry were prepared for it, some of them being very ready to share in the plunder of the church. It is interesting to notice that it was mainly from those families who had been the first to accept Protestantism that, a century later, the gathering to Friends took place. With them, as is always the case, faithfulness to the light already received brought more light.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

FAITH AND KNOWLEDGE.—Bob was home from college, and the family was gathered about the dinner table. "During the sermon," said Bob, "I kept thinking of the difference between Doctor Brown's point of view and that of the department of science at college. I never hear 'faith' mentioned in a class-room. There the word is 'knowledge.' They want to know, and they set to work and find out. Doctor Brown was mainly concerned with what we don't know and never can know on earth. I must say the method of college seems more reasonable."

The mother, with a troubled face, turned to her husband. Bob's father did not seem overwhelmed, however. "No sane man would choose to live by faith if he had the means of going by knowledge," he said, calmly. "The difficulty is we know so little. Tell me, Bob, what does your professor really know? He knows a little of a few laws of the universe, such as gravity and the conservation of energy. He knows a few mathematical truths. He knows a number of things that have happened in the past. But what any living person is going to do in the future, he never can know, and our lives are largely dependent upon what any number of individuals will do in the future. If we are going to do anything at all, we are compelled to live by the principle of faith."

"When your professor buys a railway ticket, he does so in faith that the railway will carry him where he wants to go. All commerce is founded upon faith. The panic of 1907 showed how business stops without faith. There was as much money and energy during the panic as there was before. The only thing that was lacking was faith."

"Affection is wholly a matter of faith. The better reason I can give for being a man's friend, the less of a friend I really am. If I am his friend because he is rich or powerful or clever, no one would call that friendship. If I am his friend at all, I am so in response to a mysterious voice within me that bids me love him."

"So of morality. Every moral act is an act of faith. Suppose I can steal a thousand dollars without chance of detection? Why don't I take it? Because I have faith in the mysterious voice within me that says I must not. No man knows what that voice is, yet all decent men prefer to obey rather than disobey it, and receive a great reward."

"The religious man goes one step farther. In the midst of all the difficulties and suffering of life, mankind hears an inward voice that says we are not alone, nor friendless, although no man call us friend. There is Some One Who cares, Who wants to come near and help us over the hard places of life. We can prove the reality of that Voice, no more and no less than we can prove the reality of morality and friendship. Every race and every age has felt that something tugging at their hearts. Christ's message was, 'The instinct of your heart is true! There is Some One greater and more loving than man has ever dreamed!' Are you going to live without faith, Bob?"

"Why, father," said Bob, "it would not be possible!"

Bob's mother was winking fast, but in her heart were thanksgiving and peace.—Exchange.

A PENNSYLVANIA girl has won the prize that the American Society for Thrift recently offered for the best definition of thrift. "Thrift," she wrote, "is management of your affairs in such a manner that the value of your possessions is constantly being increased." The definition may seem trite, but the truth it expresses needs constant emphasis. Saving money on one thing to waste it on another is not thrift.—Youth's Companion.

JOY FINDS A HOME.—Not long ago there was a touching story in one of the Chicago daily papers about a little boy who was without any home. His name was Joy. He had lost both his parents, and then his guardian had died, so that at five years old he was left homeless for the second time. He had no living relatives.

Immediately telephone calls, telegrams and personal inquiries poured in on the newspaper. Hundreds of homes were open to Joy; not in charity, but because those who asked for him really wanted to make him their son. The editors of the newspaper were deeply touched by the eager, spontaneous cry that came to them—the call of the childless homes.

Some of the people who wanted to adopt Joy were rich; some were well-to-do; others were in moderate circumstances, and some were poor. The paper made a careful investigation, and selected a few of the most suitable families. From among these it asked Joy to choose his own home.

Joy started out with a representative of the newspaper, and visited one home after another. For two days the little fellow was undecided. The whole city became eager to know what his choice would be, and the suspense of the childless families who hoped for him was touching. On the third day Joy visited a home he had not previously seen. It was a home of a very modest sort—comfortable enough, but with no sign of wealth, and no offer of luxury. The woman came down the hall as the little boy came in at the front door. She spoke one word: "Joy!" Instantly the little fellow ran to her, and as she caught him up, he threw his arms about her neck.

Joy had found a mother, and the woman's hungry heart had found a son. And all the city who had watched the drama said how fortunate was this woman, who had no great wealth to offer, and who had yet won the little fellow's heart.

But it was not luck or childish caprice that settled the question. The woman had loved children all her life, and had given her time and thought and such means as she had to making them happy and good. She had loved children, and worked for them, and the sign of it was upon her face and in her voice. The little boy knew as soon as he saw her that she was the best mother of them all for him.

In that way, so indirectly that it often seems accidental, we get our richest compensation for love and service and right living. Upon what we have been depends what we are to get.—Youth's Companion.

ONE BOY'S AMBITION.—There is a boy, here in Kansas City, Kansas, who wants to be a humane officer when he grows up. The ambition began when he was called as a witness in a case against a street-railway foreman for the cruel killing of a little dog. The boy made a good witness. The corporation lawyer tried to confuse him, but could not do it. The dog was not the boy's dog, but he believed that all dogs should be fairly treated. After the trial the humane officer, who had prosecuted the case, fastened a Band of Mercy button on the boy's coat and touching the silver star that he wore himself, said, "You will be wearing one of these some day."

So that is the future to which the boy looks, but he is not idly dreaming of it, or waiting for the years to pass; he is at work already, just as he will work when he is older.

One day he comes to us, riding fast on his wheel, before him a cat carefully wrapped in his coat, and carried in the basket. This cat has been cruelly hurt and the only thing is to put her to sleep in the chloroform box. Another time it is a dog, a cheerful little black dog, that just nobody seems to want.

The boy came once, with scratches on his face and badly ruptured hair. From within his blouse he handed us a tiny kitten and explained that there were three boys and five kittens and he had done the best that he could, but he had only saved one kitten. We fed and watched over that little scrap of kittenhood, holding on to the feeble life within the tiny body. Good friends came forward with suggestions—baby foods, Castoria, fountain-pen fillers. One dog in our home, a wonderful little creature, watched faithfully by the kitten's basket, waked us at night, to answer each feeble cry. A week passed, and then a mother cat added the little stranger to her new-born family, and the danger was past.

Perhaps the most unexpected rescue of all was that of a lost child, brought to us in the bicycle basket, just as the cats had come. He was a chubby little two-year-old in ragged rompers. His story, as we learned it, when, with the help of the patrolman, we found his home, proved to be one of sad neglect.

Whatever it may be that the boy brings us—cat or dog or baby—he does the work not for praise or reward but simply for the need of the creature that he rescues. The sorrow of life, because of the pain of the animals, has early come to him, but he is doing his share to lessen it.—H. H. JACOBS, from Our Dumb Animals.

LUCINDA LAKE.

THE death of Lucinda Lake, noticed in this number of THE FRIEND, removes one who was well known in teaching circles for many years. She was almost a pioneer in the Society to equip herself by Normal School training. On this account her services were much valued in Friends' families fifty years ago, and several circles attributed their interest in the best things of literary and spiritual culture to her influence. In speaking of this influence one who had known her in a family school said she was able as well or better than any other teacher he had known to bring out the very best in every member of a family in which she might live. This characteristic continued even when she was a helpless invalid during the last two years of her life. She would have a circle about her to read and discuss the leading movements of the day.

After a considerable period of teaching in public schools and private family schools, Lucinda Lake went to Westtown. For a decade or more she was active and much appreciated in her position there. Upon retirement she lived abroad, mostly in Paris, for five years. Although past sixty years of age at that time she acquired an easy reading knowledge of German and Italian, and perfected herself in French. During the last six months of her life, although her powers were much affected by paralysis, she could dictate in French letters and cards to a correspondent in Philadelphia. It was her custom to read a portion of Scripture daily in her three favorite languages. Thus by activity she kept her mental powers bright, and illustrated the saying that it takes longer to wear out than rust out.

The large circle of old scholars and of intimate friends who knew Lucinda Lake, were sensible of her devotion to spiritual interests. She had the quiet reticence on these subjects that often characterizes Friends, but the subjects themselves were realities in her life and gave color to her thought and work.

For THE FRIENDS.

THE SITUATION IN JAPAN

The situation in regard to the spread of Christianity in Japan is becoming yearly more interesting and important. The Friends, due to the character of their mission, there, are having a larger influence and they need all the support they can receive.

Dr. Gulick, who has spent about five years there, and last month in New York, "The fact that I believe that Japan was never so open to the truth as to-day. There are many and scores of her leading men who are feeling, for some new power to bless the new civilization which they are building up. They are realizing that the old civilization is insufficient, and they are feeling for some new way in which they can overcome the results of the materialistic civilization and education they have brought in.

"In the next ten, or fifteen, or twenty years we have a new opportunity in Japan. Thirty years ago the interest in Japan was one of curiosity, that of taking Christianity along with other western things. Then they said we will take the civilization without the Christianity. Now they realize that they have need of the Christianity as well. They are open now, as they never were before, and we want to take advantage of it."

Gilbert Bowles recently writes: "The change of the Bureau of Religions from the Home Department of the Central Government to the Department of Education is now generally taken to mean, not greater interference with religious education, but a recognition by the Educational Department of the importance of religion in molding character to meet the demands of national life. The general attitude of the masses toward Christianity has undergone no great change, but there is an increasing sense of need for that which only Christianity can supply. Suspicion and fear as to Christianity have lessened, especially among teachers of the Government Schools. The doors are open for all kinds of Christian work. It is estimated that eighty per cent of the Japanese have not heard enough of the Gospel to enable them to decide intelligently as to the acceptance of Christ."

The following departments of the Friends' work need aid, mostly in moderate amounts.

To meet this need referred to by Gilbert Bowles, tent meetings are held at county fairs, where great numbers of Japanese congregate. The meetings are often crowded, and many inquire for books and tracts explaining the Christian religion. In order to reach the middle and lower classes in the country, Gilbert Bowles and Gurney Binford, as well as some of the Japanese Friends, visit various places throughout the Ibaraki Prefecture, holding meetings among the business and railroad men, and farmers, and meeting these people in their own homes. About five hundred dollars is yearly needed to cover the cost of tents, literature, meeting places and traveling expenses.

The Anno Tomo, Japanese Friend, the paper which is issued by the Mission and circulated among our Japanese Friends, carrying to them comfort, advice and news of American and British Friends, is not fully self-supporting. A hundred dollars will add much to its efficiency and to the upbuilding of the smaller meetings in the Ibaraki Prefecture. Japanese Friends are not yet thoroughly conversant with meeting methods, and this paper carries many hints which are useful and educating.

Tuberculosis is a scourge in Japan. It is stated on good authority that one person in every five has it in one form or another. In the dormitory of our school for girls in Tokyo are several rooms rendered unclean and damp by the proximity of a necessary out-building. This can be removed to a little distance and serve its purpose equally well. Large, sunny windows can then be opened in these rooms. As the rooms now are, our pupils are unwilling to occupy them, partly because a pupil, who several years ago contracted tuberculosis, ascribed her illness to their dampness. As no houses in Japan are heated as are our own, we can readily understand the imperative need for sunlight. A little less than two hundred dollars will thoroughly complete these improvements.

The work among the young men of Tokyo is far-reaching.

Both Gilbert Bowles and Horace Coleman have classes among them, some at the Universities, some held in their own houses. The cost of this work, including literature and the printed letter which is sent to the students who have been in the Bible Classes but have left Tokyo, amounted to one hundred and thirty dollars for the year 1913.

These facts are mentioned as probably interesting to certain Philadelphia Friends.

NEWS ITEMS.

MILITARY TYRANNY.—The following are some typical hard cases of suffering by young men and boys who will not submit to military training in Australia and New Zealand. They are given as reported in the home papers but copied from The Friend (London).

AUSTRALIA.

"Sydney, December 15th, 1913.—Charles Harper, 17 years, suffering from pneumonia and heart trouble. Military doctor failed to examine him. Refused to hear his father. Sent for twelve days Middle Head camp."

"Sydney, November 13th, 1913.—A youth 18 years: 'I am the support of the family; my mother is dead, and my father can't work. I am a grocer, get away early in the morning and don't get home till late at night.' Failing to drill, sent to Middle Head camp twenty days; 3s. costs, and in default twenty-four hours' imprisonment."

"Sydney, December 5th, 1913.—Mitchell, a little white-faced boy, 15 years. Failing to drill. The boy's appearance showed he was too delicate to undergo military training, his legs being crooked and supported by steel bands and straps. His mother stated he had been a cripple since he was 5. The worst feature of the case was that the military authorities were informed in March last and a medical officer declared he was unfit. The magistrate ordered the case to be struck out."

NEW ZEALAND.

"Christchurch, November 27th, 1913.—Mrs. Howell writes: 'Last Friday I saw 31 cases through the court, and 19 were heard in Ashburn The Truancy officer remarked that he knew 12 of the 31 homes as very poor, and in one case where a fine of 10s. and costs was imposed he had helped the father with seed potatoes. No inquiry was made as to the condition of the homes, as is always done in education cases.'

"Auckland, November 7th, 1913.—Over 600 prosecutions in the Dominion during October. G. Batey just released after twenty-eight days in Fort Ganley; again convicted, fine 7s. He told the magistrate, 'I object to military training on religious grounds; I will not pay the fine.' Magistrate: 'Well, you will go to prison, and we will make you drill.' Batey, leaving the court, 'You will not make me drill.' Youths from Otahuhu and Pictou, 15 and 16 years of age, missing from home. Several times prosecuted for failing to render service."

"Winton, October 24th.—A young married man unable to attend parades, owing to wife's 'prolonged ill-health,' applied for exemption. £5 fine inflicted, in default imprisonment."

The opening of a new Science Hall at Bootham School, York, England, is thus reported in The Friend (London):

"On the 27th ult. Professor Silvanus P. Thompson formally opened the recently erected physical laboratory. The building is an annex to the old Science Block, with which it is connected by a glass-roof covered way. It comprises a well-appointed laboratory with seating accommodation for twenty-four boys, overhead gas-pipes for suspension experiments, and two commodious galvanometer recesses. There is also a preparation-room for the use of the master (J. A. Dell, M.Sc.) and a small store-room.

"After the opening ceremony the company, including the School Committee and many Friends in York for the Quarterly Meeting, adjourned to the John Bright Library. J. Edmund Clark, formerly science master at the school, introduced his predecessor, Prof. Thompson, who delivered an address on the 'Place of Science Teaching in the Schools.' He insisted that chemistry should have the primary consideration, and be closely followed by mechanics and physics. A place must also be found for astronomy, geology and human physiology. He then proceeded to indicate the relation which must subsist between science and mathematics on the one hand and the humanities on the other. A scientific training would afford a training in classification, generalization and exactness, but this must be supplemented by a study of the accumulated experience of the human race."

WHITE LICK QUARTERLY MEETING was held Second Month 14th, at West Union, near Monrovia, Ind.

Soon after the meeting settled a precious solemn covering of the Spirit was felt to be over it.

The danger of entertaining doubts concerning the doctrine of salvation was spoken of feebly.

The answers to the queries called out some exhortation that Friends might be faithful in their individual duties.

It was shown that it was not uncommon for all our membership to be present at our meetings.

PRESIDENT ROBERT L. KELLY, of Earlham College, has been invited to become a member of the National Citizens' Committee, formed to bring about the calling of a third International Peace Conference at The Hague.—The American Friend.

ROYAL J. DAVIS, who is one of the associate editors of the New York Evening Post, recently entertained the New York Quakerism Class at his home. He himself gave an address on "John Bright's Relation to English Quakerism."—The American Friend.

A QUAKER MEETING IN A CATHEDRAL.—The first Quaker Meeting to be held in St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston, occurred on the evening of First Month 29th, at eight o'clock. About twenty-five Friends, of three "branches," five clergymen and four lay members of the Episcopal Church sat down in quiet to worship together. There was perhaps a half hour of silence—a living silence in which the hidden oneness of our spirits came clearer to our inner vision. This consciousness was voiced by a Friend who showed that there is a unity of all souls seeking truth and keener consciousness of God, far deeper and more valuable than unity of opinion. After a few more words and another unifying silence we went to our homes feeling that the eternal part of our beings had been actually strengthened.

"There is great stillness in the court of heaven.

Great stillness at the center of our life.

Upon its outer edge the ceaseless strife.

The turbulence

Of making, breaking, bubble-worlds of sense

Proclaims the steadfast working of God's heaven;

Yet deep within its heart a calm there is,

Fontal creative calm, whence comes the whole."

THE TREATMENT OF HERBERT A. INGLE FOR REFSING DRILL.—William Ingle, of South Australia, a Friend from Yorkshire, who was imprisoned last summer for the non-registration of his son, is returning home on the S. S. Orana, with all his family. Respecting his son, Herbert Ambrose (aged about 16), who was recently sentenced to fifteen days' detention at Fort Largs for refusing to drill, he writes:—

"I am proud to tell you that up to now B. has stood firm; at Fort Largs he refused to drill. The commander of the Commonwealth Forces, Major Brand, ordered him to go into the lines, and B. refused to obey any orders, for he said, 'My conscience is against it.' The officer ordered two men to carry him into the lines and they did so. B. then sat down and refused to stand. The officer then stood over him and threatened to hit him with the cane if he did not go and stand at the end of the line; he still refused to obey him. Being then ordered to go and help in the kitchen, he told the officer, he could obey no orders. So they sent him to Fort Glanville, where he was for three days on dry bread and tea without sugar or milk, and allowed out at 6 A. M. to wash; a straw mattress on the floor was his bed. They then tried bullying him, but it was of no use; then they tried offering him better food if he would do the work he was ordered to do, but B. said, 'If I have to work it must be in a common prison.'"—The Friend (London).

At a conference of Home Agency Secretaries, held at the Bible House in New York, the officers of the nine Home Agencies were present. Their work covers nearly all of the United States. They reported for the year 1913 a remarkable advance in the circulation of the Scriptures. The total reaches the figure of 1,076,459 volumes. This takes no account of the general circulation of the American Bible Society in foreign lands, to the trade, or the circulation effected by the Auxiliary and other local Bible societies. The total is an advance of 280,222 volumes in these Home Agencies over the preceding year.

It will be remembered that our Friend James Wood is president of the American Bible Society.

BARNESVILLE SCHOOL NOTES.—Friends' Boarding School is again in session after a mid-year vacation of two weeks. There is a noticeable decrease in the congl, which prevailed at the close of the winter term, and all seem to have returned much helped by the vacation. Cold weather welcomed us and skating has been the order of the day, although some snow had to be removed first. Soccer and basket ball continue to be the chief games played by our students this time of year; the interest in basket ball seems to increase with the advance of the school year. The total enrolment for this spring term will be larger than last year and will reach the number sixty-five, which is the largest number for the spring in the history of the School at this place. The girls still outnumber the boys about two to one. There seem to be more girls of school age within the limits of the Conservative Yearly Meetings at the present time. As this is also a farming community, the boys are often kept at home in the spring to help with the spring work. Since the change of terms a few years ago the spring term has gradually increased in size from about a dozen to the present range. Formerly, I believe, the average was only about five months and a half spring term of school. The present term of school finishing at the end of February has been a record for the number of most other schools in this country.

Teacher Ellen S. Cope, who is one of the best of our teachers, at the end of the winter term is improving rapidly. Her health is now such that she can here and there take up her work. Her health is now such that she can here and there take up her work. Her health is now such that she can here and there take up her work.

THE FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY.—The Historical Society of the Friends of the Journal of John Woodman, which will be ready for the press, is accompanied by biographical notes of each person named in the Letters and manuscripts of Woodman are very interesting. The Society knows of the existence of such will perform a valuable service to the Society in its effort to set forth the work with accuracy. Correspondence with Amelia M. Gummery, Havertford, Penna., Publisher of Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The following letter was written to Edwin P. Sillow. Had he lived he would probably have shared the messages and the information in it with readers of THE FRIEND. Although a little belated, we are glad to do so now.—Eds.]

POPULAR RIDGE, N. Y., Eleventh Month 14, 1913.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—

A word of greeting to thee, and perhaps through thee to some of my many friends whom I left in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. It was like a repetition of the pain of saying far-well at home when I departed from Philadelphia, for truly my fellowship with the dear Friends of that city and neighborhood was a great refreshing to me. The words which come to my mind in connection with my recent visit are those which I suppose occur most frequently in Holy Writ: "And it came to pass." In the life in which one is privileged to experience Divine guidance and oversight things come to pass. They do not happen by chance, neither are they the result of artificial pre-arrangement and wire-pulling behind the scenes. For years I have felt the day would come when I would be permitted to meet with the Friends on the American continent with whom I have long felt an inward link. It appeared to me that they were sufficiently conservative to be considered the legitimate heirs of the glorious Quaker heritage and sufficiently modern to be of use to their own generation. My experience among them has not disappointed me. You have your troubles and difficulties, of course. But I do not feel that the day has come when Truth will be allowed to trail in the dust. As the older generation is gathered to its fathers, others will be found to till the gaps, fresh lips will be touched with the heavenly fire to declare the blessed evangel, and newly dedicated lives will continue the life of witnesses to the power which can transform men prone to sin into transcripts of the image of the Son of God.

After leaving Philadelphia I had some service in Newark, N. J., where some of the Friends from various parts who have settled there have begun meetings for worship in the Y. M. C. A. The meeting I attended was composed of some sixty-five persons, but many of them were not part of the regular congregation. It was a time of spiritual uplift to many of us. After Newark I came into the northwestern districts of the State of New York to visit the little groups of Friends on both sides of Cayuga Lake. I feel I am among an exercised people, who in much weakness are seeking to maintain a pure witness to spiritual worship and to those testimonies which we feel to believe have their root in obedience to the shinnings of the heavenly light in the heart of man. We had an opportunity of a public meeting in the Methodist place of assembly. The pastor, after a few simple devotional exercises on his part, made way for us, and after a time of silence I was permitted to set forth the truth of Christ's spiritual and inward appearance as the distinguishing experience of the Gospel dispensation and as that which characterizes true living Christianity. I do not think that it was in vain.

I still have some little service before me, such as holding a meeting with some of the students at Cornell University and in some other parts, before I can proceed to Montreal, from whence I hope to cross to England, for my London home.

What a wide, open door there seems to me to be before us on this great continent for the proclamation of our message. There is nothing sectarian about the truth we stand for. It suits all sorts and conditions of men.

We can carry it into the dens of infamy and into the slums, and it will make the most degraded and hopeless acquainted with the mighty power of God unto their salvation. We need not be ashamed of it in the halls of learning and in the most advanced schools of modern thought. For there, too, are hearts unsatisfied which neither science nor philosophy can bring into rest. It is Christ alone—Christ once humbled here in love to man; Christ living and triumphant in the glory of His enthronement over all the powers of evil; Christ inwardly revealed by the shining of His heavenly light, bringing into human lives the blessed virtue of His sacrifice and victories rising again unto their purification, regeneration, sanctification and transfiguration from glory to glory, till the veil of the seen and the temporal is pierced by the celestial brightness of the unseen and the eternal.

Thy sincere friend,
MAX I. REICH.

"We enjoy the various items in THE FRIEND, and I have no reason to criticise it at all, but wish rather to encourage all the dear Friends who help in the publication. No doubt you all miss our late beloved friend, Edwin P. Sellow in many ways."

DAMASCUS, Ohio.

The view expressed by our friend, Edward C. Wood, is one with which we have sympathy. It is not, however, the view of a number of our valuable contributors and it is not likely that in this particular we can do very differently from the present. Perhaps the best we can hope is a growth of sentiment favorable to the expression in this letter.—[Eds.]

TO THE EDITORS OF THE FRIEND:—

Dear Friends:—The force of an article is often strongly determined by its source, and although it is a commendation in itself to read an article as from THE FRIEND, I believe that it would help your readers even more if all articles that could be signed should be signed by the full name of the author. Many are now signed by the initials alone. Those of us who happen to know the names represented thereby gather additional benefit by such knowledge; to such as are in the position of not knowing whom the initials represent, there is no gain; why should not the latter class be blessed with inclusion in the former by having the full name of each author published?

Sincerely,
EDWARD C. WOOD.

PERHAPS the statement in "West-town Notes" of First Month 8, that a large oak tree had blown down in the south woods was a matter of little moment to the average reader of THE FRIEND. God often uses passing incidents, and things in nature coming under our observation, to instruct his children in things pertaining to his Kingdom. The reason given by the writer of the "Notes" for this catastrophe was unsoundness of root, and one lamentable feature was that it drew many smaller trees down with it. Perhaps others in the track of the same storm came out with twisted and broken tops, but because of soundness of roots will be able to recuperate and with the coming sun and showers take on added beauty. This short incident so illustrated to my mind the great need of true Christian humility, lest after we think we have attained some measure of stability in the journey heavenward, we may yet be blown down and drag others down with us. It is humiliating to the natural man, even to acknowledge that we have a tender heart, and this should always be done with self-abasement. The simple relation of this incident was so made use of as to convey a lesson of deep instruction to me, and elicited admiration, while relief from heavy burdens was gained by renewed resignation to the Divine will through a copious flow of unbidden tears. A wholesome characteristic of a true Gospel ministry is depth of feeling and tenderness of spirit accompanying the words spoken, and the same is true of other members of the church whether we be a pillar in the house, or a shingle to be tattered by hail and rain. Whatever the office the duty ought to be performed with fidelity, being assured that as thy day is so shall thy strength be.

I know not the writer of these "Notes," or the thought in penning them, but I admire the goodness of the Lord in applying things around us to aid our weak capacities in understanding his wise designs. I don't look upon successive experiences as development into new truth, but rather as the revelation of new aspects of the same everlasting and undiminished truth.

GALENA, KANSAS.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both houses of Congress have passed the LaFollette bill, which provides that women and girls in factories, stores, etc., in the District of Columbia shall not be permitted to work more than eight hours a day or forty-eight hours a week, and that girls under eighteen cannot be employed at night at all.

The House of Representatives has passed the Burnett bill prescribing that aliens entering this country must be able to "read the English language or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish."

It is stated that further regulations for payment of the income tax, issued at Washington, provided that the husband and wife, living together, should be entitled to an exemption of $4000 from the aggregate net income of both.

A despatch from Chandler, Ariz., says: "A great future is predicted for the ostrich industry of the Salt River valley by South African experts and experts from the United States bureaus who have visited this section and have become convinced that the climate, food and market conditions are favorable. There are now about six thousand birds on the ostrich farms of Arizona, and the industry is said to be but in its infancy. Growers have departed from the custom first established of raising as many birds as possible, and are improving the quality of the stock and feathers."

It is stated that a wave of temperance sentiment is sweeping Pennsylvania. This statement is based on reports from every section of the State, obtained for the most part from unbiased sources, which show that public opinion is aroused over the question of Statewide prohibition and county local option. The liquor question has been brought to the front as never before in the history of the Commonwealth. Careful canvasses over the entire State give the impression that public feeling is ripe for a vote on a constitutional amendment for State prohibition.

The thirteenth of Secretary Bryan's peace treaties, that with the Dominican Republic, has been recently signed; the two nations agreed to submit to investigation, for one year at least, all questions which could not be settled by diplomacy.

A despatch of the 13th from Tuckerton, N. J., says: "Wild fowl by the millions, in greater flocks than have been seen here in a half century, are flying in Tuckerton and Barnegat Bays, and now that the Federal game laws have stopped all spring gunning, the ducks, geese and brant, with an instinctive fearlessness, are even invading suburban farmyards. Because of the warm winter, the birds have remained on the Jersey coast instead of migrating to the South."

It was stated from Washington on the 13th: "The twelfth of the Bryan peace treaties was signed late to-day when Secretary Bryan, for the United States, and Minister Calvo, for Costa Rica, affixed their signatures to an agreement, which provides for the investigation by an international commission, for a year, of all misunderstandings between the two countries which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic means. Earlier in the day a similar convention between the United States and Switzerland was signed."

A despatch of the 15th from Washington says: "The Federal Industrial Committee to-day announced it would undertake an investigation immediately into reports that hundreds of thousands of men and women are out of work in the country. In New York City alone, according to what the committee has heard, there are 350,000 persons unemployed. The object of the investigation will be to determine whether the Federal Government should take action to relieve this condition and what measures should be instituted to that end."

It is stated from Boston that work for approximately 21,000 persons was found in the fiscal year of 1913 by the Massachusetts Free Employment Bureau, maintained here by the State. In 1907, the first year of the bureau's existence, it filled 11,450 positions. So well has the plan been found to work that Connecticut, Rhode Island and Quebec have copied it. All the expense is borne by the State, service being free to employers as well as to employees.

A despatch from New Orleans says: "The discovery of a cure for leprosy was announced to-day by Dr. Ralph Hopkins in a report to the directors of the Louisiana leper colony. Nine victims of the disease, Doctor Hopkins announced, have been discharged from the colony completely cured, and a score of others, who are undergoing the treatment, have been materially helped. The new cure consists of inoculation with a vaccine obtained from the bacteria of erysipelas, together with the internal administration of an oil."

It is stated from Des Moines, Iowa, that the Iowa Supreme Court has declared constitutional the Webb-Kenyon law, prohibiting the shipment of liquor into "dry" territory. The recent decisions of District Judge Hunter at Ottumwa, declaring the law to be unconstitutional, was overruled.

A recent despatch says: "The study of the peat deposits in Minnesota is going forward vigorously. It is the opinion of both State and Federal experts that the peat bogs will be one of the greatest sources of wealth in Minnesota. A convention to deal with this subject is to be held at Duluth, and it is expected that 200 specialists from various parts of the United States will be present."

Statistics in reference to the population of New York City show that of the entire 4,669,162 white population of the city in that year, the English-Celtic languages were the mother-tongue of 21 per cent. Next came the Jews with a 19 per cent. representation. Germany followed with 18 per cent.; Italy with 12 per cent., and Poland with 3 per cent. France, Sweden and Magyar brought up the rear with 1 per cent. each.

"Anti-slip" shoes, resembling bed-room slippers, have been placed on the forefeet of 250 horses by agents of the Women's Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The devices, made of burlap and carpet and fastened to the horses' hoofs, make it practically impossible for an animal to slip and fall on the slippery streets.

It is stated that trustees of estates affording their beneficiaries a net income of $2,500 or more for the year 1913, and one of $3,000 or more for 1914, are required to make a return under the income tax law, according to a ruling received yesterday by Internal Revenue Collector Ephraim Lederer from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington.

A despatch from Bloomsburg, Pa., of the 2nd says: "The three Columbia County Judges to-day, in open court, stated that next year not a saloon or restaurant license would be granted in Columbia County, and that their statement from the bench was notice to all holders of such licenses to wind up their business during the year. No so-called hotels, of which the county has a number, will be licensed. Each applicant for his license will be considered as new and must prove the necessity of his place."

FOREIGN.—A despatch of the 16th from London says: "Milk sterilized by electricity, the microbes being killed by electric shocks, is being supplied from the Liverpool Corporation milk depots to about 1000 babies daily. The new process was devised by Alderman Anthony Sheldermine, chairman of the local infant life preservation subcommittee. The advantage claimed over sterilization by steam is that the milk tastes as sweet as from the cow."

It was stated from Paris on the 20th: "At the French War Office it was announced that 10,000,000 pounds of flour would be placed in a warehouse in Paris to be used in feeding the population of the French capital in the event of ordinary railroad traffic being interrupted at any time by the mobilization of the French Army."

MID-WEEK MEETINGS.

From all the Monthly Meetings in our Yearly Meeting there has come up to the superior meeting within the past few weeks the confession which has now become almost stereotyped, and which, though it may awaken deep concern on the part of several, rarely elicits anything beyond the expression of regret that our mid-week meetings are poorly attended.

Within the year a Friend fell in with a Churchman and walked with him several squares in a nearby town; their ways parted as the latter said, "I turn in here, in order that, with a score or so of fellow communicants, I may seek in the quiet of this house of worship and apart from the distracting cares of business that calm which begets fresh life to the spirit, which we all so sorely need." The Friend said afterwards that it was the most smarting rebuke he had received for a long time, and the very lack of intention, on the part of his comrade, to hurt or to annoy him, made it the more severe. He called to mind that at that very hour a little handful of people were sitting together in the home meeting-house, where he regularly met with them on First-day mornings, and that but a few blocks away another small congregation of his own people were holding a Friends' Meeting as had been their custom for generations.

He who claims that it calls for no great exercise of faith to leave a pressing engagement or to neglect seemingly his secular affairs in order that he may attend his mid-week meetings does not know what modern times demand. While the farmer sits in his meeting on a Fourth or Fifth-day morning, the very thing that most adds to his prospective gains comes to him without a struggle on his part. The crops which were wilting and well-nigh burnt up are being refreshed by the long-needed rain. Had he remained at home he would neither have helped nor hindered what proved to his business the greatest blessing of the year.

Conditions doubtless have changed very much since the establishment of the mid-week meeting as a part of the organic life of the Society of Friends. It is very questionable, however, if the need for them is one whit less than it was at first. It is not safe to generalize and say that where these meetings have been most neglected the life and power of a congregation as such and of a community has most decreased, though there are some who argue from their own limited observations and incline to such a view.

The effort to accomplish a task that has in it an element of duty, though the effort is not crowned with success, has been known oftentimes to call down the Divine blessing; and in time a way is made among seemingly impossible conditions to realize the fulfillment of one's desires.

Members of our Yearly Meeting have not been classed with those who allow mere pleasure to interfere with a practice which the body holds to be important, neither are we prone as individuals to ask that the requirements or expectations of the church should be lessened because we fail to feel the full force of them. Not all of our members who fail to attend mid-week meetings feel the responsibility for their maintenance that others do, and certainly they know from first-hand experience little or nothing of the spiritual refreshment that peculiarly results from them.

There is a vast difference between a duty and a privilege. We base our First-day meetings on the former, and our mid-week meetings on the latter. No church rule nor act of discipline is needed to instruct us that it is God's command that we neglect not the assembling of ourselves together to worship Him, but the rich blessing which crowns the meeting need be no less one day than it is another, and our Lord's promise concerning it is in no degree limited by times and seasons. Public worship, wherever held, is in anticipation of that declaration of our Lord that, "where two or three are met together in My Name, there am I in the midst of them."

Doctor Fothergill, whose daily life brought him more closely into contact with the great men and women of his day than possibly falls to the lot of any of us of this generation, expressed himself thus on one occasion when asked why he adhered to a form of dress that was peculiar, he said: "I think it unworthy a man of sense, and inconsistent with his character, to suffer himself to be led by the whim of fashion and become the slave of its caprices." An answer not unlike this has often been given to those who query whether it is demanded of the present day to hold our mid-week meetings.

A community that holds its mid-week meetings because such has been the custom, and fails to feel any special duty in the matter or to realize any fruit therefrom, may be in line for receiving a rich blessing, but fails at the present to possess it. The prospect of that blessing, however, would be to most of us ample justification for holding fast to what we have.

Were all the mid-week meetings in our Yearly Meeting to be discontinued by a ruling of the Society there would arise a cry of protest from a body of non-attending members which might surprise us, and there would arise an equally urgent demand, at least in suburban neighborhoods, from those who are not members with us, why we have taken this backward step. The good old country doctor whose rounds took him each Fifth-day morning past a well-filled Friends' meetinghouse, said he felt a special blessing rested upon his neighborhood for this act of devotion on the part of his Quaker brothers and sisters. Those within the walls were little conscious of this, but who knows how far their public demonstration leavened the lives of those about them, and how far-reaching it may have been?

It is a peculiarly Quaker method of testimony-bearing to the need we have of Divine illumination in our daily walk, to approach often in prayer and thanksgiving our Father in Heaven, and surely none of our Christian neighbors would caution us to give up a practice which has come down to us from our fathers.

Our meetings, which seem peculiar to those who worship differently from ourselves, have been a means of untold blessing to the Church and to the world, and they seem especially adaptable as agents for enforcing that doctrine of personal responsibility and Divine guidance in all the affairs of life, which, though no monopoly of ours, is yet more insisted upon by Friends than by some others.

There is a trend to-day toward an individualism that Friends have been exercising as their birth-right ever since they had an existence. An individualism that recognizes the individual as the most important factor in the problem, but everywhere and always subordinate, not to the voice of the majority but to the voice of an enlightened understanding, which has sought and found the Divine guidance. It was this that in part called our friend to turn to his place of worship one morning in the middle of the week, and it is this that is increasingly finding place with very many Christians in all the denominations about us. We as Friends need to foster the movement and the mid-week meetings play no unimportant part in doing so.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE following story, told by a devoted African missionary, illustrates the unexpected ways in which our Heavenly Father selects and prepares instruments for His work:

"You know L——'s history," said our guest, "and that he was converted in prison? He was pretty wild, I suppose. One day he was with a rough crowd when some one was shot, and L. was arrested and imprisoned, although he declared himself to be innocent. While he was in prison he thought over his past life, grew tired of sin, and came to know Christ as his personal Saviour. Then he began preaching to the other prisoners, and some of them were converted. After the man who committed the murder confessed his guilt, L. was set at liberty; and he went up and down the country preaching. Those who had known his previous life were very much impressed, and he was greatly used of the Lord. When he heard the needs of the Sudan, he offered to go out there at a smaller salary than is usually paid to missionaries, saying that although he had not been trained for such service, he could work about the mission station, and teach a little. He has been with us a good deal," concluded the speaker with fervor, "and we just love him!"

The pioneer missionary in equatorial Africa must be ready to turn his hand to hard labor. Clearing a "compound" for the new mission station, building one or more bungalows and tilling the soil, may alternate with medical work, teaching, and delivering the Gospel message. In the first part of his three years in the Sudan, L. devoted himself chiefly to the manual branch of the work. But "Honest toil is holy service" if done for love of Christ.

L. is on protracted furlough now because of ill-health. If he should return to his chosen field, some of us may watch his course with deeper interest since learning his early history.

HYMN.

"When I thirst in the heat of the wilderness land,
Horeb's rock He will smite with His Almighty hand;
When I hunger and faint in the wearisome way,
He will rain bread from Heaven my spirit to stay.

"In the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and the night,
He will speak and my fears at His word will take flight;
And when from the waters of Marah I shrink,
He will sweeten their bitter before I must drink.

"If long seems the journey and far seems the quest,
Beneath the palm trees of Elim I'll lie down to rest;
Dark or light, it's the same, for He goes on before,
The one who is refuge and strength evermore.

"On the wings of the eagle He'll bear me above
All the earth-mist and gloom to the home of His love;
From the Heaven of heavens He'll hearken to me,
And at last, in the morning, His glory I'll see.

"I'll go in His strength, I have none of my own,
On the arm everlasting I'm leaning alone;
There is danger and darkness away from His side,
He is sun, He is shield, He is safety and guide."

THE AWAKENING OF A PEOPLE.

THOMAS DAVIDSON.

Within ten years of the establishment of Protestantism the Romish system had largely disappeared from public view, but the recent publication of very interesting reports of Jesuit Fathers of that time, to their superiors in Rome, show how the Roman Church was still fighting its losing battle with great persistency. Disguised as soldiers and otherwise, priests were ever moving about the country, teaching the old doctrines and administering the forbidden rites. It is curious that even the four Scotch Roman Catholic priests who accompanied, as chaplains, the rebel army to Derby in 1745, wore the Highland dress, and were called Captains. With us, who know how openly Friends acted, even in times of severest persecution, this underhand way of working, to say the least of it, leaves a bad taste in the mouth. "Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?" Just imagine Marmaduke Stevenson, William Robinson, Mary Dyer, or William Leddra going about Boston under assumed names, disguised, and ready to make incorrect statements when it suited their purpose. It is simply unthinkable.

Protestantism was barely well established when the long struggle between Presbyterianism and Episcopacy commenced. They had their innings by turns, but to the candid student it is evident that, generally, "the weight of the meeting" was on the Presbyterian side. The Covenanting Presbyterians prayed before the battles, not always very humbly to be sure, while the Episcopalian Cavaliers aroused. The Covenanters marched singing Psalms, often the forty-sixth, the Scotch metrical version of which begins:—

"God is our refuge and our strength,
In straits a present aid,
Therefore although the earth remove,
We will not be afraid."

Such folks were not easily beaten.

During a good part of the reigns of Charles the Second and James the Seventh, it is said that about a thousand Presbyterians lost their lives every year for their adherence to the National Covenant. Small wonder, then, that even now, to the average Scotchman, the very name of bishop or priest brings a feeling of repugnance and repulsion. The blood of the martyrs was the seed of Scotch Presbyterianism, and its roots have struck deep into the life of the nation. Some of those martyrs came very near to being Friends in spirit, though far from being Friends in their beliefs. Alexander Peden, one of the most noted of them, appears often to have had a good degree of that spiritual insight and discernment which we associate with the concerned Friend.

After the Revolution of 1688, Presbyterianism was finally established as the Church of Scotland, though it took nearly a generation to get it generally accepted in the north. Not that there was much difference in the rituals of the two churches then, for the Episcopal Church during the time of its ascendancy, from the Restoration to the Revolution, had not attempted to introduce either the Liturgy or the Surplice; so the re-introduction of Presbyterianism made but little outward difference in the manner of worship, but it made a clear cleavage in politics. The Presbyterian ministers nearly all favored the Revolution, while nearly all the Episcopal ministers were Jacobites. To us it seems very incongruous with the idea of worship, but during the disturbed times in 1715 and 1745 Presbyterian ministers are known to have conducted their services with loaded pistols, laid handy on the pulpit cushions, beside the open Bible; while the Episcopalians, at the close of some of their services, played stirring Jacobite airs on the violin or bagpipes. At public and social gatherings it became a custom to place jugs of water on the table, and when the toast to the king was proposed, the Jacobites present would pass their glasses across the jugs in token that it was "the king over the water" that they were pledging. A convivial song long very popular, composed by Dr. Geddes, a Roman Catholic priest, ended with the verse:

"Oh send Lewie Gordon hame,
And the lad we daurna name,
Though his baek be at the wa',
Here's to them that's far awa'."

Lewie Gordon was Lord Lewis Gordon, then in exile, and "the lad we daurna name," was Charles Edward Stuart, "Bonnie Prince Charlie."

Need we wonder that in all this confusion Quakerism did not hold its own. It had come to birth during the hearing and seeking age of the Commonwealth. At that time Alexander Jaffray, and many another earnest soul, had been struggling for clearer light and more certainty in regard to Divine things, and their cries had been heard and answered. They held fast that which they had received, and laid down their heads in peace. A second generation followed on, many individuals of which were worthy successors of the early stalwarts, but too many of the third and fourth generations gave but a nominal adherence to the Truth, and appear to have been more concerned to defend their outward belongings than to increase their spiritual possessions. This led them into a dry and desert state where there was "neither rain, nor dew, nor fields of offering," and their experience bore striking testimony to the truth of the declaration, "where there is no vision the people perish." One, certainly, I believe two, of the young Quaker Lairds were in the rebel army at Culloden; both, I presume, were disowned.

But the day of visitation had not passed forever, the Spirit of God still moved on the face of the waters, and now and then an individual, and occasionally a family, attained to the precious rest of Quakerism; one notable example being Margaret Fimister, afterwards Hutchinson, of Philadelphia, who though not convinced until after her removal to America, evidently had a good foundation laid in her early home training. I forbear to name a later family, one of whose members is still living in your midst. In other parts of America, especially in North Carolina, there are a goodly number of professing Friends, whose surnames indicate descent from the Northern Scotch. It is very difficult for some of us impatient ones, always to bear in mind the saying of our Lord, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now;" it is only those that are rich in faith, that can patiently submit to apparent defeat, in the quiet assurance of the ultimate triumph of truth. I have sometimes wondered how that gifted minister, Robert Harvey, of Old Meldrum (1710-1788) felt about these matters. In his youth he had known and consorted with Andrew Jaffray and others, who could remember the beginning. In the Visitation in Caln, it is supposed to have been to the ministry, and through a long life he endeavored fully to serve his Lord and Master. During the whole of that long life he saw the Society in the part getting better and better, and the testimony more and more imperfectly applied, which in the very district in which he lived, and close to the Friends' burial ground in which his remains were afterward laid, there was gathered a large congregation of the Friends' Seceders, and over the whole country there was a real renewal of spiritual life. It was, however, a spiritual life of a higher order type than that of Robert Harvey, and the host of Friends who were associated with him. There, at Caln, during these Seceders, every few years, would "renew the Covenant," and it must have been an impressive sight to see over five hundred of them, standing on that breezy knoll, with their right hands solemnly raised to heaven, as the minister read the articles pledging them to defend and maintain the doctrine and discipline of the true Reformed Kirk, and to uproot Popery, Prelacy, and all ungodliness. On some of the later occasions I believe the minister explained that uprooting Popery and Prelacy did not mean by violence and force of arms, as it certainly had meant a century earlier.

CALN QUARTERLY MEETING REVISITED.

I.

Boyhood memories were afresh awakened, when on the thirteenth of Second Month the doings of a day were again set to a single phrase—Caln Quarterly Meeting. Four times a year the childhood home was astir with the pleasing prospect, of the six mile ride down the valley, and then the long two mile climb across the brow of the north Valley Hill to the summit, where for near a century and a-half had stood

"Little, an'ient, solitary Caln, Dreaming upon its solitary hill."

A charm that takes its rise from picturesqueness of environment rests ever upon Caln. A little to the eastward is afforded a view of the far-famed Chester Valley, which once seen cannot be forgotten by a lover of nature. At the time of which we are speaking a grove of great oaks and other hard wood trees stood off to the rear of the house, whose outspreading branches afforded ample shade for such horses as found no room in the overcrowded hitching sheds. Beneath the shadow of the grove outstretched the burial ground, which, with the house, by several years antedated Revolutionary days; for, as tradition has it, a British officer lies interred therein. Another feature, bespeaking bygone needs, is the stone horse block, at which drew rein the women as well as men to dismount from their exhilarating ride, in days when, even in dreams, "the imagination had bodied forth" no such means of conveyance as the automobile.

"Little Caln," as the poet has expressed it, did not seem little to the boyish fancy that day, but erect, and, in a sense, even majestic, with its long frontage and two lines of partitions across the interior. Nor less impressive was the large company that assembled, and the lines of carriages that drew in from the several highways leading thither—from far Sadsbury to the westward, Bradford to the eastward, and Robeson and Evchlan to the northward. Plain coats and broad-brimmed hats on every hand, with appropriately generous intermingling of the plain bonnets of plain-skirted women, left no doubt as to the interpretation of what a "plain" Friend was. No hedging when they came to answer the Queries, by substitution of the word simplicity for plainness. To them, or the most of them, the expression—"plainness of speech, deportment and apparel" could mean but one thing, and that stood forth in the lives and conversation of so many of them in strong definiteness that the ministers' gallery and its precincts—so far as dress and address were concerned—held forth nothing to cheer the way of the backslider in these particulars. To these "fathers and mothers in Israel," as they were so often denominated, Quakerism must be recognized at a glance if in true sense it existed at all.

At the head of the meeting, clothed in drab, sweetly solemn in mien, and like Jacob of old leaning upon the top of his staff as he worshipped, sat the patriarchal form of Samuel Cope. Though nearly blind as to outward vision, there was a keenness and depth of mental grasp as he engaged in the ministry or spoke to the business of the meeting, that arrested and quickened even the attention of a child.

With a force of character and determined aim that reminded one of the Apostle Paul, no wonder that his text most frequently came from that high exemplar of Christian doctrine and experience. Fervently and without a shade of affectation in delivery, came the unadorned message of the preacher—"not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and with power," as it fell upon the hearer, it somehow took hold of the mind and filled the soul with determination to hold fast to his faith, and endeavor to lead a more consistent life thereafter.

Another personage present could not fail of arresting notice. Clothed in a suit of light drab, and with countenance of impressive benignity which shone forth from beneath a light hat possessing what seemed more than ample brim, passed among his brethren the well-beloved Ebenezer Worth—long known as the friend of the Indian and all who stood in need. One of those rare characters, who, like Anthony Benezet and John Woolman, poured out from a heart of unaffected cheerfulness the human sympathy that ran to meet its opportunity for service, and gave

"That best portion of a good man's life—
His little, nameless, unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love."

Nor can we omit to mention another who that day made a lasting impression. For while our memory pictures are in general composite; that is, made up of a number of similar experiences, they are at times the definite product of something too unusual and vivid to be thus weakened by alloy, a visiting minister, with a face almost awful in its solemnity of expression for the moment, rises in his seat, places his hand upon the gallery railing, and, while his whole frame trembles with emotion, utters the single word, "God," and then pauses, as it were, for the inflow of the Divine message that is to follow. Into that sublime moment was concentrated the fullest interpretation of what was understood by a genuine prophetic ministry. Never since has any word, or tone or gesture of a minister of the Gospel so emphatically set before him who was the youthful observer that day, the meaning implied by the Scripture phrase, "Thus saith the Lord," as did the utterance of this one word by him who was in such very truth a Quaker preacher. Unremembered is the rest of the sermon. But what of that, if the recollection of its first word carried so strong an evidence of the authority under which it was delivered. It is said of the great preacher George Whitefield that he held sinners in awe by the manner in which he uttered the word God. The preacher who so closely held the attention of his youthful listener on the occasion of which we are speaking was John S. Stokes.

Meeting over, a brief period of social intermingling followed, after which, if they did not accept invitations to dine in the immediate neighborhood, or on their way homeward, Friends passed thither without refreshment, save the modest lunch which they took with them to be eaten by the roadside on their return, to stay the appeals of hunger until home was reached. The latter course seemed a poor alternative to a youngster with a lively appetite after the long meeting. Happy, then, for him if the invitation to dine with neighborhood relatives was accepted. And how fresh are the memories of the Quarterly Meeting dinner! Dear Aunt Martha, though long since gone to thy eternal home, we still do thy homage for thy winsome hospitality and thy domestic art! How memory recalls thy delicious, creamy mashed potatoes, thy cold slaw, stewed tomatoes and preserves, and thy bread of snowy whiteness!

And thee, too, Uncle Henry, we recall, as thou sat at thy end of the long table, busy with thy carving of the juicy roast! In thy pressing for a second helping to thy guests we learned how generous was thy nature.

As we rode homeward at eventide, and repassed the meeting-house on the hill, closed were its doors and windows after the stirring activities of the day. Lonely it seemed to stand, like a silent sentinel peering from some lofty rampart and keeping as a sacred trust its watch upon that which had been committed to its care. And yet

"One holy Church of God appears
Through every age and race,
Unwasted by the lapse of years,
Unchanged by changing place."

II.

The years have rung their changes on Caln Quarter since the day of which we have been speaking. Seven of its meeting-houses have been closed. Most of those who frequented them twice in the week at the hour of worship have passed from earth. Their descendants have removed afar, or else been drawn to neighboring cities and towns, in their effort to "provide things lawful in the sight of all men." They have been of that generation which has sadly witnessed agricultural pursuits in all their inspiring freedom and wholesomeness go down in competition before the more lucrative means of providing a livelihood afforded by other callings. The vast grain producing areas of the middle and far West, its cattle ranges and its great flour mills, have disheartened the farmer's sons of the East. Such neighborhood industries as milling, tanning, burning lime, wagon building, paper making and the like, have been drawn away and absorbed into the vast commercial enterprises of the great trade centres.

But, "Man cannot live by bread alone." And Caln Quarterly Meeting still survives. Two meetings have been formed in new locations to accommodate the membership of the neighborhoods within which lie the closed houses. One of these is in Coatesville, which with its great iron and steel industries and rapidly growing population running into thousands, would seem to hold forth to the Society of Friends a place for its message and service. The meeting-house, erected a few years since, is very substantially built of stone, is very attractive and modern in all its appointments, and conveniently situated for train and trolley service commanding a large area of country. Hither from the quaint old meeting-house on the hill two and a half miles away to the northeastward, has been transferred the holding of the Quarterly Meeting.

The morning of Sixth-day, Second Month 13th, broke cheerless and grey across the Great Valley hills. The mercury stood at +5° or even less. The weather man has set it down as the coldest morning for that day of the year in the history of the local Bureau.

"A chill no coat, however stout,
Of homespun stuff could quite shut out,
A hard, dull bitterness of cold,
That checked, mid-vein, the circling race
Of life-blood in the sharpened face,
The coming of the snow-storm told."

But the weather, forbidding as it was, did not deter the forthcoming of the membership of the Quarterly Meeting. One of its heads made the observation, that it was the best turn out of their own people he had noticed for a long time. To these faithful ones were added a goodly number of visitors, including two at least who had not for a number of years been in attendance.

Early in the meeting the company was bowed in vocal prayer before the Divine Being in whose name it had come together, asking for strength to worship acceptably, and to conduct the business of the occasion to the help of the church. An earnest plea followed from the text,—"Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!" The exhorta-

IN MEMORIAM.

JOEL BEAN. Aged Eighty-three Years.

Paid into the beyond
 Beyond our loving eyes
 Beyond our listening ears!
 For in our meeting, though so old and young,
 His voice was often heard.
 How tenderly he spoke! Especially in prayer,
 His rich deep tones uplifted to the heavenly throne.
 Will ever live in memory;
 Pleading for faith—sightness—
 Help for himself, and for his fellowmen.
 Ah! well he knew the road of faith,
 The faith that's more than conqueror
 Through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

There was no narrowness with him.
 He held, in many ways, the "forward thought,"
 And yet the old interpretations of were his—
 But he would show all kind forbearance.
 For others' views that did not meet his own,
 Was any soul in trouble?
 Most wisely he would guide
 Point to our Saviour's sacrifice,
 Yet not ignore the sacrifice of will;
 Would plead for firm reliance
 On Christ, the way of life,
 To follow on to know the Lord.

Hearts have been strengthened
 By witnessing the gentle life
 Of Joel Bean—his all-compelling faith.
 And now 'tis but a memory!
 And yet we hope that at some future day
 We shall renew that intercourse,
 Which, while on earth so true,
 Must be more real in heaven.

JEREMIAH AND EZEKIEL.

SUSANNA S. KITE.

In the fourth year of Jehoiaakim the short-lived Egyptian ascendancy came to an end and war with Nebuchadnezzar followed, which lasted with more or less severity until 507 B. C., when the first deportation of the Jews took place. Jehoiaakim had died in the meantime and his son Jehoachin, who had reigned but three months, was carried captive to Babylon with the best people of the land—"even all the men of might—the craftsmen and the smiths, all that were strong and apt for war." The unfortunate king languished in prison for thirty-seven years, at the end of which time he was brought forth out of his prison by the King of Babylon, who spoke kindly to him and took care of him as long as he lived.

Jehoiaakim had been very angry with Jeremiah for his fierce denunciations and forbade him to go any more into the temple enclosure where he had been in the habit of speaking to the assembled people. Jeremiah occupied his leisure in writing out his prophecies. These he sent his secretary Baruch to read to the people on a "fast-day." This was in the fifth year of Jehoiaakim. This roll ultimately came into the hands of the king, who as it was read to him, cut out the leaves three or four at a time and threw them into the fire burning on the hearth before him. He told his attendants to take Jeremiah and Baruch, but the Lord had hidden them and they could not be found. After a time Baruch at Jeremiah's dictation rewrote the roll with "many like words added thereto." It contained all his prophecies from the reign of Josiah to the then present time. The volume thus composed in the winter of 604-603 B. C., forms the basis of the existing book of Jeremiah.

tion went forth to a full belief in Christ as the only Son and sent of God; with whom alone is the power to forgive sins. The outward rite of baptism to which Jesus submitted was not needful for Him except as establishing his full obedience to the requirements of a system which was not to be dissolved until every "jot and tittle" had been fulfilled. But to those who can so recognize it, the outward symbol has been done away in the all-sufficient substitute who, through the Holy Spirit, baptizes the heart of the believer with a cleansing power which is effectual unto righteousness. Another speaker referred to the decline brought about in the Galatian church by a tendency to return to that from which it had been called as an element of weakness; so that the great Apostle must needs say: "But now that ye have come to know God, or rather to be known by God, how turn ye back again to the weak and beggarly rudiments, whereunto ye desire to be in bondage over again?" The real weakness of the church to-day lies along this same line—a tendency to slip back into those worldly attachments from which the voice of God all along the centuries of the Christian era has been exerted to draw men away. The real virtue and power of our own lives over those of others for good, depend upon the sacrifice which we have been willing to make in order that the will of God may be acknowledged in all our ways; and His peace which comes as the reward of obedience will bring us satisfaction from day to day. Avenues of real Christian service will continually open up before us, our meetings will be times of refreshment and will do much in helping to sanctify our lives. The early Christians were called to be saints, and so are we. The use of this term need not bring before us the thought of unexpected and unattainable holiness, but simply that purity of heart and sincerity of purpose which the Heavenly Father may expect of the least of his children. The church to-day, in its broad and comprehensive sense, has been awakened by an unusual yearning after the realities of the religion of Christ. It is not ceremonial, nor sacrament, nor creed that arrests the attention or satisfies the craving of the sincere seeker after truth, but the recovery of the great central doctrine in the teaching of Jesus which made it of dynamic influence whenever His life in its amplitude has been brought into real touch with the lives of men.

In the meeting for business, Morris S. Cope, who for thirteen years had served as clerk, was released, and Brinton P. Cooper appointed for the ensuing year. The latter thus succeeds to a station held by his grandfather at the time of the meeting referred to in our first paper.

Since their last session the Quarterly Meeting had lost through death two of its most valued members—one of these, Hannah J. G. Thomas, being in the station of Elder. A sense of this loss seemed to quicken the membership into a realization of the added responsibility which fell upon those who remained, to enter more earnestly and willingly into the service of the church, which evidently is calling for their active support.

At the close of the meeting, Friends were invited to partake of a substantial lunch served in the roomy basement of the house. The call met with a ready response from appetites whetted by the wintry air without, through which lay the prospective homeward journey.

Second only to the view of Caln Quarter Friends gathered in meeting capacity, was the privilege of mingling with them in this social meal, which brings them quarterly together, and, like the age of the early Christians, may be a time of gladness of heart and of awakening a deeper interest in one another for good.

ACCOMPLISHMENT.—Show me a man who makes no mistakes and I will show you a man who doesn't do things.—THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

IF YOU would not be known to do a thing—never do it.—EMERSON.

After Nebuchadnezzar had, as he supposed, rendered the country powerless by removing the flower of the population, he set Josiah's third son, Zedekiah, on the throne. He appears to have sinned through weakness and incapacity—he consulted Jeremiah several times but wanted strength to follow his advice. The prophet urged the king to submit to the King of Babylon and not to rely on the "old brood reed" of Egypt as his courtiers urged him to do. They pushed him into treasonable action more than once; the first time he saved himself by prompt submission, going to Babylon to renew his pledges of loyalty. But he had very bad advisers. False prophets persuaded the people that Zion could not be taken—that if the army of the King of Babylon laid siege to the city, the Lord would again interfere as he had done in the days of Sennacherib. Jeremiah stood alone confronting these prophets, the priests, king, princes and people. The king again made peace, and it was not till five years later, in 588 B. C., that the actual revolt broke out. It was probably the earlier part of Zedekiah's reign that Jeremiah's prophecies against the surrounding nations were delivered. He was told to make bands and bars and put them on his neck and then send them to the different kings in token of the subjection due to Babylon. Also during this time Jeremiah was more than once in communication with the exiles of 507, whom he likens to a basket of "good figs" in comparison with the "very bad figs" left behind. He wrote a letter to them exhorting them to settle down quietly and behave as good citizens, as their banishment would last seventy years. He denounced especially two false prophets by name, and they wrote to the priests in Jerusalem asking that Jeremiah be put in the stocks "as one that is mad and acts the prophet."

The second siege of Jerusalem began in 588 B. C. and lasted eighteen months. Zedekiah appealed twice publicly to Jeremiah, asking him "to inquire of Jehovah for us," and to "pray unto Jehovah our God for us." Jeremiah told him both times that Jehovah was inexorable, promising bare life only to those who go over to the Chaldeans. When the Egyptians appeared and the Chaldeans had to relax the siege for a little while to attack them, Jeremiah took advantage of the lull to go to Anathoth and attend to some business matters; he was accused of desertion and was scourged and put into prison. After a time, probably when the siege was again resumed, Zedekiah sent for him privately to inquire of the Lord, but the prophet could only give him the same message, but Jeremiah's treatment was somewhat milder for a short time. On this account he seems to have had more access to the people, and his urging them to save their lives by going out to the Chaldeans was naturally looked upon as treason by his enemies. They urged the king to put him to death. They flung him into an empty well, where he would doubtless have died had not an Ethiopian servant of the court obtained leave of the king to rescue him. You may remember the story told in the 38th chapter of how ropes were let down into the well and old rags for Jeremiah to put under his arms to keep the ropes from cutting him, and so the poor man was taken out and allowed to stay in the court of the prison again. Once again Zedekiah asked advice of the prophet and once again he was counselled to surrender, with assurances of personal safety, but he hesitated and was lost. Attempting to escape he was captured—blinded, after seeing his sons slain before his eyes and so led a prisoner to Babylon, where he remained until the day of his death. As the King of Babylon knew that Jeremiah had advised the Jews to submit to him, so he directed Gidaliah, who was left in charge of the poor remnant remaining in Judea, to give Jeremiah his liberty and treat him kindly, after giving him his choice of going to Babylon or staying at home. Gidaliah was soon assassinated and the remnant determined to go down into Egypt and take Jeremiah with them. As heretofore he endeavored to dissuade them from their purpose but without avail, and tradition says that there in Egypt he was stoned to death by his own countrymen who were infuriated by his rebukes.

We feel like saying of him as he did of King Jehozah, "Weep for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more nor see his native country." Although Jeremiah had to prophesy such terrible things against his people, he was also given a comforting message to deliver, as we see in the Chapters 30-33—"For lo, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it." "Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love, therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee." "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah; I will put my law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts," etc.

The book that we have spoken of as burnt by King Jehoiakim is called the Book of Doom, whereas these chapters one writer has called the Book of the Future of Israel and Judah—and we see in it that through Jeremiah's eventide, notwithstanding its outward gloom, there shone a calm and full inward light. His afflictions have had a softening influence and he comes nearer to the "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do" than when in the early days he prayed for vengeance on his persecutors.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

EVERGREEN INN.—"Quick! Ned! Get up and look out the window! The snow has drifted in the night so much, it must be ten feet deep out there!" and Henry hopped about excitedly.

Ned leaped out of bed and ran to the window. "Let's dig a tunnel this morning to the big spruce-tree," he cried. "Hooray!"

Both boys dressed as quickly as possible and were soon through their breakfast and ready to go out in the snow.

"We can start down the path father shoveled and begin to tunnel where the drift is so high," Henry said.

The boys worked fast as the snow was light, and the tunnel progressed rapidly.

"What would become of us if it caved in?" Ned asked. "I don't believe we would have a very hard time to dig ourselves to the top, because you see the snow is not heavy," Henry answered.

Suddenly a light came into the tunnel at the end where they were digging, and through the opening they saw the loveliest little evergreen room, formed by the drooping branches of the spruce-tree.

"What a grand play-house, Henry! We'll have this tunnel for our private entrance, and nobody else can come in. Just look at the birds hidden in the branches from the storm—all kinds."

Both boys peered excitedly through the opening in the end of the tunnel at the birds.

"I don't see what they can find to eat," said Ned. "Let's go into the house and get them some food, they must be nearly starving by this time."

The children ran to the house and called to their mother, asking if she could give them anything for the cold, hungry birds.

"My teacher says beef suet is fine for them in winter," Henry suggested, "and chickadees like nuts and sunflower seeds."

The boys hurried back through the tunnel with their hands full of food. Clearing away the small amount of snow there was under the evergreen boughs, they scattered the seeds and nut meats on the ground. Then they tied the suet on the branches and crept back into their tunnel, where they could see all that happened. Immediately the ground was covered with chickadees and other seed-eating birds, while woodpeckers, nuthatches and others, were feasting on the suet ravenously. There was quite a chirping after they had eaten a few minutes, as though the birds were doing their best to thank the kind little boys for their thoughtfulness.

Ned and Henry kept food under the spruce-tree all winter, and called the snug shelter made by the drooping branches, "Evergreen Inn." The birds soon grew so tame that they let the boys come into the little enclosure and would perch on their heads and shoulders in the most friendly manner. Henry, who was a very good whistler, learned to imitate their notes and they would answer him.

Both boys enjoyed their bird friends and Evergreen Inn so much that they felt very sorry to see the snow melt and to have the birds leave the old spruce-tree for the open woods; but they are looking forward to seeing them return when the snow is deep again.—LOUISE M. HAYNES, from Our Dumb Animals.

CANNIBALS OF NEW HEBRIDES.—The New Hebrides are Islands in the South Torrid Zone, having an area of about 5,300 square miles, and a population of about 75,000. They are situated to the eastward of Australia and stretch for about five hundred miles from northwest to southeast. They are partly formed by coral reefs and partly by volcanic upheavals of the earth; are fertile, well-watered and often densely wooded, but have many active volcanoes. The people are Papuans and were formerly cannibals. Cocoanut, bread-fruit, banana, sago-palm, sugar cane, bamboo, nutmeg, vanilla and many other tropical products abound and the sea-coast has fish, tortoise and a kind of sea-slug which people eat.

Captain Cooke found and named the Islands in 1773. The people called him and his sailors "white devils." Sandalwood, highly valued for burning as incense by the Chinese, was exported to China at high prices. When the sandalwood was exhausted, the traders began to seize the natives and sell them for slaves, which was called "Kanaka trading" or "black-birding." The natives were fierce cannibals until missionaries like the heroic John Williams, Harris and John Geddie and the Gordons carried the Gospel here. Several of the early missionaries suffered as martyrs. Of the Southern islands of the group, Aneityum, it is said that when Geddie landed in 1848 there were no Christians. When he left in 1872 there were no heathen. Nearly every island has had its martyrs.

Every one has heard of the wonderful work of John G. Paton who says: "When I went to Ambrim (one of the southern group), we saw the people on the shore all lying under arms. We hesitated to go on shore, and whenever we approached they would rush to the shore and draw up their canoes. For hours they did this. At last two men came off in canoes, with shaking and trembling limbs, and one called, 'You missionary?' 'Yes, I am a missionary.' 'You true missionary?' 'Yes.' 'You not got revolver?' I bared my body and showed I had none. 'You no come steal boys or woman?' 'No; we come to tell you about God.' Then he cried, 'Me savvy you. You true missionary. You bring Missi Gordon long, long ago.' I said, 'Yes,' and with one rush the two men came in their canoes, leaped into our boat, and one called ashore, 'Missi! Missi! Missi!' and something else we did not understand.

"Soon the cry was echoed along the shore, 'Missionary, missionary!' and when we got there they rushed into the water and took our boat up upon the beach. Just then a forbidding-looking savage rushed at me, and I kept my eye on him, for I did not know what he was after. He seized me by the arm and said, 'Me die for missionary, me no got missionary.' I said, 'We cannot give you a missionary.' 'Do, do, do!' he said, looking at the young men with us. I said they were for another island. 'You stop long o' me. Me die, me die; me want missionary teach me.' When we went to the boat he said, 'When you come with missionary?' I explained that we could not for a year. 'Oh,' he said, 'no say year; me die.'" Thus eager are these islands now for messengers of the Gospel.—From Young People's Paper.

The less worth I have, the more Godlike mercy will appear in helping me.—Selected.

A PLEA FOR THE BIRDS.

A leaflet issued by the National Audubon Society of 1909, and which the Audubon Societies prove that our song birds are being destroyed for food.

Under a picture of "Bird Killing in Connecticut" is the statement: "This colored man and white boy had killed nearly one hundred robin on the morning of which this photograph was taken." "Bird Killing in Massachusetts" showed four robins hanging in a hole in a tree. While "Bird Killing in Connecticut, 1908," gave two blue jays, three flickers, two hermit thrushes and one purple Finch found on an Italian by the Fairfield County Game Warden. The birds were intended for a restaurant in New York City.

The preservation of insect eating birds is a matter of great importance to farmers and fruit growers. And every bird lover must mourn the loss of our songsters.

The Audubon Association asks the financial and moral support of the people, in their effort to educate public sentiment and protect the birds.

NOTES FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

If, as the preacher casually remarked, "There is a time for everything under the sun," there must be a time to go as well as to come—and happy the soul who discerns the right time for each. As a matter of experience it is not always the easiest to know just when that may be, but if one can have a sense of completeness it may be some evidence that the time to move on is at hand—even from so attractive a place as Florida.

Last First-day, the fifteenth of Second Month, we had a meeting at George Abbott's home, with some forty-seven in attendance, which was considered by all present to be one of the most favored occasions ever enjoyed there. The spirit of prayer and of thanksgiving was poured out to the refreshment of the whole company with feelings of true gratitude. During the following week some four or five Philadelphia Friends met at Welaka, on the St. John's River, and took a delightful launch ride up the Ocklawaha, which empties into the former at this point, some twenty miles south of Palatka. If one would see these Florida rivers to the greatest advantage a small craft is to be preferred to the larger boats which navigate them.

The moccasins were reported by one of the party to have been much in evidence, with the turtles, the previous day, but as the temperature had fallen several degrees over night they kept well under water and out of sight that day.

Joshua Harley keeps a hotel at Welaka, situated on the bank of the St. John's, with a beautiful outlook over that river, through noble live oaks. The largest specimen of a live oak I have ever seen stands beside his hotel—measuring one hundred and twelve feet under its wide-spread branches—which were also beautifully draped with Spanish moss.

This place is also known for the quantity of fish shipped all over the United States. We saw enormous cat fish and six to eight-pound large-mouthed bass in quantity, with herring, and shad, about to be sent to St. Louis, Mo. Strips of fish that would delight an angler's heart were brought into the "Sunyside," and we can testify to the excellence of their flavor. But as a matter of fact, the shad are better tasted in Philadelphia than in Florida. It was said they generally return to spawn in the river in which they were hatched. Rivers where they have not been caught when stocked with the fry of the shad, after three or four years, are found to be full of large ones—suggesting that these fish go out to the ocean and when full grown return to the same place.

The St. John's and all its tributaries were very full and running rapidly on account of recent rains. The constant windings of these rivers, with their sudden turns add greatly to their picturesque and give one a sense of expectancy, and discovery, while the impenetrable jungle makes one sit up in sheer defiance. The century-old cypress trees towering majestically above the palmettos leave an impression not easily forgotten. The long, almost interminable, stretches of cypress swamp give way, as we travel north on the Atlantic Coast line, to the Savannas and marshes of Georgia and South Carolina, and if one did not have a very interesting book, with which to beguile the hours, the ride might seem tedious.

Sidney Lanier has described these marshes beautifully in his "Marshes of Glynn" and "Sunrise," and my hostess, Grace Bigelow House, hands me some verses of her own composing, on the marshes of St. Helena:—

Oh you marshes, many-mooded, changeful,
With old winter's golden brown and gray, still Embedded in the young spring's emerald green,
Morning splendor, noon-day peace and quiet,
The quiv'ring expectancy of evening,
Lights and shadows, passionate and tender!
The strange beauty of moonlight, starlight dreams.
You have held me in your spell, oh changeful,
Many-mooded marshes of St. Helena!

Morning marshes, glist'ning and gay,
With the gladness of the morning,
And the hope of new adventure
In the water's glint and sparkle,
As between the bending marsh grass,
In and out it winds and wanders,
With its still and stealthy progress,
With its sudden, swift surprises
At the strong seas' deep encroachment
On Lord Marsh's still domain!
Give me of your hope, oh marshes,
Of your bright and dauntless courage,
That will meet life's sternest struggle
With your eager strength and joy!

Noon-day marshes
With the noon-day peace and quiet
Resting on your bosom golden,
With the sky above you cloudless,
And the all-embracing waters
Bluer than the azure arches
Of the deep blue heavens above you!
Give me of your peace, oh marshes—
When the noon-day rest is granted—
And the faith that knows no failing,
Like the marshes' perfect peace.

Evening marshes, still, mysterious,
With the twilight's soft'ning shadows,
And the deep'ning purple love-lights
Gathering o'er your radiant breast,
As the last slant beams of sunlight
Add their glory to your grace!
Give me of your love, oh marshes,
Oh you wond'rous love-lit marshes!
Fill my heart with love's bright radiance,
So that far beyond the shadows
Of the sin and grief that touch us,
I may see the heart of God.

Hush, the night has wrapped you in her mantle!
Oh you marshes, many-mooded, changeful!
She has darkened all your morning splendor
In a silent peace more deep than noon-day calm.
She has quenched your light and in a throbbing moment,
Full of tingling, starlight passion,
Has deepened all the twilight joy, and love,
And beauty, until now the moon is born!
So once again your stretch in magic light revealed!
In the white wonder of that light all dreams seem true
And all high thoughts fulfilled!

As we rowed around these marshes, across the arm of the Atlantic, which separates Beaufort from St. Helena Island, with only the light of the stars to guide us, the history of the past fifty years came vividly to mind. Port Royal was then a port of some importance and Beaufort the residence of wealthy slave owners, who deserted these islands upon the approach of the Federal troops in 1862. The soldiers took possession of their broad acres—covering on St. Helena alone one hundred and fifty square miles.

The negroes soon gathered there in considerable numbers. The last importation of slaves from Africa was landed here and we now have the most unadulterated and unspoiled type of the black man as their descendants—some eight thousand on St. Helena. We attended their meeting for worship on the 22nd inst. and were pleased and edified by what we heard. The regular minister was absent, and a young deacon of thirty spoke with much concern about the need of spiritual vision. The house was clean and attractive and those present generally well dressed—showing the effect of Penn School, which has been so well and faithfully conducted during half a century. The Cope industrial trades-building, presented as a jubilee memorial gift by Frances R. Cope, Jr., and his family, is the best equipped single building of its kind in the Southern States, as stated by Dr. Frissell of Hampton Institute. It was built entirely by the negro students and their teachers and turns out work of the first quality.

Surely as we inspected all the buildings and their several departments we could but rejoice in that these three hundred colored children had such an opportunity to learn so much of value to them. They come from all parts of the island on foot, some walking four and five miles to school.

Rossa B. Cooley and her able assistant, Grace B. House, have charge of the Institution and are the beloved guardians and personal friends of the whole community. If the suggested law to exclude white teachers from the colored schools in South Carolina should be enacted by the legislature of that State it will work a grievous injury to the negroes, although the staff of colored teachers at this school is entirely competent to carry on its work themselves. They were assembled in Butler Hall First-day evening and we certainly could and did realize that Presence which inspires and unites the best in every heart and fills us with thanksgiving. Reference was made to my dear father's visit to this school soon after the terrible storm of 1803—which visitation of wind and tidal wave was repeated in 1911—almost totally destroying the crop of long staple cotton. The teachers at the Penn School are mostly from Hampton Institute and show a marked degree of practical intelligence. The weather was glorious, about 40° F., with a brilliant sun, and the whole effect of this visit will abide as an inspiration to believe that "the problem" of which the black race is a real part is being gradually and surely solved by themselves.

NEWS ITEMS.

HAROLD STUART THOMPSON, a well-known Quaker botanist and an old scholar of Sidcot and Bootham, has in the press an illustrated work on the "Flowering Plants of the Riviera" (Longmans), containing short descriptions of nearly 1,700 species.—The Friend (London).

FRIENDS AND THE WOMEN'S MOVEMENT.—This subject was brought to the Meeting for Sufferings (London) by John Henry Barlow, under a feeling of deep concern. He pointed out that the Women's Movement received much attention at the last Yearly Meeting, both in the minute on the State of the Society and in the Epistle; and he asked whether we ought not now to carry our concern further forward. The minute had spoken of the duty of Friends to "enter into true relations with the world and its needs, facing them honestly and sympathetically." Here was a movement that had swept round the world, rousing China and India and the nations of Europe, as well as England. Here in England it has reached a stage of irritation and exasperation, and was it not the duty of Friends to strike a clear note, to give needed guidance, to help Woman to take her own place in the Church and the world, untrammelled by needless fetters? The burden is felt by some Friends as one almost too great to be borne, and some of our younger members tend to be alienated from the Society, through their feeling of its lack of guidance and almost lack of sympathy in the matter. The call to guide comes specially to Friends from the fact of their experience.

A very marked effect was produced on the Meeting by J. H. Barlow's appeal, and although a considerable number of Friends would have preferred to leave the matter alone, on account of the difficulty of keeping it separate from the political question of Women's Suffrage, the Clerk was doubtless right in judging the sense of the Meeting to be that a Committee should be appointed to draw up a statement of what the experience of Friends had been, and the advantages that had accrued to the Society from the frank recognition of the equality of men and women in the Church and in meetings for business. A Committee was accordingly appointed to prepare such a statement and bring it to a future meeting for consideration.—The Friend (London).

THE sufferings of the Japanese, resulting from recent volcanic disturbances and famine, have been mentioned in the daily papers, but it is a question whether their needs have been sufficiently considered and supplied by those who have the means to relieve them.

In a letter, dated First Month 22, 1914, Alice G. Lewis, of the Friends' School for girls in Tokio, writes:—"Very great sympathy seems to have been aroused in foreign countries by the recent volcanic eruptions here and the resulting sufferings. It certainly is dreadful enough, but not a tithe so dreadful as the famine in the north of Japan where hundreds of thousands are slowly starving, trying to eat leaves, straw, roots and bark, and because of the snow and cold, increasingly unable to get even that. That there will be great loss of life seems certain, although relief measures are being planned by the Government." Their condition merits the sympathy and help of all Christian nations. A similar statement has come to hand from several Japanese gentlemen, who are familiar with the situation and who are giving of their time and money to do what is in their power for the famine victims.

If the readers of THE FRIEND are inclined to respond to this pressing appeal, John Way, Provident Building, Philadelphia, Pa. will gladly forward any money sent to him for the above purpose.—JOSEPH ELKINTON.

Second Month 22, 1914.

A SPECIAL joint session of men and women Friends of Germantown Monthly Meeting was held Fifth-day evening, Second Month 19th, to consider a proposition to hold all business sessions of the Monthly Meeting, from Tenth Month to Second Month, inclusive, in the evening instead of the forenoon and evening as heretofore. The inconvenience of the plan in use for several years, when the joint session and the women's separate session have followed the regular morning meeting, and the separate session for men has been held in the evening, has been felt for some time by many. It was decided to try the experiment for a year, and a Committee was appointed to arrange details. This change does not contemplate the transaction of all business in joint session. The regular meeting for worship will be held as usual in the morning.

NEW stacks which will accommodate approximately 90,000 volumes are being constructed in the stack room at the Library at Haverford College. This addition to the new building was presented anonymously to the college and is to be, when completed, a very fine piece of work, costing about $6,500.—Haverford News.

DURING the winter about thirty-five persons have weekly attended First-day meetings at the home of Dr. C. D. and Elizabeth Abbott Christ, in Orlando, Fla. On the twenty-seventh ult. a party of attenders and their friends, numbering about fifty, enjoyed a barbecue, probably on the very site of old Fort Gatlin. The fort was used by settlers during the Seminole war and overlooks three lakes. Those present represented nine States and six yearly meetings.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

THE fine coasting weather on the 21st ult. attracted numerous visitors to Westtown, as letters had gone to various homes during the week with enthusiastic descriptions of the pleasure the snow fall had brought. As perfect a snow fall as the School has probably ever known. The snow was most of that year, and has continued through the 22d ult. The snow track is little less than a sheet of white, and of regular thickness and uniformness from the School building to the base of the hill. The opportunity afforded has been sufficient to carry the average sled and team, but the snow with electrician steering to bring it back to one shaft of the pair. The making of the track, however, much about the same, and in the direction of Radston Towns has been out morning coming, coming to worn places and then making them with a new one. The sleds have been in half-tracks on small sleds from the 14th.

ANOTHER sport that has been popular with the children of the village. There are about twenty pairs of sleds in the School room, and they are of some height; the ice crust has been favorable for this sport, and during the afternoons parties have gone off for cross-country training, and for a chance back full of talk of their novel experiences.

THE "preliminaries" in the Education Contest ended on Seventh-day, the 21st ult. Seventy-four boys and girls took part in them, and as some of them said, gained much by the experience. The three teachers, who acted as judges have given their report and the four boys and four girls selected will be due to appear in the "finals" on Seventh-day, the 28th, when we hope many friends of Westtown can be with us. It will be reasonable to give the list of eight next week, when we report the final decision of the judges for that night.

Now that the "preliminaries" are over, it is timely to turn the attention of the pupils to the Essays that are annually submitted for the Elliston P. Morris prize of books. Previous years these essays have been confined to a rather narrow scope on arbitration, and the topic has been found rather beyond the reach of the average Westtown boy and girl, but by request from the faculty, Elliston Morris has widened the field of investigation so as to include the general topic of peace and arbitration, which will present greater possibilities. We believe parents can be of service by encouraging their children to take part in this exercise; it is voluntary, but often a little wisely directed stimulus at the right time is needed to develop courage to take up the task, which once attempted is almost always much enjoyed.

We have had no Committee Friends with us either at Fifth or First-day meeting, but at the latter, on the 22nd, we had the company of Benjamin F. Whitson, who had a message for the meeting, as also three others who are in usual attendance.

ON First-day evening, Benjamin F. Whitson spoke in the boys' collection on "Education, Not from Books," and at the close presented each of the boys with a tastefully decorated book-marker with this quotation, which was the text of his address: "Education is a growth. The mind is not a mere capacity to be filled like a granary. It is power to be developed." Anna Walton spoke to the girls on the interests of the Indian School at Tusnessa, and read letters from Edith Thorpe and Emma Thorpe, recent Westtown graduates, and now teachers there; she also read a few short but well-expressed letters from some of their present pupils. After the talk the girls held a meeting in one of the parlors, the object being to see if Westtown girls could not add to the life of the Indian children at Tusnessa. The result of this meeting we may allude to next week.

IN order to insure no delay in the publication of THE FRIEND, on account of the weekly bulletin from Westtown, it has been decided to make the report Seventh-day morning instead of First-day evening. These notes were for last week's issue, but they are sufficiently fresh to appear a week later than originally intended.—[Ed.]

CORRESPONDENCE.

IN THE FRIEND of Second Month 19th, there is a notice of Edith de Long giving a "delightful talk before Friends' School" on "Life in the Kentucky Mountains."

We feel like supplementing this brief paragraph by stating that her object is not to entertain merely, but to sufficiently interest her listeners to make them desire to be annual subscribers toward the building and maintenance of the new Settlement School at Pine Mount, Pa.

IN this region there are eight hundred children within a radius of seven miles. They are not colored, nor are they "the poor white trash," but descendants of the sturdy Scotch, English and Irish who have lived in these mountains since Revolutionary days.

The old people there are now anxious for their grandchildren to get "larkin" and have advantages that have been denied them, and have given liberally of their land, their timber and their labor.

Ethel de Long started out early in First Month on a lecturing tour and will not return to her post at the School until early in Fourth Month. She has already visited many of our distant cities, as well as New York and Philadelphia, frequently speaking three and four times a day. Can we imagine what courage and physical strength this means?

All who have heard her, are impressed with her charming personality, but she is very modest in her appeals for money. For those who have not already done so, there is now opportunity to place their names on the subscription list to further this good cause. Checks may be sent to Elizabeth H. Richie, Moorestown, N. J., or to Francis R. Taylor, 918 Stephen Girard Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

LETTER OF DR. WILLIAM CADBURY TO HIS MONTHLY MEETING.
CANTON, China, Twelfth Month 21, 1913.
TO THE MONTHLY MEETING OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT.

My beloved friends:—During the past months I have been most busily occupied with professional work, but by word and act I have striven to show forth the life of the Great Physician. Often have I longed for an hour of silence, but in the heart of this great city such a thing is almost impossible. However, oftentimes as I am riding in my sedan chair through the busy streets of the city my thoughts turn inward to the source of all truth and my soul is knit with yours in communication with our Heavenly Father.

Once again I have been in the midst of wars and fighting, but as I went about my task of healing the sick I could feel the protecting arm of the Almighty upholding me. Many difficult problems have arisen to distract my mind and I have striven for guidance from the Power that is above all human planning.

A few days ago while conversing with two ministers of the English Church, our conversation turned to the consideration of silent worship. I spoke to them of the spiritual uplift that comes to those who wait in silence upon God, and I believe they were convinced of the truth of this fact. Through letters and from the columns of THE FRIEND (Philadelphia), I keep in touch with the activities of Friends in Philadelphia.

I would that we all might re-consecrate our lives and ourselves to our Lord's service. May we walk closer with Him and be more alert to hear the still, small voice sounding through all the tumult of this world, calling us to forsake the things of selfishness and to follow Christ even to the end of the world. May the power of the Holy Spirit ever more rule your minds and hearts.

With love, Your friend,
WM. W. CADBURY.

HAVERFORD, PA.

THE EDITORS OF THE FRIEND, 207 Walnut Place:

Dear Friends:—It is probably not too early to call the attention of the readers of THE FRIEND to the Summer School to be held here from the twentieth to the twenty-ninth of Sixth Month next, in order that they may keep these dates open in making their plans for the summer.

Business men will find that besides its value for religious things, this conference offers an inexpensive way of spending one week of their vacation with considerable opportunity for out-door exercise and for pleasant social fellowship. If they are unable to devote the whole time to attending this conference, they can still get some of the best parts of it by attending at the college and attending the evening and week-end lectures and meetings, while attending to their regular business in Philadelphia.

All young Friends are especially urged to hold the week-end of the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth for a special conference similar to that held in 1912.

I shall be very glad to furnish information to those who are interested.
Very sincerely your friend,
HENRY JOEL CADBURY.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Eight arbitration treaties with foreign nations have lately been ratified by President Woodrow Wilson.

A despatch from Amherst, Mass., of the 23rd, says: "Eminent agricultural experts from all parts of the United States will assemble here for 'Farmers' Week,' Third Month 16 to 20, to give advice and instruction to the agriculturists of New England. Last year the attendance was more than 1000. It is expected the attendance this year will be much greater, as the value of the instruction given has been widely heralded."

A despatch from Chicago of the 24th says: "Fifty thousand Chicago women out of 158,000 registered voted in the primary election to-day. It was their first chance to express themselves at the polls since the Legislature granted them the right of suffrage, but many who were registered refrained from voting in order to avoid allying themselves with a political party. The eight women candidates for aldermanic nominations were only partly successful. In some cases their male opponents received the votes of more women than did the female candidates."

The Senate of New Jersey has passed the House resolution amending the Constitution to extend the vote to women. The resolution will have to be passed by next year's Legislature before being submitted to the voters for acceptance or rejection in the election of 1915.

It is stated that after five years spent in searching for new sea foods, the U. S. Bureau of Fisheries recommends the mussel. This shellfish has been used for hundreds of years in some countries, but is almost unknown as a food in the United States. At the request of the Bureau a Boston hotel served mussels stewed, creamed, fried, roasted in the shell and combined with other foods. The guests liked them. It is stated that there are vast quantities of mussels which have hitherto been wasted.

A despatch from New York City of the 25th says: "From Hamburg, the world's greatest animal market, the steamship President Lincoln brought to-day one of the largest cargoes of birds and quadrupeds that ever reached New York. There were 11,000 assorted birds, six elephants, ten panthers, nine tigers and a number of porcupines and monkeys."

It is stated that Congress is asked to appropriate $350,000 for an advisory board of seven able engineers, to be appointed by President Wilson, who shall investigate plans and report a definite policy for dealing with the Mississippi problem. The damage caused last year by floods below Cairo is officially estimated at $40,000,000. The damage between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains was perhaps $200,000,000. Two years' saving of such losses, it is expected, would meet the cost of permanent works that would almost insure against flood dangers.

It is reported from Harrisburg that the Accident Department of the Public Service Commission reports 1138 fatal accidents on the steam railroads in this State during the year 1913. This number includes 351 employees, 22 passengers, 638 trespassers and 127 others—115 of the latter were killed at grade crossings.

FOREIGN.—Despatches from France and Spain indicate that serious damages have recently been done by storms. A despatch of the 22nd says: "Fierce storms of wind and rain are ravaging the whole of Spain. Telegraph lines are down in all directions, and in some instances trains have found it impossible to make headway against the hurricane force of the wind."

A steamer lately arrived in New York from Buenos Ayres and La Plata, had among her cargo a large consignment of Argentine beef and also 1000 cases of butter.

It was stated from Belfast, Ireland, on the 20th: "Safety for passengers and crew was the first consideration in the construction of the White Star Line's 50,000-ton triple screw steamship Britannic, the largest vessel ever constructed in an English shipyard, which was launched here to-day. There has been introduced into her construction every device possible to prevent a recurrence of the disaster which overtook the Titanic."

A despatch from Adelaide, Australia, of the 26th, says: "Dr. Douglas Mawson, the Australian explorer, returned here to-day from the Antarctic. He said his expedition had been 'eminently successful.' Many mineral deposits had been exposed, some of them rich. Their extent, however, was not traceable, owing to the ice. Occasional rocks exposed indicated the existence of a vast coal bed. Besides coal, the mineral chiefly observed was copper."

It was stated from Warsaw, Russian Poland, on the 26th that a number of houses were destroyed by a huge meteorite which descended to-day in the village of Jendkovitz, in the Polish province of Kielce. The meteorite emitted sulphurous fumes.

A despatch from Paris of the 26th says: "Seventeen people flew in one aeroplane at the same time in St. Petersburg yesterday, when the Russian airman Sikorsky made a flight of 18 minutes' duration with 16 passengers. The total weight carried was more than a ton. The aeroplane is propelled by two motors of 100 horsepower each. It carries a spacious cabin, which is entirely closed. There are eight windows in the side, and for night lights electric lamps are provided. The interior of the cabin is heated by the exhaust gases from the motors.

It is stated that reindeer have proved to be a great success in Newfoundland. In five years the 300 reindeer from Lapland have become 1200. For drawing sleds these animals are better than horses or dogs; their flesh is as good as beef, and they can live with little or no shelter in the severest winter climate.

It is stated that although radium is proved not to be a positive cure for cancer, the medical faculty of the University of Munich, Bavaria, asserts that this mineral does unquestionably prolong life and relieve pain in cancer cases.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6:32, 8:21 A. M., 2:18 and 4:30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone 114A.

WM. B. HARVEY, Superintendent.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING will be held at Haddonfield, Fifth-day, Third Month 12th, at 10 o'clock.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 27th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when the children are accustomed to the school and have duly learned to keep up with their lessons. There are, however, many cases interrupted in the studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fourth and Sixth Months throughout the health, and the child is gather up the knowledge of winter weather, so that they can get a better start for their studies in the autumn.

"As many candles lighted, and put in one place, do greatly augment the light, and make it more to shine forth, so when many are gathered together into the same life, there is more of the glory of God, and His power appears to the refreshment of each individual; for that he partakes not only of the light and life raised in himself, but in all the rest."—ROBERT BARCLAY.

UNITY IN DIVERSITY.

The basis of Christian Unity is the Love of God revealed in Christ Jesus, our Lord. It necessarily follows that they who are brought into such an experience are in fellowship one with another. "I in them and Thou in me that they may be made perfect in one, that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me and hast loved them as Thou hast loved Me." Perfectly realizing His Divine Mission, and looking beyond the narrow bounds of His native Judea, our blessed Lord declared to his followers, "Other sheep I have, not of this fold, them also I must bring and they shall hear my voice, and these shall be one fold and one Shepherd." The diversities of circumstance and environment are potent factors in multiplying denominations of Christians, but they were to give place to the Shepherd's call into the "One Fold" under the Divine leadership. How completely in harmony does this appear to be with the prophecy concerning Christ that he was to be, not only "the glory of Israel" but "a Light to enlighten the Gentiles," thus bringing "God's Salvation to the very ends of the earth." When the spiritual eye is opened and the heart is spiritually quickened we shall see, all around us, the "Seed of God" bursting into bloom and we shall know a spiritual companionship and fellowship which we scarcely dreamed of before. "Old things will be done away and all things will become new and all things of God." We shall then know something of the Apostle's vision of "living stones being builded together for an habitation of God through the spirit," and understand more than we have ever yet done of the living temples where the High and Holy One delights to dwell. In these temples He meets with His own and spiritual sacrifices are offered and incense arises to the throne of the Father's glory. So the Church of Christ, which He has purchased with His own precious blood, rejoicing in the Bridegroom, will come forth from the wilderness to be a praise in the earth. We as individuals having come to a living experience of the washings of regeneration and the renewings of the Holy Spirit there will be a oneness of interests realized, which will more and more bind the members of the "household of faith." There will also be a unity of purpose which will make professors of the Holy Name of Christ more and more each other's helpers and joy in the Lord.

While as Friends rejoicing in this vision of a brighter and better day, we are glad that Christians all around us are coming to understand us better than ever before. Some of our peculiar testimonies are finding their way into the hearts of other denominations, as the Wing of Ancient Goodness is spreading a mantle of charity over the Christian world. The Prince of Peace is becoming more clearly recognized in his rightful place as Sovereign Lord of the Universe, as well as Prophet, Priest and King in the hearts of all believers. While we are profoundly grateful for these marvelous changes which are taking place, it becomes us, in modesty and humility, to look well to our own peculiar heritage. "Hold fast that thou hast, let no man take thy crown." A spirit of unrest is creeping over us and a love of ease and of liberty which will make hard work for some of us in the day when foundations will be tried. This attitude of worldly compliance will also weaken our vital testimonies with those to whom we should recommend them by our faithfulness. Passing away is written on all earthly things, but "the word of the Lord endureth forever." We want a stable foundation beneath our feet at a coming time when all of earth is receding, and we need now to be looking to the kind of material we are using in our foundation, for the superstructure will stand or fall as its foundation is laid, on the rock or on the sand. We know not how many are looking to us with wistful eyes and wondering whether we will prove ourselves worthy of the priceless trust which has been confided to our care. We will do well to remember in our hours of ease and prosperity those words of heavenly wisdom, "No Cross, No Crown; No Conflict, No Victory."

As the years go by and the Love and Life of the risen Christ are being manifested in so many ways, a feeling of rejoicing, with trembling, comes with such unspeakable favors, lest we should be lulled into a fancied security in possession of the riches of a priceless heritage, and forget "the Rock from whence we were hewn and the hole of the pit from whence we were digged."

He who has been the "dwelling-place of the righteous in all generations" is ever watching over His own, and as these are enough concerned to stand in their allotment, drinking deep of the "Living Waters," there will not be wanting anointed servants and handmaidens filled with the Divine Spirit, with feet shod with the "preparation of the Gospel of Peace." Thus the "desert will rejoice and blossom as the rose."

HOW A GOVERNOR IN SIAM FOUND CHRIST.

HOWARD AGNES JOHNSON.

Down in the Malay Peninsula a Christian missionary was preaching the Gospel to the multitudes who gathered to hear his message. For more than thirty years he had been a missionary in that country, and he loved the blessed work of traveling over the various provinces on long itinerations, often lasting six months. When I saw him in his home in Bangkok he was just starting on a journey of this sort. From his own lips I heard the following story:

Some years ago he was in the Malay Peninsula in a region where he had never been before, and was very much surprised to hear that the governor of that province believed in Christ. He inquired if any missionary had ever been there, and was told that no preacher had visited the place, but that once a man was selling copies of a book. The governor heard of this book, and bought one of the volumes. Now the teachings of this book, according to the report that came to the missionary, were very like his preaching. He expressed a desire to see the governor, and was told that a messenger had gone to announce the stranger's coming. Soon he received a request to visit the palace, which he did, accompanied by his wife.

As they entered the beautiful grounds about the palace, they saw through the trees an old man with a gray beard, clad in white, standing on the veranda of the house, and by his side his wife, also in white. When they caught sight of the approaching visitors, they exclaimed: "Hosanna! Hosanna!" When they were all seated together on the veranda, the old man told of their remarkable experience. Thirty years before, when he and his wife were one day mending some of their broken idols, he suddenly stopped and called her attention to the wonderful character of the human hand, capable of making so many things. He said that the hand was a greater thing than these lifeless images they were mending. Then he declared that human beings, intelligent and creative, were greater than these pieces of wood and stone that they had shaped into images and worshipped. "How absurd it is for us to worship these dead things, as if they could do anything for us!" he exclaimed. His wife agreed with him, saying that she had often thought the same thing. They decided that they would worship these creatures of their own hand no longer, but would destroy them. This they did, and returned to the empty room from which they had taken the idols, wondering what they should worship now. The governor said to his wife: "There must be a Being greater than man who made man, and the earth and the stars. We will worship him, the greatest Being in the universe." For thirty years they had been going together into that empty room to bow before their God, "feeling after him, if haply they might find him," as the Apostle Paul said to the Athenians. It was a striking instance of Paul's statement, in his letter to the Romans, that even thoughtful heathen are led to believe in a great Being because of the evidence of his intelligence and power revealed in nature. Paul said: "The invisible things of Him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being perceived through the things that are made, even His eternal power and divinity, so that they are without excuse."

Through all these years these two children of God lifted up their hearts to Him in worship, striving to obey the law of God written upon their hearts. But they needed more light, and anxiously hoped for it day after day and year after year. The governor said that at last he heard of a man in his province who was selling a book. A sudden thrill of confidence came into his heart that this book was what he had waited for so long. In eager haste he sent for the man and asked about the book. The man said: "This is the greatest book that tells about the greatest Being in the universe." With trembling hands the governor took it. It was a copy of the Christian Scriptures, translated into his own language.

As he read the Old Testament, he said, the pictures seemed very familiar, for they were just the pictures of the life of his country. When the governor and his wife came to Paul's sermon to the Athenians on Mars Hill, where he spoke of the people worshipping the "unknown God," he said: "Wife, we have been living in Athens thirty years."

Through this word of God alone [the Bible], without a human voice to help them, taught by the Holy Spirit of Truth, they came to know the true God and Jesus Christ whom He has sent.

When the governor ceased to worship idols, he told his people of his convictions and practices, but he could not tell them much about any other religious life. When he came to know his Bible, however, he was prepared to teach them and help them to know the truth and obey it. The people had asked him for a statement of his faith, and he told the missionary that finally he had written it down. Going to a little box he took from it his confession of faith and read it aloud. With keenest anticipation the missionary listened to learn what a man thus taught only of God would formulate as his creed. It began thus: "I believe in God the Father, who made all things. I believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, as my Saviour. I believe in the Holy Ghost as my Comforter and Teacher." The statement contained the fundamental essentials of the faith that is accepted by the Evangelical Christian Church, with no addition of false views. The missionary said farewell to the aged couple, telling them that he soon expected to go home to America to visit his parents. The governor looked appealingly at his newly-found Christian brother and said:

"Missionary, I am an old man, and may not live until you come again, but I wish to ask one favor. When I die I will go to heaven, but I will be far back among the unworthy ones, for I have been an idolater and have done so little for my Lord. But you will be close up to the throne, for you have had a long life of blessed service. Please promise that you will tell Jesus that I would love to be allowed to come near to Him just once that I may see His glory."

This man was the only person who had the right to present any of his people to the King, and he had not appreciated the difference between the kingdoms of the earth and heaven in some of these things. Like a little child he believed and loved his Lord, and in his humility he counted himself one who would sit far down at the feast.

With tears of joy they separated. More than a year later the missionary visited the place again. The governor had gone to behold the King in His beauty, and to realize that he would not have to wait for any special introduction by any man. The governor's wife was living, and was teaching her people the Truth as it is in Jesus.

There are many instances of people who have been led to know the true God and to find peace and joy in Christ simply through the reading of the Bible, without any person to teach them. The Holy Spirit has been their teacher, leading them into the light of life. It is a striking evidence of the sufficiency of the Word of God [the revelation of Jesus confirming Scripture] to give all men everywhere all the light they need to make plain the way of salvation.—From The Missionary Review, Twelfth Month, 1913. Sent to THE FRIEND by EMMA CADBURY, of Moorestown, N. J.

—THE TRUE DYNAMIC.—"We must seek Peace and ensue it, not merely because we should be traitors to our own interest were we to do anything else, but also because all the noblest and most elevating passion of life is on the side of Peace. To put it into religious language, Peace based upon brotherly love is the will of God. The fine appeal by Swiss pastors to the Christian churches of the world, which we publish to-day, is based upon this sense of a compelling religious duty. Norman Angell and those who are associated with him in the campaign of Reason against War have done nothing to discredit the more spiritual appeals of the peacemaker, which have been so often dismissed as weak and sentimental. They have simply revealed once again that the deepest instincts of the Christian heart and the loftiest ideals of the Gospel are in strict accord with inherent reasonableness of things; and if we do not see that it is so, it is because we are still fools and blind."—The Inquirer, in the Herald of Peace.

THE AWAKENING OF A PEOPLE.

THOMAS DAVIDSON.

In the Secession movement there was earnestness and there was sincerity, but as Friends would say: "It was in the mixture." One who was accounted as a mother in Israel among them, "The Lady of Kinnmundy," zealous for Presbyterianism, had had her mansion plundered by the rebels in 1745. When the rebellion was suppressed she gave the Royalist soldiers information against her Episcopalian neighbors, and sitting on horseback on some rising ground she had the pleasure of seeing two Episcopal chapels being burned by the soldiers at the same time. Exasperated by this, one of the Episcopal ministers, the celebrated John Skinner of Longside, lampooned her in a poem into which he suggestively introduced the name of Jezebel; then, as a counter-move, she laid information against him that brought him six months' imprisonment.

Can we be surprised if, in such a community, Robert Harvey should feel that there was no ear to hear and that his labor was almost wholly confined to building up and strengthening those already in the fold; yet amidst all this discouragement he kept the faith, and John Pemberton, who was present at Aberdeen General Meeting, records in his Journal, Tenth Month 16, 1787:—"Ancient Robert Harvey, nearly eighty years of age, walked eighteen miles through the rain to the Half-year's meeting; he seems to possess an innocent, green old age." He died about a year later, and Friends issued a beautiful testimony concerning him. As far as I have been able to ascertain he was the last Friend interred in the old grave-yard at Aquhorthies. That grave-yard is the property of Lord Leith of Fyvie, some of whose ancestors were Friends, and at his expense it is kept in excellent order.

Some years after Robert Harvey's decease, John and Elizabeth Wigham, from Northumberland, went north, and ultimately settled at Kinnuck, and for many years John Wigham was the patriarch of the community. He traveled in England and America, but his labors in the homeland were largely, like those of Robert Harvey, confined to Friends. The time evidently had not come when the people in general were prepared to assimilate the distinctive truths of Quakerism, but our loving Father, who never overrides his children, sent them such messengers as they could receive. The Seceding Presbyterian preachers found much openness and gathered many into their fold. Later on the Congregationalists founded a sprinkling of their churches all over the north, but more important than the gathering of these dissenting congregations was the leavening influence that these movements had on the Established Presbyterian Church: and as time went on there was in it a manifest increase of earnestness and devotion. But, as often happens, the new wine proved too much for the old bottles, for as life increased there was an increasing assertion of a freedom that the church had always claimed in theory, but which, in its more lifeless period, it had very much waived in practice. Along with this assertion of spiritual freedom came also a desire for more political power, and when that was obtained through the Reform Bill of 1832, the democracy could no longer be kept silent. The claim of spiritual independence led to "The Ten Years' Conflict," which culminated in 1843, when the Church of Scotland was rent in twain, and her best and ablest, at great sacrifice, went forth and formed the "Free Church," now, by union with the older seceders, known as the United Free Church of Scotland. The Free Church leaders "bulted better than they knew;" they led the people in their contest for the spiritual freedom of their church, and in this struggle the people discovered their strength, and never again have either clergy or aristocracy been able to regain entire control.

Last summer, on a hillside in the parish of Marnock, in Banffshire, a Friend sat quietly seeking for the needed guidance in what he had come about, and in looking over the beautiful scene below, it seemed as if in that river valley he beheld an epitome of the whole history of his people. Down in a triangle formed by the River Deveron and the Crombie Burn, stands the Manse of Marnock, probably where the Culdee monks had formed a settlement soon after the establishment of the Monastery of Deer. At any rate, it is recorded that "Saint" Marnan died here in the earlier half of the seventh century, and the parish afterwards came to be called by his name, softened into Marnock. His remains were interred in the "Church," and until the Reformation they received superstitious veneration. This "Church" stood in what is still "the old kirkyard," a lovely spot in which for about thirteen centuries the people have laid their dead. The present kirk, built since the Reformation, stands on a small hill about a quarter of a mile away, and close to it are some "standing stones," very likely marking a place of sepulture, and maybe of earlier worship and sacrifice. The Columban monks had chosen a very suitable place for their settlement. The Deveron and the Crombie protected it on two sides, and the ground is fertile and well-sheltered. To this refuge sometimes would come hunted fugitives, "broken men and sorners," and we can well imagine Bishop Marmon standing robed, with crozier in hand, daring the pursuers to touch those to whom he had accorded sanctuary, while in the "Church" might be heard the soft, trained voices of the monks chanting the supplications of their Litany, a very apposite one being, "From Caterans, Robbers and Wolves, good Lord, deliver us." (Caterans were bands of outlaws.) Here also would come the sick and the suffering, and many a young man, whose budding spiritual perceptions urged him away from the scenes of bloodshed and pillage that were so rife in those times.

Four centuries passed with probably less change than in each half century now, and then Saxon traders from the colony of Banff, at the Deveron's mouth, would make their appearance. Traders at first, but soon as settlers, for these elbowing, pushful fellows had come to stay; and anon priests with Southern training and sympathies, and speaking the Southern tongue came and ousted the old Gaelic-speaking monks. Thus slowly but surely the transformation went on. Five hundred years later came the Reformation; not very welcome at first, for the old superstitions were deeply ingrained, but backed by the law, the Reformed ministers gradually gained firm foothold. After another century and a half of turmoil and strife, came the Revolution of 1688, not at all popular, for the Stuart kings were Scotch, and with all their faults, they had the art of holding the affections of the people from which they had sprung. Besides, Episcopacy, the pre-revolution religion, was less exacting than Presbyterianism, though in time the latter was accepted. All these changes had come from the outside and had been acquiesced in with a grumble. Presbyterianism, however hard and narrow it was then in some of its aspects, did always recognize the peoples' right to some share in the management of the affairs of the church, and it was always in favor of education. When it had been dominant for a century its influence for good on the whole community was not to be gainsaid, especially where, as at Marnock, some really pious, earnest men had been ministers.

One of the ministers died just as the Free Church movement was making steady headway, and for good reasons the people were not prepared to accept as his successor the nominee of the Patron, and so a crisis ensued that turned the attention of the whole country to this quiet and secluded locality. The Patron, finding that his nominee, John Edwards, was unacceptable, named another, readily accepted by the people; but John Edwards appealed to the civil authorities, while the people appealed to the Courts of the Church. Two years of litigation followed, then the Judges in the "Court of Session" ordered the Presbytery to induct John Edwards, and the Courts of the Church forbade them to do so. At last the Tory portion of the Presbytery, in defiance of the wishes of the congregation and the mandate of their own Church's General Assembly, on the twenty-first of First Month, 1841, ordained John Edwards and inducted him as minister of the parish of Marnock. The people's feelings were outraged, and rather than submit, before "the ordination service" took place they withdrew in a body. Down by the Crombie Burn, on that cold, snowy day, the Elders gathered them together, and, after making the needful arrangements for the following First-day, they advised all to go quietly home and so give the authorities no handle against them. The people behaved splendidly, though it was no small trial to leave the place where most of them had worshipped all their lives, and where their ancestors had done so for generations. It was another case of "the victory of the vanquished." John Edwards got his "living," the reactionary Tory judges and parsons got their way, but, unwittingly, they greatly aided that cause of popular freedom which they so much dreaded and tried to suppress. From all over Scotland, from the north of Ireland, and from America, funds came to assist the people of Marnoch to erect a place of worship suited to their needs, and to help them to bear the burdens that this course of action had brought upon them. But they were free, and in little more than two years, hundreds of congregations all over Scotland were free as well.

About seventy years ago some earnest Scotch Baptist Evangelists, mostly from Dundee, went all over the north and gathered quite a number of small congregations. They tried to do without paid ministry, which was so far well; but they did not depend on the anointing, nor wait to feel the fresh arisings of life, but depended on the letter of Scripture, and their preaching got so dry and repetitious that they not only failed to gather in the rising generation, but even to keep many of those they had gathered. In very few cases did these little meetings survive more than one generation. The Methodists had a look in, but emotionalism, especially in religion, is repugnant to the Scot, and they have failed to make much way. The Revival of 1850-60 swept over the land, and many were turned to a better life; but that force also spent itself. I have often felt deeply thankful that the dear old Friends of that day, while rejoicing that a good work was going on around them, had faith and patience enough to keep their ranks in righteousness, and not to lower the standard that had been given them to bear. The Plymouth Brethren came, and for a time "their wondrous wordy lore" attracted a good many, but as Richard Brockbank, in his Journal recently appearing in THE FRIEND tells us, they, too, have failed to satisfy the seeking ones. George Macdonald by his able writings has done much to shatter the harsh Calvinism of this his native district, but he was more of an iconoclast than a builder, and he, too, has passed and gone. I think in "Robert Falconer" he shows Calvinism at its worst, and in "Alec Forbes" at its best. Both works refer largely to Aberdeenshire.

Many in the north have drifted away from the churches that satisfied their fathers. Many are unsettled and seeking, and not a few have lost faith and are not seeking, but there is still One, even Christ, who can availingly speak to all conditions. If his messengers are to gather the people to Him they must go in the renunciation of self, and with lips that are touched with the live coal from off the Altar. To the real seekers the simple message of Quakerism, that Christ does teach his people himself, would prove as satisfying now as it did to seekers in the same locality two hundred and fifty years ago, if it were as livingly and lovingly given as it was then.

Quakerism again has its opportunity, but are Friends prepared to rise to the occasion?

I THANK THEE.

For air and sunshine, pure and sweet,
For grass that grows beneath my feet,
For leafy trees with fruit and shade,
For things of beauty He has made,
I thank my heavenly Father.

For daily blessings full and free,
For all His care o'er you and me,
For Jesus Christ, our dearest Friend,
For life in Him which knows no end,
Oh! thank our heavenly Father.

THE INWARD LIGHT.

What is Christian teaching concerning "the inward light?" We are living in a restless age. Many strange voices clamor for a hearing. Ancient pagan cults and mystic philosophies are being resuscitated out of their graves; and spite of their conflicting propositions they all profess agreement in their acceptance of the fact of a mysterious light in every man. Now what does the humble believer in the Christian revelation mean when he, too, confesses the reality of the light within?

At the very threshold of such an enquiry stands the plain pronouncement of holy Scripture: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. iii: 14). So whatever nobility attaches to man, and being a living soul, i. e., other than material, he is truly marvelously endowed, the things of the Divine Spirit are on a yet higher plane, and there is no inherent faculty in the natural man whereby he can apprehend them. It may be objected that the apostle Paul was only voicing his own view and was not speaking as an authoritative vehicle of inspired truth. But the language of his Lord and ours is stronger still. "The Spirit of Truth . . . the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him," and "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God." The realm of spiritual realities can only be discovered by means of spiritual faculties, and "the natural man" does not possess them.

Now this is Christian teaching. There is One who is "the Light of the world," the One who is declared to be the uncreated and all-creating Word, "the true Light that lighteth every man." The world of humanity is not left to its own natural faculties merely. There is a Light in every man which gives spiritual insight, as there are natural faculties suited to the world of sight and sense. Not only in those parts of the non-Christian world where man has attained to a good degree of refinement and culture, such as China and India, but among the more backward races the Light shines—more or less dimly, because the light of heaven is always affected by the earthly medium through which it reaches the consciousness. We dare to believe "That in even savage bosoms

There are longings, yearnings, strivings
For the good they comprehend not;
That the feeble hands and helpless,
Groping blindly in the darkness,
Touch God's right hand in the darkness."

But we reverently trace the feeblest and faintest ray of true light back to its Fount of light, and that Fount is Christ. "With Thee," we confess with the Hebrew psalmist, "is the fountain of life, and in Thy light we shall see light." It is the living Christ touching man, altogether apart from any outward teaching coming through human instrumentality.

Do we then make void the necessity of this outward ministry? Nay, verily, we establish it. For what is ministry? It is the Lord raising up, qualifying and sending men to open eyes that are blinded by sin to the light, that they may turn from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God (Acts xxvi: 18). India has talked about the inward Light since the dawn of history, but holding it only as an intellectual proposition, it has not known its healing power, and so its weary millions need to be turned to the light that they may believe in it, and not merely discuss it.

Neither do we set aside the need of the Incarnation and of "the Redemption that is in Christ Jesus" when we confess the inward Light to be both sufficient and efficient where its pointings are obeyed. We glorify that redemption. For the inward Light is the God-appointed means whereby that redemption reaches and becomes effective in man. The inward work of Christ is the application of the value of the outward work. The Son of God entered human history and made Himself one with the sin and suffering of humanity. He grappled with our problems and solved them gloriously. It cost Him His very blood. Where flesh and blood in man failed, it triumphed in "the second Man, who is the Lord from heaven." "His Life is the Light of men," says John. The inward light which visits every man is the essence of that life which became flesh in Jesus Christ and came off victoriously in its conflict with the sin and suffering of the world. The living virtue and power of Christ are in it. He that follows Him shall not walk in darkness, but shall have more and more abundantly the light of life.

And here even modern science becomes a witness to Truth, as it is recorded in the New Testament. It has demonstrated the essential oneness between light, heat and motion. Light is potential fire, and fire is the secret of movement. Motion can be reduced to heat, and heat to elemental light. Heat and energy are contained in the light.

If this be so, how glorious does the imagery of Light make our Saviour to appear. He who says, "I am the Light of the world!" For as Light He shews us things invisible otherwise. He illuminates our understandings and sensitizes our consciences. Moreover, He kindles the desires of our hearts and empowers our wills. By His light He first shews us the way wherein we should walk. By His fire He kindles within us a holy passion to walk in that way, even though it be the narrow way of the Cross. And that again becomes the energy enabling us to tread this way. Heavenly things become operative on earth by this means.

Anti-Christian systems of mystic philosophy have captured this expression, "the inward light," but in their hands it has become something else than what it really is—namely, the keystone of all true Christian living. It is our duty to put it back in its own proper setting. We need not make a mystery of what is after all so simple that our Lord could declare that it is "revealed to babes."

Christianity is not a philosophy which only a few highly trained minds can fathom. It is a universal message, suited to all races and conditions. It is the power of God unto salvation. It is deep answering unto deep; the deep in God answering to the cry out of the depths in man; and that answer is Christ.

"The world is weary of new tracks of thought
That lead to naught;
Sick of quack remedies prescribed in vain
For mortal pain;
Yet still above them all
One Figure stands
With outstretched hands."

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' LIBRARY.

One of the most efficient of the many activities carried on by Germantown Friends is the Free Library, founded in 1860, and generously endowed by Alfred Cope some few years later.

For many years, from 1860 to 1867, William Kite was Librarian, and for the greater portion of this period Hannah M. Jones was Assistant Librarian. In 1867, Hannah Jones was appointed Wm. Kite's successor, which position she has most acceptably filled, she is assisted by three associates, and the time so divided among them that at least two are always present when the rooms are open, and on especially busy days three are on hand.

The printed annual report for the last year has just been received, most of the following facts being taken from it.

The number of new books added this year is 705; 43 of these were gifts from friends of the Library; 36 were Government Reports, and the rest, 612, new purchases. The funds left by Alfred Cope were for the purchase of new books, the burden of administration and of meeting running expenses falls upon Germantown Friends.

The number of visits to the library during the year has been over twenty-four thousand and the number of books circulated about sixteen thousand, the total number of books in the Library at this date is 28,118. The Library is managed on the plan of unlocked cases; the books, with the exception of a few old books of interest to only a few, are accessible to all readers; it is significant to note that the total count of books worn out, lost or withdrawn for the year is only 42.

There has been a considerable increase in the number of visits paid to the Library during the year. The report states: "This increase is noticeable in the statistics tabulated and has been even more marked in the three-month period since the period covered by this record. The increase has been especially noticeable among the children, more than half a million books again having been taken out by them this year, as compared with the same period a year ago. This is probably been due in part to the placing on the shelves of a number of Juveniles of unusual interest, which has led to the further examination and use of the Juvenile department; but this does not wholly explain the renewed interest in reading which seems to have seized on the children of this community."

Again quoting from the Report: "Frequenters of the Library twenty years ago, will recall the figure of one of its most constant patrons, Thomas Wallis Evans, whose friendship with William Kite was one of the features of the declining years of both. Because of her memory of her grandfather's enjoyment of the Library, his daughter has presented to it a large, handsomely carved sofa." This has been placed in the gallery, where one who wants a quiet hour with a congenial book, can enjoy it.

The chief interest of this particular annual report centers about the list of Juvenile books. The Library has always had a high record in this line, but the list of new books of this class, offered the present year, surpasses previous ones. It embraces sixty-nine volumes, none of them novels and none of them the weak story variety, which have done so much as a great librarian once said, "to thwart the aims of good teaching of English in all our schools."

A branch of the Public Library System, located in Germantown, caters to the novel reading element. The following table shows how the books circulated during the year by the Friends' Library are divided—that which would far outnumber all the rest in other libraries—namely, fiction—does not appear here.

Biography, 2,172; Travels, 2,172; Religion, 987; Literature, 1,715; Fine Arts, 766; Juveniles, 3,101; History, 1,672; Philosophy, 513; Science, 1,864; Sociology, 755; Education, 558.

Naturally every large library contains books which seem to claim but a passing glance from the public. These hold a place of importance, however, in the collection; the report under review refers to these and closes with the following suggestive advice, which may well have a wide reading:

"It is true that the rapid advances in Science and Philosophy demand frequent adjustment of our theories and dogmas; but the pictures of human life and its achievements, the portrayal of those great changes in human history which mark the growth of our race, the record of the struggles for light and freedom by those who have gone before us—these make the books of which it has been said that 'they are not born to die; their immediate work upon mankind fulfilled, they may seem to lie torpid; but at each fresh shower of intelligence that Time pours upon their students, they prove their immortal race; they revive, they spring from the dust of great libraries; they bud, they flower, they fruit, they seed, from generation to generation, and from age to age.'"

SVEN HEDIN, the celebrated Swedish explorer, who traveled across the forbidden land of Tibet a few years ago, and whose writings descriptive of that experience have thrilled many readers, recently published an autograph letter which contains the following impressive avowal of faith in God and an interesting tribute to the value of the Bible:

"Without a strong and absolute belief in God and in his almighty protection I should not have been able to live alone in Asia's wildest regions for twelve years. During all my journey the Bible has always been my best lecture and company."

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

PROSPERITY, intelligence, manhood, character, are developed only when pressure from above is felt by those below. The consciousness of personal responsibility is the lever of progress. The cry for personal liberty raised by the champions of the saloon must be met by the awakening to the necessity of law and its protective power. Property and life are not safe where personal liberty lifts its distorted form.—Portland, Me., Express.

A WHOLESOME EXAMPLE.—A. J. Drexel Biddle, a prominent club-man of Philadelphia and founder of the Drexel-Biddle Bible classes, announced on [First Month] 1st, that henceforth he will belong to the teetotal crowd. We doubt not that many of our readers will be surprised to learn that a man so prominent, and so active in Bible class work has not been a total abstainer through all these years. Possibly the same people would be greatly surprised if we should tell them that we know of prominent ministers in this State who have not yet reached the point where they turn down their glasses at a banquet, and we could even name some who keep liquor in their homes. We rejoice in this forward step taken by A. J. Drexel Biddle, and trust it will be an eye-opener to every [First-day] school teacher and every preacher in the State who has not yet seen the evil effects of his conduct.

We find multitudes of men getting on the water wagon these days because they have discovered that the use of liquor lowers their efficiency. Some others are becoming total abstainers because of the pressure of public opinion. There are still others who have awakened to the fact that alcohol breeds disease, and with them total abstinence is simply a question of self-preservation, but we are making this extended note of A. J. Drexel Biddle's action because he has been actuated by a higher motive than any of these. He has banished wine from his home and become a total abstainer for the good he may be able to do by his personal example to his fellow-men, and by so doing he has given a striking example of Paul's declaration, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world stands."—American Issue.

A CHANGED MAN.—Men have called me strong, and while I could see its harm in others, I thought myself immune, as thousands before my time have thought, and suffered for the thought. I remembered the oft-repeated phrases about personal liberty, of the power of the human will to resist temptation, with which I had beguiled myself, and found them as unsubstantial as the fabric of a dream.

I do not mean to undervalue character and resistance as elements of personal safety, but I do mean the time will come somewhere in the life of every man who has delusions of his security against the insidiousness and fearful grip of liquor, when the sentinels of duty will sleep and the strongholds of manhood will be invested and captured by the enemy."—Ex-Governor PATTERSON, of Tenn.

BASE-BALL AND ABSTINENCE.—Now there is a curious fact about these four stars. They have something in common besides vigor, adeptness and intelligence.

McInnis is a teetotal. Collins never touches liquor. Barry is a total abstainer. Baker has become "Home-Run Baker" without ever taking a drink. Stay—Connie Mack himself, the discoverer and trainer of the $100,000 infield, uses no intoxicants whatever.

Have we been masking a sermon behind all this adroit appeal to the sporting instincts of our readers? Far from it. The ball players and their manager do not lend themselves readily to solemn discourse. Yet it is clear that their singular expertness in an exacting profession is related in some degree to their unanimity in abstinence. North American.

TOTAL ABSTAINERS WIN.—The American athletes who astonished the world by their wholesale victories in the Olympic games at Stockholm were trained under a rigid system which eliminated beer and tobacco as well as strong spirits. A poll of the men themselves is said to have shown that practically the entire team, including all of the point-winners of importance, were total abstainers not only while in training but at all other times. The sporting writer of a large Eastern daily tells of the first notable victories won by American athletes over those of England. An English team had come to New York for an international meet and expected to have an easy time in maintaining their old-time superiority over all other nations. The evening before the opening of the events a few of the Americans dropped into the British headquarters and were astonished to find several of them sipping ale. In reply to their expressions of surprise the Englishmen protested: "Oh, we always drink our ale, but not much of it." In the ensuing contests Great Britain was badly beaten. Sportsmen in the tight little isle are now speaking seriously of the United States' rise in the athletic world, and are beginning to admit that the American system of no intoxicants and no tobacco at all times must be adopted in England if the mother country can hope for the regaining of her lost laurels.—National Advocate.

ANOTHER WITNESS.—Samuel G. Blythe, for many years a well-known Washington correspondent and now a noted magazine writer, does valuable work in informing public opinion upon matters of political concern. But he never performed a greater service than he did in telling why and with what results he stopped three years ago the use of liquor.

His recital, in a recent number of the Saturday Evening Post, is as genially humorous as he is himself, yet more impressive than a hundred lurid pamphlets upon the evils of indulgence. He is quite jovially eloquent in recalling the "heap of fun" he used to have—"no sotchness about it, no solitary drinking, no drunkenness; it was all jollity and really innocent enough; a case of good fellows having a good time together."

"But," he says, "it requires rather persistent application to be a good fellow—one cannot do much else." And he finds that the balance sheet shows large advantages on the side of abstinence. He says:

"With society organized as it is, with men such as they are, is it worth while to drink moderately, or is it not? The answer, based solely on my own experience, is that it is not. The best thing I ever did for myself was to quit drinking. I will go further and say it is my unalterable conviction that alcohol in any form as a beverage never did anything for any man that he would not have been better without. The old game makes for fun, but it takes toll—and never fails! I have tried it both ways. As I look at it, there is no argument. The man who does not drink has all the better of the game."—North American.

MOORESTOWN, N. J., ABOLISHES SALOONS.—A correspondent writes as follows: "On Seventh-day, Second Month 28th, Judge John G. Homer, sitting in the Burlington County Court of Common Pleas, at Mount Holly, N. J., revoked the retail licenses for the sale of liquor held by the two hotels in Moorestown. The action against these hotels which has proved so successful, was backed by the Women's Christian Temperance Union." We are informed from other sources that Friends of both Branches were very active in the movement. A more detailed account of this interesting and encouraging action will be given to readers of THE FRIEND in a later issue.

AT CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING of Friends held at Media the tenth of Second Month, 1914, the subject of the manufacture, sale and use of intoxicating liquors having been under consideration, it was the united judgment of the meeting that the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes would, if ratified by the necessary three-fourths of the States, conduce to the health and prosperity of all the people. Accordingly the Clerk of the Meeting was instructed to forward to our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of this minute, requesting them to give their unequalled support to the Joint Resolution introduced by Richard P. Hobson, of Alabama, for the submission of such amendment.

Replies have been received as follows: From Senator George T. Oliver, saying he favors strongly submitting a prohibitory amendment to the people of Pennsylvania, but adding, "I have not made up my mind to favor a National amendment," believing "each State should regulate itself."

Senator Boies Penrose, answering by proxy, assures attention. Congressman Thomas S. Butler promises not only to vote for it, but to "assist to the best of my ability to secure its passage."

Congressman John M. Morris promises "careful attention." Congressman Arthur R. Ripley says he "will be very glad to give it hearty support."

JEREMIAH AND EZEKIEL.

SUSANNA S. KITE.

The Book of Lamentations is by an old tradition ascribed to Jeremiah, though in the text no author is named, and it is only latterly that any question has been raised on the subject. The cave in which he is said to have written these lamentations is still shown on the western side of the city, and every week the Jews assemble to recite as his these plaintive words at their waiting place in Jerusalem where a few of the old stones still remain. This book is considered, perhaps, the finest poem in the Bible. It is written in Acrostic form—the first, second, fourth and fifth chapters have twenty-two verses and the third sixty-six, corresponding to the letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

Ezekiel was also of a priestly family, probably higher in the social scale than Jeremiah. He was carried away to Babylon in 597 B. C., and was probably a young man at the time, old enough, however, to have become thoroughly familiar with the temple and its services, most likely as a priest. He seems to have been very much influenced by Jeremiah, many evidences of this being found in his writings. Jeremiah had been known as a prophet for over thirty years, and during the latter part of the time he was the most prominent figure in Jerusalem. It seems rather remarkable that these two men, whose work was in a way so similar and who must have been familiar with each other's prophecies, never in any way allude to each other. Ezekiel lived in a Jewish colony on the banks of the Chebar in Babylonia, apparently in comparative comfort, the exiles being left to govern themselves, and build houses and carry on the affairs of life. Ezekiel is supposed to have had a wife, and nothing is known of him until he had that most remarkable vision, recorded in the first chapter, of the living creatures, with the wings and the wheels and the eyes, doubtless an allegory hard for us to interpret. He was so overcome by the vision of the glory of God appearing in the firmament above that he fell on his face and heard a voice speaking to him, and telling him to go to the rebellious house of Israel and speak unto them as messages are given to him. He must not be afraid of them, nor be rebellious like unto them. "Open thy mouth," said the voice, "and eat that I give thee." Then a hand appeared containing the roll of a book written within and without with lamentations and mourning and wailing, and he was caused to eat the roll. This is supposed to be five years after the captivity and when he was about thirty years old.

The Book of Ezekiel is occupied with two great themes—the destruction of the city and nation, and the reconstitution of the people and of their eternal peace. His prophecies are either symbolical actions of which the explanation is given or allegories and riddles, the meanings being also given. Of these the most remarkable perhaps, may be found in Chapters i, iv, x, xii, xvii, xviii, xix, xxxvii. In the last named chapter we have the parable of the dry bones, and also the foretold action of the two sticks representing the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah and the promise of the coming of Christ's kingdom. They are very different from those of Jeremiah, who lived in the midst of the trouble in Jerusalem, where Ezekiel looked on from afar. He foretold in the time of his destruction which was coming upon the people, and he felt as exiles did not believe him any more than the men of Jeru-ah believed Jeremiah, but he was not persecuted, and when he would not listen he withdrew into himself and devoted his time to writing. The book consists probably of the prophecies which he had delivered written out later, as well as of others that had never been spoken. They are more finished than the impetuous words of Jeremiah, not only because he was a man of a much less emotional nature but because he had the leisure for careful composition. He tells us almost nothing about his fellow-exiles. He may have exercised a sort of ministry among them, and the "elders" seemed to have come to consult with him from time to time, but his mind was largely occupied with the nation as a whole, those at home as well as those in captivity.

The first twenty-four chapters of the book deal with the downfall of the nation, and after this had taken place the people who never really believed that it could happen were plunged into despair. Then in the second twenty-four chapters promises of restoration and their future happy state were given to cheer them. The last eight chapters are devoted to a detailed account of the restored temple ritual, in which is shown his full belief in the letter of the law, not that he does not speak of the necessity of individual faithfulness, but he does think that the Law had its place and that God's dealings with His people would bring them into a proper condition to live up to the requirements of the Law, whereas Jeremiah speaks of a new covenant, the law written on the heart of each individual, taking the place of a state religion. As in Jeremiah there are a number of prophecies against the surrounding nations—placed as an introduction as it were to the promised restoration of Israel. This book is simple in its arrangement and the prophecies are given mostly in chronological order—very different from the book of Jeremiah, which is often very difficult to follow. This seems to show that it was committed to writing in the latter part of Ezekiel's life as a consecutive whole.

We know very little of Ezekiel's private life. He does not write an autobiography as Jeremiah does, we can only judge of him by his writings. We think of him as a reserved, unemotional man, doing his duty and delivering the messages that the Lord gave him to deliver, occasionally rising to a poetical outburst, and his style at times even severe, altogether not by any means as attractive a personality as Jeremiah, but withal one of the great prophets of the Hebrew nation.

IN MEMORY OF JOEL BEAN.

In a setting of green fields, with the note of the meadow-lark coming in through the open windows, a notable service was held at Friends' Meeting-house in College Park, Second Month 15th. It was a memorial service for Joel Bean, a venerable minister of the Society of Friends, who passed away last month in Honolulu, the scene of a missionary journey of his early manhood.

He came of a fine Quaker family, belonging to the sixth generation of the descendants of John Bean, who came from Scotland in 1600. On his mother's side he was sprung from strong Puritan ancestry through the same colonial forbear from whom Daniel Webster and John G. Whittier were also descended.

In 1850 he was married to Hannah, of the well-known Shipley family of Philadelphia, and they began their remarkable service together, for she herself later became a minister.

In 1861 they went to the Hawaiian Islands, which then seemed indeed "the edge of the world."

Upon returning to America, Iowa was again their home, though teaching in Rhode Island claimed them for a time, and finally they removed to California in 1882, where their remaining years were spent at College Park near San José. During the years many journeys were taken, sometimes in carriages far from railroads, stimulating the religious life of newly-settled communities in the middle West, and more extensively in England and the eastern United States.

Joel Bean had numbered among his intimate friends many persons of eminence When the end came hosts of those who loved him not only in his own land, but in Great Britain and the islands of the sea, hastened to send their tributes of honor and affection.

Moreover, through a curious concatenation of events, the threads of all the phases of his long and varied life were caught up and knit together by the presence and testimonials at the memorial service of one and another from a distance, who could not have been expected to be present. Thus in addition to the concourse of citizens of every sect that thronged to do his memory honor, a number were present from abroad.

Extracts from the last address delivered by the venerable minister at Whittier, Cal., in 1913, were read at the opening of the meeting in which he asserted his lifelong belief in the freedom of the spirit as against the bondage of the letter. Religion was to him not a thing of creeds, but the life of God, working in the life of man.

A Chinese friend spoke of the stimulating and fortifying influence of Joel Bean, realized in the spiritual isolation of the confines of Tibet. A professor from Stanford University told of meeting recently in New Mexico a gentleman who felt his life to have been inspired and molded by Joel Bean, his teacher of some sixty years ago. The lasting impress of Joel and Hannah Bean's ministry in England and Ireland was portrayed with singular beauty and personal feeling by two gentlemen, who years ago had brought letters of introduction to them from those countries. His early life and influence in New England was gratefully revealed by a lady who said she owed much then and in later years to the spiritual elevation of his character. His visit to San Francisco more than fifty years ago was alluded to with feeling by the daughter of close friends of those days. Friends from our own town, and many connected with the meeting at College Park, both here and from Palo Alto, spoke with deep gratitude of the personality and ministry of Joel Bean, as a revelation, a challenge and a fortifier in the conflicts of life. Among these was his older brother, James Bean. "At Last" was read by his grandson from a presentation copy of Whittier's poems, containing an autograph letter of the poet.

On every side were evidences that a great soul had passed—one dearly beloved.

What was there in this man that drew all hearts? It was because all saw and felt that here was a man in whom was no guile, one who loved his fellow-men and walked humbly with his God; one who "impressed a flavor of eternity into temporal life."

It was noticeable at this service that there was no mourning apparel to be seen—none of the usual trappings of grief, which is against the spirit of the Friends. And when midway in the service a daughter of the house knelt and offered a prayer of thanksgiving for a presence which had sweetened the secret springs of earthly life and been itself assurance of immortality, the highest note of the occasion was struck.

Throughout the service, instead of the customary words, "We sorrow, we mourn, we lament," was heard the words: "We rejoice—and we give thanks." And although there was many a broken voice in the giving of the heartfelt testimonials, still, the prevailing note was one of thankfulness for the serene and illuminating life that had just passed.

This feeling found voice in a poem written to his memory by one of his San José friends.

"Lighthouses do not ring bells and fire cannon to call attention to their shining. They just shine."

Founded on rock, immutable, serene,
Benignly looking over sea and land
In winter tempest or in summer calm,
We see afar the friendly lighthouse stand.

No bells ring out when leaps at eve its flame;
No cannon's roar proclaims its lighted face.
It simply shines, and lo, across the wave
Pours the far radiance of a saving grace.

In steadfast quiet of abiding faith
So, on the Rock Eternal, stood our friend.
No ringing plaudits of the crowd would he,
No sounding titles that the world might lend.

By the pure radiance of his life serene
Our darkened paths were lit. And now a ray
Of light supernal gleams across the deep,
And shining—ever shining, shows the way.

THE AMERICAN NILE.—For some two thousand miles the great Colorado River sweeps diagonally across the country from the high mountain plateau of Wyoming and Colorado to the farthest southwest corner of the United States. The basin drained by the Colorado and its tributaries is about 300,000 square miles in area, and much of it is of high industrial and scenic interest.

The Colorado basin comprises two distinct portions. The lower third is but little above the level of the sea, though here and there in it ranges of mountains rise to elevations of 2,000 to 6,000 feet. This part of the valley is bounded on the north by a line of cliffs which present a bold and in many places vertical step of hundreds or thousands of feet to the tablelands above. The upper two-thirds of the basin stands from 4,000 to 8,000 feet above sea level and is bordered on the east, west and north by ranges of snow-clad mountains, which attain altitudes ranging from 8,000 to 14,000 feet. Through this plateau the Colorado and its tributaries have cut narrow gorges or canyons in which they flow at almost inaccessible depths. At points where lateral streams enter, the canyons are broken by narrow, transverse valleys. The whole upper basin of the Colorado is traversed by a labyrinth of these canyons, many of which are dry during the greater portion of the year and carry water only during the melting of the snow and the brief periods of the autumnal and spring rains.

In the lower portion the river strongly resembles the Nile, having annual floods which distribute silt over the adjoining lands and render them as fertile as those in the historic valley of North Africa. The Colorado and its tributaries are not only of value for irrigation, but, descending in steep channels, they present abundant opportunities for the development of water power. Power has been developed at a few points, but the resources of the Colorado basin are in this respect yet practically untouched.

The control of the Colorado for the prevention of further outbreaks, such as its recent diversion into the Salton Sea, must involve thorough knowledge of the tributary flow, even in the high regions of its headwaters, in Colorado, and the ultimate steps taken to prevent disastrous inundations will in all probability involve the control of these upland tributaries.

The size of the Colorado River is indicated by its discharge at Yuma in the year 1910. The heaviest discharge was in Fifth Month, 70,300 cubic feet a second; the smallest discharge was in Tenth Month, 4,300 cubic feet a second. The average discharge for the year was 10,700 cubic feet a second. The total run-off for the year was 14,300,000 acre-feet, which would make a lake a million acres in extent and 14.3 feet in depth.—U. S. Geological Survey Bulletin.

NEWS ITEMS.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN, a minister and member of Chester Monthly Meeting, N. J., was granted a minute by his Monthly Meeting, on the 3rd inst., liberating him for extensive service beyond the seas. As his friends know, Wm. Allen has for some years had his home in California. The minute granted him contemplates religious service in Japan, China and Australia, and some in the British Isles on the homeward voyage. If present plans mature, he will leave California, traveling westward, about Ninth Month 1st.

ONE could not easily believe that a matter like the following could be soberly discussed. "Christian" surely has a larger meaning to most real Christians.—[Eds.]

The religious standing of Friends was rather curiously dragged into a discussion on Marriage in the Lower House of Convocation at York, Eng., last week. J. S. L. Burn, a clergyman, of Middlesbrough, moved a resolution against the solemnization in churches of the Establishment of marriages "between Christians and non-Christians." Besides the union of Christians and Jews, or Mohammedans, or non-Christian Chinese, the speaker instanced those between Church-people and Friends as improper for performance except before a registrar. The Bishop of Barrow, who recommended reference of the subject to a committee, said it seemed a very serious thing to accept a motion which might be understood as telling the Quakers that they could not be regarded as Christians. Eventually this course, of reference to a committee, was adopted.

One of J. S. L. Burn's points on marriage of Churchmen (or women) with outsiders was that under the Act of 1823 all persons to be married must give their true Christian names. But, said he, if they had not been baptized, they had not got any true Christian names!—The Friend (London).

THE Home is the moral and spiritual barometer of a people. We as Friends need to remember that no institution, however good, can do the work of the Home. We may be weak and often desire to shift our sacred responsibility upon some paid servant. This often happens to the detriment of the child. In the final analysis we as Friends will rise or fall in the scales of human progress in the direct proportion of the number of solid, spiritually-minded fathers and mothers in the sacred environment of our homes.—W. F. O., in the Westonian.

WITH the Third Month issue of The Westonian the new editor, Carroll T. Brown, assumes his responsibilities. The aims and ideals of the paper will continue to be much as they have always been—to further the plans of Westtown and of her friends for continual improvement and service.—The Westonian.

A PRIZE of $50, open to all undergraduates of Haverford College, and to graduates of not more than three years' standing, is offered in alternate years for the best essay bearing on the general problem of "International Peace and the Means of Securing it." The next award will be made in the Fifth Month of 1914, and will be announced at Commencement. Any or all of the papers may be rejected if a high standard of merit is not reached. Competitors are urged to avoid mere discussion and fine writing, and to seek the advancement of knowledge by a study of facts or a proposal of practical advances. The essays of 1914 may be written on one of the following subjects:

1. The grounds for believing that an international court of arbitral justice will become a substitute for war.
2. The ethical grounds for opposition to war.
3. Will the economic burden of war, and of national armament in time of peace, force the nations of the world to adopt peaceful methods of settling disputes?
4. Lessons for the peace movement in the armed conflicts of 1912 and 1913.

5. The obstacles which America has placed in the way of her influence in the councils of nations by the rejection of arbitration treaties.

Elliston P. Morris established this prize several years ago, and at a more recent date he made a gift for the same purpose to Westtown.

A FRIENDS' Meeting in Florence! Such is the announcement that comes to us from Alice M. Cruickshank, who states that the meeting is held at her residence, 32, Via dell' Esta Canina, on First-day mornings, at 11 o'clock. The lecture will be held at the Hotel Victoria, 10, Piazza Venezia, from the Porta S. Minerva, or the "concourse of the Wars."—The Friend (London).

W. R. FOSTER, proprietor of the Greenland, a popular monthly feature from sea and land of the Friend, has just returned from a Deane Heald his experiences in a cruise around the world. The first few days were spent at the Old Land of the Vikings, and the remainder is not much ornamentation, so that the Greenland is a most interestingment is in the hands of two young men, who are, it is said, exceedingly comfortable. The cooling is good, while the beds are soft, clean, and plain. When I say that one can here to sleep for a whole day, according to the time of year, it is not from that the Greenland is a heavy one.—The Friend—London.

AN important meeting of the Woodbrooke Council of the Society of Friends last week, when the appointment of successful Mary and Mary Snowden Braithwaite, the Wardens, who are retiring at the close of the summer term, received careful consideration. Woodbrooke's particular and Friends in general will be interested to know that the choice has fallen upon Herbert G. Wood, M. A., and his wife, Dorothy Wood. The prospective Wardens are well known to Woodbrooke at home and abroad. For the greater part of the life of the Settlement Herbert Wood has been one of the Lecturers, and his work has been greatly valued by the students. We would express our cordial good wishes for the new Wardens in their prospective assumption of added responsibilities.—The Friend (London).

Second Month 20th.

AUGUSTUS T. MURRAY, Professor of Greek in Leland Stanford, Jr., University, delivered a lecture on "The Spiritual Message of Whittier," on the tenth, in Roberts Hall, Haverford. Attendance at this lecture was required of the student body.—Haverford News.

E. MARSHALL SCULL, Haverford '01, has written a book on "Hunting in the Arctic and Alaska," which will soon be issued from the press of the John C. Winston Co. Our friend is also the author of "A Bit of Wild Africa."—Haverford News.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

THE lecture by Ethel DeLong, on Second Month 18th, on "The Pine Mountain Settlement School in Kentucky," aroused great interest among the girls. She spoke of the great need for education among these sturdy mountaineers. Our girls soon started the raising of $125, which represents the cost of education of a pupil at the above school, which is sorely in need of funds; in order to raise the money the girls have for a consideration been making beds, polishing shoes, darning stockings, etc.

On Second Month 27th, Edward A. Steiner, who is an authority on immigration matters, gave a very instructive lecture on that general topic.—It was not illustrated.

WE were quite disappointed that Tong Sin Kow, the "Chinese Quaker," did not come on the 6th inst. to lecture to us; we had hoped that he would cross the continent in time for our usual sixth-day evening lecture.

THE sledging track has been a source of great pleasure to the School family for much of the time during the past two weeks, particularly in the mornings. School was postponed nearly an hour on numerous occasions in order that the sport might be enjoyed. Much labor was put on the track by the boys "icing" it, so that rapid transit could be had when in.

THE "finals" for the Eloquence contest occurred on Second-day evening, 28th ult., before a large audience; the judges were, Edith W. Evans, Nellie J. Davis and Henry J. Cadbury. The first prize was awarded to Alice John and Walter T. Erogoff; Ella Roberts and Marie S. Shipley winning second honors.

THE recent blizzard did not cause the School serious damage, as our worst trouble was in the destruction of the chimney in the bookshop, which was blown down about eleven o'clock First-day night, breaking rafters and ceilings underneath and causing some commotion among the occupants of that portion of the building. Temporary repairs were made before Second-day evening under difficulty, so that the baker lost the use of the oven but a little while.

The election of officers for the first class held last week, resulted as follows: President, Arthur S. Maris; Vice-president, Arthur D. Hall; Secretary, Esther W. Brunglust; Treasurer, Esther E. Jones.

This Seventh-day afternoon a snow-ball fight is planned between the Senior girls and the women faculty—forts of snowballs are erected and a lively time is anticipated.

Last First-day evening, C. Reed Cary read to the boys from an address of Francis Peabody and made some appropriate uplifting remarks afterwards, tending to character-building.

RUBY DAVIS spoke to the girls, her topic being, "Keeping in Touch with the Master," a very helpful talk.

CORRESPONDENCE.

INQUIRY is made at the office of THE FRIEND for a book entitled, "A Story of an Old Farm," by Andrew D. Melick, Jr. It was published something like fifty years ago and is said to contain some interesting observations on Friends. There is a copy at the Pennsylvania Historical Society, but the book is evidently quite rare.

There is also inquiry for a book entitled, "Religious Declension, An Enquiry into the Nature, Symptoms and Effect of it, with Means of Recovery, by Andrew Fuller." Perhaps some one will know the publisher.—[Eds.]

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—The National Food Trades Conference lately meeting in New York, decided to ask President Wilson for the appointment of a commission to study the food laws of other countries. Other resolutions recommended changes in the Federal law which would permit the destruction of food that has been exposed to contamination and which would make it clear to the consumer that the Government's guarantee number was not necessarily a guarantee of purity.

A telegram from Richmond, Cal., of the 27th ult., says: "Two hundred unemployed men, equipped with blankets and cooking utensils, left here to-day on a march to Washington to petition Congress for work. The men expect to obtain rations from the various towns on the line of march."

A despatch of the 1st inst. from Washington says: "Women who are opposed to the equal franchise will present a strong array of speakers before the House Committee on the Judiciary in opposition to the arguments of the suffragists for the proposed woman suffrage amendment to legislation."

It is stated from Sacramento, Cal.: "The State of California hopes by scientific farming of the 9000 acres of tillable land which it owns around its prisons and asylums to add nearly $100,000 to its annual income after two years of preparatory work. The tilling of more land will provide outdoor life for more insane patients, building them up physically and so tending to advance cures."

The storm which has prevailed here lately, it is said, had its origin off the Georgia coast, and traversed the Atlantic coast from Savannah to Long Island within 36 hours, moving as a whirling gale 1000 miles in diameter, with unusual rapidity and with violent force.

An unusual and alarming increase in the number of whooping cough cases in the city—amounting almost to an epidemic—has called forth a warning from the Department of Public Health and Charities, accompanied by advice on the prevention of the spread of the disease. The increase dates from Tenth Month 1, since which time there have been 1350 cases, which is four times as many as for the corresponding period last year, and the average for the five preceding years. The danger to life from the disease is pointed out by the department, which says that twenty-seven out of every 100 children under one year of age who get whooping cough die. In addition to the high mortality from the disease, the department dwells upon the physical defects it often leaves behind to handicap the survivor for life. The warning continues: "Whooping cough is a dangerous and distressing disease of infancy and childhood. Its seriousness is not sufficiently appreciated by many people."

It is stated from New York City, in reference to the damage caused by the recent storm, that the railroads and telegraph companies are the heaviest losers, it being estimated that they will have to expend $1,000,000 to repair the ravages of the storm. Two thousand poles were blown down or broken by the wind, and wires covering a distance of 800 miles were snapped. It is said that the cost of the storm to the Pennsylvania and Reading systems will be at least a half a million dollars and may easily reach three-quarters of a million.

It is stated that the number of trespassers killed on the lines of the Pennsylvania system in 1913 was 497. In addition, 556 were injured. In compiling these statistics, the management of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company calls attention to the fact that on all the rail lines of the country about 15 trespassers are killed per day. On the Pennsylvania lines alone, since 1900, no fewer than 9483 trespassers have been killed and 9283 injured.

It is reported from Washington that eggs imported into the United States under the first three months of the new tariff act, totaled 1,700,000 dozens, while in the entire preceding fiscal year only 1,370,000 dozens were shipped in, according to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

It is stated that experiments started more than ten years ago have finally resulted in the production of a vaccine by the injection of which cattle can be made immune from tuberculosis. This statement was made before the second day's session of the annual meeting of the Pennsylvania State Veterinary Medical Association by S. H. Gilliland, of Marietta.

It is said that Governor Walsh, of Massachusetts, has earned admiration by refusing to accept at the hands of the Legislature an increase of salary from $8000 to $12,000. He takes the ground that when he was elected he made a binding contract with the people to serve them at the lesser emolument, and that it would not be fair dealing if he should now permit the amount to be changed in his favor.

A despatch from Atlanta, Ga., of the 5th inst. says: "A perceptible earthquake shock was felt here this afternoon a few minutes after three o'clock. The tremors continued for seven minutes. There was no damage done in the city. The shock was felt at Athens and other Georgia towns. Many persons were badly frightened. At Jackson the shock was the most violent felt there since 1886. Buildings rocked and the shock caused much excitement."

It is stated from St. Paul, Minn., that the Northern Pacific Railway Company has established "The Careful Club," to membership in which all its employes are eligible. Applicants sign the following pledge: "I wish to become a member of the Careful Club because I believe it is better to be careful than crippled. I will avoid all risks, take the time to do all work carefully, and in every way possible endeavor to prevent accident or injury to others. Membership is voluntary and there are no dues or fees."

It is stated from Washington that the cost of living in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Scranton and 20 other large cities, reached a higher level on Eleventh Month 15, 1913, than at any other time in the 23 years preceding, according to the Department of Labor, of which William B. Wilson is the head. Prices reached the maximum of 72.9 per cent. above the averages of 1890.

In consequence of the occurrence of one or more cases of small-pox recently in this city, it is said more than 20,000 persons have been vaccinated. The number of cases reported up to date, nine in all, is not greatly in excess of normal, there having been the same number last year, but the greatest care is being exercised to prevent an epidemic.

FOREIGN.—An arbitration treaty between the United States and Denmark was lately ratified by the lower house of the Danish Parliament.

A despatch of the 2nd inst., from Madrid, says: "King Alfonso to-day signed a renewal of the Spanish arbitration treaty with the United States."

A recent despatch from Paris says: "Tuberculosis has a little more than doubled in France since 1887, according to figures supplied to the Temps, by Henri Schmidt, a Republican-Radical Deputy, who is one of the leading figures in the temperance movement in France. Deputy Schmidt traces statistically the effects of drunkenness on births and upon the lives of children whose parents have been intemperate. Infantile mortality in Normandy, where women drink excessively, is just double what it is in the temperate Department of the Gers."

It has been recently stated in The Public Ledger of this city that the total public indebtedness of the nations of the world is now about $43,000,000,000, more than three-fourths of which is charged against Europe alone. The population of the world is estimated to be almost 2,000,000,000, of whom about half are in Asia and one-fourth in Europe.

It is said that while this winter has averaged mild in most of the United States, the countries of Europe have experienced a winter which will long be remembered both for its length and its severity. France appears to have had very severe weather, and in many places the temperatures have been the lowest within the memory of anyone living.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILA., will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M.—Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL. The Special Education Department and new pupils will be received at Westtown. We have a very natural time for most children to enter a new school. It has been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the morning, particularly the case when they are coming from a school that is heavily burdened in keeping up with their studies. Their studies are interrupted in leaving up with their studies.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Month, together with health, and the children gather up the line of these Westtown children that they can get an easier start for their year's study than at other schools.

Applications for admission should be made to:

RACE PREJUDICE.

"It is easy enough to exclude Hindus," hotly declared Representative Johnson of Washington at the House committee hearing on immigration, "all nations are barring them." That is not quite true, but it is true enough to cause a swelling wave of indignation in India which may make trouble for the British empire. Resentment is strongest of course at exclusion from countries under the British flag, but the more complete the boycott the more bitter the grievance.

The above is an item of editorial comment from the Springfield Republican. It will be apparent at a glance that it is in the same line as an article furnished for this issue of THE FRIEND from the N. Y. Evening Post. England and America both seem to be afflicted with problems of exclusion. There are indeed many signs at every hand that the question of race prejudice is a serious menace in our present-day civilization. It concerns us to ask in a periodical like ours whether the religious world is in any degree involved in this prejudice, or to be more specific still, to ask whether the Society of Friends has even maintained its ancient position on this subject? That ancient position is plain enough. It had its basis in the Scripture that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men." Such exponents of this principle as Benezet and Woolman and Shipley removed any suspicion that the principle was held as a mere theory, and not practiced. As a Society we inherit institutions that these men founded or fostered. Have we in spite of this inheritance and in common with a general public relaxed in interest and zeal on this subject? Is there not a clarion call of duty to us (a sadly unheeded call) in outbursts of feeling such as the two great newspapers we are quoting comment upon? Prior to the civil war the race problem was in a sense at arm's length to those north of Mason and Dixon's line. Since that time thousands of Negroes have settled in the North. Our great cities have populations of them in one or two instances amounting to nearly 100,000. We have much first-hand knowledge of matters that to our fathers were largely questions of sentiment. There are some Benezets and Woolmans in feeling amongst us yet, but is not the general attitude expressed in the not unusual comment, "I like colored people, but I like them in their place"? The late Fanny Jackson Coppin, so highly respected amongst Friends for her sterling character and for a long period of devoted educational work, once commented that only three Friends ever greeted her so that she was not sensible of some reserve on account of her color. We rather proudly record that one of these Friends is still living and is a worthy example to many in this and in other particulars. But it is a pertinent question whether his attitude on the race question is one we actually emulate? If we convince ourselves we do emulate it, what is the process by which it is to be more generally cultivated?

The early Friends made no reservations in their practice of the Christian ideal of brotherhood. God had set his image and seal upon every human creature. It might be obscured by ignorance and poverty and crime—it might be obscured by the trappings of wealth and worldly estate—it might seem to be obscured by the skin of a Mongolian or a Negro. God meant it should come out into the nobility of real manhood, and this process would obliterate considerations of race and position by elevating the individual above them. It is a question after all of living on the higher plane—in fact, the highest plane. Too many of us need a vision with its attendant rebuke, "What God hath cleansed make not thou common." Real brotherhood as involved in the Gospel experience is at once the ideal and the process that is called for by the tense situation in political relationships, but quite as much called for in the relationships with "retarded" races in our daily life.

True enough, fifty years have brought many changes in the race problem as we see it in our country at large and at our very doors. Imitation is the strong instinct—certainly one of the very strongest instincts in child life. This instinct has cumulative strength as seen in the uplift of a backward race. Unless, therefore, there is wise guidance, constantly the more external and material elements of our civilization will be imitated, and we are naturally repelled by this offensive imitation. Probably at no period in the two hundred years of our history as a Society has there been a more urgent call for this "wise guidance." Here and there a few Friends are devoted to it. We are not without signal examples of individual lives almost wholly dedicated to this cause as a vocation. The call of the present, however, in the counsels of the state and of the world is for a much larger measure of the spirit of Woolman and Benezet.

FAIR PLAY FOR ASIATICS.

Sidney L. Gulick, of Doshisha University, Japan, and lecturer to the Imperial University, addressed the Chamber of Commerce this afternoon on the "Japanese Problem and the Yellow Peril." Dr. Gulick said that, in the matter of the relationship of America and the Eastern races, he represented all the missionaries of Japan, and he urged the United States to adopt a new Oriental policy.

Dr. Gulick advocated a new law, which would allow a certain maximum immigration from any land, this maximum to be a fixed percentage of those from that particular country already naturalized in the United States. He said in part:

"California's Anti-Asiatic agitation is but one symptom of an ominous world situation. Recent decades have brought East and West into closest contact. Races and civilization, for ages self-sufficient, proud, ambitious, determined, are now face to face.

"The fundamental postulate of California's Anti-Asiatic policy is correct. We cannot tolerate a swamping immigration, overturning our democratic institutions or bringing economic ruin to Caucasian laborers or farmers. But in seeking to carry out her policy California has erred, for she seeks to settle an international matter in the light of local interests. Her Anti-Alien bill was needless, humiliating to Japan and short-sighted.

"With growing populations due to the adoption of Western science and ideals, Japan and China find themselves rigidly excluded from vast territories where lie undeveloped natural resources. The white races have seized continents and hold them for exclusive white ownership and uses. Moreover, developing national consciousness and ambitions by the peoples of Asia discover that the West regards all Asiatics as inferiors, as undesirable, and treats them as such, not only in conflict with solemn treaties, but out of harmony with their national dignity. This treatment causes indignation. It is evoking solidarity of Asiatic consciousness against the white man.

"America's refusal of naturalization to any save men of white ancestry and those of 'African descent' is a fundamental error, and opens the door to local legislation differentiating between races. California's legislation rests upon Federal law. Professing friendship to Japan in words, we deny it in important deeds. Demanding an open door for Americans in Asia and equality of opportunity for our citizens of the 'most-favored nation,' we do not ourselves grant the same to Asiatics in our land.

"The duty of granting naturalization should be entrusted to a Federal bureau. Certificates of graduation and of good behavior during residence in America should be essential prerequisites. [Citizenship] should be [proclaimed] on a single day throughout the country, on the fourth of [Seventh Month], with welcome speeches and responses, processions, banners, badges and pins. The event should be made significant and impressive. It would make citizenship count.

"Such a policy as this would fulfil all requirements on both sides of the Pacific. It would conserve the interests of America and be in harmony with the dignity of Japan and China; it would prevent swamping immigration, yet by the application of these principles Asiatics would recognize that justice had been done and would feel in no wise humiliated. Friendship between America and Asia would be maintained with all its advantages. Both yellow and white perils would become void."

WHEN KNOWING IS BETTER THAN "TRUSTING."—When our trust means uncertainty, it ceases to be trust. Is not this sort of mistaken trust the cause of much joyless Christianity? A man who evidently likes ringing conviction speaks a word of caustic reproof of the joyless, uncertain Christian in a letter to a correspondent: "Ask these same people whether they are Republicans or Democrats and they will answer very promptly; but if you ask them whether they are Christians you have to wait until they get their faces pulled into the proper degree of sadness before you get the answer that they trust they are. Why a man knows he is a Republican and trusts he is a Christian is a mystery to me." When our trust is directed toward the Lord Jesus Christ it ought to be knowledge; unshakable, radiant, irrefragable, contagious knowledge. "I know him whom I have believed," triumphantly declared Paul. We do not really trust God until we know that God is trustworthy.

THE soul, after it hath cast anchor upon God, may be disquieted awhile, but this unsettling tends to deeper settling. The more we believe, the more we are established.—R. SIMBS.

THE WORK OF FRIENDS IN CONNECTION WITH PRISONS.

ALBERT H. VOTAW, SECRETARY, PENNSYLVANIA PRISON SOCIETY.

The first experiences of members of the Society of Friends with prisons were as inmates. The founder, George Fox, served sentence altogether for several years of his eventful life, and we may readily recall from his Journal such phrases as "loathsome and stinking gaol," "hard-hearted and cruel gaoler." The historian Green in his "Short History of the English People," states that 12,000 Quakers were in prison at one time, of whom about a tenth died of jail fever. Janney, in his "Life of William Penn," tells us that 1,400 Friends, between 1680 and 1685, under the reign of the first Stuarts, were imprisoned, of whom several hundred died.

Thomas Ellwood, companion of William Penn and William Mead, at Newgate, relates an incident from which we get a glimpse of the unspeakable conditions of the English prisons in the seventeenth century. A coroner's inquest being held over one of the Newgate prisoners whom death had released from his earthly fetters, the jury insisted on seeing the cell where he had been confined. With great reluctance the keeper granted the demand. When they had inspected the miserable quarters of the unfortunate prisoner, the foreman lifted his hands and said, "Lord bless me, what a sight is here! I did not think there had been so much cruelty in the hearts of Englishmen as to use Englishmen in this manner. We need not question now how this man came to his death; we may rather wonder that they are not all dead." Macaulay describes these prisons as "hells on earth, seminaries of every crime and disease."

Section X of Penn's celebrated code for his new province, Pennsylvania, provided that "all prisoners shall be work-houses for felons, vagrants and idle persons; whereof one shall be in every county." Such an idea was unknown in England or at least not in practice. William Penn's mother was a Dutch woman, and a very notable one, the daughter of John Jasper, of Rotterdam. According to the gossipy Pepsys, "Dutch Peg" Jasper had more wit than her brave husband, the Admiral. Her son, William, became a thorough Dutch scholar. He traveled in Holland and preached to the Dutch Quakers in their native language. Doubtless he became familiar with the government and institutions of Holland, for historians who have made a study of Penn's famous code have found the influence of Holland in various provisions of his scheme of government. At that very time Holland had turned all the prisons into work-houses and they were then models of their kind. They had the same food as was furnished to seamen. The women were placed in separate prisons, where they were employed in spinning or sewing, and were amply supplied with provisions; and we are told that the whole institution resembled a school rather than a prison. We read that "high-bred and delicate ladies did not disdain to perform the duties of matrons of the female prisons."

To alleviate the miseries of the Friends confined in the horrible prisons throughout all England, to assist in securing their release, and to give help to their unhappy families, the Meeting for Sufferings was instituted by the English Friends. For the first century of its existence, this body gave particular attention to rendering such assistance, and also to alleviate the distress occasioned by the distraint of goods because of the conscientious refusal of the Friends to pay tithes to the Established Church of England. Before the end of the seventeenth century practically all the Friends were released from prison, but the troubles on account of the collection of tithes have continued to the present day, though not with drastic severity in the last fifty or hundred years. Incidentally and indirectly it may be supposed that Friends remonstrated with the authorities in regard to the deplorable condition of prisons and the outrageous treatment of criminals, but with scant effect. More than a hundred years after Friends had ceased to be occupants of jails on account of their religious opinions, there was little change in method.

In 1772, John Howard, who himself had been a Sheriff, began to investigate the conditions of prisons, and to publish his conclusions. Scarcely any improvement had been made in the prison system since the days of Queen Elizabeth. The jailors received no salary, but paid the government for the privilege of wresting profit from the unhappy wretches subjected to their violence and rapacity. They sold to the prisoners their food and the straw on which they slept. Those in confinement without means frequently starved. They were sometimes allowed to support themselves by making little articles, which they, standing by the prison gate and chained by the ankles, were allowed to sell to the passers-by. Others, standing within the grated door or suspending a stocking from the window, were allowed to beg, and those passing by the walls were continually assailed by the piteous cries for food or money. There was no separation of the sexes, and no regard was paid to the helplessness of childhood. Even an acquittal brought no relief unless the jailor's fees were paid, and many a victim pronounced innocent by a jury lingered in torture till released by death. All these horrors John Howard laid before the English people, but little was accomplished till about 1834, when after a parliamentary investigation, it was determined to adopt a prison system something like that established in New York and Pennsylvania. This was more than forty years after the death of John Howard and twenty years after Elizabeth Fry began her great work at Newgate. In 1818, Thomas Fowell Buxton, who married a sister of Elizabeth Fry, wrote a work on "Prison Discipline" in which the author contrasts the English Prisons with the one in Philadelphia. Samuel Romilly told his countrymen that he had examined the criminal code of all other nations, and that England's was the worst.

But it was nearly a century after the death of William Penn before the provisions of his code with regard to the establishment of work-houses for the vicious and the idle received much practical attention. Certain it is that in 1776 the prisons of Philadelphia were in a deplorable condition. Prisoners of all ages, races and sexes were huddled together in one large compartment with no opportunity to work and little opportunity to beg. This ill-constructed prison was at Third and Market Streets, with subterranean dungeons for those under sentence of death. At least half a dozen crimes were punishable by death. There was no separation of the most flagrant felon from the prisoner held on suspicion for some trifling misdemeanor. There was little furniture and no bedding. Unless the prisoners could secure bedding from friends or by purchase, they slept on the floor. Every day one small loaf of bread was furnished to each prisoner, and nought else was obtainable unless the prisoner had money or outside friends. Intoxicating drinks were supplied to all who could pay the bills, and it was a common "skylarking" custom to strip newcomers, who would not stand true, of most of their clothing, which was thereupon pawned for rum. The keeper readily connived at such purchases, inasmuch as he obtained a liberal commission thereby. Parents were allowed to have their children with them in prison, and so they were exposed to all the corrupting influences of association with confirmed and reckless villains. The keeper had power to retain prisoners till his fees for maintenance were paid, so that often persons were detained in this unwholesome lazaretto for months or years after their sentence had expired, or after their innocence had been established. Imprisonment for debt was not unusual, and many a poor debtor languished in prison who might have settled all claims against him if allowed an opportunity at some industrial employment.

(To be concluded.)

GOD THE LIVING GOD.—He knows not the half of religion—nor indeed, perhaps, any religion at all in the true sense of the word—who has not a burning sense of God as a living God—a God living to-day just as much as He has ever lived in the past and working to-day, as always, for the redemption of the world.—JOHN HAYNES HOLMES.

[The News Summary in THE FRIEND seems to have appreciative reading even in California. We feel sure our numerous farmer-subscribers will be glad to see the following from the veteran olive grower of Santa Barbara.—ED.]

FARMERS' HANDICAPS.

To the Morning Press:

I have noticed in THE FRIEND, a literary paper published in Philadelphia, dated the 22nd ult., that the Department of Commerce had published that the loss in the cotton production caused by the cotton boll weevil, amounted to 10,000,000 bales, of a value of $50 a bale, the monetary loss reaching $500,000,000, and stated that the loss was very much more.

In the same journal there is a statement by the Department of Agriculture that the producers of the products of the soil have sustained a loss of $1,250,000,000 the last year, caused by insect pests.

Also in the same journal a statement that an effort is being made to urge Congress to appropriate $1,000,000 for the eradication of hog cholera, that causes a loss of over $10,000,000 each year.

From these statements it would appear that the cultivators of the soil are terribly handicapped in their vocation.

The producers have no peers, and should have the combined efforts of the government to save these losses.

The progress and prosperity of the cultivators of the soil insures the prosperity of every other business, hence the importance of a combined effort of all the people to eradicate this waste.

With regard to the insect pest destruction, past experience in California furnishes a method by which this loss could be eliminated. It has been demonstrated here as well as in other countries, and cannot be disputed; and yet in California the effort has been dropped, for reasons that cannot be understood by the intelligent citizens.

To return to the boll weevil, some ten years ago Governor Blanchard, of Louisiana, called the legislature together in extra session to consider the loss by this weevil, and in his message stated that the loss was from $15,000,000 to $50,000,000.

I wrote the governor, offering to find and introduce the parasite of said pest for $5000 a year from each of the four cotton states for three years, making a total of $60,000, nothing to be paid until the experiment should be proven. I never received an answer to said letter.

About this time Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, in his message to Congress, recommended an appropriation to assist the south in the boll weevil destruction.

I wrote the president of my offer to Governor Blanchard, and gave as a reference of my standing and experience in pest destruction, our Senator and E. E. Hale, then chaplain of the Senate.

I received no answer. I learned that the letter had been turned over to Secretary James Wilson. Nothing was done regarding my offer.

$250,000 was appropriated and afterwards $100,000, making $440,000, which was spent by the Agricultural Department and practically nothing accomplished.

At the present time we have, according to the above statement, an annual loss of $500,000,000, or ten times the loss formerly reported, with the expense incurred and with the government experiments.

With regard to California, after the great success in parasitic work during my administration of the horticultural work carried on for many years, since I left the office, about eight years ago, nothing has been done in parasitic search, notwithstanding about double the amount has been expended in horticultural work.

I will state, to inform those who are not familiar with the results, some of the things accomplished.

The first and most alarming pest that the fruit growers were considering was the San José scale. A parasite appeared, and now it would be difficult to find any San José scale in California. This scale has spread over all the fruit growing sections in the United States, and when we take into consideration the value of the parasite it will amount to hundreds of millions, as other states, when they have sense enough, will avail of it to save their apples and pears.

The next pest that alarmed fruit growers was the "Ycereja purchasii," called White Cottony Cushion Scale. A lady-bird was imported from Australia that in a short time completely destroyed this pest. $100,000,000 would be a very low estimate to put upon the value of this lady-bird.

The sugar planters of the Hawaiian Islands lost over $3,000,000 in sugar by the ravages of the mealy bug and the fear was that the sugar industry of the islands would be destroyed.

Albert Koebele, the expert searcher for parasites, was employed to find a parasite. In a few months a parasite was found, a lady-bird, that soon destroyed the mealy bug. So that the sugar planters gave the matter no further thought. It would be difficult to estimate the value of this parasite.

The black scale is one of the greatest pests to olive culture and citrus culture, and one of the most difficult to fight by artificial remedies. There was imported a lady-bird, the rhizophobius-centralis, a successful enemy of the black scale.

It will be for the future growers of said fruits to estimate the value of this lady-bird.

At present unnatural remedies are resorted to in many sections for the reason that the owners of orchards are not willing to give the attention in a trial that is requisite for success.

There have been many other parasites imported that have done great work as pest destroyers, but it is not my purpose to extend further this article, having a sufficient basis for a future comment on the management of human affairs.

I will, however, state that there are hundreds of thousands of dollars spent yearly in replacing wharf piles, on account of the destruction by the lerede and the limnoria, while there is a known parasite for these pests, but for the present wharf owners have not given this subject their attention, hence they will continue the present replacing, as long as there are forests to furnish piles and the transportation can be charged to meet the expense.

ELLWOOD COOPER.

ARE YOU AN EDUCATED PERSON?

An exchange declares that any one is educated who can answer affirmatively the following:

Has education given you sympathy with all good causes, and made you eager to espouse them?

Has it made you public-spirited?

Has it made you brother to the weak?

Have you learned how to make friends, and keep them?

Do you know what it is to be a friend yourself?

Can you look an honest man or a pure woman straight in the eye?

Do you see anything to love in a little child?

Can you be high-minded and happy in the meaner drudgeries of life?

Are you good for anything to yourself? Can you be happy alone?

Can you look out on the world and see anything except dollars and cents?

Can you look into a mudpuddle by the wayside and see the clear sky? Can you see anything in the puddle but mud?

Can you look into the sky at night and see beyond the stars? Can your soul claim relationship with the Creator?

BLISS BEYOND WORDS.—The glad reliance that comes upon the man; the sense of trust; a rest with God; the soul's exceeding peace; the universal harmony; the infinite within; sympathy with the Soul of All—is bliss that words cannot portray.

THE LATEST LIFE OF FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

Since 1858 Florence Nightingale has been one of the most popular heroines, not only in England, but also in the United States.

A new and exhaustive life of her, written by Edward Cook, and recently published by Macmillan & Company, will be gladly welcomed and read by many. There is much detail and the two volumes are large, but it is all so interesting one can hardly see how the work could be curtailed. "Men and women," says the author, "are divided in relation to their papers into hoarders and scatterers. Florence Nightingale was a hoarder, and as she lived to be ninety, the accumulation of papers was very great." "Even soiled sheets of blotting paper, on which she has made notes, were preserved." So it can be seen what a mass of material there was from which to draw. The author portrays a delightful picture of her childhood and then tells of her longing to do something. Born of parents who were wealthy, this was not necessary from a financial standpoint, but was necessary to Florence Nightingale's happiness.

She had much opposition to overcome, especially from her mother and sister, but succeeded in getting some hospital training both in Germany and France, and was "lady superintendent" of a hospital in London, when the Crimean war broke out, and she was asked by the Government to take some nurses and go to the East, which she did promptly.

It is interesting to find that here the opposition of her family was withdrawn, and her sister writes, "I must say the way in which all things have tended to and fitted her for this is so very remarkable that one cannot but believe she was intended for it."

Edward Cook tells a little of the romance of her life, too, and quotes from a letter from the man she did not marry (because of her feeling that she "was called" to the profession of nursing). "I hear you are going to the East. I am happy it is so, for the good you will do there and the hope that you may find some satisfaction in it yourself . . . you can undertake that when you could not undertake me. God bless you, dear friend, wherever you go."

The account of the state of affairs in the Crimea upon Florence Nightingale's arrival is appalling. "To an unpractised eye the buildings used at Scutari were imposing and convenient, and this fact accounts for some of the rose-colored descriptions, by which persons in high places were for a time misled." "In fact, however, the buildings were pest houses; underneath the great structures were sewers of the worst possible construction, loaded with filth." "There was frightful overcrowding. Hospital comforts and even many hospital necessities were deficient, the supply of bedsteads was inadequate. 'The sheets,' said Florence Nightingale, 'were of canvas and so coarse that the wounded men begged to be left in their blankets.'" "The hospital was infested also with rodents and vermin, and among the new accomplishments acquired under the stress of new occasions, Florence Nightingale became an expert rat killer." The author shows how one obstacle after another is overcome, how patiently and tactfully she worked, with one aim always before her—to improve the health and the general condition of the soldiers. Many interesting pages show the struggle against useless rules and regulations. "She wanted to have the meat issued from the stores boned so that one patient should not get all bone, and another all gristle, and another all meat. The Inspector General informed her that it would require a new regulation of the Service to bone the meat!" and it was not done—but she usually was more successful in carrying her points. The author's description of the love and devotion of the soldiers to their "lady with a lamp" is very touching. "If the Queen came for to die," said a soldier, who lost a leg at the Alma, "they ought to make her Queen and I think they would;" and another soldier wrote, "What a comfort it was to see her pass even. She would speak to one and nod and smile to as many more, but she could not do it to all, you know. We lay there by hundreds; but we could kiss her shadow as it fell and lay our heads on the pillow again content."

It is probably with her work in the Crimea that we have usually associated the name of Florence Nightingale, but after reading these volumes one realizes that that was in reality a small part of the work she accomplished in her long life. When she came home after the war—so broken in health that she was an invalid the rest of her life—she went right on with her work for her "children," as she called the soldiers. The author gives an account of interviews with many ministers and statesmen—and there are letters from the most prominent men and women in public life as well as letters from Florence Nightingale to them. And these letters and interviews are filled with earnest effort for the improvement of the health of the soldier, for "the better sanitation of the army," for hospital reform and kindred subjects. In all these varying interests the fact that most impresses one is her acquaintance with every detail, the personal touch given at every turn. She was the founder of modern nursing and she kept close watch over her Nightingale Training School for nurses.

Speaking of the results of her work in behalf of the British Army in India, Edward Cook says: "In 1850 it was found that the average annual death rate among the British soldiers in India since the year 1817 had been sixty-nine per one thousand. To-day it is a little over five per one thousand." This wonderful decrease was largely due to changes in barracks and military sanitation recommended and suggested by Florence Nightingale to the Royal Commission who carried them through. For the appointment of this Royal Commission she was also largely responsible.

One interesting chapter is given to her work-house reforms. The conditions in the London work-houses were almost as bad as those which existed in the Crimea when Florence Nightingale began her work there—"the nursing being done by paupers, many of whom could neither read nor write, whose love of drink often drove them to rob the sick of stimulants and whose treatment of the poor, was characterized neither by judgment nor by gentleness." Trained nurses were introduced by Florence Nightingale to remedy this state of affairs. Many pages are devoted to her friendships, of which she had hosts, although as the author says: "She was apt to be a little over-exacting and to drive her friends rather hard, also she did not relish independence or opposition." In spite of this, however, she surely had a genius for friendship and was loved by her friends in no ordinary manner, as the many letters quoted give evidence.

A large part of her life after her return from the Crimea was spent on her couch and from there she directed the various reforms that she was so interested in carrying out. Edward Cook says, "The strange manner of her life, too, should be remembered. Her habit of seeing only one person at a time, and that at set times, must have made intercourse rather formidable for both parties. Nobody, even if staying in the house, ever happened to come into her room, and no outside visitor appeared unexpectedly. She never had the relief of hearing two other people talk or of witnessing even for a moment two other personalities in contact."

In the closing chapter he says, "Having found her appointed corner in the vineyard, Florence Nightingale devoted her life to it, in equal measure with careful adjustment of means to ends and with intense devotion." FRANCES W. ALLEN.

RICHARD SHACKLETON wrote to his daughter in 1780:—"If we neglect a proper care of our bodies, disorders will hurt them; if we omit to seek for spiritual nourishment, our souls will be in danger of perishing; and if we exercise not our reason to cultivate and improve our natural understanding to form us and our manners, so as to be pleasing and profitable members of society, our spirits may in our progress through life contract dispositions, which, in course of time, may be inveterate and hard to be removed;—dispositions which will disqualify us for fulfilling our several departments in life with propriety and with ease and satisfaction to ourselves and others."

THE HOME AND THE SCHOOL.

A noted Catholic educator has been credited with saying: "Give us the training of a child until he is six years of age and we care not who has him after that; he will always be a Catholic." However, the absolute surety of such an assertion may be doubted, in view of the many boys and girls who break away from the early home training; yet there is much truth in the assertion and when we come to analyze the training of those children for the first six years of life, and for the second six also, we shall find many times that what was meant for early training was merely early re-training.

Our children are not enough encouraged to do the thing that will teach them to hear God in the wind, and to see Him in the milky way, and too many words are spoken forbidding to do those things that they would not do except for outside suggestion and that they would see no pleasure in except for the lure of forbidden fruits.

The power of example over our children without any word being spoken is aptly illustrated by the flock of sheep that have been known to follow their leader even over a precipice, or in the stampede of a herd of cattle where the dash of a startled leader soon becomes a blind rush, bearing destruction to any unfortunate who comes in its path.

In the successful development of the child mind we must not neglect the application of natural law to the spiritual world and remember that nature is teaching the great laws of life and immortality from the time when the tiny plants awake to life in the spring until the autumn makes all the fields look brown and sere and the forests stand as naked skeletons guarding the graves of the dead, only to break into renewed life with the passing of the dark and dreary winter and the coming of warm sunshine with the south wind softly blowing. With much and regular repetition nature seeks to impress these truths on our minds even at the risk of having them become so commonplace as to be accepted as mere matters of fact.

Even so will the truths we seek to impress on the child's mind become impressed by the repetition of daily living and going in and out before him. We should not seek the ability of the swallow who builds her nest so true that the pattern may be recognized as the one used to build under the rafters of Noah's ark, but to become as the corn of Pharaoh developed into the wheat that grows on the plains of the western world and supplies the bread for an ever-increasing and hungry people.

Books written in the style of the seventeenth century may not be interesting to the child of to-day, but the matter may and should be made as interesting to them as it was to the children then, by the dressing being made different, for it remains to be true that "Cold broth hot again, that loved I never Old love renewed again that loved I ever."

The Scriptures might appear as an example of an ancient book whose style and language remains as a pattern for all the ages and yet if one were to come among us and attempt to teach its great truths to us by reading and giving to each word the same tone and force as to every other word, we would find it very irksome, to say the least.

We want to educate our children and those under our care so that they will not be easily led away from the path marked out for the children of God to walk in, and we want to place them in such an environment that their minds will not be filled with things that pertain to the pleasure and enjoyment of this present life to the exclusion of the real reason there is for us to pass through this vale of tears. To show the culmination of God's creation in a being that is above the brute creation, the image of his Maker, yet a little lower than the angels and intended to work together with God towards the advancement of the race to the place it was intended to occupy, but was prevented by the fall of Adam.

Whenever I hear the query: "Are they encouraged frequently to read the Holy Scriptures?" it comes home to me. What encouragement am I giving my children in this matter? I do not know how generally the practice may be to set apart a time in each day for reading aloud a portion of the Scripture, and even if all families made such a practice is it sufficient encouragement? Can we give proper encouragement except by providing an incentive that will lead on to a storing the mind with golden grains of Divine thought so that when the time of the awakening comes the child(man) of God will be thoroughly furnished unto every good word and work. We should so teach that when our children go out among other children they will be able to show an intelligent familiarity with the Scriptures, and as they grow older we should have some collective incentive to lead them to become familiar with the biographies of those who helped in building up the Society of Friends, together with the history of conditions in those times, so that the continuance of our Society may not be a copying of the sayings and doings of those who have preceded us, but a renewing of their lives and a reviving of their Christianity to shed abroad its blessings among the workers of the world to-day.

I believe that in the home the characteristics of the child are largely fixed before he comes under the influence of the teacher in the first grade, and yet every influence to which the child is subjected will leave its impress and it may touch upon some hidden chord in the child's nature so as to change the course of his whole after life. And the influence of the pre-school training will be very much more effective with a system of co-operation among the homes so as to lend interest to the work and to derive the benefits of a wider range of experience. — D. C. BUNDY, in The Olney Current.

THE REVOCATION OF THE LIQUOR LICENSES IN MOORESTOWN, N. J.

Brief allusion was made in the last issue of THE FRIEND to the revocation of the retail licenses to sell intoxicating liquors held by the two hotels in Moorestown, New Jersey. The event is a very important one in the life of that community and an account of how such a result has been accomplished may be of interest to those enlisted in the cause of temperance. In previous years two attempts have been made to close the saloons in Moorestown but without success.

The last effort of the kind was in the spring of 1906, and although evidence clearly proving infractions of the Werts law by the liquor dealers was at that time presented before Judge Joseph H. Gaskill, then on the bench of the Court of Common Pleas of Burlington County, yet he again granted retail licenses to the two hotels in question and in addition opened the way for them to obtain licenses to sell liquor at wholesale. This result so discouraged the temperance forces of the community that no concerted movement against the sale of liquor was attempted until the present one that has resulted so successfully.

Meanwhile, however, things were happening. In the fall of 1906 an act, known as the Bishop's Law, was passed by the New Jersey Legislature. This act seemed to increase the difficulty of obtaining competent evidence of law-breaking against the holder of a liquor license because it provided that complaint against them must be made and certified to by two persons "resident in the township or municipality wherein such license is used and exercised." The difficulty under this law that at once confronts any one desiring to investigate the conduct of license-holders in any small community in New Jersey is to find two residents of the township or municipality who are sufficiently interested in the temperance cause to be willing to spend night after night in a personal investigation of the saloons in question in order that they may base a complaint upon actual personal knowledge of the conditions and who are sufficiently unknown to the proprietors that the resorts to escape the suspicion of the proprietors.

This requirement of the Bishop's Law makes the investigations and testimony of professional detectives of secondary importance and valuable only as corroborative evidence. As compensation, however, for these hampering requirements, the law sets forth in a most definite way the specific acts that are violations of law and which if proven against a license-holder shall cause the judge before whom action is brought to rule "that the license theretofore granted such person be declared forfeited and void." Thus the matter of the revocation of a license under the Bishop's Law is not left to the discretion of the court, but should violations of law be proven, works positively and automatically for annulment of the privilege to sell liquor.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union in Moorestown has for some time past been husbanding its financial resources in the hope that the opportune time might arrive for another attack upon the liquor traffic in the community. Finally, in Tenth Month of last year, it decided to enter upon another campaign against the two saloons in the town. The movement was begun very quietly and the direction of the whole matter was placed in the hands of a representative in whom it had confidence.

A preliminary investigation quickly revealed the fact that the saloons were not being legally conducted but were breaking the law in several particulars. It at once became necessary to find two citizens, residents of the township, who were unknown to the frequenters of the two hotels and who were willing personally to visit the bar-rooms and see with their own eyes the violations of law upon which a complaint must be based. Fortunately for the cause, two such men volunteered for the service, and to the thorough and careful way in which they performed the duty the success of the movement is largely due. Several professional detectives were employed to assist these two citizens in their investigations and to furnish corroborative evidence of the unlawful acts committed by the license-holders or their agents. The surveillance was continued for about four months, during which time a mass of evidence of infractions of the law was accumulated. Finally the proper time for action arrived, and on Second Month 5th a formal complaint against both license-holders was filed with the court at Mount Holly. The work had been carried on so quietly that the filing of this complaint came as a great surprise to the community. When the date set by the judge for a hearing arrived, public interest was intense and the courtroom at Mount Holly was packed with people from many parts of the county. The trial lasted for four-and-one-half days, and two night sessions of the court were held. More than one hundred witnesses in all were called in the case. The lawyers defending the saloon-keepers, surprising as it may seem, were the State Senator from Burlington County and the Attorney-General of the State of New Jersey. The willingness of the last named to devote his time and talents to the defense of such law-breakers, when he is paid a large salary by the State to uphold the laws of New Jersey, caused considerable adverse comment.

As the trial progressed, it became clear that the case of the temperance forces was too well prepared to be successfully resisted. The following illegal acts were proven against the holders of both licenses:—selling liquor to minors, selling to those "known in the neighborhood to be of confirmed intemperate habits," selling to those "visibly under the influence of intoxicating liquors," and harboring of drunken persons. In fact, so clear and indisputable was the proof that both license-holders had broken the law in several particulars that at the close of the trial, without taking time for further consideration, Judge Horner promptly revoked the retail licenses of both hotels, stating that even on the testimony of the defenses' own witnesses alone he would be forced to take such action.

In addition to the retail licenses, both of the hotel-keepers also were holders of wholesale licenses. The latter Judge Horner did not revoke, stating that there appeared to be no evidence against the wholesale part of the business. These wholesale licenses expire, however, on Fourth Month 28th of this year, and cannot be renewed, because the Bishop's Law provides that "in case a license is revoked, the person to whom the same was granted shall be disqualified for one year from receiving a license in the state and for the same period no license shall be granted to sell spirituous, vinous, malt or brewed liquors in the premises for which the forfeited license was granted." Thus, to sum up the matter, applications for licenses in these two hotels cannot be again filed until the term of court in Fourth Month, 1915, and unless a new license is meanwhile granted to a new person at a new location, Moorestown will be one of the few "dry spots" in the State of New Jersey for at least one year. While rejoicing in the splendid results so far obtained, the temperance forces of the community feel that their duty in the matter is by no means fulfilled. They fully realize that all the conditions arising from the revocation of these licenses must be met, and that the problem of forestalling any action in future looking toward a resumption of the sale of liquor in the town must be wisely solved.

A LITTLE JOURNEY HOME!

Last summer I went home—back to the old home. Back where a great city stands by a beautiful Oregon river and a snow-crowned mountain looks down from a sapphire sky. It was the fourth of [Seventh Month], and there was a parade. I have seen many parades, many fourth of [Seventh Month] parades. I have seen many parades in that, my native city. One that I remember especially I viewed from my father's shoulder, when the "President" came to town. But East or West or North or South I had never before seen a fourth of [Seventh Month] parade like that parade. First in line came the city's "blue coats," filling the street. Following the battalion of police walked with head erect the mayor and under his arm was a Bible! Behind the mayor marched the more than one hundred boys of his [First-day] School class, and each lad carried a Bible. Behind the marching boys came a military band playing "Onward, Christian Soldier," and behind the band trudged and sang twelve thousand men and women and children from the [First-day] Schools of Portland, Oregon. A fourth of [Seventh Month] parade? Yes! And to the question that your eyes flash, I would answer that a few months before, for the first time in history, the women of Portland voted! They went to the polls and elected a reform administration. They swept the city clean. The women did. My mother and my sister helped. Father cast his one vote, and the "females of the species" in our clan cast their two! The great, good men of the city had tried again and again. Standing alone, they had failed. The day that saw women vote for the first time in the metropolis of Oregon was Portland's great emancipation day.

MOTHER HAD NOT CHANGED.

That night I went to bed in the old home and by my side slept a little fellow, bearing my name and carrying my blood in his veins. Just such a little fellow as I was before I grew up and went away. Midnight came and I had not slept. My heart was stirred by a hundred emotions and my mind was memory's picture gallery. Then across the threshold of the quiet room swept soft as an angel a figure in white. The cold comes down at night in the Northwest. No sweltering there through sleepless, humid terrors! Mother feared that I might be uncovered and chilled in my sleep. Often she had found me thus. Close by my bed she came and in the dim moon that crept under the blinds I sensed her stooping low. I closed my eyes. I felt her fingers touch the coverlet. She tucked it deftly—then a pause—and there as light as a breath from the milky way, her lips brushed my forehead. Mother, voting citizen of Oregon, had not changed!

To-day she is as tender as ever, as true and brave, and pure and wise as ever. But she is stronger now and more potent. She is a ruler in a city and a state. Her voice is a voice that counts and is counted. Where yesterday it spoke only to plead, to-day it speaks for every interest of home and country, with authority. —Printed by request of Walter F. Tail, Palo Alto, Cal.

The following is from an article in The Friend, of 1913, entitled "The Heart of the Christian Message," written for readers of The Friend. The author is a student of some things by drops in the study of the source of concern in many "evangelical" circles.

"An old document tells us that a man named Jesus of Nazareth is Lord, save by the Holy Spirit. Learning partly through and there are times when I come over set that I do not understand in an attempt to understand the Gospel by the aid of the Bousset's 'Jesus' or Arno Nimmo's 'Jesus' or the 'Sources of Our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus' or the 'Quest of the Historical Jesus' or 'Haitzinger's 'Jesus.' I admire the critical scholarship of the latter. I do not disagree much with their conclusions. But when I look over I have a feeling that something has dropped out of the process. It seems to be the very thing I was after.

"The real Jesus convinced his contemporaries that his God was identical with the Spirit of God. He filled the world with a new social passion. He put belief into its skeptical philosophy. He raised the fallen and disheartened elements of society to a new level of life. 'This is God's attitude toward the world,' men cried. 'It was a question that only faith and love could answer.' The first age passed, and still the belief grew. Nearly twenty centuries have come and gone, and to this day millions read the story of the Gospels and cry: 'Jesus is God.'

"It was observed by Jesus himself that great truths are often hidden from 'the wise and prudent.' Christianity is not a science. The heart of the Christian message is not something for the learned. It does not hinge on the solution of the 'Johannine Problem,' or the ultimate decision of German critics as to the 'Logia' of Matthew. It is simply a belief in the Divine nature and power of Christ. That belief is ever new and ever evading the proudest thought of man. Each age seeks to explain it in speculative documents that soon gather dust and are burnt. It is a belief that all classes of men seem to reach by methods peculiar and diverse. It is a belief that baffles the mind, yet leaves it eager in the quest. From all these things I can reach but one conclusion, that we have here a judgment too large for definition and too clear for denial. It is a spiritual message, an inspiring truth, a transforming conviction, that can only be understood by those who have experienced it. It is the heart of the Christian message.

NEWS ITEMS.

SOME RECENT DOINGS OF MOORESTOWN FRIENDS.—The annual meeting of "The Ramblers" occurred on the evening of the 25th ult., when a large company of Friends with a fair sprinkling of their fellow-townpeople met in social intercourse, after which the company was delightfully entertained and instructed by Prof. Edward A. Steiner, of Iowa, author and lecturer. His subject—"The New Immigrant and the New Problem"—was presented in a manner calculated to leave a deep impression with regard to one of the greatest problems affecting our national welfare.

Friends joined with many others in a feeling of deep thankfulness when on the 28th ult., after a hearing lasting several days at its court's seat, the retail liquor licenses of the two hotels of the town were revoked. Notwithstanding the strong temperance sentiment of the community and the repeated efforts made during the past two decades for the revocation of these licenses on the ground of intemperance, the law, the basis of which has been permitted to flourish through the difficulty of securing a jury of sufficient weight with the court to procure the desired result.

At the Monthly Meeting held the evening of the 22nd inst., several matters of particular interest claimed attention. Among these was the reading of a letter from a little group of Friends, one of whom resides at Calgary, Canada. This letter was a copy of a letter to the Friend that had been sent them, expressing a desire for our support.

One of the Monthly Meetings reported was that of the 19th ult. at Federation of the Churches of the town, gave an interesting account of the recent work of that body in employing the noted expert John R. McChin, who had spent two weeks in making a survey, preparatory to taking steps for the general social betterment, especially of that element which is not directly reached by any church affiliation.

William C. Allen laid before the meeting, by letter, a concern leading to the granting of a minute for Gospel service abroad of an extensive nature, including China, Japan, Australia and some parts of Great Britain. Much unity was expressed with the concern and for the welfare of our friend in its carrying out. Elizabeth C. B. Allen is expecting to accompany her husband.

HARRISBURG Friends are grateful for the unexpected visit on First-day, Third Month 8th, of Joseph Elkinton, accompanied by his Chinese friend, Tong Sin Kow, and also Joseph Calley, of Philadelphia. Our usual First-day morning meeting was omitted and a meeting called for 2:30 in the afternoon instead. Forty-two persons were present for this our first public meeting in our new rooms, 319 N. Second Street. Martha Bishop, formerly of Hopewell, Va., appeared in supplication, following which Tong Sing Kow, gave fervent and impressive testimony for the opportunity of again meeting in Divine worship after the manner of Friends for the first time during nearly twenty years, during which time he had passed through many trials, due to the revolutionary upheaval in China. During the whole he had been wonderfully strengthened and upheld with the knowledge of Christ his Saviour. Joseph Elkinton, Joseph Calley and Dr. John J. Mallowney, the latter of whom had also spent several years in China, gave wonderful testimony to the truth, so that we felt indeed that our meeting had a mantle of love and tenderness thrown over it. After our Friends' Meeting our visitors accompanied the writer to the Men's "Non-Sectarian Sabbath Afternoon Meeting" in the residential portion of the city, where public meetings are held weekly, using the auditorium of a moving picture play house as an assembly-room in the endeavor to reach the non-church attenders of the city. Both Joseph Elkinton and our Chinese Friend spoke to about four hundred men, who were assembled there, and the latter brought out the significant fact that in the last revolution for the overthrow of the Emperor of China, six-tenths of the revolutionists were identified with Christians. On one occasion at Peking on a First-day morning all the missionary churches were filled to overflowing by the soldiers, who came to worship and not to disturb their meetings.

In the evening a few of our friends met our visitors at the home of Dr. J. J. Mallowney, where we were very eager listeners to the three travelers who had been in China and who were able to inform us of the incidents which led up to the Republic.

Tong Sin Kow expects to spend some time in the eastern part of the United States, and it is hoped that many of our Friends may have the opportunity of meeting him, for he has a message from the Orient to us.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.—The Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting was held Third Month 12th, at Haddonfield, N. J. This is one of the largest Quarterly Meetings, and there was a full attendance.

The impressive silence was broken by Jacob Elfreth, who quoted from Robert Barclay to show the power of the silent meeting to weaken the evil and strengthen the good in the worshippers.

If the spiritual power was less to-day than in the time of George Fox it showed a lack of receptivity for God was the same now as then. It was, therefore, needful for them to examine themselves and see if their lives were patterned perfectly after the Christ ideal.

Joseph Elkinton quoted the sayings of Jesus, "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. . . . I am come to bear witness to the truth." These, said he, are the words of one who had not attained the meridian of manhood but He spoke as never man spoke before. There was a maturity in His utterance which has made a profound impression upon the minds of men. Many interpretations have been placed upon His words, but His living power is continually increasing in the world.

The inward life, the secret power, has always been in the world, but we are growing more aware of it. Our vision of God is proportioned to the purity of our hearts. The rising tide of the spiritual power in the world is surging through our own souls and bearing us upward to higher levels of vision and attainment.

The devotional meeting was followed by a joint business session for men and women.

A minute was presented from Chester Monthly Meeting issued in answer to a concern of William C. Allen and wife to visit Japan, China, Australia, and possibly the British Islands, on a missionary tour.

The meeting endorsed this action, and many expressions of approval were given.

A report was read from the Visitation Committee, which was appointed last year to visit subordinate meetings and render help wherever needed. The report showed the large amount of work which had been done and made suggestions for more effective work in the coming year. These recommendations will be sent to the different meetings and the committee was continued for further service.

The committee having oversight of the small Merchantville meeting, said that in view of the limited number of Friends there they found it necessary to discontinue the weekly services, but a meeting would be held there the first First-day of each month.

The educational report from the Monthly Meetings showed that there were 159 children under care of the Meetings, being two more than last year.

Reports from the subordinate meetings showed that a number less than last year used intoxicants in any form. Salem reported that all were clear.

The men and women then held their separate meetings. Representatives were present from the six Monthly Meetings of Haddonfield, Chester, Evesham, Upper Evesham, Woodbury and Salem.

The nine queries were read, with answers from the Monthly Meetings. These were highly favorable and a summary was prepared for the Yearly Meeting.

The annual queries showed that there had been no change in the meetings during the year and that there were three schools under care of the meetings.

Joseph Elkinton gave a farewell message previous to his departure for a world tour. He said that the stock-taking of the year did not include everything. Some things could not be tabulated. They were only a small part of a larger fellowship. Other sheep not of this fold were being brought up to a higher spiritual life.

The meeting concluded with an earnest prayer offered by Alfred Leeds.—From the Public Ledger.

DAVID E. and Sarah Sampson, have reached England from the United States, having certificates for service. David Sampson is the blind Friend who has so long been associated with the Blue Ridge Mission in North Carolina. He was in this country with certificate in 1893, with his wife, Emma Sampson, since deceased. She was an Elder, as is his present wife. Our Friends landed at Fishguard and proceeded to Bristol, where they have Friends. They were expected at London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting on the 3rd inst., and will probably attend the Meeting for Sufferings this week.—The Friend (London).

HENRY J. CABBURY calls attention to an article by T. Edmund Harvey on John Woolman in the Third Month's number of The Constructive Quarterly. The article is not merely informing to the large circle of readers of this new magazine, but it is written so as to prompt the observation that it reflects not a little of the spirit of Woolman himself.

CHARLES H. JONES, a minister at Amesbury, Mass., died at his home on the fifth of Third Month in his sixty-ninth year. During his useful life he had been active in teaching and in the management of philanthropic institutions. He was a cousin of the poet Whittier and for many years closely associated with him. The death of his wife, H. Elizabeth Jones, occurred Second Month 25th, about a week before the death of her husband.

Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, Moorestown, N. J., sends greeting to our fellow-member, Walter Kennedy, and to those with whom he joins in worship.

It is stated that "every city in New Jersey on the Delaware River, which has a system of sewers, from Phillipsburg to Salem, inclusive, has been ordered by the State Board of Health to cease polluting the Delaware River by the addition thereto of raw sewage. A number of these municipalities have already installed and are operating sewage disposal plants and with the exception of Phillipsburg, all of these municipalities which have not yet constructed plants are making plans to do so."

It is mentioned that more than 2,000,000 efficiency tests made on the Pennsylvania Railroad in 1913 showed that the observance of train safety rules was 99.9 per cent. perfect. The company carried 111,000,000 passengers during the year without the loss of the life of a single one of them in a train accident.

A warning of the danger to adults in raw milk has been sent out by the Department of Public Health and Charities as a result of a discussion of the Board of Health's rule that will require all milk and cream brought to this city to be pasteurized. It is set forth that adults particularly are susceptible to septic sore throat, the germs of which may be transmitted from diseased cows in milk that is not pasteurized. It is further stated that the health authorities contend that pasteurization is absolutely necessary to safeguard the health of the city against the sore throat ailment. It is said that more serious ailments, including tuberculosis, typhoid fever, diphtheria and scarlet fever may be caused in adults by unpasteurized milk. The warning is sent out to combat the idea that the adult consumer of milk has less need than the infant of protection by pasteurization, so long as he is guaranteed a product of a standard quantity, clean in the ordinary sense.

A despatch from Washington of the 8th says: "Numerous cases of importance, involving mooted questions of international law, are to be decided by the International Tribunal of Arbitration which begins its second session in Washington at the Carnegie Institute. The commission created by treaty to adjust all outstanding pecuniary claims between the United States and Great Britain, at this session is expected to hear argument on 26 cases, 10 American and 16 British, involving damages aggregating nearly $6,000,000."

A despatch from Elkton, Ky., says: "Operation of the parole law will go a long way in solving labor problems in this immediate section. By order of the Court of Appeals more than 100 prisoners are to be released within the next few days. Farmers already have contracted to give them work, according to requirements prerequisite to parole. The parole law requires that before a prisoner may be released on parole he must have contract for employment. Most of them are unskilled and eagerly accept offers from farmers."

It is stated that experiments in the Ancon hospital, in the Canal Zone, have revealed the fact that ants may transmit infectious diseases. So far as the observers could determine, ants are not themselves subject to such diseases, but they carry the disease by tracking the germs with their feet. Any moving thing from a freight train to an insect may carry germs, if there is any disease about.

FOREIGN.—A recent despatch from Copenhagen says: "An agreement reached between the Socialists, Radical and Moderate parties, which control majorities in both Houses of Parliament, assured the passage of the constitutional reform bill under the provisions of which all electoral property qualifications are abolished and suffrage is granted women."

It was stated from Washington on the 12th inst.: "An appeal for more money to combat famine and pestilence, which already has carried off hundreds of lives in Albania, was received to-day at Red Cross headquarters. They cabled: It is said 4,000 refugees are at Berat. Great destitution is everywhere. A little money promptly sent will save many lives. Hundreds have already succumbed. Hospitals are overcrowded. Temporary hospitals have been opened; bedding, clothing and medicine are required."

A despatch from Paris of the 12th says: "Iodine as a cure for tuberculosis of the lungs is now being taken up by French doctors, following the excellent results obtained with this treatment by Doctor Boudreaux, a leading Bordeaux physician. Doctor Boudreaux announces successful results in the treatment with iodine or iodide of potassium of persons who had reached the third stage of pulmonary tuberculosis. Several of these, who were treated five or ten years ago, are now fit and well."

It was stated from Panama on the 13th inst.: "The Panama Canal was lighted by electricity for the first time to-night, all buoys, lighthouses and range lights along the course being tested successfully. This was the final operation in the preparation of the canal for commerce."

A despatch from Vienna of the 8th says: "Hundreds of women's mass-meetings in favor of woman suffrage were held to-day throughout Austria. At all of them resolutions were adopted declaring it was the general demand of Austrian women for the vote in parliamentary and local elections. The meetings were organized by the Socialist party."

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 27th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when they are temporarily out of school or are unduly burdened in keeping up with their classes, or have been seriously interrupted in their studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Months strengthens the health, and the children gather up the lines of their Westtown studies so that they can get an easier start for their year's work the next autumn.

"THE PRAYER LIFE."

One of the delegates from Haverford to the recent Students' Conference in Kansas City, a young Friend, reported the emphasis upon "the prayer life" in the meetings of the occasion as perhaps the most significant feature of the whole Conference. The expression, "the prayer life," may seem new in Friendly circles. It certainly should not be difficult for us to appreciate how closely it is articulated even to our approved forms of speaking. A concrete illustration will bring this to mind. A whole generation of Westtown boys and girls—the generation that now finds itself classed as "middle aged"—remembers with much affection the frequent visits of the late Edward Sharpless to the School. He was "instant in season" with words of counsel and exhortation. No theme was oftener on his lips than that of the importance of quiet, personal reading of the Holy Scriptures to be followed by periods of "silent waiting upon the Lord." That silent waiting in modern phrase is the "prayer life."

We may prefer the ancient phrase; it is used frequently, with one and another modification in our Discipline, it is particularly used in commending our special form of worship. We can, however, recognize that the general use of the new phrase represents a wide-spread advance in the reality of Christianity. "The prayer life" embraces much more than reading or offering prayers. It recognizes communion as the very basis of prayer. It puts aside form and priest, too. It claims personal access "through the blood of the everlasting covenant" for all.

FRIENDS AND INDIANS.

In this number of THE FRIEND we are beginning an article kindly furnished by Joseph Elkinton, in which the work of Friends for the Indians—especially for the Indians of New York State—is passed in review. A few years since our friend George J. Scattergood recounted this history in careful detail for the readers of our paper. The special reason for what might seem a repetition of subject matter is the evident revival of interest in the Indian work of the Yearly Meeting.

The school at Tunesassa seems to have entered upon a new stage of usefulness. It is important, therefore, that we should all appreciate that this new stage is but an orderly development of the concern in which the interest of several generations has been invested. The article now in hand makes this development clear.

Under the administration of U. S. Grant as President, it seemed likely that the whole Indian problem of the country would be turned over to Friends. Whether such a solution would have resulted favorably to the race and to our Society, we cannot say. Human affairs are too mixed and political interests too powerful to favor such idealism as was in prospect. The mark, however, of President Grant's conclusion to use Friends in the problem still continues in our national system of Indian administration. The President of the U. S. Indian Commissioners is now a Friend (George Vaux, Jr.) and at least one other member of the Board is a member of our Society (Daniel Smiley). Probably the whole national system presents marks of Friendly influence of which we are not aware.

The work of Friends in New York State is an intensive work. It has the merit of an intensive work. If it seems to produce small results, if it seems hardly to touch the whole great national Indian problem, we may be assured that this is a groundless discouragement. The greatest and best causes are now most certainly advanced by the concentrated wisdom that results from intensive studies. We may have builded as a Yearly Meeting "better than we knew." Whether it has been brought about consciously or unconsciously we now have on our hands what is recognized as the best kind of an effort to further a great cause. Let us stand as a unit behind the devoted committee of the Yearly Meeting.—[Eds.]

THE QUAKER MISSION AMONG THE INDIANS OF NEW YORK STATE.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

TO THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF BUFFALO:—

Your President has asked me to tell you the story of the mission which the Society of Friends has conducted for more than a century in behalf of the Iroquois Indians.

You are all acquainted in a general way with the interest Friends have always taken in the natives of North America. As early as 1672, when George Fox visited this country, he earnestly entreated all who came into contact with the Indians to treat them with courtesy and Christian kindness, as well as to educate them in the useful arts as opportunity offered. And William Penn put the advice of his co-religionist into practice in such a way when he settled Pennsylvania as to make his name immortal.

In 1790 three Seneca Chiefs, Corn Planter, Big Tree and Half Town, came to Philadelphia to plead with President Washington for consideration, after the army of General Sullivan had humbled the power of the Six Nations, destroyed their habitations and endangered their title to their ancient hunting-grounds.

Corn Planter, when addressing the President on this memorable occasion, said that he "loved peace, and all that he had in store he had given to those who had been robbed by white people, lest they plunder the innocent to repay themselves. The whole season which others had employed in providing for their families, he had spent in endeavors to preserve peace; and at that very moment his wife and children were lying on the ground and in want of food; his heart was in pain for them, but he perceived that the Great Spirit would try his firmness in doing that which is right."

"Father, innocent men of our nation are killed, one after another, and of our best families; but none of your people who have committed these murders have been punished. We recollect that you did promise to punish those who killed our people, and we ask—was it intended that your people should kill the Senecas and not only remain unpunished but be protected from the next of kin?"

"Father, these are to us very great things; we know that you are very strong, and we have heard that you are wise, and we shall wait to hear your answer that we may know that you are just."

The answer of the President was kind and conciliatory, so that Corn Planter replied: "Father, your speech, written on the great paper, is to us like the first light of the morning to a sick man, whose pulse beats too strongly in his temples, and prevents him from sleeping; he sees it and rejoices, but he is not cured."

Tradition says that it was during this interview, when the Indians asked President Washington whether he had any good men whom he would send among them to teach them the habits and the learning of the white man, that he recommended the Quakers as both willing and reliable for such assistance. These Chiefs had an interview with Friends of Philadelphia before returning to their homes in New York State and their situation and needs were carefully considered by the Representative Meeting of that Society early in 1791.

The address of Corn Planter, which was listened to with much interest at that time, is as follows:

"Brothers, the Seneca Nation sees that the Great Spirit intends that they shall not continue to live by hunting, and they look round on every side, and inquire who it is that shall teach them what is best for them to do.

"Brothers, your fathers have dealt fairly and honestly with our fathers and they have charged us to remember it, and we think it right to tell you that we wish our children to be taught the same principles by which your fathers were guided in their councils.

"We have too little wisdom among us; we cannot teach our children what we perceive their situation requires them to know, and we therefore ask you to instruct some of them. We wish them to be instructed to read and write, and such other things as you teach your own children, and especially to teach them to love peace.

"Brothers, we desire of you to take under your care two Seneca boys, and to teach them as your own; and in order that they may be satisfied to remain with you and be easy in their minds, that they take with them the son of our interpreter and teach him also according to his desire.

"Brothers, you know that it is not in our power to pay for the education of these three boys, and therefore you must, if you do this thing, look up to God for your reward.

"Brothers, you will consider this request and let us know what you determine to do. If your hearts are inclined towards us, and you will afford our nations this great advantage, I will send my son as one of the boys to receive your instruction and at the time which you shall appoint."

These boys were sent to Friends in Philadelphia and educated as requested. One hundred dollars was also appropriated as a token of regard for the Seneca Nation.

Four years later (1795) a permanent Committee was appointed to assist these Indians on their own reservations, and this Committee has been under continuous appointment ever since.

Incidentally, it may be of interest to note that this was the outcome of a century of good-will and kindness, for the Friends of Philadelphia, when writing to their brethren of London Yearly Meeting in 1717, say, "As to your brotherly advice concerning our conduct towards the heathen, among whom it hath pleased God to cast our lot, we can truly say, as it has been the care of Friends even from their first settlement to behave with a Godly and prudent carriage towards them, in which our worthy Friend, William Penn, when here, always set a noble and good example by his love and justice and tenderness towards the Indians, so that his memory is dear to them and they love to speak and hear his name, so it is the care of Friends, in their several stations and places, what in them lies, to continue the same and we could heartily desire that as the country increases, all that come in among us and the succeeding generations may not slacken in that respect, but look back on the great and remarkable blessing, preservation and peace which the hand of the Almighty hath vouchsafed unto these countries, as a continual engagement upon all the inhabitants thereof." [Taken from the minutes of Philadelphia "Yearly Meeting, held at Philadelphia for the Provinces of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, from the 14th to the 18th of Seventh Month, 1717."]

Seventy-seven years later, in 1794, we read in a similar Epistle to London Yearly Meeting: "Within a few weeks past a fresh occasion has claimed renewed attention to this great concern; information having been communicated to divers (of our) members, by officers of the General Government, of a treaty shortly to be held with representatives from certain of the Indian Nations, who had expressed a particular desire for the company of some Friends thereat. . . . an address to said Indian representatives was prepared, with a few suitable articles as a present to be made to them in token of Friends' continued brotherly regard, and four Friends, who had weightily signified a resignation to the arduous service, set forward on their journey. . . . the distance being upwards of three hundred miles, in part through a wilderness country."

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.

[The following account, kindly prepared by Walter L. Moore, reached us after the Ledger report of the Quarterly Meeting was in type. It contains so much that that report did not, that we gladly include it in this number.—Eds.]

The series of Quarterly Meetings constituting the Yearly Meeting was again completed by the holding of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting at Haddonfield on the 12th inst. Though unusually slow in gathering, doubtless due in part to the cold weather and bad condition of roads, the meeting at length settled into an impressive stillness, which was broken by the voice of a visiting minister who quoted the words of Robert Barclay—"When I came into the silent assemblies of the Lord's people, I felt a secret power amongst them which reached my heart, and as I gave way thereto, I felt the evil within me to be loosened and the good raised up." The speaker referred to this power which Barclay found to exist in the silent meetings, even, of the early Friends, as being the same with that spoken of by the Lord Jesus, when he informed his disciples with reference to that which came to pass upon the day of Pentecost.—"Ye shall have power after the Holy Ghost is come upon you." By inference, as this power is promised to the faithful of all time, it is to be anticipated wherever they are gathered together to worship the Father in spirit and in truth. A second speaker, also a visiting minister, quoted the language of the Saviour: "I came not to be ministered unto, but to minister," under which text was set forth the exalted mission of Him who came to reveal the Fatherhood of God in all that pertains to the care of His creatures, and how as one with the Father from the beginning, in all that He taught and suffered in order that our sin-stained humanity should find a way of reconciliation with the Father, He became on the human side of His nature the perfect pattern of submission to the Divine will.

Though eight of those in the station of ministers in the Quarterly Meeting were present, it seemed remarkable that none were called to vocal service; though doubtless they could say, if they had not been called to minister they had been ministered unto.

The meeting for business was opened in joint session. The reading of a letter from William C. Allen asking that he be set at liberty for the important religious engagement unto which he has for a long period felt drawn—namely, a visit to China, Japan, Australasia, and parts of the British Isles—was listened to with much interest and sympathy, resulting in his request being granted. By the same minute Elizabeth C. B. Allen was also liberated to accompany her husband.

The reports on education showed that there were in the six Monthly Meetings constituting the Quarter one hundred and fifty-nine children between the ages of five and twenty years. From the reports on the use of intoxicants it was concluded that the cause of total abstinence had made a slight advance within the past year.

A feature of the meeting which elicited much interest was the report of the Visitation Committee, which for six months had been engaged in the important work of endeavoring to strengthen the cause of true religion in the subordinate meetings. It was stated in the report that the groups representing the several Monthly Meetings in the Committee had conferred together as touching their various needs and as their conclusions are thought to be of general interest and of application elsewhere, they are here given as embodied in the report:

1. The visitation by members of the Committee, of our smaller meetings for worship and discipline, that advice may be given in the latter where matters of importance are before them, and encouragement where they would otherwise be held in silence.

2. The visitation of individual members and families, and the extension to them of sympathy and encouragement. Especially visits or letters to members who are invalids, or who live at a distance, or are in any way prevented from the regular attendance of our meetings. This is a service not only for overseers and others whose official duty is to look after the membership, but for any concerned member who may feel it right to so express Christian fellowship. Sometimes the reason for non-attendance at meeting, or apparent indifference, lies deeper than we can understand, unless in the spirit of true friendliness we earnestly seek to learn the cause of estrangement.

3. Feeling that in the past our interest has been centred on our adult membership, we now emphatically call attention to the necessity of taking steps to meet the religious needs of our children and young people, so that they may be encouraged to enter into the full Christian experience.

4. A reaching out in greater Christian fellowship towards attenders of our meetings who have not been sufficiently interested to join us in membership.

5. Greater interest in inviting strangers to sit with us in our meetings for worship, and in welcoming such as come in a manner that will assure them that we sincerely want them. In this connection we recommend that a sign be placed in front of every meeting-house, announcing the time of holding our public meetings for Divine worship, and extending a welcome to all to attend them.

6. A more strict observance of the hour for gathering at our meetings, and when therein assembled, and at other times, a more humble, prayerful watchfulness, and a closer faithfulness on the part of individual members.

7. An individual feeling of responsibility in our meetings both for worship and discipline—especially our larger meetings. Only as we accept our own share and do not leave it to a few leaders can our meetings reach their greatest power.

8. Encouragement to any who give evidence of a possible call to the ministry, and the avoidance of all unkind or unfavorable criticism, so that there may be mutual forbearance and love.

9. The holding of occasional appointed meetings, especially in neighborhood like Mt. Laurel and Medford, for the settlement of Friends was at one time large and when the neighborhood interest is kindly towards Friends, the method of worship.

Under the direction of the Committee, an appointed meeting was held at Westfield on the twenty-second of September, especially for those residents of the neighborhood who have no church affiliation. The invitation was given by personal house to house visits made by two members of the Committee. The attendance numbered seventy-five to one hundred per cent, and was, therefore, made up chiefly of neighbors of the meeting. Some of these learned with surprise that the usual meetings for worship of Friends are public, and expressed a desire to attend them. The meeting was reverently held, with impressive vocal service and silent worship.

The Committee which has had the oversight of the Merchantville meeting, after some months' consideration, felt it right to suggest the discontinuance of the holding of the morning meeting for worship at that place, owing to the smallness of attendance. This judgment was concurred in by the Quarterly Meeting. The meeting held there on the first First-day afternoon in each month was, however, continued and placed under the care of a much smaller committee to be chosen by the original Committee from their number.

The reading and answering of the Queries was performed in separate session of men and women Friends. The entire meeting on the men's side when closed made for them the unusual length of four and a half hours, which though a little hard for the physical part was repaid by the close attention given to the proceedings, showing a lively interest on the part of the membership of the Quarterly Meeting in the welfare of the Society.

To talk with God before I talk with man. To do my daily work with sunshine in my face and honey on my tongue. To be strong in the presence of temptation, alert in the presence of opportunity, open-eared to the call of conscience for service or sacrifice, open-minded to views of truth which differ from mine. To make duty a joy, and joy a duty. To work and not worry, to be energetic and not fussy. To be true to myself, and false to no man; diligent to make a living, and earnest to make a life. To cherish friendships and guard confidences. To be loyal to principle at the cost of popularity. To make no promises I cannot keep, and to keep no foolish promises. To be faithful to every honest obligation. To be sweet-tempered under criticism, charitable in my judgments, discriminating in my adjectives. To honor no one, simply because he is rich. To despise no one, simply because he is poor. To be respectful, not cringing, to the great; sympathetic with the sorrowing; gentle to the weak, helpful to the fallen, courteous to all. To be simple in my tastes, quiet in my dress; pure in my speech; temperate in my pastimes. To companion with great books; cherish inspiring thoughts; and to keep my body on friendly terms with water and fresh air. To fear nothing but sin; hate nothing but hypocrisy; envy nothing but a clean life; covet nothing but character. And at last to leave the world a little better for my stay; to face death without a tremor, with faith in Christ who tunneled the grave that I might walk into the larger and perfect life.—DANIEL HOFFMAN MARTIN.

ONWARD.—O Thou who ever goest before Thy flock like a wise shepherd, leading them in ways of peace and strength, help us with ready hearts to listen for Thy voice and gladly follow Thee. Let there be no lingering for love of sin, no doubt for lack of perfect vision, no resting in the happy places of the past, as if Thy love had done its best and had no larger gift to offer. Teach us a wise forgetting of the things that are behind, that we may press on toward the goal. For we believe that in the way Thou leadest light and truth and immortality are found. Forgive the folly of our oft-recurring fears, and quicken us to an unflinching courage by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.—ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN, in Congregationalist.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

HE THAT DWELLETH IN THE SECRET PLACE.

IN THE FRIEND of First Month 8, 1914, I read the most helpful article, "The Lamb and The Beast," by M. I. Reich. In his conclusion, he says: "If we get accustomed to dwell in His light now, we shall feel at home in it when we are at last where no earthly shadows shall obscure its brightness or dim its glory." This has made me realize more fully the great importance of sitting at Jesus' feet, and learning each moment of the day His will concerning me. This inspiring old Bible verse in the ninety-first Psalm, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty," has for generations inspired and given strength to many seeking souls. Are we as Friends seeking to dwell in this Secret Place? "Casting all your cares upon Him; for He careth for you." (1 Peter v: 7). This verse in the ninety-first Psalm may consist of two parts—a condition and a promise. The condition may be said to be, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High," and the promise, "shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." To dwell in this Secret Place is the important and essential thing. Secret means to put apart, to separate, therefore, the secret place of the Most High means a place separate or apart, apart from ourselves, and apart from the world. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." His purposes are spiritual and good, and to dwell in this Secret Place, it seems to me, we must be in harmony with the Divine, and then will we reflect Jesus Christ. This seeking and abiding and reflecting, surely means, as Friends understand it, a growth daily and a continual worship in spirit and in truth, each moment of our lives, instead of a merely First-day observance, for the apostle enjoins, "Let that mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Then let us seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, as the Scriptures command us to do, and we shall be privileged to enter into this Secret Place of the Most High, there to win those blessings of peace, contentment, and satisfaction which pass human understanding.

"In the shadow of His hand hath He hid me." (Isa. xlix: 2)

"When the storms of life are raging,
Tempests wild on sea and land,
I will seek a place of refuge
In the shadow of God's hand,

Though He may send some afflictions,
'Twill but make me long for home;
For in love and not in anger,
All His chastenings will come.

Enemies may strive to injure,
Satan all his arts employ;
He will turn what seems to harm me,
Into everlasting joy.

So, while here the cross I'm bearing,
Meeting storms and billows wild,
Jesus, for my soul is caring,
Naught can harm His Father's child.

He will hide me, He will hide me,
Where no harm can e'er befall me;
He will hide me, safely hide me,
In the hollow of His hand."

"Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." (1 Samuel vii: 12.)

THE word "hitherto" seems like a hand pointing in the direction of the past. Twenty years or seventy, and yet "hitherto the Lord hath helped!" Through poverty, through wealth, through sickness, through health, at home, abroad, on the land, on the sea, in honor, in dishonor, in perplexity, in joy, in trial, in triumph, in prayer, in temptation; "hitherto the Lord hath helped us!"

We delight to look down a long avenue of trees. It is delightful to gaze from end to end of the long vista, a sort of verdant temple, with its branching pillars and its arches of leaves; even so look down the long aisles of your years, at the green boughs of mercy overhead and the strong pillars of loving kindness and faithfulness which bear up your joys?

Are there no birds in yonder branches singing?

Surely, there must be many and they all sing of mercy received "hitherto." But the word points forward. For when a man gets up to a certain mark and writes "hitherto," he is not yet at the end; there is still a distance to be traversed. More trials, more joys; more temptations, more triumphs; more prayers, more answers, more toils, more strength, more fights, more victories, and then come sickness, old age, disease, death.

Is it over now? No! there is more yet—awakening in Jesus' likeness, thrones, harps, songs, psalms, white raiment, the face of Jesus, the society of saints, the glory of God, the fulness of eternity, the infinity of bliss.

O, be of good courage, believer, and with grateful confidence raise thy "Ebenezer."

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.

THE sixth of the series of Quarterly Meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was held at Burlington, New Jersey, Second Month 24, 1914. It is composed of seven small centres of Friends in New Jersey and one larger group in Pennsylvania.

The day was clear and cold. Many of the older members were missed from their accustomed places. During the period of waiting—watching—and even wrestling for the blessing—the exercise of many hearts found expression in the words of Paul—Ephesians, Sixth Chapter, Verses 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 18—stating that the burdens of the church are shifting. The young people were feelingly invited to take unto themselves the whole armor of God—employing the sword of the Spirit that they may be fully equipped to work for the dear Master, giving cheerful and effective service in response to His bidding. "Your fathers where are they? and the prophets do they live forever?" was quoted with the observation that the faces of some present were indices of their heart-longing, that their fathers' and mothers' God might be theirs. This consciousness brought cheer and comfort in the consideration of a succession of workers. "Will we also go away?" We are not altogether responsible for the conditions which surround us. But we may be more largely accountable for those which follow us. However, if we believe the things which we profess to believe, our faith will be of the sort that we shall enter freely and faithfully into the service of our dear Heavenly Father. The message of Friends is for all people everywhere, and not merely for themselves. God is altogether able to meet changed and changing conditions,—to employ the few or the many, to inspire the learned or the unlearned. If the heart is receptive and responsive to the intimations of duty, progress will be made in the right way of the Lord by the individual, and corporate concerns will be constructive and will be conscientiously conserved.

Thanksgiving and praise to the Father of all our sure mercies were offered for the favor of His sweet presence on this occasion, pleading for His strength to help to take up the mantles which have been laid down and so to go forward. Formerly, the law was written upon tables of stone. The Israelites were to teach it to their children, and to their children's children. The new dispensation intends that all shall become priests unto God. All have a ministry to exercise, if not in word, in deed.

In the business session permission was granted to Burlington Monthly Meeting to hold its meetings for discipline in joint session. It is the province of the Quarterly Meeting to participate in certain functions—among these is the summarizing of answers to the queries and other reports. It is helpful when such considerations produce sympathy for the struggle of the small meeting, as well as strength to the large assembly. Thus there may be an up-building together in what is right and pure and lovely, and of sweet necessity a sharing with others of the good things of the kingdom.

THE WORK OF FRIENDS IN CONNECTION WITH PRISONS.

ALBERT H. VOTAW, SECRETARY, PENNSYLVANIA PRISON SOCIETY.

It was in this year of 1776 that several benevolent citizens of Philadelphia, realizing to some extent the horrible condition of the prisons, established, so far as is known, the first organization designed to alleviate such conditions. The name chosen for this body was "The Philadelphia Society for Assisting Distressed Prisoners." Among the Managers appear the names of several Friends, Christopher Marshall, Isaac Howell, Benjamin Marshall, Richard Humphreys and Samuel Sansom. The late Richard Vaux is authority for the statement that Richard Wistar was practically the founder of this organization. The active life of this Society continued for only nineteen months, as the occupation of Philadelphia by the British soldiery and the exigencies of war caused the dissolution of the organization. It is on record that one effort of the Society was to supply the needy prisoners with food. To this end a cart was purchased and was brought to the homes of the citizens in order to receive the scraps and "left-overs" from the tables. The contents of these carts were taken to the keeper with instruction to deliver to the starving prisoners.

In 1787 another organization with similar purpose was formed, which has continued in unbroken existence to the present day, and is the oldest Prison Society in the world. Dr. Benjamin Rush and Bishop William White, the latter being elected President, a position which he held but a few months less than half a century, were foremost among the founders. Benjamin Franklin seems to have been a member in the first year or two of the existence of the Society. The following Friends were members in the first year of the Society's life: James Whitall, Thomas Wistar, Isaac Parrish, Dr. S. P. Griffiths, Joseph Cowperthwaite, Richard Vaux, Samuel Coates, John Evans, James Pemberton, Eliston Perot, Thomas Clifford, Philip Benezet, Job Bacon, Thos. Morris, Dr. C. Wistar, Jeremiah Warder and Henry Drinker. During the more than a century and a quarter of its existence, Friends have taken a prominent part in the work of this organization.

The Society early resolved that two leading elements of the desired reformation were to find employment for the prisoners and to interdict the use of intoxicating drinks. They also insisted that there must be a segregation, not only of the sexes, but also of individuals, in order that penal institutions should not become schools for crime. Through the efforts of the Society, in 1790 the legislature of the State passed an Act reforming the penal code in which the principle of individual separation was first legally recognized, though to be applied to "more hardened and atrocious offenders, who are sentenced to a term of years." The introduction of intoxicating drinks was prohibited under severe penalties. In 1794 the Society secured the abolition of the exaction of fees by the jailers as a condition of release, and a competent salary was authorized to be paid to the prison officials. About the same time capital punishment was abolished except for murder in the first degree. Barbarous methods of punishment, such as the pillory, branding with hot irons, the whipping post, were soon dispensed with as reformatory measures.

In 1794 it was enacted that all convicts should be confined in separate cells, but the Managers or Inspectors have been compelled to give a very broad construction to this law, since usually there are more prisoners than cells. In the year 1820, when the Eastern State Penitentiary, at Twenty-first and Fairmount Avenue, Philadelphia, was opened for the reception of inmates, the members of the Acting Committee of the Society were by enactment of the State Legislature constituted "Official Visitors" of all prisons of the State. For many years the Warden of the Eastern State Penitentiary was a Friend, and the Board of Inspectors has usually included one or more members of our Society. But activity in the line of Prison Reform in general has been mostly confined among Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to the comparatively few individuals who have been associated with the ancient and honorable Prison Society. Joshua T. Baily, whose membership, dating from 1851, is the oldest in the Society, has been for some years the efficient President of the organization. John J. Lytle, who died in 1911, was for more than fifty years the Secretary of the Society. His work at the Eastern Penitentiary was characterized by intense devotion and unflinching self-sacrifice. I do not recall that any time the Meeting for Sufferings or Representative Meeting has issued any document relative to prison reform or management. Perhaps the time is ripe for a more general consideration of this subject. This State does not yet have a Reformatory for women, but the last legislature passed a law providing for the appointment of a commission to establish such an institution and made a grant of $250,000 to be used for this purpose. The Commission has just been appointed with E. J. Stotesbury, of Philadelphia, as its head. Another commission will be appointed to consider the penal system of the State and report their findings to the next legislature.

In the State of Indiana, a Reformatory for women was established more than forty years ago. Friends took a leading part in this movement, and the matron of the Institution has usually been a member of the Society of Friends. Friends have served on the Board of Managers not only of this Institution but of all penal or reformatory institutions of the State. The same is true of the well-known institution at Bedford, N. Y., of which James Wood, of Mt. Kisco, is president.

The removal of the Western Penitentiary from Pittsburgh to a farm of 5000 acres in Centre County will make an epoch in the penological annals of Pennsylvania. Already work has begun. The last legislature passed an appropriation for the erection of the buildings, and it is to be hoped that within a year or two the prisoners now confined in the dank, unwholesome quarters on the Ohio River bottom will be transferred to the high, healthful and beautiful location in the central part of the State. It is an inspiration to hear Warden John Francies tell of his plans for the employment and reformation of those under his charge. The Institution will be conducted somewhat on the lines of the system now in successful operation at Great Meadows, N. Y. Within the last five years several States have applied the "Farm Treatment," and always with efficacious results.

The conditions of county jails throughout the commonwealth have long needed serious attention. Lack of proper employment is the leading difficulty. I recently visited a county jail in which a man was sentenced to remain for eight years with no employment whatever. The results of such confinement are detrimental to health, morals and mentality. Too often the young are confined with old and hardened criminals. It is to be hoped that imperfect sanitation and unwholesome environments may hereafter in this State be remedied in the county jails. The State Board of Charities has for years through its inspectors called attention to these matters, but their jurisdiction ended with the power of making suggestions. The last legislature took a decided step in advance when it authorized this body to report to the County Commissioners any evils of this kind, and further empowered them to take action to enforce their recommendations. There is an experiment now being tried in the State of Indiana which is attracting the interest of all who are interested in solving the county jail problem. This State has recently established a penal farm to which all prisoners sentenced throughout the State to short terms of sixty days or more—say two years—may be sent and put to work. Doubtless there will be other employments besides merely agricultural operations on this farm. It is hoped that this farm will be self-supporting and that a small wage may be earned, some of which is to be sent to the families of those imprisoned. When the State places a wage-earner in confinement, it should not forget some degree of responsibility for those whom the wage-earner supports, or should support.

The "New Penology" has come to stay. Do not think that modern penologists would dispense with punishment. It is a most severe punishment to suffer the degradation of a jail sentence, to be confined within walls and bounds, to lose personal liberty. But we believe that the criminal has a reversionary right to liberty and the pursuit of happiness. The leading object of our penal institutions should be to restore men and women so that they may become useful members of the community.

A PILGRIMAGE FROM OLNEY TO OLNEY.

It was in the summer of 1904 that my father and I, after our many happy years at Olney, near Philadelphia, longed to see old England. An ancient Friend, Alexander Wilson, had come to America from across the sea, calling his farm and house "Olney," and from this our village obtained its title. There are several other Olneys in the United States, and probably they all owe their origin, as did ours, to a regard for the Poet Cowper. The English pronunciation of the word is "O-ney," and it is derived from the French "aunail," which means alder—these bushes growing along the river Ouse. Cowper also pronounced his name Cooper, for on his coat-of-arms were three hoops representing that trade. Behold us then setting forth from London one misty morning by rail, which brought us in two hours to Bedford, famed as the home of John Bunyan—we saw his monument in bronze, a book open in his hand and his face upturned. The chapel has bronze doors with illustrations in bas-relief from twelve scenes in "Pilgrim's Progress." A short drive to the neighboring village of Elstow, carried us to Bunyan's cottage, containing four rooms, while across the garden was the common, and in this the old meeting-house, where he used to preach. The goal is torn down, but his imprisonment for twelve years showed the grit that was in the man, that led to the production of his wonderful book, and immortalized him as a Christian author. He belonged to the Baptists. Macaulay says of him, "He had no suspicion that he was producing a master-piece. He could not guess what place his allegory would occupy in English literature. We are not afraid to say that though there were many clever men in England during the latter half of the seventeenth century, there were only two great creative minds—one of these minds produced "Paradise Lost," the other "Pilgrim's Progress."

As we turn westward from Bedford, the village of Olney soon appears on the horizon, with the "Tall spire from which the sound of cheerful bells

Just undulates upon the listening ear."

This church building dates back to 1350, and on its weather-vane is this triplet

"I never crow,
But stand to show
Whence winds do blow."

A wide highway sweeps in graceful curves, from which branch narrow lanes—the houses thatched or tiled, one can hardly tell which is prettier. We enter some of these and find the quaint cottagers at their ancient industry of lace-weaving—each woman having a pillow and bobbins on her lap—long ago men also won their bread here in the same manner, and wonderful filmy fabrics were wrought for the nobility.

By the large, open common with its spreading elm, we come to Cowper's House, lately presented at the Centenary celebration by the owner to the citizens of Olney, to be kept as a museum with relics of the poet. His cane, his watch, many autograph letters, portraits of himself and his friends. We see the tiny kitchen and the hole cut through the wall for the three pet hares, "Puss," "Tiny" and "Bess," to be admitted to the dining-room, while the sleeping apartment overhead shows the bed-quilt given by lady friends.

The garden fills us with delight, full of fruit and flowers, the sun kindly allowing me to take photographs—with father strolling through the grassy paths. How real do associations become when we thus tread the very sod and sit in the very seat of one whom we revere through the haze of years. The idea of cherishing the homes of great men has long prevailed in England, and is taught by our country. Thus we find the residence of Cowper in the care of a clever old gentleman and his wife, who occupy it as open to the public—his son, Thomas Wright, is an artist, having many Olney views as well as a good book for sale, "The Town of Cowper," of which he is the author. So we are in touch at once with enthusiastic guides. They seem interested in hearing that we come from Olney in America, and when we go to a neighboring tea-room for dinner, we glance through the guest book, where many signers have rhymed upon the excellence of the food and I perpetrated this verse,

For love of Cowper have we come
From Olney far across the sea,
And here we find a village rare,
With every point in harmony.

Thomas Wright is also Principal of the Olney School, and as we peep through the fence, the boys are drilling, their quaint costume making them look like an animated primer, in short jackets, broad white collars and high silk hats—while the girls in their yard, are dressed in pinafores and are also marching.

Let us go back to Cowper's day and picture Mary Unwin, with her warm motherly heart, bringing him to reside at Olney, where for nineteen years he passed the happiest period of his life and did his best work. Their reason for choosing this village was their nearness to the vicar, John Newton—a man who had once lived an abandoned life as a slave-trader on the west coast of Africa, but who was reached by reading "The Imitation of Christ," and by encountering a ship-wreck—thus he returned to England, married and became intimate with Whitefield and Wesley—finally taking the curacy at Olney. His kindness of heart drew to him the gentle poet, and together they wrote "The Olney Hymns," three hundred and forty-eight in all, with "a desire to promote the faith and comfort of sincere Christians. For six years we were seldom separate when at home and awake." Much of their time was spent in visiting the poor, ministering to the sick and praying at the bedside of the dying.

The correspondence of Cowper contains perhaps the choicest series of letters in the English language—he wrote most charmingly to his cousin, Lady Hisketh—with a gay and tender gallantry. His engagement to her sister, Theodora, had been forbidden by her father in early life, and they never met again, though anonymous gifts at intervals probably came from her.

A witty woman, Lady Austen, filled with admiration for Cowper's writings, settled herself at Olney and by her vivacity, cheered and inspired him. Her recital of a true anecdote once prompted him to compose "John Gilpin," proving the humorous side of his character, while in 1783 this "sister," as he called her, suggested "The Sofa," as a suitable subject, and thus began his best known poem, "The Task."

We were lately questioned by one of our valued members, William Wistar Comfort, a Master of Languages at Cornell University, as to the love for Cowper so marked among Friends a half century ago, and why it has declined. At our schools here and in England, he was read and memorized and quoted, until the melody of his verse, the description of Nature, the high moral tone and the deep Christian keynote all touched a responsive chord. Our friend, Clarkson Sheppard, a minister, could recite the "Task" from beginning to end. A revival of the study of Cowper's best writings would be wholesome for this day, for they still hold a place among the classics. Perhaps some of us shrink from the despondent side of his temperament, but if we realize how this was counteracted by his deeply religious nature, we learn to bless the Divine Grace that upheld him to the very end.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning in her great poem, "Gowper's Grave," tried soul in sympathetic appreciation of this tossed and tried soul.

"He shall be strong to sanctify the poet's high vocation,
And bow the meekest Christian down in meeker adoration;
Nor ever shall he be in praise by wise or good forsaken,
Named softly as the household name of one whom God hath taken."

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

AN ARMY INDIAN STORY.—The wife of Colonel L. M. Maus, now stationed at Governor's Island, New York City, spent much time among the Indians when her husband was at posts in the western states, and is much interested in helping them. The story which follows was told by her.

Near one of the army posts in North Dakota, there lived a beautiful little Indian girl whose name was Tokahr, which means Anna. When Tokahr was very small her mother was a sad gambler.

Indians are fond of gambling; that is one of the things we have to teach them—that gambling is very bad for them. They play all kinds of games, and bet on them—whether games of cards they have learned from the white men or a sort of checker game they play on the ground or on running races. They will begin by betting a little; and oftentimes they lose everything they have.

That is what happened to Tokahr's mother: at first she bet her moccasins that she would win; then she lost them, and the next time she bet her blanket. The blanket she lost, too, so she bet her bar of laundry soap, which was supposed to last a whole month. By this time she was so crazy over the game that she felt she knew she could win the next time if she only had something left to bet—but everything was gone. Suddenly her eye lighted—she had Tokahr left. So she bet her little daughter—and lost.

The woman who won the game won Tokahr, but she did not love the little girl; she only wanted her to work and to beg for her at the garrison or army post.

Poor little Tokahr was very unhappy. Is it any wonder? Just think how unhappy you would be if you should suddenly discover that your dearest friend—whether mother, father, aunt or uncle—had ceased to love you, and had given you away in payment of a gambling debt. Would you not be very sad and unhappy? At the post was a lady who pitied little Tokahr, and the little girl came often to beg.

One day an Indian came to this lady and said that Tokahr was very sick—so sick that she could not recover—and that she wanted to say good-bye before she went to the "happy hunting grounds," meaning heaven.

So the lady, feeling very sorry for beautiful little Tokahr, went with the Indian, and found the child lying in a tepee or tent, and apparently dying. The Indian "medicine man" had brought a quantity of bitter roots to doctor the child; these roots he ordered five old squaws to chew, and then to spit upon her little body. This being done, they put a number of dresses on the child, and covered her with all the blankets they could get, so that she should perspire and the bitter medicine go in through the open pores of the skin.

Tokahr cried piteously, and seemed to be dying, but begged the lady to take care of her. The lady was afraid to give her a bath, which was what she needed, for fear the child might die and then the Indians would blame her.

But finally little Tokahr begged so hard to be taken away that the officer's wife took her to her own home at the post. There she made the child clean, comfortable and happy; and instead of going to the "happy hunting-grounds," little Tokahr blossomed into girlhood and sweet womanhood, and is now a teacher in the Indian school, helping other little Indian girls to make the most of their lives.—ANNA RUSSELL MATS, in O'er Sea and Land.

SOME GLIMPSES OF THE LIFE OF HARVEY H HAIGHT.

Having the feeling that we have lost a beloved father and our Israel in the recent removal of our dear Friend Harvey H Haight I am constrained to write down a few thoughts that have arisen concerning him. The leading impression made by his life seems to be expressed in Revelation 19: "They are they which come out of great tribulation and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and they serve Him day and night in His temple."

We learn from a newspaper article written since his death that he was the youngest son of James Haight and Annie Allen who moved from New York State in 1820, accompanied by six children, and settled on the farm now occupied by their grandson; they had twelve children altogether, eight of whom grew up to manhood and womanhood. They were members of our Society, but I am not in possession of much more information about them.

We have often heard from the lips of our friend what a prodigal he was as a young man and how in abounding mercy he was brought under deep conviction for his wickedness. He told of one instance on a First-day when in company with some young companions, bent on pleasure, instead of going to meeting, one asked him what his family would say if they knew what he was doing, he replied, "When they get me to be a Quaker they'll know it."

He married (in 1845) Sarah Jane Rathburn, who was not a Friend. They had four children, of whom only the youngest survives. His wife was taken from his side in 1890. This was deeply trying to his very affectionate nature, but he endeavored to bear it, we believe, with Christian fortitude.

Many Friends in the United States will remember his visits in the love of the Gospel amongst them; these trips were always made, I think we may safely say, very much in the cross to his natural inclination. Indeed, we have reason to believe all his religious exercises in public were humbling to him. At different times he was saying that he could adopt Paul's language, "I am not meet to be called an Apostle, because I persecuted the church of God." Soon after his last trip to another Yearly Meeting, about ten years ago, he became quite blind. This affliction he felt more keenly than words can express; one time when some friends were visiting him, some remark was made about it and he said if it were not for the sustaining power of his Heavenly Father, he did not think he would be able to keep sane.

"If so be that ye suffer with Him, that ye also may be glorified together with Him," was a subject which he was frequently engaged to proclaim and he seemed called upon to exemplify the same in his own experience in no common measure. "I have refined thee, but not with silver, I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction," seems very applicable. As might be expected, he was very appreciative of visits from his friends. During such a visit last summer he seemed quite alive to the interests of our Society and made some inquiries about the situation in some other parts of the land, which surprised us, considering that his memory had failed so much in more common things. After telling him of a message of remembrance from a Friend at our Yearly Meeting, he said, "My love goes out to all my friends everywhere." So he surely seemed "as a shock of corn fully ripe," waiting to be gathered into the Heavenly garner.

SOCIETY OF FRIENDS AND THE DUTY OF EMPLOYERS.—Following a conference on the responsibility of employer to employed, the members of the Society of Friends in Birmingham and district have adopted the following minute:—"We have been stimulated to fresh thought upon the principles which should govern the relationships in which we are involved in our social life and in the world of industry. It has been brought home to us that the conditions under which large numbers of wage-earners live are profoundly unsatisfactory, and offer little opportunity for mental and spiritual development. It is clear to us that many of these evils are the result of low wages, and we hold that every Friend who is an employer should inform himself from time to time as to the wage which is adequate to keep the worker in decency and comfort, remembering that the current market rate of wages is not necessarily sufficient for this purpose. We feel that many causes of friction between masters and men would be removed if advances were made not through the compulsion of a strike on the part of the workers, but through the ready response on the part of the employer to the demands of a new situation. Nor should we forget that in this relationship all are implicated, and that as householders, investors and consumers we share the responsibility for the employment of numerous men and women for whose conditions we are largely responsible, and we should at all times take whatever steps we can to find out what these conditions are, especially when about to invest in any commercial undertaking. We realize that as individuals we may be able to do very little to improve matters at once, yet in a corporate capacity in the church, and above all by influencing public opinion and national action, we may play our part in creating a more enlightened social conscience and thereby help to bring in a better ordering of our national life."

THE FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF PHILADELPHIA held its annual meeting and supper at Arch Street Meeting House on the evening of Third Month 12th. About one hundred and fifty members were in attendance. Apart from the routine business, the interest of the evening centered upon two excellent papers. Amelia Mott Gummere wrote of "John Woolman," and Gertrude Roberts Sherer had for her subject, "When Quakerism was Young." Both were sprightly and interesting in an unusual degree, and at the same time both conveyed an amount of historical information which amply justified their appearance in such a gathering.

A GERMAN APPRECIATION OF J. S. ROWNTREE'S "FAITH AND PRACTICE."—An interesting notice of the recent German translation of John S. Rowntree's "The Society of Friends: Its Faith and Practice," appears in a Düsseldorf newspaper and has been forwarded to Norman Penney by F. Mortens, of Rugby, of which the following is in brief the substance:—

"This little book gives to German readers a brief outline of the views of the so-called Quakers, the religious Society to which the English people owes so much in civics and economics, and shows that it still has an important message to proclaim which specially meets the needs of our own time. The Friends, as the Quakers call themselves (the word 'Quakers' under which they are widely known is a nickname and means 'trembler,') have always stood fast to their convictions undisturbed by persecution and ill-treatment, scorn and derision. Tolerant of the opinions of others, they have continually striven in their many philanthropic works (we need only name the well-known Adult Schools) to understand the requirements of the time. They have remained faithful to the one recognized belief in the quickening consciousness of the nearness of an invisible world in the midst of the visible with its temptations and needs.

"This little book deserves a wide circulation, and no one will put it down without taking some good thought into his future life. The Friends have in recent years striven for a better understanding between England and Germany. If in these efforts they attain such results as in their labors for the abolition of slavery, we may look forward hopefully."—From The Friend (London).

WITH the title "The Story of Ahikar," J. Rendel Harris is associated in the publication of a book of which the London Friend says: "If any ordinary scholar wishes to gauge the depths of his own ignorance, he has full opportunity for so doing within the covers of this book. It is the work of three linguistic scholars of the first rank, well known in connection with Biblical studies—J. Rendel Harris, F. C. Conybeare and Agnes Smith Lewis. . . . The two page review of the work concludes: We now recognize in the story of Ahikar the contribution of Neo-Babylonia to the world's library. The book must be at least as old as that, but may be much older. We may even hope yet for the discovery of the very pillar of Ahikaros, from which Democritus was accused of having plagiarized his moral philosophy."

ST. GEORGE STOCK.

A STATED meeting of the Representative Meeting was held on Sixth-day, the twentieth, with a fair attendance. The memorial of Josiah W. Leeds was read a second time and with some slight verbal corrections will go forward to the Yearly Meeting.

The Committee on Public Morality, a new committee, appointed three months ago, reported a sympathetic hearing by Director George Porter. He is evidently much alive to the concerns of the Committee and ready to co-operate with them or with any exercised citizens in advancing public morality.

The Committee on Records presented a statistical report for the year. The total membership is 4410, as against 4416 last year. The city Quarterly Meeting and those Quarters more remote from the city show some decrease of membership, but the other Quarters have made gains in numbers during the year.

A minute in regard to the long and valued services of George M. Comfort in the Representative Meeting was put on record.

A letter from the Governor of Maryland in response to the appeal against gambling showed that he had the concern at heart. The telegram sent to President Wilson at last meeting was acknowledged by the State Department.

A Friend called attention to the manner of nominating some of the standing Committees of the Yearly Meeting and questioned whether nominating Committees should not be appointed a year in advance. A favorable feeling to this subject was expressed although it was recognized to be strictly in the province of the Yearly Meeting.

There was also some informal consideration of the question of dropping names of members of meetings who have been a long time on the list without having been heard from. The Discipline provides for such cases.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

We enjoyed a week-end visit over the seventh and eighth from Oscar Moon and wife, of Baltimore. They attended First-day morning meeting and in the evening Oscar Moon spoke to the boys in their half hour collection, and later had the Baltimore Yearly Meeting boys and girls in the Superintendent's parlor for a social visit. Oscar Moon holds a position in his Yearly Meeting which brings him closely in touch with the out-lying sections, which Westtown is glad to reach.

The exercise provided for the girl's collection the same evening was a paper written by Ann Sharpless and read by Mary Ward. It was entitled, "Friends in these Parts Long Ago," and we hope that later it may appear in THE FRIEND.

We have been to an unusual degree favored with good health this school year, and while other schools in and near Philadelphia have been much interfered with by contagions of one sort or another, our first contagion to report consists in cases of mumps, at the present time confined to the girls; the patients are comfortably housed in the school hospital, with every reasonable want supplied, awaiting with what patience they can command the passing of the three weeks of quarantine.

In view of the contagion here and the much more serious contagions in various home neighborhoods, the School authorities have decided for the present to limit home visits to those cases of positive necessity.

PLANS are already taking shape for the biennial school excursion to Washington. It is arranged for the party to leave Philadelphia the morning of Third-day, Fourth Month 14th, returning on the evening of the sixteenth. This outing is planned primarily for the Senior and First Classes, but it is hoped that some older people in addition to the teacher chaperons will join, and probably there will be room for a few from the Second Class. The trip to Washington has always been a most enjoyable as well as educative event, and from the fact that a long vacation follows the date of the return, it is not objectionable on the score of over-taxing just before the opening of a new term of School.

The teachers most directly in charge of the elocution contest which has been referred to frequently of late in the Westtown Notes, held a reception on Fifth-day evening in the Gymnasium, to which all the contestants were invited and other guests, in all about one hundred; the entertainment was furnished by Ellen C. Carter, Helen P. Cooper and Augustine Dwyer, who gave recitations, mostly of humorous tone, followed by a more substantial feature, which especially appealed to Boarding School boys and girls.

Our Friends may be weary of our reports of the feats on the coasting hill; we want, however, to chronicle the fact that on the fourteenth of Third Month, the coasting on the north slope of Walnut Hill was excellent, and that the ice track through the north woods was still in use. The season's record is without parallel in recent years and doubtless will be often referred to with words of glowing appreciation by the boys and girls of 1914, when years hence they explain the attractions of Westtown to the next generation.

OUR lecture course, which has been an unusually choice one, still offers three more lectures; two of them will have been given before this issue of THE FRIEND is published, the third will be of Tong Sing Kow (the Chinese Quaker), on the 27th inst. The lecture for the current week was given by Augustus T. Murray, of Leland Stanford University, California, on "Whittier's Testimony Against War."

THE Visiting Committee of twelve are expected from the 14th to the 17th. William Bishop, who is under appointment for this date, not being able to be from home at that time, was with us for a couple of days near the middle of the week and was acceptably present at our Fifth-day morning meeting.

Third Month 14th.

CORRESPONDENCE.

By letter from Minnie P. Bowles dated Tokio, Second Month 20th, 1914, we are informed of the terrible suffering of the people in northern Japan from famine, and in the south from the volcanic eruption. Last summer's rice crop entirely failed. Seed planted in the spring was destroyed by freezing weather, and as rice is the staple article of food in Japan, people in the province of Hokkaido are on the verge of starvation. They are existing on the fallen and dried leaves of last autumn, and on roots. These boiled together with chopped rice straw make their chief food supply. Old people and children are dying from lack of proper nourishment and many, both men and women, commit suicide that they may be one less to feed in the family. It is a heartrending tale of actual suffering and one that must appeal to every humane person.

At a meeting of the Friends' Foreign Mission Committee held at Tokio, Japan, Second Month 6th, 1914, the following minute was adopted: "The great suffering at present in Japan, entailed by the volcanic eruption in the south, and by the famine in the north, was brought before us, and the Publicity Committee was instructed to send reports of conditions and appeals for help."

In 1906 there was failure of the rice crop in Japan and the people passed through a similar experience, though not nearly so severe and widespread as at present. Friends in Philadelphia and vicinity at that time contributed twenty-seven hundred dollars for relief of the suffering and starving Japanese. Shall we in this terrible crisis do less?

Friends are ever ready to respond to appeals for relieving their distressed fellow-beings, and need only to have this pitiful condition presented authoritatively before them to render assistance.

Relief funds will be gratefully received and acknowledged and forwarded promptly to Japan.

Funds may be sent to JOHN WAY, Assistant Treasurer Provident Life and Trust Co., 409 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., or to MARGARET W. HAINES, Cheltenham, Pa.

In reading THE FRIEND, dated Third Month 12, 1914, my attention was particularly attracted and held by the paragraphs in the Temperance Department, entitled "A Wholesome Example," taken from the American Issue. While not wishing to detract one slightest bit from the "Wholesome Example," it seems to me not nearly so much a surprise that A. J. Drexel Biddle, "prominent club-man of Philadelphia and founder of the Drexel Bible classes," "has not been a total abstainer through all these years," as that so many members of our own Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have not given their support to total abstinence "through all these years" where it counts in the state and nation.

Almost all of us among Friends are total abstainers, most heartily believe in temperance, and do not hesitate to say so, but fail to clinch the matter where it really counts for temperance. The lively impression made upon my mind is a renewal of a feeling of a good many years standing—and I am glad that most Friends have long ago taken the present stand of A. J. Drexel Biddle—"If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while he so offendeth." But my mind feels fairly burdened for Friends in that they have not brought "all the tithes into the storehouse." "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth." A "wholesome example," a good example, is excellent, and sometimes there is no further opportunity open to us—but are we sure that we have done our part when so great an evil has been undermining our country—have we done that which it was our privilege and opportunity to do toward clearing slippery paths for the testimony of our brothers and neighbors?

Without a thought to undervalue in any way the "Temperance Work" of Friends for many years past, and with thankfulness for the activity and interest of Friends in various localities in the liquor question for the past year or so, I have still failed to understand how we can really be regarded as faithful Friends, without taking a wider active interest—a state-wide and nation-wide interest—in this problem of as great import to our country as was slavery years ago. Do the words not come home to us: "These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone?" Is it a large proportion of the evils and inefficiency of the world come directly, and indirectly through the use of alcohol, that it seems to me we are not clear of our duty until we have paid as it were "the utmost farthing."

In these last days many people are coming round to the side of the "proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes," for one convincing reason or another—efficiency, disease, pressure of public opinion, etc.—but I wonder, in so plain a case of right or wrong, when it is a great moral issue, when it is a problem of political morality, when it is a matter of principle, why we do not stand boldly for the right, even "though the cause of evil prosper." Friends, of all people, stand on principle—have for more than two hundred years—and it has been no time to give up such stand in case of so great a moral issue as the liquor question has been for many years past, and is. It is

"The coward who stands aside,

Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified,

And the multitude make virtue of the faith they had denied."

President Lincoln, "Honest Abe," said: "I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true," and he had no faith in the "contrivances" wherewith we grope "for some middle ground between the right and wrong"; and he said, "Let us have faith that right makes might." And I wonder again why we are so anxious to be on a side that wins, or so zealous that a majority control our actions in a matter of right and wrong. No majority can ever make wrong right! Wendell Phillips said, "One on God's side, is a majority."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—A despatch of the 10th inst. from Boston says: "The proposed amendment to the Constitution, which would give women the right to vote, passed the State Senate to-day by a vote of 32 to 2, with one pair. This is the first time such an amendment has ever passed either branch of the Legislature. It now goes to the House, but before it can become a law it must be acted upon favorably by two successive Legislatures and then be accepted by the voters."

A despatch from Chicago of the 18th says: "The Boys' Court, said to be the first of its kind, was opened to-day as a branch of the municipal judicial system. The court will deal with cases of boys between 17 and 21 years of age. Its object is to keep the boys from contact with mature criminals and to give their cases sympathetic consideration. It is said that nearly 2000 boys will be tried in this court every year."

It is stated that salmon as a substitute for meat, to reduce the cost of living, is advocated by Dr. Hugh M. Smith, Federal Commissioner of Fisheries. In a statement, Doctor Smith asserts that not only is salmon cheaper than meat, but will keep indefinitely if unopened. Doctor Smith shows that one pound of canned red salmon of the best quality, costing about 16 cents, is equal in bone, muscle, blood and brain building matter to 36 cents' worth of eggs or 33 cents' worth of sirloin steak.

The State's right to tax the oil and gas leases of Oklahoma, estimated to be worth from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000, was sustained by a decision of the State Supreme Court, upholding the State Board of Equalization's valuation of the Indian Territory Illuminating Oil Company's property for the year 1911.

It is stated that there are now 38,000 domesticated reindeer in Alaska, according to a report of the U. S. Bureau of Education. More than half of them are owned by about 600 natives. The animals are worth $25 each.

It is reported from Madison, Wisconsin: "In compliance with a law passed by the last Legislature, that the eyes of all infants must be washed in silver solution to prevent blindness, the State Board of Health to-day sent 3000 packages of nitrate of silver to all physicians in the State. A recent investigation at the State school for the blind showed that at least 25 per cent. of the children would not be blind had they been properly treated at birth."

The great storm which lately passed over this neighborhood did great damage to the wires of the telegraph and telephone companies, who, it is said, have been bending every effort toward making temporary repairs as quickly as possible. The permanent work, it was said yesterday by officials of the railroad and telegraph companies, would require months for its completion.

It was stated from Harrisburg, Pa., on the 15th inst.: "The second series of winter orchard demonstrations will be started under the direction of State Economic Zoologist H. A. Surface the last week of this month. The public orchard demonstration service is said to be the most extensive and the longest established in the world. The State Bureau of Zoology gave the first demonstration of this kind in America 11 years ago, and they have been continued ever since. Reports received by Doctor Surface show that the quantity of the fruit of the State has been increasing, while the quality is vastly improved."

A despatch from Oshkosh, Wis., says: "Giving milk free of charge to children of indigent parents is an innovation practiced in the public schools of this city under the direction of Mate Kinney, teacher of health and hygiene. Last month 1349 quarts of milk were used in carrying out the plan. It is now in operation at nine of the schools and nearly 600 children are being benefited by it. From a moderate beginning in one school, the plan has met with great favor, and it will not be long before it will be put in operation at all of the ward schools. So far it has not drawn a penny from the city treasury, either directly or indirectly."

A despatch of the 15th from Washington says: "Postmaster General Burleson to-night announced a change in the parcel post regulations that, in his opinion, will be a great boon to the farmers and truckers of the country. Under the new regulation, butter, eggs, fruits, berries, vegetables, dressed poultry and other articles in parcels weighing 20 pounds up to 50 pounds, for shipment within the first and second zones—approximately 150 miles—can be packed in boxes and crates similar to those generally used when shipping these products by express. These large parcels will now be handled outside of mail bags. Packages of these articles weighing less than 20 pounds are to be required to be securely packed as heretofore, in such manner as to be safely handled in bags with other mail matter."

It is stated that the colored people of Philadelphia have one bank, which last year handled over $1,000,000; two drug stores, two hospitals, 14 building and loan associations and 15 insurance companies. They own $10,000,000 worth of real estate.

It has been recently stated that the primary elections last week gave thousands of Illinois women in small cities and villages their first chance to vote. Town after town reported by telegraph that few women voted. Leaders of the movement are expecting a much heavier vote at the spring elections, when the liquor question will be an issue.

A despatch from Chicago of the 18th says: "Registration of 60,119 women yesterday made Chicago's voting population larger than that of any other city in the United States. The total, 693,424, is greater than the registration in New York city by more than 20,000. The number of women now registered is 218,643. The number of men is 474,981."

On the 10th inst. the Alaska railway bill, providing for the construction of a $35,000,000 railway system, finally passed Congress. The bill now goes to the President. President Wilson has indicated his intention of signing the bill as soon as it reaches the White House, and tentative plans for constructing the first Government railroad have been considered by the Interior Department.

A recent despatch from Washington says: "Warning that the United States hereafter must produce enough potatoes to supply the home consumption on account of most sources of foreign imports being closed by a plant disease quarantine was issued by the Department of Agriculture to-day. The potato in Germany, it was stated, occupies a more important place than in the United States. The area there planted in potatoes is 8,165,000 acres, against 3,566,000 acres here. The average total yield is 1,653,463,000 bushels, or 202.5 bushels per acre, against 343,587,000 bushels, or 96.2 bushels per acre in the United States."

FOREIGN.—Several serious encounters have occurred lately between Villa's army and Federal troops in Mexico.

A despatch of the 16th from Tokio says: "Eighty-three persons, according to the official estimate, were killed by the earthquake which occurred yesterday in the prefecture of Akita, Island of Hondu. Eye witnesses described the flight of the inhabitants of the stricken zone. They declare that entire families were crushed to death. Great gaps appeared in the earth and every house in the towns of Omagari, Yokote and Iizume was wrecked or damaged. Five hundred persons were injured and many are missing."

It is stated that the electric lights along the Panama Canal were tested lately. This was the final step; the Canal is now ready for use. A little work remains to be done, but it need not interfere with commerce.

A despatch from Johannisthal, says: "An altitude record of 12,303 feet for a flight with three passengers was established to-day from the aerodrome here by Robert Thelen, the German aviator. The previous record for a flight in an aeroplane carrying three passengers was held by the French aviator, Garaix, who attained an altitude of 10,890 feet at Chartres.

NOTICES.

The meeting of the Educational Association announced for Third Month 27th has been cancelled. In its stead Friends are cordially invited to a CONFERENCE ON TRAINING FOR CITIZENSHIP that evening at the Philadelphia Normal School, Thirtieth and Spring Garden Streets. The meeting at 8 o'clock will be addressed by U. S. Commissioner of Education P. P. Claxton, President Joseph Swain, Supt. Brumbaugh and others.

FRANCES C. FERREIS,
Secretary.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.32, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone 114A.

WM. B. HARVEY, Superintendent.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. Sixteenth Street, Phila., will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M.—Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 27th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when they are temporarily out of school or are unduly burdened in keeping up with their classes, or have been seriously interrupted in their studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Months strengthens the health, and the children gather up the lines of their Westtown studies so that they can get an easier start for their year's work the next autumn.

Applications for admission should be made to

THOMAS K. BROWN, Principal,
Westtown, Pa.

A METHODIST'S APPRECIATION.

Several months ago there appeared in the Methodist Review, of New York City, a long paper under the title, "A Methodist View of George Fox." Recently parts of it have appeared in other periodicals, and may have come under the notice of many Friends. We doubt not most of our readers would be interested in the entire paper, and in some future issue we may be able to give it complete; it does not deal with unwholesome flattery, so that no one's taste need be offended. The thought that prompts a reference to the paper just now is to take up in order the various items alluded to in it that are critical toward Friends, and by a little self-analysis show how fair, from our standpoint of judgment, they are fair.

The writer has a warm admiration for George Fox and says of him, "The character of George Fox stands out as one of the purest and noblest with which the annals of religion make us acquainted. . . . He was a man wholly devoted to what he believed to be his God-appointed mission, and without any of those sidelong looks at worldly promotion and personal aggrandizement which many fairly sincere leaders of church parties have cast at intervals during their journey. . . . He was far in advance of his age. He it was mainly who associated philanthropy inseparably with Quakerism." Here the author cites no less than twelve distinct illustrations of Fox's steadfastness to his high ideals of practical religion working out great philanthropic reforms.

Fox and Wesley stand as types of men representing the deepest convictions concerning spiritual matters. They came upon different conditions, as the seventeenth century differed from the eighteenth century in the outlook it gave upon problems of religion. Wesley had many dealings with the Friends of his time, some of them far from pleasant both to him and to them. He found much to commend in the earnestness of their spirits, and their plain and simple living appealed to him as tokens that they placed first things first. "He called Robert Barclay's Apology, 'that solemn trifle,' and says, 'between me and the Quakers there is a great gulf fixed. The ceremonies of baptism and the Lord's supper keep us at a wide distance from each other.'"

It is but little over a century and a-half since Wesley made this statement, and while Friends are still almost alone in their steadfastness to the views which Barclay taught and which the early Friends practiced, every Methodist to-day who on this matter candid consideration admit that the Quaker view of this point is the only correct one, and that while the Christian church at large may be far from the realization of Barclay's position, it grasps more fully to-day than it did in Wesley's time the doctrine of all symbols as given in 1 Peter iii: 21, 22.

Again this stricture occurs in the essay we have under review, "Many of the practices of the Friends gave great offense to his [Wesley's] stalwart common-sense and his high church affiliations. 'A silent meeting,' he says, 'was never heard of in the church of Christ for sixteen hundred years.'" We must remember that Wesley was removed by a full century from the days of Fox, and that he knew only as we know of that great display of zeal that manifested itself at the birth of the Society; nothing could be more opposite in character, that had for its object the one and same purpose, than the Friends' meeting in which silence was a conspicuous element, and the noise and seeming confusion of a Methodist experience meeting. If John Wesley could have had added to his many scholarly attainments a fuller knowledge of early church history than his time was able to offer, he would doubtless have changed his statement and admitted that in the method of worship which prevailed among the early Christians, though much of Judaism, as was natural, survived in the new order, the element of silence, as "a reverential silent waiting for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit" was more conspicuous by its presence than by its absence.

Again, another stricture which the essayist makes can be given in his own words, "Quakerism met the hunger of its century, the seventeenth, for a genuine burning word of God, just as Methodism did that of the eighteenth, and the rise of Methodism in the eighteenth century so satisfied this longing without the needlessly offensive peculiarities of Quakerism that the ground was effectively cut from under the latter and their increase prevented. Perhaps they resented this. At least they did not profit by the general religious awakening inaugurated by the Wesleys as did other bodies of Christians."

There are many Quaker journals available to test the historic accuracy of the above-quoted statement. From the Methodist standpoint these journals, without exception, are strong in the support of this view. There is something almost pathetic in the acknowledgment of the younger Fothergill that he made great haste to the little communities of Friends in South Carolina and Georgia, that he might anticipate the arrival there of a Methodist itinerant. We know the result, and we know the result of like nature in other places.

Whoever knows anything of the second century of Quaker history, knows that it offers little to parallel the story of the seventeenth century. The Society, based on the spirit of equality in the membership that has no counterpart in history, was testing out its ability to survive. We do not mean to claim that it was actually putting itself to an experimental test, but that in the hands of a Providence not seen but felt and believed in, a greater problem in the religious advancement of the race was being wrought out than anything that Methodism embraced. It may be that this is too great a claim even to hint at; whether true or false this period of Quaker history both in England and America reflects to the advantage of those comparatively few Friends who stood firm to their convictions, and little to the great company of nominal members who found in their birth-right their chief reason for association.

Another quotation from the essay under review is this, "The first revelation that Fox had, an important one for his day, was that 'being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not enough to qualify men to be ministers of Jesus Christ.' God now showed the Quakers that being bred at Oxford was not enough to disqualify men from being chosen messengers of salvation. Fox protested most fiercely against 'a hiring clergy' as being priests of Baal. But now these were the ones in large measure that turned the people back to God." Our essayist is both unfair in his statement and illogical in his conclusions. It was not primarily the Oxford training that conferred upon Wesley and the few other college-trained men associated with him the power they held over the hearts of their listeners, it was something far more Divine, it was in fact that very spirit which George Fox had and which was irrespective of high scholarship. Where too, it is fair to ask, in the annals of early Methodism are there words of more sweet comfort, of more enduring nature, giving forth messages that are not confined to sects or times or places, but which breathe the very messages that are universal and eternal, than will be found in the writings of Isaac Pennington and William Penn, princes in their command of English among the men of their day?

Our essayist then enumerates fifteen causes for the rapid numerical decline in membership from the seventeenth to the eighteenth century; with all of these we are more or less familiar, they are matters of history and are doubtless correct.

It would not be supposed that a paper dealing with the tenets of the Society of Friends would omit all reference to the doctrine of the Inward Light. The paper here is fair in its statements. It says, "The Inward Voice, unchecked by other sources of truth, is an unsafe guide. So is the Scripture, so is the reason; so is the church. . . . The Holy Spirit is supreme, no doubt, but it works in part through the good men of old who have left us their record of revelation; in part through the general body of good men to-day who constituted the spiritual or invisible church, in part through the human reason which must sit in judgment on conflicting claims, in part through the individual soul to whom it immediately speaks." This may sound different from the oft-quoted passage from Barclay, but it is the same message. Friends have been clear in their testimony regarding the supremacy of the Inspeaking Voice and have been equally clear and emphatic as to the nature and relation of subordinate standards.

The concluding paragraphs of the essay show that the author's knowledge of existing forms and practices among Friends is too limited to make his generalizations of any value; they may be true within certain limitations, but they are far from universal.

The actual conclusion is significant and represents a condition that knows no boundary of sects, "The great task which confronts the Christianity of the twentieth century is the revitalizing of its forms, the pouring of heart power into its organization, and the exalting of the inward voice of the Spirit, which is in so much danger of being smothered by the rattle of ecclesiastical machinery. All this and more the study of Quakerism teaches." D. H. F.

ALBERT HENRY BELL.

The unexpected removal of Albert H. Bell, of Waterford, will be felt increasingly by not a few as a personal loss. Our Friend passed away at Brighton, where he and his wife were staying, at the early age of not quite forty-eight years, on the fourth of [Eleventh Month], 1912. He had been obliged to seek refreshment at the seaside, visiting Weymouth and Torquay before coming to Brighton, but none anticipated the approaching close of earthly conflict and labor. We can only bow in silence before the majesty and mystery of the dealings of God.

Surrounded by holy influences in the gentle Quaker home of his childhood, Albert Bell came early under the quickening visitations of the Divine Spirit, and yielded his heart to the heavenly love which had thus drawn near to take possession of his life. As a young man, he, with his brothers, became active in the family business founded by his father, Henry Bell. It must have been about 1886 when he felt it right to adopt the plain dress and the plain language as an expression of his solid conviction that the path of life discovered by the early Quakers was the one for him also to walk in. This conviction, in spite of his wide sympathies, including the Salvation Army, he never swerved from, though it may be said to have distinguished him from every other young man in the Society in Ireland.

Some time after, in 1892, he came under a powerful concern to do something for the poor of his native town. He opened a dining-room for the very poorest where, for the price of one penny, well-cooked food could be obtained, and he succeeded in making the business pay for itself. He aimed at providing the best possible. Soon after, he started lodging-houses also, providing in all some eighty beds, generally occupied, and also self-supporting. His ideas were published in print:—

"How to start a dining-room, soup kitchen, or coffee stand for the working classes;" and "How to manage a lodging-house."

He gave an illuminating address on this subject during the Yearly Meeting at Dublin. The pamphlets were much appreciated, the Countess of Aberdeen ordering forty copies only a few days before his death. These ideas have since been successfully adopted in Dublin.

Albert Bell could not have accomplished what he did if he had not been a man of leisure, handing over the active interest in the business to his brothers, and giving himself wholeheartedly to his labor of love. He traveled from time to time on religious service, in Ireland, Scotland and England. He was always a cheerful traveling companion. His spoken ministry was frequently directed to the young and inexperienced; though when he addressed those of riper experience, his communications, invariably proceeding from much exercise, were always worthy of consideration. His chief concern was the need of a more frequent assembling for reverent and solemn waiting upon God, feeling that one meeting for worship in the course of seven days was not enough to maintain the spiritual life of a church in freshness and power. His concern in this direction was also sent forth in the form of a printed letter.

The mortal part of our Friend was laid to rest in the Friends' Burial Ground, Newtown, Waterford, in that simplicity he loved to exemplify. The streets were lined with the sorrowing poor, whose unostentatious benefactor he had been. A large company gathered at the grave site, including prominent clergy of the Church of Ireland, and many Roman Catholics. The latter listened with marked respect to the words of Gospel truth which were proclaimed in their hearing by various Friends.

Many will miss him, and will always remember him with gratitude to God from whom every good and perfect gift proceeds, for the example of a life the affections of which were in such large measure set on things above, and not on things on the earth.—From the Annual Monitor.

OUR Lord hunteth for our love more ways than one or two.
—S. RUTHERFORD.

[It is proposed from time to time to give space in THE FRIEND for reports, etc., from the Friends' Peace Association; at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Association we publish at the following brief sketch of Samuel B. Capen, whose death occurred on the twenty-ninth of last First Month; among the many interests that received his support, he placed the cause of peace in the forefront and in its service he was working at the time of his death.—Ed.]

SAMUEL B. CAPEN.

In the sudden death at Shanghai, China, of Samuel B. Capen, president of the Massachusetts Peace Society and a representative director of The American Peace Society, the peace cause, as well as every Christian philanthropic movement, has sustained a great loss. Few, if any, Christian laymen in this country have been so widely identified with all good causes, and his executive ability, his versatility and devotion were always in demand.

The bare mention of some of the positions which he held will serve to show his many-sided nature. For seventeen years he was president of the Congregational Sunday School and Publishing Society; in 1860 he was made president of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and for years was an active director of the American Congregational Association, the Boston City Missionary Society, and the United Society of Christian Endeavor. He was one of the organizers of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and was chairman of its executive committee, besides taking an active part in the Men and Religion Movement. A few years ago he retired from active business and devoted his entire time to these causes. The Boston Indian Citizenship Committee and the North American Civic League for Immigrants also claimed a share of his attention. In municipal reform he was most useful, organizing about twenty years ago the Boston Municipal League, of which he was president. At about the same time he was a member of the Boston School Committee. Since 1905 he held the office of president of the Board of Trustees of Wellesley College. His business experience as a member of the firm of Torrey, Bright & Capen for a half century made him a most valued member of the Boston Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants' Association.

From the beginning of the Mohonk Arbitration Conferences he was an interested attendee, and in 1860, at the second conference, was appointed a member of the business committee, on which he served every year he attended, acting several times as its chairman, and reporting to the conference the declarations prepared by the committee. In 1904 the Boston Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants' Association appointed him their representative at Mohonk, and in an address on "Business Men and Peace" he told of the formation by the Boston chamber of a Permanent Committee on International Arbitration. He attended the First and Second American Conferences on International Arbitration at Washington in 1896 and 1904, besides many of the national and local peace conferences. For years Samuel Capen was a vice-president of the American Peace Society, and after Edward Everett Hale's death acted as the first vice-president, his signature appearing on life-membership certificates with those of the president and secretary. When the society removed to Washington in 1911, he was made president of the newly organized Massachusetts Peace Society, and became the next year its representative on the Board of Directors. The World Peace Foundation also made him one of its trustees, and on the missionary tour around the world, during which death overtook him, he was its representative, delivering peace addresses in many Oriental cities. A strong article by him on "Foreign Missions and World Peace" is published by the Foundation in pamphlet form. He was also a member of the Commission on Peace and Arbitration of the Federal Council of Churches, and he had been chosen one of the trustees of the new Church Peace Union.

Thus the world over, in missionary, educational, peace, and municipal circles, his winning, inspiring, and hopeful personality will be deeply missed. He was a noble and capable Christian citizen, whose last authority was that of a seafaring man well exemplified in his own life. He kept his nation true to the high ideal of peace, but he was not alone, but to uplift the world.

By SAMUEL A. COLE.

PATROLING THE ATLANTIC.

As we frequently lament the expenditure of millions of dollars by the National government in the construction of war vessels or engines of destruction, it is refreshing to read in the following article in the Courier and Inquirer that some of the money are being expended by the Government to save life as well as to destroy it. —JOSIAH WELLS.

Life and property require to be safeguarded on sea as fully as, if not more than, on land. For this purpose the ocean patrol has come into being. On the waste of waters there is ever a danger which taxes the best of human skill, foresight and carefulness to combat it. At a certain period of the year the danger of the deep increases, and, therefore, emphatic measures have been taken to escape it. This most dangerous time of the year is that in which the icebergs occur, when great masses break away from the parent glaciers in the north to float down in their frozen might into the lanes of travel traversed by the steamships plying between European and American ports. This period of utmost danger generally lasts from the beginning of [Third Month] to the last of [Seventh Month]. In some years the ice drift begins as early as [Second Month] and by [Third Month] some of the bergs are so far south as to get in the way of the northerly course of vessels entering Canadian and New England ports.

As the season advances the floating masses get in the main track of the big liners and it is then that the greatest danger is to be apprehended. To avoid them as much as possible the principal companies engaged in North Atlantic transportation between the ports of New York, Boston, Fastnet and Bishop's Rock direct their captains to take the most southerly course.

This southerly course, as it is termed, which is pursued during the spring and summer months, takes the vessels across the fiftieth degree of longitude (the region of danger) in latitude 41 degrees 30 minutes on the westbound passage and in latitude 40 degrees 30 minutes on the eastbound passage. Yet icebergs of immense size are frequently encountered on this track. The ill-fated Titanic was on the southerly course when she struck the berg that sent her down to the Atlantic graveyard. Many a stately bark which left the home port in high hope has come to grief in this dreaded section of the North Atlantic.

It was the appalling catastrophe of the Titanic that woke the nations to the fact that no ship, however staunch, is immune from accident, and that the problem of elemental danger still remained unsolved. The Titanic was thought to be practically unsinkable. Proudly she steamed along on her maiden trip, defying winds and waves, a floating palace full of life and light, when lo! out of the darkness of night rolled the grim sea monster which sent her to her doom. The news of her fate shocked the civilized world. The boasted science and skill of man were baffled, beaten, sunk beneath the waves by the might of the ice king.

Then it was that thought was taken, not how to overcome, but how to avoid this irresistible power in the future. Our Navy Department, in the interest of life and property at sea, set aside two cruisers for patrol duty; that is, to scour the steamship track for icebergs and give warning of their location and approach. The U. S. S. Birmingham and the U. S. S. Chester were assigned to this service. When icebergs were located their location was reported by wireless.

This year precautions have been taken early in the season to safeguard transatlantic travel. The Seneca has been dispatched to the ice-fields. The cutter left Tompkinsville, Staten Island, N. Y., on the fifteenth of [Second Month] for her five months' cruise. The experienced Capt. Johnston is in command. The Seneca is the only vessel that has been detailed for the service this year, but when the ice has moved southward so as to make a constant patrol necessary, an additional vessel will be sent out for the purpose, probably the Miami.

There has been a report that some of the big companies were to put on patrol boats of their own to supplement the government service, but as yet none of them has taken the initiative, although some of them have adopted the scheme of motor-boat scouts to circumvent ice perils in the North Atlantic. The new Allan liners Asiatian and Calgarian are the first vessels to be equipped in this way. On their next voyage each will carry two motor boats fitted with thirty-horsepower motors, and with wireless apparatus for signaling. During foggy weather these ice scouts will be sent ahead to report danger. It is said that the Cunard Company has also arranged for motor-boat scouts and that the new Aquitania will carry four of such craft to give warning of danger. The recent international conference for safety at sea had under consideration the whole subject of sea patrols.—The Christian Herald.

[WALTER T. MOORE in reading to the boys at Westtown from Trevelyan's Life of John Bright, recently, prefaced his selections with the following:—Eps.]

Anyone who has at heart the best welfare of Westtown must needs be deeply impressed with the importance of those things which touch the formation of character and which nourish the higher life of all who come within the range of its influence.

By reason of certain distinguishing features, Westtown occupies a unique position, and exerts a wide influence for good, which is not confined to the Society of Friends alone.

In the first place, it aims to create an atmosphere which gives rise to a seriousness of purpose and which stimulates the growth of a real religious experience. In conjunction with this vital concern, it also strives, by means of a well-planned system of instruction, to develop those functions of the mind and body which fit one for the duties of life. In dealing with the necessary changes which every human institution must undergo, Westtown should not forget or forsake the hidden and unfailing source of its strength and its blessings.

The life of the Christian, in some of its aspects, is one of warfare, and all of us—old and young alike—must assume the duties and responsibilities which it imposes upon us. As the weapons of this warfare are essentially spiritual, we want to sharpen our spiritual insight and to acquire a clear sense of proportion as between things spiritual and things temporal. For the things which are seen are temporal but the things which are not seen are eternal. There is a common and well-defined conviction among many thoughtful persons that the civilization of recent generations has produced evils which may work destruction unless remedies are applied; that we, as a people, have drifted into dangerous waters and must retrace and redirect our course into safer channels.

As evidence of this feeling of unrest, voices are heard from many sides, calling us back to the Bible, back to Christ Himself, and back to the country which is His handiwork. Do not let us who are children of the Light be covered with confusion. For the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. It is only by placing our dependence upon the Rock of Ages that we can hope as individuals or as a nation to resist the currents and counter-currents which otherwise carry us irresistibly to material things and may even sweep us off our feet before we realize the perils that confront us. This is no new doctrine, and it has always been proclaimed in this place. The Saviour declares: "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them," again, "be ye doers of the word and not hearers only."

Therefore in the multitude of activities which arise before us, it is highly important to wisely discriminate and put first things first. There is little danger in people forgetting to make money and to follow their occupations with energy and with skill. But the real danger lies in pursuing these objects to the exclusion of larger ends and deeper interests.

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness." This with others seems to be a hard saying. It is to be hoped that while here in your formative years you may be favored to apprehend the significance of these words and the truth that lies behind them. For they are spirit and they are life. The issues of our lives depend upon what we regard as first. In this connection, how true and searching are the words, "Where thy treasure is, there will thy heart be also." In building up and molding character to the pattern of highest ideals, there is nothing more constructive and better calculated to quicken the best impulses than to study the careers of those who in their measure have been humble and sincere followers of Christ—not vocal ministers necessarily but living epistles known and read of all men—in the world of action but not of it—who have achieved success in the highest form and withal have extended the kingdom by obedience to religious convictions. Such are they who have fought the good fight, finished the course and won the crown even against strong opposition and manifold difficulties.

Men and women of this type are the salt of the earth and worthy of our reverence and our emulation. They are the saving remnant which give character and strength to any community or group and who in times of danger are valiant for the truth, pointing and leading others into the ways of righteousness. It seems to me that we can ascribe such a position to John Bright, of England, and my purpose is to invite your attention to his life and work by reading a few passages from a book recently written by George Macaulay Trevelyan.

MEETINGS OF THE MEDIA READING CIRCLE DURING THE WINTER.

The first meeting of the Media Reading Circle for the winter of 1913-14 was addressed by Daniel Oliver, who spoke on the life of a missionary in Syria. His talk about the strenuous existence of the Christian worker in the East was full of inspiration and courage to those of us who live comfortably at home. He told of efforts to pacify hostile villages, of repeated trips in vain from one group to the other, and of the joy in a final reconciliation coming after months of hard work. The beatitude, "Blessed are the Peacemakers," had, he said, an immediate personal meaning to a man working under conditions like these. Of the medical situation in this Eastern country he spoke most forcibly. Even people of the better classes have so little conception of what to do in sickness that the unnecessary pain which they undergo with the greatest stoicism wrings the foreigner's heart. Daniel Oliver told, for instance, of a laborer who ignorantly insisted on pulling down a wall from the bottom and was injured by the falling stones as the upper parts collapsed. Though both legs were broken he declined to be treated until a day had elapsed and the limbs were swollen almost beyond recognition. Finally, the injured man was carried several miles down one side of a steep ravine, across a stream, and up the other slope to the hospital, undergoing extreme pain with every jolt. Had this hospital not been in operation a valuable life would have been lost. We learned with sympathy that the institution must be closed unless money can be raised for its remodeling. No wonder that with such memories of human pain and trouble, Daniel Oliver longs to demonstrate to these people through the new building for which he is now collecting money, that the love of Christ is freely manifested by His followers to their brethren of other religions everywhere.

By invitation the Circle met one evening at the Elwyn Training School. Joseph Elkinton kindly arranged it that the officers and the many caretakers, closely confined by their duties, might be present. The views showed the Panama Canal Zone and points of interest en route. Some two hundred of the more intelligent children were present and gave close attention to the lecture.

One evening in Twelfth Month, 1913, the Library Committee, as usual, entertained the Circle with reports of the year's work, etc.

Early in the new year a Tea Meeting was held, when Isaac Sharpless gave a very interesting account of his experiences in St. Petersburg, of the journey across Siberia and of his visit in Japan. At a special meeting in Tokyo of a number of leading men and diplomats he heard their views in regard to the recent Japanese immigration laws, and appreciated, from their view-point, the keen injustice of our treatment towards them. He spoke especially of the peace movement started by Gilbert Bowles, and of the good work being done by other missionaries in schools, especially for girls.

Dr. Frances Baker, of Media, who made the difficult trip to Labrador last summer, entertained the Circle with a lively account of her experiences in Dr. Grenfell's country. While at St. Anthony she boarded with the family of the skipper who used to run the Stratbeona, and so had a chance to see the life of the people as it really is. The daily fare was scanty. For breakfast, as she cleverly put it, they had tea and fish and bread; for dinner, fish and bread and tea; and for supper, bread and tea and fish, with, of course, a few variations. Though the life of the natives is rough, they seemed to the visitor a brave and generous people, who appreciate the work that is being done for them by their devoted medical missionary, and Dr. Baker said she had never seen better surgery, even in our great American cities, than she saw Dr. Grenfell perform in his little hospital in the far North.

One evening, Charles E. Gause entertained the Reading Circle in a very interesting manner by taking the company to Mt. Auburn, that beautiful spot where so many of our great men, poets and statesmen are laid. Standing as it were by the poets' graves he recited to us portions of touching poems, and vividly described interesting places he had visited in his travels, made memorable by lively incidents and anecdotes in the lives and writings of many great worthies that lie now in Mt. Auburn cemetery.

Albert Votaw recently gave a talk on prison conditions in Pennsylvania.

At one meeting we were entertained by Ethel de Long, a Columbia college woman, now living among and starting a school for the neglected, isolated white children far back in the Kentucky mountains. She told most convincingly of the great need of educational opportunities there. Her whole heart is in the work. She is soliciting funds to erect buildings for this Pine Mountain Settlement School to be built on 130 acres of land donated by an aged, big-hearted man, William Creech, whose whole life has been spent in these Kentucky mountains. For thirty years he has wanted such a school. He says in his own words, "I have put almost all I have into the building of the new school, hoping that the school would be a benefit to my grandchildren and all the community around me so that I may spend my last days in a quiet, moral and peaceable country, made better for the yet unborn children of this country." Anne G. Walton, of Media, kindly consented to forward funds given for this worthy cause.

BE STILL.

Be still! Just now be still,

Something thy soul hath never heard,

Something unknown to any song of bird.

Something unknown to any wind, or wave, or star,

A message from the Fatherland afar.

That sweet joy the homeseek soul shall thrill,

Come to thee if thou canst but be still.

Be still! Just now be still.

There comes a Presence very mild and sweet,

White are the sandals on His noiseless feet.

It is the Comforter whom Jesus sent

To teach thee what the words He uttered meant.

The willing, waiting spirit doth He fill.

If thou wouldst bear His message,

Dear soul, be still.

THE QUAKER MISSION AMONG THE INDIANS OF NEW YORK STATE.

BY DR. TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The History of Cattaraugus County published in 1879 contains the following: "At one time, particularly in the winter of 1703-04, and the spring and summer of the latter years the few settlers who had penetrated west of Canandaigua became alarmed in view of the threatening and unprovoked demonstrations of hostility on the part of the Senecas. These Indians were displeased at the near proximity of the whites; they complained that they had been cheated in 1654-55 in the sale of their lands in the treaty of 1788. They had not yet lost the feeling of exasperation produced by the crushing defeat and punishment administered to them by General Sullivan in 1790.

"In this crisis a general Council of Indians was convoked by the Government of the United States, and held at Canandaigua in the autumn of 1794, before Timothy Pickering as Commissioner on the part of the United States. Four Friends, representatives of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, were present in behalf of the Indians.

"On their way to this council, some of the Indians told the settlers that on their return, if their grievances had not been adjusted they would be redressed by the scalping-knife. But the deliberations of the council progressed favorably, and on the eleventh of November a treaty was concluded, by which the United States ratified and confirmed the several treaties that had been made by the State of New York; and goods to the amount of $10,000 were delivered to the Indians, besides making an addition of three thousand dollars to their annuity of $1500, previously allowed.

"The result of this convention conciliated the Senecas so that they never afterwards gave serious trouble to the settlers west of the Genesee River."

One of the Friends attending this Council, William Savery, records a visit from Sagarassa or the Sword-carrier, who appeared to be a thoughtful man and expressed the desire that some young men from the Society of Friends would come among them as teachers, school-masters and mechanics. This request was laid before the Yearly Meeting, sitting in Philadelphia the following year, and a committee of forty-three Friends was appointed to establish a permanent mission in New York State, as well as to raise a fund to carry on that mission.

In passing, it should be noted that Friends have always been careful not to supply the Indians with strong drink. As early as 1687 they testified against the practice of "selling rum or other strong liquors to the Indians, directly or indirectly, or exchanging the same for any goods or merchandize with them (considering the abuse they make of it) as a thing displeasing to the Lord, a dishonor to the Truth and a grief to all good people."

A Mohegan chief, Hendrick Aupaumut, appealed to Friends in Philadelphia in 1704 to assist his people settled with remnants of the Brotherton and Tuscarora tribes on the Oneida Reservation. The Friends responded by settling among them, although the Oneidas remained in a very uncivilized state. Some practical questions were addressed to all the Indians in New York State as to their willingness to be taught to read and write and to cultivate their lands. They also had a very satisfactory interview with President Washington, who entered into their efforts sympathetically, and referred them to Timothy Pickering, then Secretary of State, to whom was entrusted the management of Indian Affairs. He wrote to the Six Nations, under date of Second Month 15, 1760:

"Now, brothers, I have the great pleasure to inform you that your good friends, the Quakers, have formed a wise plan to show your young men and boys the most useful practices of the white people. They will choose some prudent, good men to instruct them. These good men will do this only for the love they bear to your fellow-men as children of the Great Spirit whom they desire to please, and who will be pleased with the good they do to you.

"The Quakers and the good men they employ will ask nothing of you—neither land nor money, nor skins nor furs, for all the good they render to you; they request only your consent and the attention of the young men and boys to learn what will be so useful.

"Brothers, if this first attempt succeeds, the way will be opened in which your people may learn other useful practices of the white people, so as to enable them to supply all their wants, and such as choose it may learn to read and write.

"Having thus explained to you the plan of your friends, the Quakers, I conclude with heartily recommending it to your adoption, as better calculated to procure lasting and essential benefits to your Nation than any plan ever before attempted. Wishing it great success,

I remain your friend and brother,

(Signed)

TIMOTHY PICKERING."

Six Friends set out in the early summer of 1796 to visit the different tribes in the wilderness parts of New York, three of whom remained in Madison County, and on the Oneida Reservation, to instruct them in the arts of civilization. Two years later these pioneer missionaries were joined by three others, but it was thought best to close this mission in 1799, and, as some Indians could not understand why anyone could be so interested in them without asking some compensation, Friends distributed their equipment among them and removed to labor among the Senecas. In 1797, members of the Oneida, Stockbridge and Tuscarora tribes requested Friends to place some of the Indian girls among their own families near Philadelphia, and this was done to mutual satisfaction. Two Friends, Henry Simmons and Joseph Clark, brought them to Philadelphia, and the latter, four years later, accompanied three of these Indian girls back to their homes. He says, in an account of this journey, "On my arrival at Stockbridge and delivering up the girls, I could discover no less joy manifested among the whole nation than by their parents." Three other girls had returned previously very much improved. A Council was called and Joseph Clark told these Indians "that it was neither curiosity, ease nor interest that induced him to leave his habitation, but that their children whom they delivered to him four years ago, might be safely returned to them, with their qualifications and improvements. And as the Great and Good Spirit had preserved them from various evils, so he hoped they would continue to do well." Each girl had a Bible and other religious books in which they could read; also, a spinning wheel, with abundance of clothing of their own making.

In the spring of 1798 three young men, Joel Swayne, Henry Simmons and Halliday Jackson, accompanied by Joshua Sharpless and John Pierce, went by way of Pittsburgh, the mouth of Oil Creek and Warren, Pa., to start a mission station at an old Indian settlement called Ganesanguta, now known as Old Town, on the Allegheny River, about five miles from the State line—the first settlement made by white men within Cattaraugus County. They held a Council with thirty or forty Indians, at which six women were present. This was in the Corn Planter settlement, and the following address was interpreted to them:—

"To Corn Planter and all our Indian brothers of the Seneca Nation, now living on the Allegheny River.

"Brothers, We have now been several days among you, and have had counsel with your chiefs and wise men, and have looked about your country, and have agreed upon a place for our young men to begin work. We are glad and thankful to the Great Spirit that everything we have proposed for your good has been so agreeable to your minds, that we seem to agree like brothers, having but one mind in everything that we do.

"Brothers, if you are industrious this summer, and raise a good deal of corn and some wheat, we will help you to build a good mill next summer, if a suitable place can be found for it. You must find half the money to build the mill, and we will find the other half. . . . We are also willing to encourage you to learn farming by giving some small premiums to our Indian brothers who are industrious and raise a good deal of grain—to every Indian man living on this river who shall raise twenty-five bushels of wheat or rye in one year on his own land, not worked by white people, the sum of two dollars. And a like sum for fifty bushels of corn, raised in like manner; or fifty bushels of potatoes; or two tons of hay, not mown or drawn by white people, but put in stack or barn; or for every twelve yards of linen cloth, made by an Indian woman, out of flax raised on her husband's land, and spun in her own house, to be paid to the woman; or for twelve yards of woolen or linsey cloth, made by an Indian woman, out of the wool of her own or her husband's sheep and spun in her own house, to be paid to the woman.

"Brothers, we will give you these premiums for four years—if our young men stay here so long—upon these conditions: that the person who applies for a premium must produce a certificate from two of the chiefs, signifying the quantity of grain, cloth, etc., for which the premium is intended or demanded, and that it was raised or made in the manner above mentioned, and that the person has not been intoxicated with whiskey at least for the term of six months before that period."

WHEN SUMMER IS OVER.

When summer is over I sit at the window,
And gaze in the twilight across the dim lea,
And watch the last shadows that fly to the southward,
Away o'er the ocean from winter and me;
And breezes of evening come in through the easement,
And bring me the breath of the far-off salt sea.

When summer is over and hid are the sunbeams,
And gray clouds have covered the rose-tinted west,
There comes from the meadows, the green dewy meadows,
A soft drowsy murmur when all sinks to rest;
And then there is silence, for nature is sleeping,
Deep down in the valley and on the hill crest.

When summer is over and reaped are the cornfields,
And home has been driven the last creaking wain,
And the fruit has been picked from the apple tree branches,
And the leaves are all changing in woodland and lane,
I think of the beauty the summer has brought us,
And the beauty next summer will bring us again.

—PHYLLIS SARGENT, 11 Years Old.

THREE SMALL IMMIGRANTS.—A number of years ago, before the voices of any of Our Younger Friends had begun to gladden their homes, a boy whom we shall call Joseph, for that was one of his names, though not the one he was known by, found himself one summer, in company with an older friend, on a small farm in southeastern France. The people who owned and occupied the farm had, like many of their neighbors, a horse and several goats, but no cow, a half dozen cats, but no dog, and a score of rabbits, but no chickens. Of these animals the most interesting to Joseph were the rabbits. They lived in a little cave that had been dug in the earth along the lane where, to make room for a driveway, the bank had been cut down straight. A wire door shut them in and enemies out, and the bunnies were so tame or timid or contented as never to burrow under their entrance. Having no cow, the family had to depend upon goats' milk, which by the way, makes the best "slip-and-go-down" in the world; and having no fowls, they could never, as farmer folk say, kill a chicken and make out; they had to fall back on rabbit meat. Of course this was what the rabbits were kept for, but when a rabbit was needed the farmer's wife never chose one of a certain three, because in the first place they were too young for the table and in the second because she had made Joseph a present of them. In all the warren these were the bunnies he had from the first most admired, and as they came to seem closer to him as pets the idea of leaving them behind at the end of his visit was too disquieting to be entertained, he determined to take them home. This the older friend agreed to, provided Joseph would take full charge of them.

Before it came time to leave, the bunnies had grown so much that it took a basket of considerable size to hold them. The basket was provided with a lid and with a zinc pan fitted only part way down and left room under itself for the bunnies' food. Then came the morning of departure. Leon, the farm boy, wheeled out to the end of the lane the visitors' trunk and basket. After him came all the family to say farewell, and right sorry were Joseph and his friend to say it. Up rolled the diligence, big and lumbering. The driver pulled up his horses, the postboy jumped down and set a ladder against the stage-coach, the baggage was lifted to the top, and the travelers climbed into a high seat over the driver. "Be careful of the basket," said the farmer to the postboy, "it has rabbits in it."

Between this leaving of their native land and reaching a home in America, Pete, Sal and Lizzie, for these were the names Joseph called them by instead of the pretty French names they deserved, had to go through Switzerland, Germany and Belgium and then take passage for New York. To live most of this time in a hamper, packed almost as close together as loaves of bread in a pan, was very different from being able to hop about in the little cavern. Every evening, however, when the chambermaid at the hotel where they happened to be staying, had been in to turn down the bed and on leaving had politely said "good-night," Joseph let the bunnies out, as the poet Cowper used to do, for a frisk around the room. Then at bed-time he made a three-sided pen by putting the trunk with its lid up across a corner of the room. This did fairly well. Now and then one of the three would get out and sleep somewhere else, not a bit more comfortably than in the pen, yet in the main Joseph found managing his fellow-travelers not at all hard. In railroad cars he used to put the basket into the baggage rack, not only to get it out of the way, but, if the truth must be told, to get the smell as far away as he could from peoples' noses. Once some old ladies were startled by a loud drumming in the compartment. They looked anxiously about but saw nothing amiss and never knew that it were merely Pete scratching his ear and incidently beating on the zinc pan.

When travel had continued long enough to wear out the rabbits' patience they seemed to conclude that it was silly to stay crowded in that basket when only a few strands of willow stood between them and freedom; so when Joseph and his friends went out one morning to visit the Rhone Glacier three pairs of teeth set to work on those prison bars, and three young scamps soon began to crouch wherever they pleased. Presently a maid came in to make the bed. In the midst of her work she heard a scratching under the bureau; then something hopped by her feet. In a fright she ran down stairs and said that in No. 13 there were rats running about as big as cats. After this the basket had to be lined with wire-grating and still later when the handle gave out and Joseph had to carry the hamper on his shoulder it was necessary to secure the lid with a shawlsrap.

Not until he reached the steamer did Joseph tire of his bargain. Having no third companion in a pretty large stateroom, he put his little family, together with a bag of cabbage and carrots, into the space under the lounge. But one is apt to be sensitive to bad smells on shipboard, and so caring for the rabbits very soon turned Joseph's stomach. Even had such not been the case, some other disposition of them would have been necessary because the steward found the stowaways and said it was against the rules to keep pets in staterooms. To do this Joseph was extremely willing. The butcher put them into a barrel and said that Joseph might come every day to see them. The steward not only cleared the stateroom, he reported the matter to the purser, who came to say that

Joseph must pay ten dollar for the bunnies ticket, but no doubt this was a proper charge, but on it being reported that Joseph and his friend were traveling free and that the president of the company would certainly be willing to include three rabbits in the pass, the purser consented to take no charge before reaching New York. Natural, none ever made, and so the little deadheads traveled four thousand miles without so much as saying thank you.

Animals, dogs, horses, cows, perhaps rabbits, can't get seasick. Whether in this case it was seasickness or something affected the rabbits' hair on the voyage. Before the time they got to land, though fat as ever and still scruffy about their ears, they were a ragged crew, their fur worn off in patches and their coats mused and dirty. Still they came round after a few weeks in the city pen that was built for them and were the pride of Joseph and his friends.

Then something happened that again changed the destiny of Pete, Sal and Lizzie. Near Joseph's home lived some boys who could look in through the gate and see the rabbits, but were not satisfied with looking. Probably it was the little creatures' market value, not their beauty, that attracted the lads. At any rate Pete and his lady friends went off one night and did not come back for breakfast. Joseph and his brethren were indignant. However, by keeping still they heard first a whisper, then louder talk about some rabbits that were living in a back street, until it was fully ascertained where and whose the visitors were. Then, whether rightly or wrongly, taking the law into his own hands, Joseph organized a band of his chums, made a raid on the place in the back street, captured the spoil and brought it home. But it was plainly unsafe to keep this small menagerie in town. A large pen was accordingly built at the farm in Maryland that belonged to Joseph's father, and there for a number of months the little French immigrants took up their home. Our Younger Friends know what is said of American air, that breathing it you breathe in the spirit of liberty. Can it be the same with rabbits? Whatever it was, Pete, Sal and Lizzie became very independent in Maryland. Why stay in a cage when fields and woods lay all about? With axe I suppose they grew wise and knew what to do. At any rate there came to be a little tunnel under the wire fence surrounding them. Three cotton-tails disappeared into the forest. Into the forest they disappeared and were never seen again, unless—and how I wish we could know whether this was the case!—unless by and by they formed a nice rabbit stew for somebody.

WHEN I HAVE TIME.

When I have time, so many things I'll do
To make life happier and more free
For those whose lives are crowded now with care;
I'll help to lift them from their low despair.
When I have time.

When I have time, the friend I love so well
Shall know no more the many toiling well,
I'll lead her foot in pleasant paths always,
And cheer her heart with words of sweetest praise.
When I have time.

When you have time, the friend you hold so dear
May be beyond the reach of all your sweet intent,
May not know that you so kindly meant
To fill her life with sweet content.
When you had time.

Now is the time. Ah, friend, no longer wait
To scatter loving smiles and words, or cheer,
To those around whose lives are now so dear,
That may not meet you in the coming year.
Now is the time.

EUGENICS.

The chart before him lay, wherein to see—

Defeat and failure as his ancestry,
Weakness and pain as his heredity.
He bowed his head in bitter agony
Feeling himself unworthy atterly.
Then light, through black despair,
Shone piercingly.

"They have forgot my brother," whispered he,
"Jesus, Who died for others on the tree,
And my great Father God, who strengthen me."

NEWS ITEMS.

EDWARD GRUBB has forwarded a reprint of his articles on Separations, their causes and effects. It is a shilling book in paper cover printed by Headley Brothers. Many would gladly forget so far as possible the heart burnings of times of disunion. The true perspective of history, however, and a capacity to judge and to serve the present require a candid treatment of these difficult subjects. Edward Grubb has written plainly and his little book strikes one as a real contribution.

GEORGE SYKES and family (wife and two children) of Birmingham, England, are expecting to attend Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. After that they will travel to the Pacific coast by the central route and return by the Canadian Pacific. George Sykes is a son of Thomas Sykes, who was Daniel Pickard's companion in this country.

DOUGLAS ALLEN, a Friend, was last week sentenced by the Melbourne magistrates to twenty days' confinement in a fortress for refusal to drill.—The Friend (London).

The following item from a report of the recent Free Church Council at Norwich (England) will interest a number of our readers: Herbert G. Wood, in his paper on the Holy Spirit, said that practically the coming of the Spirit meant enthusiasm—the God-filled life. It meant a certain glow and exaltation of feeling, a sense of vitality, power, a sense of reality in the things of God. As illustrations of its manifest working, he instanced the Welsh Revival and movements for the deepening of spiritual life, in which we sought to realize the Holy Spirit as the spirit of personal holiness, and to raise our daily life to the level of our prayers. Pre-eminently these are the gifts of the Spirit, the signs of His presence—enthusiasm and power, a vivid apprehension of things unseen, a genuine personal consecration. With these gifts we are sure God is with us; without them we waver and doubt.—The Friend (London).

JOHN FIRTH FRYER, for many years headmaster of Bootham School, York, England, died at Leeds on the twenty-eighth of Second Month. "Throughout his headmastership it was his earnest desire that the boys in his charge should develop strong and noble characters, and should become fitted to take their right share in the life of the church and of the state."

FROM EXCHANGES.

INDIFFERENCE of conscience is ever a dangerous moral and spiritual indication. It is one of the worst indications of our times. It is often taken as a sign of advancement. People consider that they have come to regard lightly some things because they are more enlightened. Such is the feeling of some about irreverence. Things which once shocked and offended them they now take with indifference. So, too, some reach the same condition with regard to wrongdoing. But all this is indifference, and it is deadly. The conscience will not always sleep. It will awake and accuse and condemn. . . . Repentance and forgiveness are our only escape from this dread end.—The Proslightman.

We must not forget in these strenuous times that the Lord has appointed prayer as the means by which and through which Divine blessings of a spiritual nature are secured. The Lord bids us pray. He encourages us to pray. He has given directions how to pray. He has assured us that earnest, persistent prayer will be answered. He has given us examples of praying men who received answers to their petitions.—The Free Methodist.

CONCLUSION of address on "Silence," by Ora Carrol, at Hartford Theological Seminary:—

In closing, I would like to sum up the value of silence in worship as it has been experienced by different congregations of people. Times of silence give every individual the opportunity for personal participation in worship. They also tend to place the responsibility of the meeting on every individual. They result in community of prayer and community of worship. They give God an opportunity to speak. Early in the meeting, a true time of silence generates power for all that is to follow because the worshippers come into contact with the Divine power. Late in the meeting, a time of silence affords the opportunity to fix what has been said and to make personal consecration to whatever call God has given for service, as was true, for example, in the case of the Student Volunteer Convention.

Thus a period of silence when it grows naturally out of the meeting, forms the very climax of the worship, for it is then that the soul meets God, catches a new vision of Jesus Christ, and so is prepared for a more effective service.—The American Friend.

The future church—even the religious life itself will depend upon the religious training of the present. At a time when there is an awakening among our young people, the church itself cannot afford to delay the study of the problems of its children, who need to be trained, not only in the home and in the school, but in the church itself, in those principles that develop the spiritual life and fit our youth for the responsibilities of the religious world.—The American Friend.

The travelers to Zion are not Pharisees, but pilgrims, doing all the good they can on their way. The last thing they desire is to make a show in the world. The price of the rich dress, the costly ornament, would make a widow's heart sing for joy. We are strangers not to God, but with God as we pass through and along the good way which leads to eternal life. Glory be to God! You who have found the way, walk ye in it, and ye shall find rest to your souls.—Episcopal Recorder.

Is it a sufficient motive for the establishment of hospitals and the raising of great sums for the display of skill simply that the body of man should be freed from suffering? Is it enough that we stop at the healing of the body? Is not every hospital in the nature of the case by reason of its birth-right an evidence to all the world of kinship with the Divine Father? If no hospitals are to be found except under the influence of Christianity does not every hospital become a testimony to the power of Christianity and are not those who minister in the hospital, physicians, nurses, managers and trustees, using the physical in order to call attention to the great spiritual values of life? This may not always be consciously done, but if every deed of kindness links us with the Divine kindness so every institution born out of the motives and history of Christian Truth links its staff and all associated with it with the Infinite Father who sets side by side with the "Star of Suffering" the "Star of Alleviation."—The Baptist Commonwealth.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

The echoes from our General Information Test have not yet died away. Scarcely a day passes when letters, inquiries, or suggestions in regard to the test are not received. The city papers have devoted a good deal of space to reports of it. The Public Ledger published three long articles about the test, printing all the questions in one issue, and in a subsequent issue repeating the questions and giving correct answers to each.

Dr. Samuel C. Schumaker, of West Chester, recently lectured here on "The Meaning of a Flower." The interest of the whole School was held throughout this simple and illuminating exposition of fundamental life processes.

DR. J. LEONARD LEVY, of Pittsburgh, gave us what he called his "Beauty Talk" the other morning. He spoke eloquently of three types of beauty, the Roman, the Greek, and the Hebrew—the beauty of Order, the beauty of Form, and the beauty of Holiness. In the course of his address he made a plea for the Peace Cause as worthy of the fighting energies of virile and red-blooded men, and not merely as a field for anemic "mollycoddles."

Sara M. Longstreth has talked to our younger children about life in Japan, exhibiting various costumes and objects of interest.

The annual Boys' Gymnastic Contest was given in our Gymnasium on Sixth-day the 27th ultimo.

The girls had given their contests previously on two days, the girls of the six younger classes on the 19th and of the six older classes on the 25th. The girls of the Lower School are divided into two groups, the "Golds" and the "Browns," named from the School colors. This year the "Browns" won over the "Golds" by a score of 81 to 46. In the upper School, a team of six girls, representing each class, took part in the contest. The Seniors won, scoring 593 points. The other classes scored as follows: A's, 538½; B's, 526; C's, 556½; D's, 588; E's, 557½. The highest individual score was made by Elizabeth Brinton of the "D" class, who made 116½ points.

Plans are under way to hold a reunion of all the old scholars of the School on Fifth Month Twenty-second, when it is hoped that all the Friends who have ever attended the School will make a special effort to be present.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

The lecture season has closed; a good many of our neighbors have shared with us the privilege of listening to not a few persons of more or less fame, and have enjoyed many beautiful pictures which have been shown on the screen depicting life and customs in our own and other countries.

On the 18th inst., Rabbi Leonard Levy, of Pittsburgh, spoke of old customs as compared with modern civilization.

J. DUNCAN SPAETH is always most welcome to the Westtown audience; he appeared on the twentieth, taking for his topic the writings of Beowulf.

The last lecture was on the 27th inst. Tong Sin Kow, the "Chinese Quaker," spoke to an interested audience concerning China, her customs and development.

An informal lecture for the benefit of the Agricultural Club was given in the gymnasium on the evening of the 26th inst. by Professor Cromwell, of the West Chester Normal School. Corn breeding was treated in an interesting manner, numerous lantern slides adding much to illustrate the topic.

The Visiting Committee for the Third Month came on the 21st. George A. Rhoads, Walter L. Moore, Walter T. Moore, Henry T. Brown, J. Hervej Dewees, Frances T. Rhoads, Martha G. Sheppard, Eleanor Cope Emlen, Mary M. Leeds, Sarah Emlen Moore and Mary Eaulen Stokes were in attendance.

WILLIAM BISHOP was here earlier in the week for two or more days; he was exercised in the ministry at Fifth-day meeting the 19th.

The "Senior party" occurred on the evening of the 21st. Three or four short of a hundred profile pictures of the class of 1914, officers of the School, etc., were pinned around "Central" and one girl guessed aright for every one; the social occasion seemed to be enjoyed by all; refreshments ended the event at 9:45 o'clock.

On First-day evening, 22nd inst., Walter T. Moore spoke and read to the boys forcibly concerning John Bright and his life.

ELEANOR COPE EMLEN read a paper which she had prepared on "Doors Open and Shut," taking her subject from different parts of the Bible and the conclusions drawn were both apt and impressive.

The "bumbers" in the hospital are enjoying their enforced illness as best they can, and that means that they are having a bright, cheerful time of it.

Third Month 28th.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The many friends of Hannah Bellows amongst our readers will be interested in this communication of hers to The Friend (London).

To the Editor of The Friend:

Dear Friend.—One of your correspondents on this subject considers that no action ought to be taken by the Meeting for Sufferings with regard to the expression of our experience as to the position of women in the Society of Friends, and I am authorized to protest (by letter) and by constitutional suffragists against the actions of the meeting in question. Such protests have again and again been issued in the years 1908, 1909, and each year from 1911 by the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies. But the men or women who do not read the suffrage papers know nothing of this, so persistent is the boycott of the question in the press.

Another correspondent speaks of the Church League for Women's Suffrage as being one of the most militant of the organizations, and in this ground condemns the Friends' League for joining it, or holding meetings. As a matter of fact, according to the chairman of the General Council of the Church League, "education and prayer are the only methods of propaganda which the League employs or approves." It seems as if practically the whole life of Christ teaches that the use of force to gain a much desired end was not according to the Will of God; and it is difficult to understand how His followers can make use of force, under whatever provocation. But in no other great movement than this is the action of a small section of extremists; and there are such in every movement used so frequently as an excuse for standing aside even by those who would be willing to grant the justice of the claims of women.

HANNAH BELLOW'S.

GLOUCESTER, Third Month 8, 1914.

JOHN WAY acknowledges receipt of postal order for $5 from E. of Bloomfield, Ont., for relief of suffering Japanese.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

A bulletin lately issued by the Department of Public Health and Charities at Washington says: "The mortality from influenza or 'grip' so far this year has been higher than normal, which means that the type of the disease which is attacking so many of our people at this season is severe. Many deaths which have been charged to pneumonia, heart disease and kidney disease no doubt had their origin in a preceding attack of grip, the germs of which produce toxins or poisons which often do serious damage to the vital organs of the body. Persons who recover from grip are often many months in regaining their former health and strength. Grip, although not quarantinable by the Bureau of Health, is a highly contagious disease. The patient should be isolated and all contact between the sick and well members of the family avoided."

A recent despatch from Springfield, Mass., says: "E. S. Clowes, chief statistician of the National Highways Protective Society, the headquarters of which is in New York, has been making a New England tour to further the removal of illegal advertising on the highways. The purpose of the organization is the ultimate extinction of unsightly highway advertising and, as a preliminary step, the education of both the public and advertisers in regard to the legal aspect of a practice which until recently has been unincured. Massachusetts and Connecticut have a statute imposing a penalty of $10 for painting or attaching to any fence, building, tree or rock advertising device of any kind unless the written consent of the owner of the property is secured."

It is stated that Postmaster General Burleson issued an order permitting the shipment of food produce by parcel post. The innovation will be tried at Boston, St. Louis, San Francisco, Atlanta, Baltimore, Detroit and about a dozen other postoffices, and will soon be extended to all other parts. Philadelphia will be in the second list of 10 cities to receive the privilege. Postmasters have been directed to receive the names of persons willing to supply farm products in retail quantities by parcel post. Printed lists of these names, showing the kinds of commodities available, will be prepared from time to time for distribution to city and town patrons who wish to buy farm products by mail.

A despatch from Reading, Pa., says: "The Reading Playgrounds Association has provided for the children of this city one of the best-equipped and best-managed systems of playgrounds in the country. Vacant lots and waste spaces in the congested sections have been developed into desirable public playing centres, and so great has been the demand for additional space that two more playgrounds will be opened this season."

A despatch of the 24th from Chicago says: "Chicago has a larger population of 671,614, exceeding that of New York by 24,522, as a ruling to the official review to-day of registration figures. Of these also registered, more than 200,000 were women."

The Pennsylvania Railroad, following a plan of re-organization, has lately dismissed or suspended 15,000 employees. It is stated that as the company normally employs 140,000 men on its Eastern lines, more than 10 per cent. of the total force has been thrust into the ranks of the wholly idle. Altogether, counting dismissals, lay-offs and short-time orders, a 25 per cent. reduction, in round figures, has been effected in the working hours of skilled and unskilled labor on the Pennsylvania's Eastern lines, and wage payments have been cut accordingly.

A despatch of the 26th from Boston says: "By action of the House to-day, the Legislature has voted for the first time in its history for referring to the people the question of granting suffrage to women. The vote in the House was 168 to 39 on a resolve which had been favorably acted upon by the Senate, providing for an amendment to the constitution striking the word 'male' from the qualifications for voters. The measure must receive favorable action in the Legislature next year before it may go to the people for decisive vote. Should it pass the next Legislature, the voters would have an opportunity to act on the woman suffrage question in 1915."

It was stated from Boston on the 27th that the new law prohibiting the employment of children between 14 and 16 years of age more than 8 hours a day resulted in the discharge during the first year of 4000 out of 25,000 to 30,000 employed, according to a special report filed with Governor Walsh by the Labor and Industrial Commission to-day.

A despatch of the 27th from San Francisco says: "A portion of the first shipment of fresh fruit from New Zealand ever received on the Pacific coast was placed on sale here to-day. The shipment consisted of peaches and pears."

It is stated that Indian Commissioner Sills, in his annual report, described health conditions among the Indians as deplorable. Approximately 25,000 Indians are suffering from tuberculosis. During the last fiscal year 1905 Indians died from tuberculosis. The Indian death rate was 32.25 per 1000, against 16 per 1000 for the entire registered area of the United States. More than 60,000 cases of trachoma are shown to exist among the Government's wards. The report says there are 8000 Indian families without homes, many of whom live under revolting conditions."

FOREIGN.—It was recently stated that Linnekogel, a German aviator, established a world's altitude record for a flight with one passenger in an aeroplane by attaining a height of 18,050 feet. The previous record for a flight with one passenger was made by the late Edmond Perreyon, a Frenchman, who rose to a height of 16,270 feet.

A despatch of the 26th from Berlin says: "By a unanimous vote the Imperial Parliament to-day passed a bill providing that where a duel or a challenge to a duel has been provoked by dishonorable conduct, the offender shall be liable to imprisonment in a penitentiary instead of confinement in a fortress. The bill gives the courts discretionary power to deprive the offender of his civil rights. This is the first occasion on which all the parties in the Imperial Parliament have been united on a measure to discourage dueling."

A despatch from Peking of the 22nd says: "Outrages by brigands in Central China are assuming alarming proportions. Several bands associated with the noted outlaw, White Wolf, are ravaging the country, ruthlessly murdering and robbing the people and burning property."

An arbitration treaty for a term of five years between the United States and Venezuela has been signed by a representative of the Venezuelan Government and by Preston McGowan, of Oklahoma, United States Minister to Venezuela.

It is stated that Omsk, Siberia, has become the outfitting point for an extraordinary migration, estimated at two million people annually which pours into the country bordering on Mongolia. Nothing in Europe or Asia has ever been quite so like the springing up of the great cities of the American Middle-west as is the growth to-day of new towns in Siberia. Except that the tide is moving east instead of west the movement has many parallels to the wonderful migration which won the west for America.

NOTICES.

THE HOUSE OF INDUSTRY, Seventh and Race Streets, will be open all day for visitors, Fourth Month 22, 1914. Members of the Board of Managers will be glad to welcome all who care to come and to show them the work done by the women who are employed.

Friends who contribute to the Needlework Guild are urged to purchase the articles they donate from the House of Industry.

MEETING AT LANERCH.—Under authority of a committee appointed by Concord Quarterly Meeting, a meeting for Divine Worship will be held in Paiste Hall, Lanerch, Pa., on First-day afternoon, Fourth Month 5th, at three o'clock. All interested are invited.

MERCHANTVILLE MEETING.—The regular meeting for worship held monthly at Merchantville, N. J., will occur on First-day afternoon, the Fifth of Merchmonth, at 3 o'clock. With the recent suspension of the morning meeting at this place it is hoped that interested Friends of neighborhood meetings will bear this meeting with increasing weight upon their spirits.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.32, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone 114A.

WM. B. HARVEY, Superintendent.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. Sixteenth Street, Phila., will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M.—Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 27th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when they are temporarily out of school or are unduly burdened in keeping up with their classes, or have been seriously interrupted in their studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Months strengthens the health, and the children gather up the lines of their Westtown studies so that they can get an easier start for their year's work the next autumn.

Applications for admission should be made to

SUPPORTING "THE FRIEND."

One of the best informed persons in all the country in regard to the success and circulation of the periodical press recently wrote in a friendly letter to one of the Editors, as follows:—"It is a sad fact that the great majority of the religious journals have steadily gone down both in quality and circulation during the last ten years." This, fortunately, is not a correct statement as regards the circulation of THE FRIEND. There has been a very moderate, but somewhat steady, growth in the number of subscribers for several years past. The list stands now at the highest point in its history, but this point of attainment is quite below what seems to us a reasonable expectation. The question of circulation, of course, is much involved with the whole question of support, and our readers generally may be in some measure interested in that.

The special name by which the Managers of THE FRIEND are known—"Contributors"—carries us back to a time when one of their important functions was to furnish the required means for financing the project. In the course of years some endowment was secured, amounting to about $8000, and the annual contributions were finally not required. Possibly for two decades at least THE FRIEND was just about self-supporting. After the death of our friend John H. Dillingham the editorial staff was increased. One of the three names added was made possible by contributions of liberal Friends not on the Board of Managers. For a brief period still receipts and expenditures balanced, and then came a material advance in the cost of producing the paper. Printing bills, still kept at about cost by the generosity of a firm that had had the job over sixty years, were increased more than thirty per cent.; all other labor except that for editorial work cost more money, and a threatened annual deficit of $1000 was in sight. This situation has brought some kind Friends to the rescue with liberal donations, and it is likely that the present volume will close without debt.

The addition of two pages of advertisements was intended to increase the income from the paper. This prospect has, in measure, been realized, although not a welcome addition to some of our most esteemed subscribers. We may say in passing that there is reason to believe that the Christian principle of brotherhood was at the root of the modern art of advertising, so that apart from sentiment, it need not be ruled out of a religious journal. If the sentiment were strong enough to provide means to make advertising unnecessary, many would rejoice.

From the above it will be clear that our present situation, so far as financial support is concerned, is pressing. Two forms of relief have been suggested. It is an idea quite current in modern times that the religious press must be endowed. Friends with much sagacity anticipated this idea and made a good start in the endowment of their project. If the growth of this feature can now be stimulated, so that in the next decade the troublesome question of finance can yield to others of more moment in the growth of the paper, it will be most happy. The interest of Friends in this line is earnestly solicited. The other suggestion is the perennial one of an increased circulation. All who are acquainted with the facts are pretty well convinced that there are four to five hundred Friends whose names should be added to our subscription list. How can we reach these Friends? We have sent them appeals—numerous appeals in fact—but the number of responses is not great. Our agents are interested and in some cases quite active. Is it in bad taste for us to appeal to our regular subscribers to help us in this important effort? Some of them do so very effectively; will not others join in a like effort? We will gladly send the paper for three months without charge to lists of names furnished to us in the hope of exciting interest.

One other aspect of support demands a word before concluding an article like this. For many years it has been difficult to secure original articles, reports and news items for THE FRIEND. It was often a great burden from week to week to provide the necessary pages, and scissors and paste were very active. Successful weeklies we learn often have material in hand for three to six months. Indeed, this is regarded as a normal condition. In this particular, we are most happy to confess ourselves now in this "normal" condition. We have a good store of matter in hand and the number ready to write for THE FRIEND seems to be on the increase. Does this not represent in good part a new attitude and a new feeling in the Society? That modern word solidarity means unity in action. It is such unity we wish to cultivate, and because THE FRIEND can accomplish a mission of this kind, we make a general appeal for help to "enlarge its borders."

AN ALLEGORY.—One day, while walking in the noonday light of a mid-summer sun, beneath a cloudless sky, I was accosted by a person wholly a stranger to me, who, with kind, condescending air, made offer to show me the way. I saw in his hand a lantern, and in it a lighted farthing candle. Pity checked my rising laughter, so, as gravely as I could, I declined his offer, and went on my way. I was afterwards told that his name was Higher Criticism.—R. C. CHAPMAN.

THE QUAKER MISSION AMONG THE INDIANS OF NEW YORK STATE.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

This offer of premiums for agricultural products antedated any similar offer made to white men by forty years.

The situation of these Friends who had gone to reside among the Seneca Indians was attended by many privations and difficulties. Under these circumstances it is not a matter of surprise that those who thus dedicated themselves had some seasons of discouragement, as also that they found many compensations and consolations, affording an ample reward for the sacrifices made.

In 1800 Red Jacket and three other chiefs of the Seneca Nation were in Philadelphia and requested that Friends should erect a saw-mill at Buffalo Creek, on the site of the present city of Buffalo, and intimated that such a present would be very acceptable to the Indians living at Tonawanda. A set of saw-mill irons was forwarded to each place within three years.

Friends generally made ready to co-operate with the Indians whenever they made any preparations to erect such a mill. They felt encouraged by hearing one young Indian at Old Town say to a white man, who had inquired of him what success he had in hunting, "I have almost quit hunting, or hunt but little latterly, for the Quakers have put another mind in me, and I have got so much notion of work that I pay little attention to hunting."

For several reasons the Committee in charge of these Indians thought it desirable to buy some seven hundred acres of land on Tunesassa Creek, two miles from Old Town, on the south side of the Allegheny River, and a half mile from the reservation.

Joel Swayne and Jonathan Thomas removed from Old Town to Tunesassa in 1804, and steps were soon taken to erect a saw and grist mill, which were completed and in operation early in 1805. The lumber of the Indians was sawn without charge when they used it to build houses for themselves, and an Indian who had a grist of his own raising, ground and bolted on the same terms, said, "I think this will make Indians see daylight."

The Indians at Cattaraugus were also supplied with tools for cultivating the soil and some of their boys taken to Philadelphia to be sent to school. The Friends also bought a tract of 500 acres adjoining that reservation in 1808. This was on Clear Creek, a tributary of the Cattaraugus. A beginning was made during the summer of this year in clearing this tract and erecting a house for the accommodation of those who should reside there.

Four Friends were stationed there and five at the Tunesassa farm the following year. Their efforts were not confined to instructing the men in agricultural pursuits, as they were equally interested to help the Indian women in making their homes more comfortable. Clothing made of flax and wool instead of the skins of animals was introduced, and the Indians were taught to manufacture and use soap. One of these missionaries described the usual Indian habitation of this period thus: "Many of their houses have earthen floors with some boards along each side, with deerskins spread over them, which serve for beds and seats to sit on. When they eat they set a dirty bowl, made of bark, in the middle of the floor, each one comes and cuts a piece and takes it in his hands and sits down again with pigs and dogs (of which they have abundance) running about the floor. These eat up the bones or scraps which are thrown down on the floor. By this means the house is kept cleaner. I think I scarcely saw a table. . . . Here and there, as we traveled about we saw and were in divers of their old bark cabins. It is wonderful to think how anybody could live in them through the winter without being frozen."

It is by contrasting such conditions with those of to-day that we believe this century-long effort has not been in vain.

In the summer of 1807 the first death in this band of pioneer missionaries occurred. The wife of Benjamin Cope was gathered to her eternal home. He wrote shortly after this event, "Several of the Indians have expressed a very great sympathy for me under my present trial. One old man, in particular, came to the mill when I was grinding his grist. . . . The great animation with which he spoke and the concern that I believe he felt for me touched my feelings very much."

The interest and efforts of Friends of New York Yearly Meeting should be recorded. John Murray, Jr., of New York City, and one of a Committee of that body to help the Indians in that State, wrote in 1810:

"We first called to see the Brothertown tribe, among whom our friend, John Dean, and family reside, whose endeavors to promote the concern of the Society of Friends touching the civilization and welfare of the Indians we think has been measurably successful, and we trust they are in a state of improvement. . . . We tarried two nights among the Oneidas, lodging with our Friends, Absalom and Ruth Hatfield, who are fixed among this tribe with a view to the promotion of their welfare." Halliday Jackson, one of the Philadelphia Friends, visiting the Cattaraugus settlement in 1814, mentioned that "our Friends inform us that they have almost daily heard the roaring of cannon from the British lines near Fort Erie for several weeks past. . . . at the time Buffalo was burnt the alarm was distressing here, people were flying in every direction from the enemy. In consequence of which the Indians at Cattaraugus became very uneasy and moved much of their property south of the river, in readiness to fly to Allegheny in case of an attack. They seem to put great confidence in the judgment of Friends, often consulting them on account of their safety and stating that if Friends removed they would fly also."

The farms of these Indians were generally under good fence, at that time several hundred acres having been enclosed and cultivated within three or four years.

Friends have continuously and, so far, successfully resisted the efforts of The Ogden Land Company to remove the Senecas from their reservation in New York State. This movement was started by Thomas L. Ogden, of New York City, as early as 1809. This company has the pre-emption rights to these reservations and they ought to be extinguished by application to the Courts of New York by the friends of the Indians, as the Superior Court decided recently that the Indians could not make such application in their own behalf.

Friends appealed to President Monroe in 1817, to discourage the alienation of these reservations, and at the same time urged the Indians not to part with their lands.

In the summer of 1816, Joseph Elkinton, from a sense of religious duty, left his home in Philadelphia to reside at Tunesassa, where he remained for sixteen years. During a considerable part of this time he was engaged in teaching and in superintending schools taught by others. In the course of his labors he encountered great opposition from some of the Indian chiefs, who clung to their old habits and prejudices. Red Jacket threatened to "tar and feather" him if he persisted in teaching the Indian children.

He learned the Seneca tongue and was adopted into their tribe as an honorary member. His Indian name, "We-Ne-Se-W" (a very fine day) was given him a year after he settled amongst them and was intended to signify that they were satisfied with him as a member of their community. Occasionally a chief would visit his school and speak as Skin-dihqua did, some four years after he first opened it. Addressing the children, he said, "Be attentive to your learning, and pay attention to the account we have in the Testament of Jesus, some of you know something about it, and are able to understand. He spoke the words of truth and of life, to which we should pay attention. Love your schoolmaster, who is sitting there. We old men love him, he left his home where he had all the comforts of this life to come here and endeavor to instruct you."

(To be concluded.)

SOMETIME.

Sometime, when all life's lessons have been learned;

And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things which our weak judgments here have spurned.

The things on which we grieved with eyelids wet,
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,

As stars shine most in deepest tints of blue,
And we shall see how all God's plans are right;

And how what seemed reproofs was love most true.

And we shall see, how while we frown and sigh,

God's plans go on as best for you and me;

How when we called, He heeded not our cry,

Because His wisdom to the end could see.

And e'en as prudent parents disallow

Too much of sweet to craving babyhood,

So, God perhaps is keeping from us now,

Life's sweetest things because it seemeth good.

And if sometimes, commingled with life's wine

We find the wormwood and rebel and shrink,

Be sure a wiser Hand than yours or mine

Pours out this potion for our lips to drink.

And if some friend we love is lying low,

Where human kisses cannot reach his face,

Oh! do not blame the loving Father so,

But wear your sorrow with obedient grace.

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath

Is not the sweetest gift God sends His friend,

And that sometimes the sable pall of Death

Conceals the fairest bloom His love can send.

If we could push ajar the gates of Life,

And stand within, and all God's workings see,

We could interpret all the doubt and strife,

And for each mystery could find a key.

But not to-day. Then be content, poor heart!

God's plans, like lilies, pure and white, unfold.

We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart

Time will reveal the calyxes of gold,

And if, through Mercy's gate, we reach the land,

Where tired feet, with sandals loosed, may rest;

When we shall clearly know and understand,

I think that we will say, "God knew the best."

—GEORGE HERBERT

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

A CHILDREN'S TEA MEETING. The bright afternoon sunshine of Third Month 20th shone on a group of about eighty children, with a sprinkling of "grown-up" parent and teachers, gathered in Germantown Meeting-house. The occasion was a Tea Meeting for the children of Abington Quarter. As the company settled down, six young Friends filed in, with becoming gravity, and took seats facing the audience. They represented George Fox, William Penn, Margaret Fell Fox, Elizabeth Fry, Francis Daniel Pastorius and Lucretia Mott.

After a few words from Stanley R. Yarnall, they gave, in turn, a little sketch of the man or woman whom they personated, and these we reproduce here for "Our Younger Friends," only wishing all could have heard them as given.

I was born in a modest home in a small village called Fenny Drayton, in Leicestershire. My father's name was Christopher Fox; both he and my mother were good and honest people. My father was by profession a weaver and the neighbors called him righteous Christopher. I was born in 1624, and my mother and father taught me how to know pureness and righteousness. When I grew older, I was put under a man who was a shoemaker and dealt in wool. While I was there I did no wrong to anyone and frequently used in my dealings the word "verily," so it became a common saying among those who knew me. "If George says verily there is no altering him." As I grew toward manhood I was in sorrow and trouble, and felt that I must get wisdom. I went from minister to minister and talked to them of the trouble of my heart, but received no help; one told me to smoke tobacco and sing psalms and another wanted to give me medicine. At last I saw that all my hopes in them were gone, nor could I tell what to do; then I heard a voice which said, "There is one that can speak to thy condition," and when I heard it I was exceedingly glad. Then God spoke to me Himself, and told me plainly the message from Him that I was to go and tell it to the people wherever I was and this I did for the rest of my life. For years I went from place to place, to steepelhouse or market-place, to city, town or country, as I was directed, telling everywhere that God spoke in each man's heart, and that every person should listen to this voice and live his life according to the Scriptures. This very much provoked the priests or ministers of the Church of England, as they claimed to be in authority and were so by the law of the land. This law forbade more than five persons to meet together for religious purposes except under the Church of England. I considered this law as disobedient to God's law, so those of us who met to worship Him, as we thought was right, were beaten and taken to prison and suffered much for truth's sake. I, myself, have been kept in eight or nine prisons, some the most horrible of dungeons, it was in fact three years at one time before I was allowed my freedom. In Derby jail I told the justice to tremble at the word of the Lord, and from this some people used to call us Quakers. One time, when I had gone to plead for one of my friends who was in prison, I asked the judge what he had done that was wrong. He said, "He would not take off his hat before us." "Then," said I, "why do the priests over there have hats on?" "Cut off the brims of my friend's hat," I said, "and it would look nearly like those, and the brims are only to protect him from the weather." After thinking it over the judge said that I was right and soon released my friend. I have traveled in Ireland and Scotland. I went also to Holland and Germany and later to the new colonies of America, holding meetings. This was some years before William Penn visited his land of Pennsylvania. We sailed in the Industry, which was a very leaky boat.

In doing what I was commanded I went three times to Oliver Cromwell, once to ask that 2,000 Friends then in prison should be released. This number shows how many men and women, thousands throughout the land, were ready to preach the Scriptures, to live by them and often suffer rather than give up what they thought was right.

In my wandering life there was one bright spot to which I often returned—Swarthmore Hall. It was here that Margaret Fell and her husband lived their good lives, greatly helping others. More than eleven years after Judge Fell's death I married Margaret Fell in 1669. I can tell you no more of my life now, but that for more than forty years I have been traveling to many places preaching in the love of the truth and teaching as I have been taught by it.

MARRIOTT C. MORRIS, JR.

My home was Swarthmore Hall. It was well known throughout the country because of its hospitality. Many traveling ministers had lodged there, and later it was where the Friends held many of their meetings.

One day I came home to find that George Fox was lodged at my home, and all the household were excited at the strange things he had been saying. But that night I had a long talk with him, and when the next day he spoke at my church I was convinced of the truth of what he said. So it was that when my husband, Judge Fell, returned home from his journey, he found that I, our older daughters and most of the servants had turned Quakers.

Eight years later, after my husband had died, George Fox was sitting in our parlor. Suddenly there was an uproar and some men came in and took him off to prison, just because he was a Quaker; he had done nothing wrong. I went to London to beg the King to have him released. After seeing the King many times I was successful in getting George Fox set free, but I had to stay in London more than a year to help get other Friends out of prison. I longed to get home to my six girls, who were keeping up the meetings, and therefore were themselves in danger of being imprisoned.

But when at last I went home I could not stay long. Very soon I was taken to prison and kept there four long, weary years in a filthy, damp place, not fit for people to lie in. It was often filled with smoke, and the rain and wind beat in, so that it was only owing to the power and goodness of the Lord that I was kept alive. Three times they told me I might go free if I would take the oath of allegiance and never hold meetings in my house again. But I told them, "I rather choose a prison for obeying God, than my liberty for obeying men contrary to my conscience." For I must keep my conscience clear, however I may suffer.

Pently to do I had in prison, for so many to whom I could write needed loving comfort; many might be convinced of the truth, and oft I wrote to the King, begging justice toward Friends. But two of my daughters were married while I was in prison and one was so ill she nearly died, but I prayed the Lord for patience.

After being released I met George Fox, who had become very dear to me. We were married and for twenty-two years were man and wife, but we spent very little time together. The Lord's business was dearer to us than our own pleasure. George traveled to America, to Holland, and up and down England; and we were both at times in prison, but we felt it an honor to suffer even imprisonment and separation in the cause of our Lord. I was called the "Mother of Quakerism," and, truly, I loved and labored for the Friends as though they had been my own children. HELEN DICKEY POTTS.

I, WILLIAM PENN, introduce myself in all humbleness, as an author of many books, a minister of the Gospel, and a Christian legislator.

I am the son of Vice-Admiral, Sir William Penn, of the British Navy, during the wars of the Commonwealth and under Charles II. I was born near London, in 1644. . . . (and yet no grey hairs, as you see). When I was fifteen years old I entered Christ Church College in Oxford. I was a smart lad. At this time I first heard of Quakers, and attended a religious meeting of the Society of Friends where I heard Thomas Loe preach. From the age of eleven years I had been a serious-minded boy and had felt God's spirit in me; from this time on I learned more on the simple teachings of Friends, and I became a minister of the Gospel. For this cause I was expelled from College, was many times imprisoned, and my father drove me from his house.

After my father's death I was granted a large tract of land in America, in lieu of money owed me by the English Crown. In this new land I decided to form a colony of "freethinkers," who could not live in peace in England owing to persecution there by the people and laws of the English churches. This new land was Pennsylvania, or "Penn's Woods." You know of my kindness to the Indians; I paid them for their lands, was fair and just to them, treated them as equals, and would not allow liquor sold to them.

My first ship with colonists came out in the autumn of 1681, and from then on many settled in and near my city of Philadelphia, on the banks of the Delaware River. The Indians loved me and called me "Onas." JOHN STORY WRIGHT.

I AM Daniel Pastorius. I was born in Sommerhausen, Franconia, Germany, in 1651, at a time of religious strife. I went to school, when eleven, to a schoolmaster who knew none of our native German, and we boys were compelled to learn from him in Latin. After this, I studied eight years in many Universities, and left them with much knowledge of law, languages and other learned studies.

After several years of practice of law, I became restless, and an opportunity arising to go on a journey with a noble friend, to see many and various countries, we set out together. We saw England, Holland, France and Switzerland, but in none of these did I find happiness.

At last, at home in Germany, I began to hear of the pious people who were starting good and simple lives in that new America of William Penn, and his earnest followers, those of the Society of Friends. They invited us to join them in their journey across the ocean, and I decided to do this.

A stormy voyage we made across the Atlantic to the new land; food was scarce—many were hungry and sick, but the new country and its religious freedom lifted our minds in hope.

We Germans had bought from William Penn the land far out from the town of Philadelphia, now Germantown, and there we laid out our Main Street and town lots, living in Philadelphia while work went forward. I built a house for myself, but many lived at first in caves.

Even in this new, free land I saw negroes and Indians sold in slavery, and lifted up my voice in testimony against it. We prospered and became a settlement—at peace with Indians—with neighbors; conquerors of the wild beasts, owners of homes and gardens.

I became chief man on account of my learning and experience, and ended here my busy life, spent mainly in helping the growth of this our town of Germantown.

As I write in my hand-book of Germantown, so say I to all who succeed me—

"Think how your fathers left their native land,
Dear German land, O sacred hearths and homes!
And where the wild beast roams,
In patience planned
New forest homes beyond the mighty sea,
There undisturbed and free
To live as brothers of one family;"

GORDON W. STRAWBRIDGE.

ABOUT one hundred and thirty-five years ago there was born in Norwich, England, a baby girl who grew to be one of the noblest, most useful and best-loved women our Society of Friends has ever known. And yet, as a little girl, she was not very different from some of us here this afternoon, except, perhaps, in that she had six sisters and four brothers—more than any of us have; and more wonderful still, teasing and quarreling were almost unknown even in that large family. She loved lots of company and enjoyed riding, sketching, boating and all out-door pleasures, and her sisters and brothers, with their cousins and friends, had many frolics, such as the "ass ride," when fifteen of them mounted donkeys and galloped about the country lanes with three men following on foot to pick up those who fell.

Another time, when they were living at their beautiful home named Earham, Elizabeth and her sisters went into the high road and, linking themselves arm in arm, the seven merry girls stretched right across the road. They waited for the great Norwich traveling coach, and when the horses came galloping along, the driver saw the sisters were determined to keep in the way, so he was obliged to stop the coach, amid much laughter from the delighted party.

When we look at the well-known picture of Elizabeth Fry we feel like saying, "How brave and stately she is; she looks as if she could dare anything for the right, and would never have doubts and fears or make mistakes." And perhaps we are tempted to add, "I never could do such things!" If we should feel like this, it is very encouraging to remember that as a little girl, "Betsy" was timid, not very strong, often nervous, and afraid of being left in the dark! She was not very bright at her studies and was sometimes called stupid, which often discouraged her from even trying to learn.

She was also like some of us who do not always love going to Meeting, feeling that it is something not very pleasant, but which must be done with as good grace as possible. But one First-day an American Friend, named William Savery, from Philadelphia, visited her meeting. Betsy Gurney was then about seventeen years old, pretty, gay and fond of good-looking clothes. Sitting far up front under the gallery with her six sisters, she was at first rather restless and looked a good deal at her best shoes, which were purple, laced with red. But while William Savery was speaking she listened very earnestly and felt that what he said would cause her to change her way of life. She heard him preach again in the afternoon and talked to him between times. It was soon after this that she felt she must become a better Friend. She put on the plain dress, became more gentle and kind and thoughtful of others, and from this time began to grow into that beautiful character which we all know as Elizabeth Fry. When she was twenty years old she married Joseph Fry, and went to live in London. Although she was from that time on a very busy woman in her home, she spent a great part of her time trying to make the lives of the poor more comfortable and happy. She visited the prisons, read the Bible, and preached to the convicts, and had a school started for their little children who were forced to live with their mothers in prison. The prisoners were such wild and wicked women that even the officers were almost afraid to go in among them, and yet Elizabeth Fry, because she believed God called her to preach to them, was not afraid; and soon the women all grew to love her and became obedient and orderly.

Besides her great work among the prisons, Elizabeth Fry had many other charities. She traveled all over Europe, visited some of the kings and queens and others of high rank, and was not afraid to talk to them about their duty to God and what she hoped they would do for others. When she died, at the age of sixty-six, all those who knew her felt they had lost a very dear and helpful friend. She had eleven children and twenty-five grandchildren.

"In Earham's bowers, in Plashet's liberal hall,
In the great city's restless crowd and din,
Her ear was open to the Master's call,
And knew the summons of His voice within.
Tender as mother, beautiful as wife,
Amidst the throngs of prison crime she stood
In modest raiment, faultless as her life,
The type of England's worthiest womanhood."

ANNABEL B. WOOD.

MANY, many years ago, among the quiet scenes of Nantucket, I was born. My father, Thomas Coffin, was a sea captain, of staunch principles. My mother, a woman of great energy, wit and good sense. I had five brothers and sisters, and sometimes, when mother went to visit one of our neighbors, she would say, "Now, after you have finished your family accounts, you may go down cellar and pick out a new dress, or you want of the smallest portion. The very made-up dress of them in the ashes."

When I was twelve years old my father took us to the place where we all at first attended a private school, but I had feared this would make us proud, so removed us to a public school. I am glad he did so, because it gave me a love and sympathy for the patient and struggling poor which I could never have known otherwise.

A year later I attended a boarding school in the State, which both boys and girls attended. At first, though, we were not allowed to speak to each other unless they were in the relations, and then only on certain days, over a certain corner of the fence between the playgrounds. James Mott was the teacher, and when I was fifteen years old, I was appointed his assistant. We studied French together, and became more and more fond of each other, so when James was twenty-one and I eighteen, we were married and went to Philadelphia to live.

The next year occurred the War of 1812, and this caused such depression in business affairs, that it seemed best for me to assist my husband by opening a school, my cousin helping me. We started with only four pupils, but soon had forty, and meanwhile my husband's business had greatly improved. Soon after this occurred one of the greatest sorrows of my life; my only son, my little Thomas, died, saying with his last breath, "I love thee, mother." This led me nearer to my Heavenly Father than I had ever been before, and after this I often felt moved to speak in meeting, and James and I often drove to different meetings in the neighborhood.

When I was a child, a description I had read of slave-ships left a deep impression on my mind, so when it seemed possible for me to do a little part toward freeing the slaves I was very glad to do it.

In 1833 a convention met in Philadelphia to form the American Anti-slavery Society, and I was one of the four women who attended, and afterwards became President of the Female Anti-slavery Society. Needless to say we suffered humiliation and persecution in our unpopular cause. It has been one of the joys of my life to have lived to see the slaves freed. I wish I might also have seen equal suffrage for men and women and arbitration take the place of warfare in the settlement of disputes between nations, but these did not come in my day.

I have greatly enjoyed having my house visited by so many people of different interests, both rich and poor, both slave and free. In the broad hallway of our house stood two chairs which our children called the "beggars' chairs," and when it seemed best to move from our large town house to "Roadside" on the old York Road, the children read the following poem the last evening we spent in our old home:

"Who constantly will ring the bell,
And ask if they will please to tell
Where Mrs. Mott has gone to dwell?
The beggars.

"Who never, never, nevermore,
Will see the lines at the door,
That they've so often seen before?
The neighbors.

"And who will miss, for months at least,
That place of rest for man and beast,
From North and South and West and East?
Everybody."

In 1861, James and I celebrated our fiftieth wedding anniversary and a joyous occasion it was. Seven more years James and I were permitted to live together; then after a brief illness, he went home.

I am now an old woman and my life is nearly done. I can truly say that if you resolve to follow the Lamb wherever you may be led you will find all the ways pleasant and the paths peace.

NOW THE LABORER'S TASK IS O'ER.

Now the laborer's task is o'er,
 Now the battle day is past;
 Now upon the farther shore
 Lands the voyager at last.
 Father, in Thy gracious keeping
 Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

There the tears of earth are dried;
 There the hidden things are clear;
 There the work of life is tried
 By a juster Judge than here.
 Father, in Thy gracious keeping
 Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

There the penitents, that turn
 To the cross their dying eyes,
 All the love of Jesus learn,
 At His feet in Paradise.
 Father, in Thy gracious keeping
 Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

There no more the powers of hell
 Can prevail to mar their peace;
 Christ the Lord shall guard them well,
 He who died for their release.
 Father, in Thy gracious keeping
 Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

"Earth to earth, and dust to dust,"
 Cahaly now the words we say,
 Left behind we wait in trust
 For the resurrection-day.
 Father, in Thy gracious keeping
 Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

FROM HADDONFIELD.

The Haddonfield Penn Literary held its last meeting for the season on Third Month 24th, at the home of Beulah M. Rhoads.

About seventy-five persons were present and listened with great interest to a very informing and enjoyable talk by a fellow-townsmen, James L. Pennypacker.

His subject, Stephen Munsen Day, had been but little more than a name to many of the listeners, but at the conclusion of the evening a feeling of inspiration had come to those who heard of this man's work. Born into a Presbyterian home in Morristown, New Jersey, his surroundings were of that denomination. In early years his attention was directed to Friends, and he soon applied and was received into membership at Burlington, New Jersey.

A short time after this he was appointed teacher of the Friends' School in Haddonfield. His influence as teacher in this school was so great and so wide-spread that pupils were sent to him from considerable distances from other States.

At one time Stephen Munsen Day wrote to a friend that he had a very prosperous school of sixty children and that he received the generous income of $600 for the year. At another time he referred to his school of eighty boys and girls, making it necessary for him to call in an assistant.

He was instrumental in gathering together in his school-room nineteen men of the town to consider the project of a library for the use of the public; he was appointed Secretary of the Association and from that beginning has grown the present Library of Haddonfield. Stephen Munsen Day was also Secretary of the Fire Company and interested in all that appertained to the good of the town.

It was not many years after he became a member with Friends that he was recorded a minister. The meeting records testify to his great usefulness to the Society. He died in his thirty-fourth year in 1812, leaving a widow and one child. That the speaker of the evening should treat his subject in such a deeply interested way and with such thorough appreciation of the viewpoint of Friends was interesting to his audience who, with but one or two exceptions, were members of the Society.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

Tell us not of banks and tariffs,—cease your paltry pedlar cries,—
 Shall the good State sink her honor, that your gambling-stocks may rise?
 Would ye barter man for cotton? That your gains may sum up higher,
 Must we kiss the feet of Moloch, pass our children through the fire?
 Is the dollar only real?—God and truth and right a dream?
 Weighed against your lying ledgers, must our manhood kick the beam?
 —WHITIER.

READERS, PLEASE NOTICE.—Some of you who are not subscribers to THE FRIEND have been receiving a copy practically every month gratuitously. The Temperance Association is responsible for this, although justice requires that it be said here that the managers of THE FRIEND have made the charge very moderate, indeed, for printing and mailing the four hundred and fifty extra copies of the "Temperance Issue." It is intended that this should be a very helpful channel for extending the work of the Temperance Association through the faithfulness of those who read this page, and at the same time the widening of the influence of THE FRIEND. These things cannot be done, however, without the expenditure of time and labor that must be paid for. Contributors and compilers may give their services freely, as their contribution to social needs, but printers and publishers depend upon such work for a livelihood. If any reader is moved hereby to become a paid subscriber to THE FRIEND, or to make a contribution to the Temperance Association, Henry E. Haines, Treas., Girard Trust Co., Phila., the purpose of this statement will have been attained.

U. S. B. A. YEAR BOOK.—The 1914 issue of this well-printed and neatly-bound book of more than three hundred pages, including, with other matters, the "Proceedings of the Fifth-third Annual Convention" of the United States Brewers' Association has been received through express companies by many Friends, and others. The writer has had four copies handed to him, and has placed each where he thinks it will be of service in awakening people from their indifference to the many evils inseparable from the liquor business, and incidentally, of course, in putting the U. S. B. A. out of a pernicious business. The expense of distributing these books so freely (recklessly, perhaps) must have been enormous. It illustrates the money strength of the liquor interests. The book is an adroit presentation of truths and half truths, together with much shocking perversion of truth, and a deal of subtle argument that has no fear of God apparent in it. Nevertheless, there is enough admission of the extent and growth of the prohibition sentiment to give us of the opposition much assurance that "Rum is on the run." Furthermore, we may study with profit our enemy's method of resistance as the final surrender becomes more and more imminent.

PENROSE AND PROHIBITION.—It has been said that "politics makes strange bed-fellows." This would seem to be illustrated by the announcement that "the senior senator from Pennsylvania" and his associate senator, George T. Oliver, propose to support the proposition to submit the question of prohibition to the voters of the State in due course of time. If the amendment were passed at the next session of the Legislature it would have to be readopted in 1917 before being voted on by the people, after which an effective law would have to be drafted and passed. With the corrupt political machines of Philadelphia and other cities combined in support of the liquor traffic, it might be impossible to ratify such an amendment, whereas the adoption of a county option law would give immediate relief to the suffering communities throughout the rural and suburban districts. The proposition of Senator Oliver, as outlined above, is regarded by many competent persons as an adroit move on the part of politicians to save the liquor interests of Pennsylvania from the restraint of county option.

THE TOWN OF COATESVILLE, PA., population about 11,000, after demonstrating the many advantages that follow the suppression of rum-selling, even for so brief a period as twelve months, is now to suffer the reproach of having five licensed saloons. Such is the decision of Judge Butler, who assumes the authority of ignoring the will of majorities and the petitions of nearly all the business men and public-spirited citizens of the town. The judge claims that where there are a "substantial number of liquor-using people" the "necessity" exists for saloons. The reverse contention of other judges in the State did not influence him. Again we see how "the strength of sin is the law."

LETTERS AND PETITIONS by hundreds are pouring into Congress through Senators and Representatives who have been addressed by those supporting the legalized liquor business, asking that the Hobson Amendment bill be defeated. This bill provides that the States may vote on the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution designed to crush the traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The liquor men say: "The possibility of the passage of the bill is serious." Their views are further expressed in these words: "Prohibition is a menace to our mutual interests and to the general welfare of the country, and an interference with the inalienable rights of our citizens."

THE SHEPPARD-HOBSON JOINT RESOLUTION is now before both the House and Senate. It is in the hands of the Committee on Judiciary of each body. This Committee is for the purpose of "hearing from the people." Please let them hear from everyone who reads these lines. Write to Charles A. Culbertson, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, U. S. Senate, Washington, D. C., and also to Henry D. Clayton, Chairman Committee of same name, House of Representatives, and say to each very briefly but kindly and clearly that you want this measure passed by Congress. Do this immediately.

DR. JOSEPH STOKES' ADDRESS on the Use of Alcoholic Liquors as Viewed from a Medical Standpoint has been so much called for that a third edition has been printed of 5,000 copies. They are for distribution at Friends' Institute. This is a thoroughly "up-to-date" paper, especially interesting to physicians and nurses, and equally valuable to all who respect the findings of science. Our members who heed the call to service, or who "wait the call," may reap a rich reward by distributing wisely this forceful address, or any others of the thousands of pages of Temperance Literature which may be had at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, for the asking.

THE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, Cato Sells, testifies to the lawlessness of the liquor dealers when he calls attention to the fact that "Congress appropriates $100,000 a year for the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians." He says: "I believe that the greatest present menace to the American Indian is whiskey. It does more to destroy his constitution and invite the ravages of disease than anything else. It does more to demoralize him as a man and frequently as a woman. It does more to make him an easy prey to the unscrupulous than everything else combined. If I say nothing more to you to-night that leaves an impression, let it be this one thought: Let us save the American Indian from the curse of whiskey." This would seem to warrant an effort on the part of the Government to save others also from the "curse of whiskey."

NO MORE PERJURERS.—In Norway one person in every ten belongs to some total abstinence organization that holds local meetings to encourage reformed men with other total abstinence and usually includes training for prohibition work abroad. In the United States less than one in a hundred of the women are thus organized, and the number of men locally organized for temperance work is infinitesimal. In Great Britain one-third of the youth of school age are in juvenile temperance organizations. If we did as well we should have 8,000,000 so organized; but we haven't a tithe as many. The next slogan of our temperance forces should be: Put no more perjurers in charge of prohibition laws, and re-ventilate these ideas by multiplying and organizing abstainers. W. J. CHAPIN.

LOCAL INTERESTS.—The disposition to magnify the importance of circumstances directly affecting ourselves, or the particular community in which we live, is both natural and common. We may have seemed to err in this way when considering, in recent issues, the great awakening of prohibition sentiment in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Let us remember that this movement is as wide as the continent, sea, world-wide, and as deep as the sense of justice in men.

PLACES RELIGION ABOVE EDUCATION.

Charles P. Anderson, Bishop of Chicago, told a Lenten audience that crowded the Garrick Theatre that education will never save the American nation.

He was making a plea to parents to do their part by giving their children religious training in the home. All the educational institutions in the country, he said, could not compensate for lack of home training.

"What is it disintegrates the family?" asked the Bishop. "Is it poverty? No. Relatively, there are more wrecked families among the rich than among the poor. It is not lack of education, for in like manner we find more wrecked homes, relatively, among college-bred men; it is not sickness, nor even death.

"The family is wrecked when love flies out of the door; when some kind of domestic infidelity creeps into the home; when parents do things that make children blush; when children do things that bring sorrow to their parents; when religion is dethroned in the household; when prayer is unknown there; when the family life becomes secularized. There are conditions in American family life to-day which make one tremble for the future of this great nation."

Bishop Anderson said the secularization of the family began with the secularization of the Sabbath. He said automobiling and other innocent recreations indulged in by many Americans on the Sabbath were not in themselves harmful, but were harmful because they crowded out the proper observance of the day. "Sunday is being secularized, not so much by what we do on that day, but by what we don't do," he added.

The Bishop contended that the Sabbath was intended to be a re-creative day; one in which man was "to get spiritual power to live soberly and righteously throughout the rest of the week."

"In Chicago, recently, we had a 'Go-to-Church Sunday.' I am not much given to that sort of thing. I do not care particularly for sporadic effort in religion, or for band-wagon religion. But that Go-to-Church Sunday revealed in Chicago, and doubtless the same is true elsewhere, that our churches were being operated by one-third of their communicant strength. This means that two-thirds of our church membership had become absolutely secularized.

"How dull and deadening is the life that has no sacred day. How prosaic is the life that has no mountain tops of aspiration and inspiration. Is American life to be a dead swamp of secularism? Is it to have no sacred day, no sacred Book, no sacred ideals?"

"Some people believe that our schools will provide for all of mankind's needs. I am not going to attack our schools,

I don't believe they are godless, neither do I believe that they provide a complete system of education. No system of education is complete which fails to develop all of man's powers—the several sides of his nature.

"If education was merely athletic, we might all train in gymnastics and turn out a number of John L. Sullivans. Parents must educate their children in the home. Take your children into your confidence; teach them to honor God and to reverence religion. Bring back religion into the bosom of the family, and we need have no fear for the future of the nation."

RICHARD DAVIES.

In the history of the Society of Friends we can scarcely find a more striking instance of faithfulness under adverse circumstances than that of Richard Davies. In his earlier experiences practically alone and actuated by the convictions of the Spirit of Truth, he settled where there were then no others of like mind with himself, and set up the standard of persevering obedience to the will of God manifest in the breast of man. Few can be named in whom a larger measure of purity of motives and carefulness of action existed with the blessing resting upon these. This won the respect of enemies even so that it could truly be said, "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." In him was remarkably displayed faithfulness under suffering, to what he believed was right, and a loyalty to his Maker, in the face of persecution both within and without, that has not often been excelled. We are comforted in believing there are still Richard Davies, though in some respects differently situated. He started alone and was supported in his integrity according to his needs.

There are those who feel alone, or may have been left largely so, as to as much outward fellowship, and yet who have been enabled to resist temptation on the right hand, and on the left, supported by the unerring Spirit of Truth, the same Spirit that supported Richard Davies. Very fruitful were the results of his labors, the time was ripe, the veil of spiritual darkness was being rent, the gathering time had come, in the prospect of suffering, the people could yield, and persecution had the tendency to gather them together, not only the lowly, but the wise of the earth, and the noble, who became meek indeed, and were made instruments of the good word of Life. The increase became such that at the request of Richard Davies a yearly meeting was established. It may be there are disciples as loyal, though in diminishing numbers as those who clustered about Richard Davies, who experience in the midst of departures and much unfaithfulness about them that the supporting Arm is able and willing to-day to protect them as in Richard Davies' time. Doubtless his faith was closely proven, not knowing what would be, and further his faith stood not in results, or fruits, which were doubtless not seen, or possibly not contemplated, but his faith was obedience to the Light of Truth, to the requirements of his Heavenly Father, to the service called for, and we doubt not he would have lived and died in the Truth even if there had been no others associated with him. He had been under the veil of darkness. Light broke through and he believed in it and received it. The same veil of darkness would blind again, small in its beginnings, but sure in its results. The Richard Davies that now exist are the fruit of Divine Grace, the same Grace that made him what he was. They are supported and will be by the same spirit and they will be enabled to bear testimony to the same Truth, even though they may seem situated under adverse conditions, yet they will have the same unshaken faith, believing "this spirit shall yet break forth in thousands" and in the confidence of Joseph of old who declared at his close, "God will surely visit you." For true it is still, "If God be for us who can be against us?" In the language of one recently removed, in one of his last public opportunities: "We need not so much to defend our principles, but if we truly possess them rather to promulgate them. God will defend them and support those who accept them in their purity."

Then let the Richard Davies who have had faith to believe and who have been enabled to persevere, look not so much to results, count not so much the cost, but standing upon that good ancient ground of faithfulness and of obedience, whether there be an increase or whether there be a decrease, experience the will of God being accomplished in them. Christ died for us. He paid the price that none other has paid, for being Lord of all, and having all power, He became obedient unto death. His disciples were scattered, thinking all was lost, but believing in the promise and waiting for it, they were gathered in due time, and witnessed that same Divine and Almighty power to transform such an enemy as Saul of Tarsus so that he became not a whit behind the chiefest of the Apostles.

God is as able, his power is as sufficient, his Grace as abundant as ever; if He could convert the unbelieving then, how much more should He the believing now. May it be a day when "the word of the Lord is precious, when His still, small voice speaks and says, 'Behold I stand at the door and knock, if any man hear my voice and open the door I will come in and sup with him and he with Me.'"

NEWS ITEMS.

An agenda giving the meetings in which Friends are interested during Yearly Meeting week is distributed from Friends' Institute. Any who do not get a copy by mail will be gladly supplied upon application. This is the most convenient form of keeping all the meetings in mind. We have had some special notices forwarded to us, but we have not space for all, and the folder in which we refer seems to meet the requirements of the case better than we can.—Ems.

During the coming summer a small party of young English Friends intends to come to this country to attend some of the Friendly conferences, including the Haverford Summer School and the Winona Conference, at the end of the Sixth and Seventh Months respectively, and to stay on until the middle of the Ninth Month. They are hoping to spend some of the intervening time in less formal visits in Friends' communities as "way opens" not only in the East but also during the Seventh Month in the States of Indiana, Iowa and Ohio. Their itinerary is still uncertain in minor details, but any persons who are interested to inquire further about it should write to Henry J. Cadbury, Haverford, Pa.

THE AMERICAN PEACE SOCIETY OF JAPAN, of which Gilbert Bowles is Secretary, circulates a monthly periodical. The following is clipped from it:—

"THE JAPAN PEACE MOVEMENT: According to agreement with the Japan Peace Society, since 1912, the two organizations have been publishing conjointly a monthly periodical, the Japan Peace Movement. The Japan Peace Society pays two-thirds of the expense, and receives one thousand copies a month, while the American Peace Society pays one-third (from Eleven to Twelve Yen a month) and receives five hundred copies. Beginning with this year, the periodical is to be published by the Shueisha, one of the best printing houses in Japan. The English Department of six pages serves as the official organ for distribution to the active members in Japan and to corresponding members abroad. About three hundred copies are sent each month to America, Europe, Australia and China."

FROM THE SCHOOL CONDUCTED BY FRIENDS IN PALESTINE.

RAM ALLAH, PALESTINE, Third Month 7, 1914.

Dear Friends:—

On the twelfth of First Month, Edward Kelsey left the Mission with his face set toward the homeland, and to the task of raising the necessary money to finish and furnish the building for our boys. We are glad to hear of the quick response of many to the opportunity to give toward the furnishing and now before it is time to begin the work of finishing, we are trusting that others will come gladly forward with the needful amount so that Edward Kelsey may return to the field with a light heart. His address while in the United States is in care of Moses Brown School, Providence, R. I.

During the rainy season we have been planting some trees and sowing seed. A driveway from the gate to the north door of the building is now being laid. Some inside work in rainy weather is being accomplished by the man who cares for the place.

Just now many travelers are passing through the country and we are praying that their hearts may be touched by the needs of these people.

One case demands immediate attention and I am going to lay it before you, hoping that some one may feel a concern to offer a helping hand.

A few years ago in one of the neighboring villages a murder was committed. Much bitter feeling followed and the mother of the murdered man constantly urged his remaining son to avenge the deed. He was not so inclined, but the mother would repeat, "Your brother is dead! His slayer still lives! Your brother is dead! His slayer still lives!" At length the poor man was persuaded to do the awful deed of revenge and was taken by the government to prison, where he now is. His boy at the age of ten was taken into our school four years ago. He has grown much since and is now one of our large boys. It is becoming unsafe for him to stay in this country, owing to this family feud. The other party is waiting for him to grow to a size fitting to meet their hatred. The boy is strong, willing and very conscientious and gentle. Of late he is very troubled and grave and his scholarship is falling for his position is very serious and unenviable and his mind is plainly disturbed. His cousin, an educated man in Sudan government service, is trying to find a way to save the boy. He could take him back to the Sudan when he returns but there are no educational advantages. He is willing to pay his way to America, but is not willing to have him go alone and fall to the mercies of chance. Isn't there someone who would like to receive this boy into his home and help him make a good man? He could earn his board and would be glad to do anything he could in return for such kindness as a Christian home affords. He comes from a Protestant family and is well liked by the teachers and his mates. He is worth helping and educating and I covet free air for him to breathe.

Will one whose heart is touched, who is able, write, "I should be glad to take him into our home."

We must act promptly as his days are numbered if he stays in Palestine. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Sincerely,

MARION E. KELSEY.

In looking forward to the approaching Yearly Meeting in Dublin, Sarah R. Barcroft remarks: That regular attenders "often recognize that each year the meeting has some individual characteristic." "The present is by universal consent a time of very serious crisis for our fatherland; it is of the utmost seriousness, no matter how we look at the ultimate outcome of events. This can hardly fail in some way to affect our meeting." Conrad A. Pim makes an earnest appeal to young Friends to consider their duty in relation to our business meetings by their regular attendance. "Our forefathers gave up much of their time and thought to the Society's business, and surely it is incumbent on us to do likewise."—The Friend (London).

ELBERT S. CLARKE, of Natal, son-in-law of the late Samuel Fothergill, of Darlington, has been much stirred by the reports of the Kikuyu controversy, having been for nearly forty years engaged in Gospel service among the colored peoples of Central and South Africa. His experience has increasingly convinced him of the unwisdom of introducing rites and ceremonies among those who have come out of heathenism. He says: "Only those who have lived long among the barbarous tribes of Africa and know the trend of their thinking and living, can understand the awful mischief caused by the teaching and practice of sacramental things in the spiritual faith of Jesus Christ." He recalls the following, written by him eighteen years ago: "The longer I live in a heathen land, and the more I watch the effect of the so-called Christian rite of water baptism and the Supper upon the native converts, the more I am convinced, from the formality, littleness, schisms, and often sin to which they give rise, that they are not of God, and that it is my duty to teach that they are not."—The Friend (London).

WESTTOWN NOTES.

BEFORE these Westtown Notes shall have reached our readers the winter term will have closed. The contagion of mumps still continuing, it was thought wise to lengthen the vacation by a few days, so as to escape, if possible, the chance of the contagion continuing with us all of next term and probably seriously interfere with the regular school class. With this in view, school closed on the afternoon of the 15th of February, and the regular term resumed on the afternoon of the 29th; pupil registers were kept and leave Broad Street by the 1:30 p. m. train.

The Washington excursion alluded to a few weeks since has closed off on account of the mumps, to the disappointment of many. About seventy and eighty had enrolled. It is probable that as soon as the excursion will be made as planned for this year, the outbreak of the mumps will be that the class of '14, as such, cannot have the benefit. Considering the contagion alluded to, the health of the school has been good this year; record, so far as it concerns the boys, is the best for the school yet known for the past six years. This may be due to several causes working together, but we believe one important factor to be the closer supervision given to the out-of-school exercise. The gymnastic drills in the open-air gymnasium under Ralston Thomas have been more systematically supervised than formerly, and few excuses for absence from them have been tolerated.

"Visitors' Day" has been thus far omitted; the sentiment seems quite general that every alternate year will serve the purpose intended better than were the occasions more frequent. This being the year when the Old Scholars' Association does not meet at the School, it would seem to be the appropriate one for us to have a Visitors' Day, so that after our return from the holiday the topic may be taken up again.

Some time ago the question of having a revision of the complete Westtown catalogue was under discussion. There are reasons, which appeal to many, why this should be done, and if there is a sufficient demand for the book to warrant the expense, there are doubtless those who would gladly do the work that will be needed to prepare copy for the press. The following notice for insertion in THE FRIEND has just been received, which, as members of the Westtown family, we commend to our friends. The work will be undertaken if a sufficient number of persons will signify that they approve it. "A proposition has been made that the 'Westtown History and Catalogue' (printed in 1888) shall be brought up to date with the names of all Committee Friends, teachers and students from 1799 to 1914, inclusive. The Historical Committee of the W. O. S. A. will undertake this work if it can be found to be a warrantable proceeding. The card catalogue of the W. O. S. A. at the School cannot take the place of this book. So it is asked of the interested readers of these 'Notes' that they will send their views on the advisability of the reprinting of the Catalogue, addressing,

MARY HUTTON BIDDLE,

Wallingford, Pa."

THE near future will have something to report concerning the farming operations on Walnut Hill. At the present writing there is probably little that can be done but wait for more settled weather. Two teams of farm horses have been purchased and are housed in the new barn, a family has moved into the new tenement house, and James F. Walker, whose appointment as head of the orchard project was alluded to a few months ago, reported before the first.

FOLLOWING the example of Germantown Friends' School and Select School a general information test was given a week or more ago. The questions numbered one hundred and were divided into ten groups. All the children present, about two hundred, tried them. It was no small task to examine the twenty thousand answers; about ten of the questions were of such a character as to require an effort of judgment on the part of the examiners. As at the other two schools mentioned, the boys averaged a little better than the girls, as an indication that they are a little better informed on current topics. Joseph J. Walton of the First Class won first place among the boys, and Margaret W. Rhoads, of the same class, among the girls.

ON Seventh-day evening the 4th, the general announcement of results was given; among the answers were several that brought an innocent smile to the surface; Zion was located "as a place in the next world." The Decalogue was defined as "a dialogue in which ten took part." The Hebrides were located "as a constellation in the northern heavens." "The Hub" was "a city or place in Hades." "The King and Queen of England were said to reside in the Vatican." "In which direction does Chester Creek flow," called forth the answer, "Towards its mouth." It may be well for parents to try the same test during vacation.

We have had no Committee Friends with us during the week, and the addresses given on First-day evening were by two of our teachers, Carroll T. Brown and Sarah J. Bracken.

CORRESPONDENCE.

37 ALBERT STREET, East Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

Third Month 7th, 1914.

I should just like to say how very much my family and myself enjoy THE FRIEND. In these days of social unrest and with the military spirit so abroad it is very pleasant to turn to it for its high tone and deep spiritual messages. It is, may I say, a deep concern to some of us in Australia that Friends' principles in regard to peace should be better known, and some of us feel that we may do service for the Master in giving, as God wills, a clear, definite message.

I notice with regret that Edwin P. Sellev has passed to his rest. May I ask that our appreciation of his work be conveyed to his relatives?

I should be very glad to hear from any of our dear friends in America, and if there be any Peace Friends' Pamphlets that would be suitable, I should be glad to see them.

Sincerely,

C. FLINN.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has lately issued a letter to agents in the Indian service on the suppression of the liquor traffic. It is to be read in every Indian school and mission in the country on Fourth Month 6th. He says: "I believe the greatest present menace to the American Indian is whiskey. It does more to destroy his constitution and invite the ravages of disease than anything else. It does more than any other evil to demoralize the manhood and womanhood of the race. It does more to make him an easy prey to the unscrupulous than everything else combined. Let us save the American Indian from the curse of whiskey."

It is stated that New Orleans has an orange grove of 7,000 acres. A company has been launched to demonstrate that the fruit flourishes in Louisiana. More than 40,000 acres have been planted in seedlings.

A late despatch from Boston says: "Approximately $200 is on deposit in the savings banks of Boston for every man, woman and child living within the city limits. The total, according to the latest available figures, is $273,924,994. These 273 odd millions do not include the fortunes of the wealthy residents of the city; they are the deposits of persons of moderate means."

The planting of 1,000,000 pine trees, the first reforestation work by the State of Minnesota on a large scale, was begun in Itasca and Crow Wing Counties, in the northern part of the State. Most of the trees planted are white pine. W. T. Cox, State forester, has said that some experimental reforestation had been done in that part of the State, which has proven that the work will be a success. Cut-over and burned over land will be replanted.

The Massachusetts Forestry Association has offered a prize to the city or town in the State which shall plant the greatest number of shade trees, in proportion to its population, before Seventh Month.

In pursuance of retrenchment plans, the Pennsylvania Railroad has annulled a total of 118 passenger trains on the lines east of Pittsburgh and Erie, and a large number on the Western lines. The Pennsylvania Railroad in the last six years has operated an average of 2,280 trains daily on its eastern lines.

A despatch from Butte, Montana, says: "Large tracts of radium-bearing ore lands are reported in Beaverhead County. Three Butte miners are said to have made the find, and the fields are reported the largest ever found in the Northwest."

The population of Philadelphia is 60 per cent. foreign birth or of foreign parentage, according to a bulletin lately issued by the Bureau of Census in Washington. The classification includes only whites, and the total number in the city who are foreign-born, or of foreign parentage, either father or mother, is 879,363 out of a population of 1,463,371, based on the census of 1910. The English and Celtic group is about 26 per cent. of the city's population, while the German group includes 14 per cent. Others are: Yiddish and Hebrew, 8 per cent.; Italian, 5 per cent., and Polish, 3 per cent. The percentages for the State of Pennsylvania are approximately the same as for Philadelphia.

All applications for wholesale and retail liquor licenses in Venango County, Penna., were lately refused by Judge George S. Criswell, who had granted licenses continuously for eighteen years. There were twenty-three wholesale and retail licenses in the county last year, and three new applications were made this year. Judge Criswell has not disposed of two brewery applications. The applications were refused on the broad ground that they are not necessary, and in this connection Judge Criswell took into consideration the public welfare.

A despatch from Augusta, Me., says: "The Governor and Council have approved regulations adopted by the State Board of Health forbidding the use of common drinking cups and common towels in schools, on board trains, in hotels and restaurants and other public places."

Woman suffrage has been defeated in the United States Senate. The vote was 35 in favor to 34 against submitting a constitutional amendment to the State Legislatures. This defeated the measure, because a two-thirds vote of both Houses is required in order to submit to the Legislatures any proposed amendment. The opposition to the amendment came mainly from the South, where the suffrage question is complicated with the negro question, and from New England.

The number of Indians in the United States is said to be 331,000, which is a gain of 25,000 in three years. The Indian population of Canada is about 107,000 at present and increasing at the rate of 2,000 a year.

It is said that taking the year 1900 as the base year, retail prices in the United States, from 1900 to 1912, rose 39 per cent. In England they rose 15 per cent., in France 17 per cent., in Germany 28 per cent., in Russia 21 per cent., in Holland 23 per cent., in Belgium 32 per cent., in Norway 19 per cent., in Italy 20 per cent., in Austria 35 per cent., in Japan 38 per cent., in Australia and New Zealand 16 per cent., and in Canada 51 per cent.

A despatch from Chicago of the 1st inst., says: "Nearly 50,000 Ohio bituminous coal miners were forced into indefinite idleness to-day, and 38,000 Pennsylvania miners may be thrown out of employment because of the failure of the recent Chicago conference between the operators and officials of the United Mine Workers of America to reach a new wage agreement to take the place of the one which expired last midnight."

It is said that there are 350,000 newly enfranchised women in the State of Kansas.

FOREIGN.—It is stated that Germany now uses between 40,000,000 and 50,000,000 gallons of denatured alcohol a year, of which over 30,000,000 are sold to the general public for burning purposes. The importance of this fuel in Germany may be appreciated when it is considered that France uses about 18,000,000 gallons, the United States about 10,000,000 gallons, and the United Kingdom only 4,000,000 gallons annually.

A despatch of the 2d from Leeds, England, says: "One hundred and seventy thousand coal miners, practically all in Yorkshire, are on strike, the last of the notices given by the men having expired to-day. The stocks of coal at the pit heads are only sufficient to last a week. After that period the railroads and steel and iron works depending on the Yorkshire collieries for fuel will be seriously hampered, and many of the men employed by them may also be forced into idleness. The coal miners demand the introduction of a minimum wage scale."

A British motor omnibus company is to start a stage line between Bagdad and Beirut, a distance of 500 miles. It is a journey that now takes twenty days by camel. The route lies through Damascus and across a part of the Arabian desert. It is expected that a large number of American and European tourists will make the journey when it can be done by motor.

It is said that the Arlington radio station at Washington has been in communication with Honolulu, a distance of 5,280 miles. Daily exchanges are made with the Eiffel tower in Paris, 3,000 miles from Arlington.

NOTICES.

THE HOUSE OF INDUSTRY, Seventh and Race Streets, will be open all day for visitors, Fourth Month 22, 1914. Members of the Board of Managers will be glad to welcome all who care to come and to show them the work done by the women who are employed.

Friends who contribute to the Needlework Guild are urged to purchase the articles they donate from the House of Industry.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The following books have recently been added to Friends' Library:—
Fertis—History of the Original Settlements on the Delaware.

Lee—Crows.

Ogden—Quaker Ogdens.

Poixotto—Pacific Shores from Panama.

Perkins—Dutch Twins.

Reid—Sir Richard Tangye.

LINDA A. MOORE,
Librarian.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.32, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone 114A.

WM. B. HARVEY, Superintendent.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. Sixteenth Street, Phila., will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M.—Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 20th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when they are temporarily out of school or are unduly burdened in keeping up with their classes, or have been seriously interrupted in their studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Months strengthens the health, and the children gather up the best of their Westtown studies so that they can get an easier start for their year's work in their new school.

Applications for admission should be made to

THOMAS K. BROWN, Principal, Westtown, Pa.

My concern for our Yearly Meeting is that the uniting power of Divine love may prevail among our members by the constraining influence of the Holy Spirit; that walking in the Light, there may be consequent "fellowship one with another, the blood of Jesus Christ cleansing us from all sin."

J. E. R.

THE YEARLY MEETING IN ANTICIPATION.

As the appointed season draws near for that which used to be spoken of as a "solemnity", the feelings with which its approach is contemplated are as varied as our experience, our temperaments, or our general interest. To many it brings a sense of definite responsibility,—even "exercise" of mind and heart: to some, perhaps, it suggests an occasion for stimulation, exhilaration, or what they regard as "vision"; to still others doubtless (humble, earnest souls), it offers the hope of spiritual instruction, and of an increase in courage and faith. But in order "that all may learn and all may be comforted", it should be our high purpose in the several ranks to contribute those elements of self-sacrifice, dedication and humility which, under the Divine blessing, will culminate in true service, and make our gathering a solemnity in the best sense.

Again, we are variously affected by actually being part and parcel of this collective enterprise. The presence of numbers works as a spur to activity in some natures, and as a deterrent in others; accordingly, it may be needful for those of the one class to put some restraint upon their impulses, and for those of the other to overcome the diffidence which unduly limits their usefulness. Yet the greatest service in our coming together depends not so much upon the influence of numbers in themselves as upon the spirit which pervades the assembly and influences its proceedings. Here, as elsewhere, the fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much; and the hidden exercise of those whose dwelling is deep, may accomplish more than the ready expression of many others.

Moreover, the value and effectiveness of congregational activities at such a time must always have some relation to the trend of our interests during the fifty-one weeks intervening since the previous similar occasion. What has been the bent of our minds meanwhile? To whom have we yielded ourselves servants to obey? Have we diligently followed those thine, wherewith one may edify another, or have we given our strength to that which was not profitable? If during the year there has been little unity of spiritual feeling, or little solicitude for the prevalence of the best things, there will probably not be much fruitful labor when we are assembled.

Yet there must be different degrees of experience and stages of growth, and it is possible for all these to work together without conflict. "The members of the church-militant", said Richard Shackleton, "are still coming on and going off the stage of action: there must be a succession of clean hands to handle the discipline, and there must be some time in learning, that they may have skill in the work". The apostle Peter teaches a large and applicable lesson in few words: "Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder; yea, all of you"—he hastens to add—"be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility"; and Paul's straightforward acknowledgment, "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak", may be coupled with that fine compendium of church order, "Let all things be done unto edifying".

Now what can be more obviously beneficial in the transaction of our weighty affairs—more likely to edify the body and promote its service in the world—than a genuine desire to know the mind of the Spirit, and to have our human wills subject thereto? Here unity prevails,—and the peaceable wisdom. The confusion arising from the urgency of self-will and self-wisdom is avoided, and ultimately all things will be found to have worked together for good. There is room for diversities of gifts and of operations while there is the same Lord. There may be the word of wisdom and the word of knowledge, and there are the ear and the eye, the hand and the foot; but all these, for their harmony and their greatest efficiency, must be in some wise responsive to that Divine influence which would both move upon the individual mind and guide the "corporate conscience".

CONSIDERATION OF THE MINISTRY.

It has been said of the early Friends that they stopped at no barriers, provided they saw the goal they wished to attain. There came a day, a century or so later, when quite as much time and care were given to removing the barriers as were given to gaining the goal; sometimes even the removing of the barriers was made equivalent to the desired attainment. Much of this spirit survives into our twentieth century Quakerism, and it is well it does if we do not thereby become so overcharged with it that we make the less to include the greater.

There was nothing that the seventeenth century Friend would not set his hand to if he thought he felt a genuine call to the service. He trod with great reverence when he approached the threshold that opened upon things Divine, but when he was in the outer courts, where men and women and things were the actors, he treated them with all the human wisdom and seasoned judgment he could command. It is unfair to say that nothing was too sacred for him to handle, but it is quite true that he did not envelop matters of very serious importance with a sort of covering of sanctity and forbid himself and others the liberty of discoursing upon them.

It is therefore refreshing to find a company of Friends of the present time willing to take under review at a "tea meeting" a question so profound and fundamental as that of the ministry. This was done at a recent "reading circle" at Lansdowne, Pa., upon which occasion three papers were read on these topics: "Why should we have Speaking in Meeting?" "What Constitutes a Call to Speak in Meeting?" "Why is there not more Speaking in our Meeting?"

These papers were sent to THE FRIEND by an interested member of the Meeting, not by one of the authors. The thought that prompted the sending of the papers to us was that they might appear in our columns. It was our original intention to publish them, but aside from the fact that they are long, each contains much that is peculiarly appropriate to the time and place for which it was written. We have made the following generous selections from the three papers, and give them in the order of the titles just recited.—[EDS.]

"We hold our meetings for the purpose of Divine worship, and all that occurs therein must be a part of that Divine worship. In the act of worship the individual soul should with very great earnestness, and with the co-operating assistance of all of the faculties with which it is endowed, reverence, imagination, learning, explore into the profoundest truths and mysteries of life, seeking thereby to bring his own thoughts and life into closer harmony with the Divine will than ever before. . . . Under the stimulus and excitation of deep religious experience there is bound to be, sooner or later, some verbal expression of it on the part of the worshipper, even though it be only an involuntary and inarticulate ejaculation.

. . . . Our meetings are for mutual helpfulness and for the help of the whole body, and the need of the individual to give expression publicly to his or her feeling may be very real, even though it be not within the range of the term "ministry" as usually used. The care must always be to restrain such individual exercises within the proper bounds, so as not to prejudice the congregation as a whole. . . . But the ministry with which we have most to do is that which is akin to the old time prophecy, and seeks to teach the congregation what they ought or ought not to do or think, or to exhort them to a life of right principles. . . . It seems to me clear that there is within each of us that principle, which is the germ of all truth, and which, properly developed will lead us to a higher and higher life. Call it whatever you will, 'The Word,' as in our Bibles; the 'Logos' of the theologians, the 'Inner Light' of the early Friends, or by whatever name seems most acceptable, it is still that indefinable essence which seems to exist in man at all times, and wherever he is found; which points him upward and onward; which distinguishes him from the beast; and which instantly responds to truth when it is brought home to it, and which seems capable of infinite development and growth. . . . We might liken this germ of truth to the delicate harp cords of the inner ear, or it is like the sensitive antennae of the wireless telegraph, which, standing high in the air, are unaffected by the myriad electric vibrations which surge constantly about them, until they are touched by impulses for which they are attuned—which for them are the true ones—whereupon they instantly respond, and communicate the message to the waiting operator below. If, then, there is in each one of us this potential germ which needs but to grow and expand in order to take control of our lives and help make them what they should be, our great problem is how to break down or tear away the encircling ceremonies. We need, as it were, to take some keen surgeon's knife and cut through layer after layer of the outer covering so that the spirit within may shine brighter and brighter, until it gain its full power over us. But what sort of a surgeon's knife shall we use? and after we have found it, how shall we find a surgeon of sufficient skill to handle it? Just here is our great question, and, it seems to me, just here is the point where we need at least a part of our Friends' ministry.

"We are told by students that while the anatomy of all men is substantially uniform, yet in details there is among individuals the greatest variation, . . . so with our spiritual bodies, they are much alike and suffer from the same diseases and derangements, but the peculiarities of each individual must be dealt with and treated according to its individual needs. Adopting the figure which was used before—the harp or the wireless telegraph—we must strike the note or start into being the right electric impress to which that particular individual will respond, whereupon all the wrappings which were about that indwelling germ of truth will quickly vanish away—like the walls of Jericho, they will fall before the trumpet notes which are sounded from God Himself.

The force of ministry depends not on its quantity, nor yet on its quality in the sense of learning or rhetoric, but upon that unexpressible quality of opening a way into the individual heart whereby the imprisoned glory already there may escape to lighten the body. Thus often we see very remarkable results following from very humble ministrations, and we have heard very excellent and polished sermons which leave no lasting impression. . . . It is not that we need a great deal of ministry, but we want the appealing kind, and this, I sometimes think, will come more often from the experience of those who are struggling hardest in the battle of life and who fall often, than from those who have attained to a degree of quiet self-control, which knows few outward battles or temptations, and which is concerned with what we might term contemplative religion. . . . I sometimes think we have set the standard of our ministry so high that one with a sensitive spirit and diffident nature will never be able to convince himself that the call to him is real. This is a serious error. . . . The truth through whatever channel is still truth, and though stained somewhat with earth may thereby be the more beautiful. . . . I have thought of the ministry as of lights shining through so many different lanterns, with different colored glass, and some clear and some dirty and smutty. It is all the same light, and it is all needed to help us to see our way, and even the smallest rays may help to lighten the darkness a little. . . . It seems to me that if it is the truth which shines upon us we need not think much of the kind of lantern out of which it shines, remembering the words of a great and good man:

"To me the meannest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

"The Friendly view of worship is that it is a personal matter between the individual soul and its Maker. This carries with it the requirement that all the exercises of the meeting, be they silent introspection and prayer or vocal service of any kind, shall be such as are conducive to the attainment of that vital communion which constitutes worship. . . . What man can know the needs of those who are sitting with him, or, knowing them, can tell how all or any one of those needs can be met? It may be that no vocal service can reach them all, unless it be one so blessed by the Head of the Church that all the hearers may find that contact with Him which, as in the case of Job of old, causes all their doubts and troubles to fade away into insignificance.

"Doubtless in our meetings for worship we have all thought of things which might be said. Texts can be recalled easily. . . . Such exercises as those hinted at might be performed most impressively and yet fail to meet the needs of the hour. How clear it seems then, that if those needs are to be met, a wisdom higher than human must choose the message and the messenger. . . . Vocal service in our meetings is only one of many forms of service, and the call to it may presumably come in various ways. Some may feel a message taking shape in their minds for many days before the time comes to deliver it. To others the impulse may come more suddenly. But however it may come, I believe that the sense of duty in the matter is always present. In some cases this may be of overwhelming power. 'Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel,' says the apostle. In others it may be perfectly real and yet so gentle that a lack of willingness may be enough to extinguish it entirely.

'Doubtless our Master could impress His message upon each individual consciousness directly. It is equally true that He does not always choose to follow that method, but selects some one to bear His message. I cannot presume to give the reasons for this. I do believe, however, that we can at times understand things better when presented in concrete form. Here enters the human element. Does it make any difference who bears the message? I believe that it does make a difference. For instance, if the speaker is known to have been a prodigal son himself, how much more impressive may be his presentation of the woes of the sinner and the joys of the reception in the father's house! . . . The prophet Hosea's message grew out of his life, acquiring a vividness not to be had in any other way. . . . I presume that a sense of unworthiness is one of the commonest difficulties in the way of those who are called upon to speak in our meetings. This is but natural, and is as old as prophecy itself. But if none spoke except the perfect, how little speaking there would be! Probably we all have noticed the hush which comes when an unfamiliar voice breaks the silence of our meetings. Though the vessels be earthen and imperfect, they have some part in the influence of the message. . . . Just a word regarding the third part of the subject assigned to me, the adaptation of the message to the audience. Sometimes a message may be difficult to understand, the thought may be involved, or the expression may be far from lucid, and yet the spirit breathing through it may show it to have had the proper source.

In most cases, however, the observation of the Apostle Paul is applicable, 'In the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.'

"In conclusion, if I were to attempt to say what attitude on the part of the worshippers would be most conducive to proper vocal expression, I should say—perfect willingness to bear the message if it should be required; prayerful watchfulness to see if it may be required, and earnest faithfulness when it is required."

"Recently at our meeting—spoke of the reluctance of many people to trouble themselves to do things which would be of help to their neighbors and friends. . . . also—has spoken to us recently of the hesitancy of most people to sacrifice themselves for the benefit of some one else's life, to be willing to suffer physically or mentally for the sake of another. I have thought of these things in connection with the subjects under discussion. What do we actually do to help one another to reach our ideals, to meet our problems? What are we doing to make our meetings for worship deeper and their influence more wide-spread? Our meetings should be times when we can renew strength and failing courage, when we can have proved again in terms of life to-day those principles which each generation has tested and proved sufficient for its own needs. . . . Are we using our meetings for the larger spiritual growth of those attending, and are we bringing to these meetings a sense of our individual responsibility and a readiness to serve in whatever way we can find?"

"The attitude in which we approach our meetings for worship seems to me of exceedingly great importance; in fact, I think their good results will be almost directly in proportion to the amount of responsibility we feel, and the attitude of expectation and encouragement which we bring into them.

The things which we long for, the things which we look for, are the things which we will unconsciously help bring to pass.

'Are we expecting the hour of worship to bring forth newer and richer experiences? Are we making our own struggle with their victories and defeats sources of encouragement to some one else? Are we meeting half way a possible call to offer to some one else a thought or experience which might solve some one else's difficulty? Is there any advantage at all in coming together to worship—should there not be a feeling of fellowship strong enough to be felt? . . . Spiritual life in meetings will manifest itself in living silences and in public speech. . . . Christ so infused His spirit into the lives of His friends and impressed on them so strongly, the need the world had of His spirit that they consecrated themselves to the task of bringing others into the influences of His life. . . . Do we encourage this spirit of fellowship, and give the human encouragement which He meant His disciples to use in pointing the way to the life of Christ? . . . Is there an atmosphere of encouragement and expectation which invites spiritual communion? . . . There is a part of the meeting for which the human in us is responsible. I have been wondering if we do not neglect this part for which we are responsible, and expect the divine will to work in us in spite of our own attitude of indifference. . . . Often it is the short message of the one whose courage is hardly sufficient to carry him through, which calls forth the greater response from the listeners than that spoken by one whose voice is heard more often and whose phraseology has become familiar. . . . But we say, 'he should not speak unless he is sure of a call to speak.' Just here, I think, is the trouble; in our anxiety to prevent people from speaking too thoughtlessly we have focussed our attention on the negative side till we find ourselves taking some such train of thought as this,—'I must not speak unless I am positive I am called upon to speak,' then one easily slips into the next negative stage of 'I probably shall not be called on to speak,' and after that, 'I am not called to speak,' and finally, though it may never be expressed definitely in our own mind, our attitude becomes, 'I probably never shall be called on to speak.' After that stage is reached it is only a short step further till we find ourselves saying, 'I wonder why so and so didn't speak to-day, I thought he surely would?'

If the majority of those in the meeting are people who have either consciously or unconsciously settled it in their own minds that they will never have a call to speak, how can the atmosphere be anything but lifeless?"

"One of the great needs of the Church to-day, as someone has said, is a Quaker revival. We need to learn the power of silence." So writes Canon Tupper-Carey in an able paper on Intercessory Prayer on behalf of Christian Missions in the current issue of East and West; and he goes on to say: "I first learned about the extraordinary power of silence in New Zealand during the Mission of Help two years ago. We came across some 'Friends' in the Hawkes Bay district. The vicar of the parish said that he allowed them to come for an hour a week to his church, as they had no other building in which to meet. During the Mission, however, the missionary asked them to come every day, and he invited the church-people to join with them. I heard the missionary and the vicar speak about their experience at the Bishop's Conference, both of them said the effect of these silent meetings was the most wonderful experience they had had in their lives."—The Friend (London).

O, THE malady of the soul! how foul it is!

There is not in nature an antidote to so great evil; but the Lord of life and glory came down from Heaven, from the bosom of His Father, to recover lost mankind, and throw consolatory hope into the cup of human woe, made a bitter cup by man's disobedience and pride.

Gracious, holy Father! open the blind eye! unstup the deaf ear! that we may see and acknowledge the mystery of thy condescending love!

MARY CAPPER.

SPIRITUAL ALONENESS.

In all the deeper experiences of the spiritual life the soul must tread a solitary way. There are blessings that come to us through our being component parts of the family, or the community, or the church; but those which have to do with our eternal relationships find us in our individuality dealing directly with the realities of the unseen. There are no greater mysteries than are wrapt up in these two small words, "God" and "I." There is an ocean of meaning in these drops of language. It will take us all our days, and then the work will have only begun, to find out their depths.

Jacob, we are told, was "left alone," when "there wrestled a man with him till the breaking of the day." It was the crisis of his life and he had to go through it alone. He bore the marks of that midnight struggle till the end, for he came out of it a crippled and broken, yet divinely blest man. In the dust he became a prince. In the loneliness he saw God face to face, and that heavenly vision stamped his character with an indelible mark. Is it any wonder that God loved to be called more frequently "the God of Jacob" than by any other name? Jacob was by no means an amiable character. His brother, Esau, appeals to the observer much more at first sight. But Jacob was a man whose spirit reached out after the divine. Heaven, as far as we know, never opened to Esau. Angels never appeared to the man who preferred the mess of pottage to the privilege of priestly office, in the family of the chosen patriarchs, through which God purposed to bless all the nations of the earth. Esau never had a Daniel, never cared to be left alone with God.

And it is so to-day. I care not what the natural bent may be, aloneness with God will elevate and refine the most unpromising. Jacobs may still become Israels and beggars of the dust princes of the aristocracy of Heaven.

Of all the sons of men only one did not require the ordeal of repentance. Repentance is a lonely piece of business. Sin isolates from God and from one's fellows also; and repentance is a wider entering into the sense of this isolation and feeling its gravity. Though our holy Redeemer did not know repentance for Himself, the heart of His atoning sacrifice consists in His repentance for others. And to Him, too, it was a lonely struggle in the darkness, rejected of earth and forsaken of Heaven as far as His consciousness went in that solemn hour. But if He repented for us, He did not repent instead of us, to let us off from repentance. The lonely path of repentance is the one that leads to that door opened in Christ into the blessedness that is found in God.

A striking picture of the loneliness of the ordeal of repentance is given by the prophet Zechariah in these words: "I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born. In that day there shall be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon. And the land shall mourn, every family apart; the family of the house of David apart, and their wives apart; the family of the house of Nathan apart, and their wives apart; the family of the house of Levi apart, and their wives apart; the family of the house of Simeon (of Simeon as LXX) apart, and their wives apart. All the families that remain every family apart, and their wives apart." (Zech. xii: 9-14).

It is a picture of national confession of sin we have in these words, but the repentance is profoundly individual. No one accuses another, everyone smites his own breast. David and Nathan weep apart; Nathan cannot go to David now, he has enough to do with his own guilt. Levi and Simeon had been partners in wickedness, but no one dares to excuse his own share of the guilty deed. Husbands and wives get away from each other to be alone with God. The agony of repentance must be gone through in solitude.

All true prayer requires aloneness with God for its exercise. Hear the Master on this great subject. "Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." Of course, these words have more than a letter meaning. There is only one inner chamber, there is only one secret place, there is only one holy realm where the human meets the Divine, that is within the soul itself. The door that must be shut is the consciousness of the external world. When we enter the secret place visible and external things must be shut out. We have not begun to pray until we have reached this inner chamber, and we have not yet discovered a permanent centre of peace until we have come to the inner kingdom, "a house of defence" from all outward storms and disturbances, where we are engaged in the adoration of the Divine perfections in the silence of love and worship. The essence of true prayer is its solitariness—God and I—the finite personality of the human swallowed up in the infinite personality of the Divine, whether vocal exercise is called for or not.

When Saul of Tarsus caught a glimpse of the purpose of God with his life, separated from his mother's womb and called by the internal voice of the Spirit within him and by the voice that spoke to him in the Hebrew tongue out of the midst of the brightness, eclipsing the noonday sun on the Damascus road, even that it was the good pleasure of the Father to reveal His Son in him, immediately he conferred not with flesh and blood, neither did he turn to the older apostles, but he retired into Arabia, there to listen to that still, small voice of calm that succeeded the earthquake, whirlwind and fire experiences through which he had passed. And out of that silence, aloneness and solitude he came forth the apostle to the nations.

And in this self-same school of aloneness with God first-hand witnesses to Divine Truth are still being formed and qualified for their service towards this our busy, fussy and talkative twentieth century.

MAX I. REICH.

Complied by B. M. Rhoads.

A FEW selections of expressions of our dear Friend, Christopher Healy, of Bucks County, Pa., in his last illness, 1851. . . . He received messages of love from several distant Friends, which seemed very precious to his feelings, and said he believed that many in different places felt united with him in spirit, and his dear love was to them. At a later date he said, "Oh! if I could now settle away and go to sleep in the arms of my beloved Saviour how glad I would be, but it is not time yet. His time is the best time and the right time. He has brought me through all my trials and temptations, and landed me safe in a well-grounded hope of a happy eternity! What a consolation it is to me, and how glad I am that I can say at such a time as this, that I feel no condemnation, everything looks bright and pleasant, yes, as clear and as bright as the light. I have that hope which is an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, and enters into that within the veil whither our forerunner has gone. . . . I am ready to pass the valley and shadow of death to that City whose inhabitants shall not hunger any more, neither thirst any more, for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and lead them into living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. . . . I now say, as I have often said, 'Friends speak often one to another,' and, if we speak right, the Lord will hearken and hear. I do not mean we should speak often one to another in common conversation or about things of the world, but about Heavenly things; encourage one another and endeavor to get into that pure state of mind in which we will say no evil, and the Lord will hearken and hear, 'and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name.'" His last words were, "Peace, peace!"

WHETHER therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. (1 Corinthians xi: 31.)

THE QUAKER MISSION AMONG THE INDIANS OF NEW YORK STATE.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

A year later (1821) Joseph Elkinton wrote that it was a time of great commotion among the Indians because they were not united in sentiment about dividing their land in severalty, and that the party opposing improvements had succeeded in getting the school closed until a general Council could be held at Buffalo. Some designing men had circulated the rumor that the Quakers would take their land for their services, whereupon the Friends in Philadelphia sent the following:

"To the Chiefs and others of the Seneca Nation, residing on the Allegheny:

"Brothers, We have been informed that some of you are uneasy in your minds for fear that your brothers, the Quakers, will bring a charge against you for the assistance they have afforded you in your endeavors to improve in the manner of living and in the management of your lands.

"We hereby tell you plainly, as we have often told you before, that the Quakers, your brothers, do not want any of your land, any of your skins, nor any of your money, for anything they have done for you, and that they will never charge against you for any of these things, and we send you this writing to keep forever, to make your minds easy on this respect.

(Signed by 26 Friends).

PHILADELPHIA, 19th First Month, 1821.

This assurance, with other tokens of unselfish interest, brought forth this reply some two years later:

"Brothers, the Quakers' Make your mind easy, for we shall endeavor to have your advice attended to, and we become a useful people, and we much wish that our children become valuable citizens. We believe the reason of Indians having dwindled away to almost nothing has been by their irregular conduct, and sufficient attention not having been given to the marriage agreement, etc., which we desire may no longer be the case amongst us; we desire that our people should be orderly and feel gratitude flow in their hearts daily to the Great Spirit for favors; we also wish you to know that our brothers who now live beside us, we love and feel very choice of, and hope they may long continue with us.

"Ever since Joseph Elkinton has been here, your desires for us in various respects, such as schooling, industrious habits, etc., have been repeatedly told to us by him, and we think great improvement has been made by us in several respects. He has attended faithfully to the school, whether few or many scholars, and that branch has been progressed in by our children. We have never yet seen him act amiss."

For a few years the school at Tunesassa was discontinued, but those who had been taught there were employed by the Indians to teach their children at other places on the Allegheny reservation. Friends, however, continued to keep themselves thoroughly posted about the conditions and needs of the Senecas. Three of the Friends returned, most opportunely, in 1835, when a terrible flood had carried away two-thirds of the crops.

We note that there are about three hundred more Indians resident on the Allegheny reservation now than was the case in 1835.

Enoch Lewis, one of the greatest mathematicians of last century, with Robert Scotten, found only eight families possessed of means sufficient to prevent them from suffering, and so they distributed $1000 among them during the winter of 1836, and an additional $200 for seed potatoes. Another disastrous flood called forth a like sum in the following summer. The school at Tunesassa was reopened that year.

The Indians parted with some 88,000 acres of their land, and most strenuous efforts were used to persuade the Senecas to move to Green Bay, Wisconsin. After repeated councils with the Chiefs they were dissuaded from this very questionable move and the report of J. Moch Lewis and Joseph Elkinton in 1837 concludes with, "It appears to us that our duty is a plain one. That we ought to exert such influence as we possess to induce them to hold fast their present possessions, to improve themselves and their land as rapidly as possible and to become not only a civilized but a Christian community. If they should be induced to accede to the flattering offer which are so industriously presented to their view, it appears to us that a few more fleeting years will join their name and memory with those which are no longer known except on the historian's page."

Friends repeatedly went to Washington, D. C., in behalf of these Indians and did all they could to prevent the ratifications of the treaty of 1838 and that of 1842—whereby a compromise was made with the Ogden Land Company.

The annals of this period would not be complete without mentioning the name of Ebenezer Worth, who came from near Philadelphia and labored most devotedly for seven years on the Allegheny Reservation, teaching school and advising the Indians in many ways. He was greatly beloved by them, as he frequently visited them in their houses and gave to them liberally of his ample means, as well as of his time and sympathy. Sixty children were in attendance at three schools under his direction—one at Horse Shoe, a second at Cold Spring, and a third at Corn Planter's.

It would be impossible, in a sketch of this kind, to do justice to all the noble men and women who, under a true religious concern for the good of these natives, sacrificed much that was nearest and dearest to them. There is one name, however, that should not be forgotten in the early establishment of this mission among the Senecas.

Jonathan Thomas lived and labored very helpfully among them between 1796 and 1821. His daughter, writing of him, said, "Though but a little child, I well remember his staid and serious deportment while laboring for the Indian people; to them he was a true helper, and his counsel was often sought and his advice followed. It was a common expression with them, 'Jonathan could do no wrong; he did not know how.'"

Up to 1852 the schools under the care of Friends had been day schools, but in the winter of that year a boarding-school was started at Tunesassa. The progress of the students has always been more satisfactory when they reside at the school, and its capacity has been increased from time to time, so the average attendance for several years has been about fifty-five boys and girls—equally divided between the sexes.

The laying of railroads through the Allegheny Reservation gave the Friends much anxiety on account of the character of the men employed, and up to date (1914) it is said some three hundred Indians have been killed on the railroad, many of them because they were under the influence of liquor.

The settlement of whites on this reservation, especially at Salamanca, has always been attended with serious danger to the Indians—introducing many complications, of which the supply of liquor has not been the least. But upon seriously talking over the whole effect of this now considerable city with the missionary, Morton F. Trippe, who resides there and who has devoted himself to the Senecas for thirty-three years past, he could but give credit to the good influence of the High School in Salamanca, and to some of the best citizens resident there. And thus we see in all human affairs good and evil are generally mixed.

The course of history invariably reveals periods of transition to be attended with grave set-backs as well as dangers, and the greatest comfort comes from the fact that, generally speaking, the best survives and century-long fears are succeeded by confidence in the triumph of right. This is illustrated by the present probability that the Senecas in New York State will remain on their reservations and that they will gradually become self-supporting, as some of them have shown quite as much thrift and ability as their white neighbors.

(To be concluded.)

LAUREATES AND BRIDGES.

How long have our English cousins, more jealous than the spirit of poetry be a part of their national life than we are, it seems, had a poet Laureate? Wondering about this the other day, I set to work to find out, and am passing on the old news.

Hundreds and hundreds of years ago in Greece, the poet whom the people loved to honor was crowned with a wreath of verdant laurel, and in the Middle Ages the pretty custom was revived. In the fourteenth century we read that Petrarch was crowned in Rome, and it soon became customary in Paris, Oxford and Cambridge to crown those of unusual literary merit. Our English word laureate (Latin Laurus, laurel), has sprung from this time-honored custom, and the title has been given to those whom the English crown chose to write poems of occasion, either in the Royal family or in the State.

John Skelton, of the sixteenth century, was probably the first to receive the title Poet Laureate, which he conferred on himself after receiving the laurel from both English Universities.

About that time minstrels and poets were frequently attached to the Royal Court, and their compensation was given in the form of pensions. Chaucer, in the fourteenth century, received a pension and also a measure of wine daily, but for diplomatic service rather than poetry. In after times the measure of wine became a part of the Laureate's compensation.

Ben Jonson was considered a Laureate because of the pensions he received, although he was never officially appointed to the office.

So far as is known, John Dryden, of the seventeenth century, with whose lyric, "The Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," we are familiar perhaps, was the first official Poet Laureate, and he received the appointment by Royal Letters Patent.

Since then England has had her Laureate almost without an intermission until now, the death of one being closely followed by the appointment of another. After Tennyson's death, however, about four years elapsed before a successor was chosen, for the wisdom of asking even the best to take a position so lately glorified was doubted. At last, however, it was felt a pity to give up the old tradition because of temporary inefficiency, and the appointment was given to Alfred Austin. Can we wonder that a nation should hesitate before asking any mortal to take up the mantle of the immortal?

Since the first official Laureate, John Dryden, the best known of his successors have been Robert Southey, William Wordsworth and Alfred Tennyson. Tennyson's compensation, by the way, was £72 a year, beside £27 in lieu of the "butt of sack" of tradition.

Tennyson's successor, Alfred Austin, who does not seem to have made a very deep impression, was followed by the present Laureate, Robert Bridges. Let us look him up a little, for his name will go down in the history books, and perhaps he has something for us that is worth while, though it is so hard to find out what is worth while in literature till we have had years and years to think about it.

Robert Bridges was born in 1844, educated at Eton and at Oxford, was prominent as an athlete, and later studied and practiced medicine. Indeed, he had several important hospital appointments before his retirement from the medical profession. Medicine and literature, we notice, sometimes go hand in hand, as in the case of Oliver Wendell Holmes, S. Weir Mitchell and Robert Bridges. It takes a good-sized brain to succeed in either line, and perhaps the bigger the brain the more sides it has. However, Bridges soon gave up medicine for literature, and his pen has been active and versatile.

His first volume of poems appeared in 1873, when he was not quite thirty years old. It was a thin volume bound in blue, and he soon conceived an intense dislike for it, and whenever he found a copy destroyed it if possible. Edmund Gosse tells of finding him in a friend's library at one time clandestinely cutting out the pages of the little blue volume and replacing the cover on the shelf. For years he was intensely secretive and sensitive about his literary work, and he has always seemed to care little for popularity.

At about middle life, after he had given up the practice of medicine, he left London, and retired to a quiet country village in Berkshire, where among strangers and far from the sound of the locomotive whistle, he could dream and meditate all day long, and write when the mood came. We are told that Browning and Wordsworth wrote even in uninspired moments—can we not believe it?—but Bridges wrote when the muse sanctioned, or he waited. He had nothing to hurry for, and he gave the outside world scarcely a thought. His works therefore, for a life now nearly rounded out, are not numerous, but almost without exception they manifest the poetic touch.

Edmund Gosse thinks that Bridges is very independent of criticism, for one who is withal so sensitive, and that he sometimes so far defies other people's tastes, in carrying out his own experiments and theories, as to be unfortunate; that he is primarily austere, does not deafen with sound or blind with color, and even neglects the sensuous aspects of beauty; that he is at times so devoid of ornament and so unemphatic that he is difficult for the ordinary reader to follow, and that he tries to return to the old idea that "poetic value is in the essence of what is written, not the attributes." Thus he arranges his own meter, or returns to one long unused and almost forgotten.

The dramas, of which there are eight, have little attraction for the ordinary reader, but having begun them, there is something about them that holds us often to the end. Of these, the finest is thought to be the Return of Ulysses, a dramatizing of the chief scenes in the Odyssey. In some respects Nero is thought to be the most dramatic of the plays, and the Feast of Bacchus is worth some study. Achilles in Scyros is said to contain much simple beauty.

But the short poems will appeal to most of us more than the dramas, and it is in them that we feel that his name will live, for they are full of the rhythm and word-painting of the real poet. In them we realize that he feels the beauty of the flower's coloring and of the cloud's motion, of the bird's song and the brook's babble. Indeed, he seems to have breathed in the spirit of the whole out-doors, and to breathe it out again so easily, that we feel he thinks in poetry, and that he gives us the thought just as it came to him. There is a certain simplicity and purity about some of the little lyrics that charm those whose ears are attuned to the softer and less extravagant harmonies. Some one has said that the shorter poems "have the sudden irresistible charm of the lyrics of the Elizabethan song books, like nothing in English poetry from then till now." When his collected poems were published in 1900, Edmund Gosse called them "delicate flute music," and characterized them as among the finest and simplest poetry of our age.

Except the dramas, his poems now appear in one volume. In this, the best of the long poems is thought to be Prometheus the Fire-Giver, a Mask after the Greek. Indeed, there is much of the Greek Mythology in his works.

Like Tennyson, he knows many flowers by name, and in one poem, called "The Idle Flowers," he names between seventy and eighty flowers and plants.

Some prose he has written, which, however, is read but little. It is sufficient along this line to mention a technical criticism called Milton's Prosody.

Bridges' work—I quote—"has influenced by its restraint, purity, precision and delicacy yet strength of expression." And yet the New York Tribune about Christmas time said, "In issuing his first poem, the new British Laureate wisely took advantage of the season of brotherly kindness." The poem was called "Christmas Eve," and the verse form was that of the Vision of Piers Plowman (1340).

Perhaps the Tribune isn't quite capable of apprehending the poetic in so ancient a garb.

Bridges is not and never will be the poet for the crowd, he did not try to be, and his work is not the kind that appeals to one who rushes from this form of sensation to that, who deals in superlatives and direct appeal to the sense of excitement. But to those whose spirit is in tune to feel with his spirit, he will ever bear a welcome message.

With our free libraries at hand and our well-stocked book-shops it is needless for me to add much from Bridges' work to what is already quoted in these pages. Let us just read in closing the first few lines of A Passerby—

"Whither, oh splendid ship, thy white sails crowding,
Leaning across the bosom of the urgent West,
That fairest nor sea-rising nor sky-clouding,
Whither away, fair rover, and what thy quest?"

There are other lines just as full of the poet's vision. Among them are some that we may not feel able to appreciate— who shall tell us whether the fault be Robert Bridges' or our own? but shall we not hope that the latest of the Laureates may not be the least?

LAUS DEO.

Let praise devote thy work, and skill enjoy
Thy whole mind, and thy heart be lost in joy
Well-doing bringeth pride, this constant thought,
Humility, that thy best done is nought.
Man doeth nothing well, be it great or small,
Save to praise God; but that hath saved all;
For God requires no more than thou hast done,
And takes thy work to bless it for His own.

—ROBERT BRIDGES.

ETERNAL Father, who didst all create,
In whom we live, and to whose bosom move,
To all men be Thy name known, which is Love,
Till its loud praises sound at heaven's high gate.
Perfect thy kingdom in our passing state,
That here on earth Thou may'st as well approve
Our service, as Thou ownest theirs above,
Whose joy we echo and in pain await.

Grant body and soul each day their daily bread:
And should in spite of grace fresh we begin,
Even as our anger soon is past and dead
Be Thy remembrance mortal of our sin:
By Thee in paths of peace Thy sheep be led,
And in the vale of terror comforted.

From "The Growth of Love," by ROBERT BRIDGES.

THE seat of the scornful is one of the special dangers of this age. Pride, presumption and scorn are closely linked together, and are far indeed from the mind which was in Christ Jesus. This spirit often shows itself in the present day in the form of irreverent criticism. Those who are spiritually least qualified for it are to be found sitting in the seat of judgment rather than taking the place of the inquirer and the learner. The Bereans of old did not scornfully reject the, to them, strange teachings of the Apostle Paul, but searched the Scriptures daily to see whether these things were so. Now, forsooth, the Scriptures themselves are called in question, and the very foundations of Christian faith are abandoned by men who would fain be looked upon as the apostles of the modern thought. May God preserve His people from abandoning the faith once for all delivered to the saints for the baseless, ephemeral fancies of the present day.

—J. HUDSON TAYLOR

Selected for THE FRIEND by B. M. Rhoads.

"CHRISTIANS, expect not, hope not, desire not your fellow-pilgrims to be the counterpart of yourselves. He who, rich in mercy, has called so great a variety of men to be fellow-partakers of the Gospel of Christ and fellow-heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven, can so move the hearts of his people that different graces shall be for each other's good and His glory. Go on your way, then, not only loving your gracious Lord, but also loving one another, bearing each other's burdens, forgiving each other's trespasses, avoiding each other's faults and emulating each other's graces."

FROM THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE TRACT ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

While in the year just closed more Friends have taken part in the circulation of our Tracts than in some previous years, we still feel that more of the members of our religious Society should take part in this good work. All do not feel called to the personal distribution, but many of this latter class can give the Association valuable assistance by informing us of openings which may come to their knowledge, where Tracts would be eagerly and profitably read.

In reviewing the labors of our Auxiliary Associations, we feel that they have many opportunities to aid us in a work that should not be looked upon with apathy or indifference, and we would affectionately encourage the several officers and members of these Auxiliaries to renewed diligence and faithfulness in this seed sowing; reminding them as well as ourselves that we are not to grow weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not.

We have been encouraged by the faithfulness of a Friend in a neighboring State, who under a feeling of religious duty has within the past year distributed over 7,000 Tracts and Juveniles, making personal calls from house to house, in rural neighborhoods adjacent to his home. Through our Depository and other channels, we have had a number of interesting letters, giving evidence of the good a tract may do, and of the value placed on those we issue, by some who have read them.

A person in the lumber districts of Wisconsin, surrounded by many who apparently give but little thought to the life that is to come, and feeling her almost complete isolation from congenial spirits, after receiving a small selection of our Tracts, writes as follows: "I received a package of booklets and leaflets, and I thank you very much. I have been hungrily reading them ever since they came. Oh, they are so good, I can't leave them alone. I have handed them among my Christian friends and they enjoy reading them very much. We intend passing them on to others when we are through. We haven't had any meeting for about a month; no minister has been here. A friend of mine works at a boarding-house, and has a good opportunity to leave the leaflets where others pick them up and read them. They do me much good, and when I read them I feel that I am not half good enough, and they give me the desire to improve and grow more like them."

A Friend who has from time to time placed a few of our Tracts on a Table in a waiting-room at one of the Ferries, was recently accosted by the attendant, who said that some Jewesses had picked up the Tract No. 180. The Letter of a Young Jewess to Her Father, and had asked her to try to obtain for them others that told about Christ, which was done.

From Ontario we get the following: "I have just read with much spiritual profit, two booklets, Preaching by Women as well as by Men, No. 77, and The True Christian Communion, No. 154. I must confess that this is contrary to the way I have been worshipping, but I believe I see a truth that heretofore has passed unnoticed. We are hungry, very much so, for the deeper experiences in the things pertaining to God and his Christ, our precious Saviour and Friend." Later he writes, "I have read many articles on Prayer and Worship, but never have seen anything so profitable and strengthening, as your pamphlet on Worship, No. 140. My conception of Prayer and the approach into the "Divine Presence" have been enlightened. Your suggesting silence and waiting surely is very significant; I see this now much more clearly than ever before."

One of our Distributors who visits the sailors on shipboard, while in this port, says in writing for a fresh supply, "Those which you so kindly furnished me came in very good. That they have been placed to good advantage, and results accomplished that will be far beyond our present realization, there can be no question. They have reached 'the uttermost parts of the world,' for I placed them in the hands of crews going to all parts of the globe. Only I wish I had some in Norwegian, Hungarian, etc. In fact, I can use all sound Tracts that have Christ as the power of God unto Salvation and deliverance from the curse of sin. Once more I make an appeal for some of your printed matter which has been so valuable in our missionary work, both aboard ships and in the homes of squalor, as well as in every other place where good tracts may encourage those in sin to seek a better life in Christ, those in error to learn the truth. It would take too long to tell of instances in our work which would be very interesting, the opportunities to get in homes of sin and talk to them, to reach backsliders, who are encouraged to start again in the right path. And as to results, I am sure that part will be made known some day, and all who had part in it will have great cause to rejoice."

From a mission worker in this city we received the following instructive testimony to the mastery which tobacco obtains over those who use it: "Some time ago I received some Tracts from your Association, among them was The Deadly Cigarette. We are organizing an Anti-Cigarette League, and would like about fifty or one hundred of them. I assure you they will be used to good advantage, with prayerful distribution. I am a Sunday school teacher at . . . Mission. We find cigarettes a menace to the boys and young men,—yes, and often find it easier for a man to give up intoxicating liquors than for him to give up smoking. The cigarette tract is especially good, and I want every member of our League to have one, especially the boys."

From a person in Vermont we received the following gratifying information: "Please send me a number of those envelope-sized booklets, entitled The Deadly Cigarette, The Wall of Fire, etc. They are instrumental in doing a good work. Last Spring a person was in the railroad station at Troy, N. Y., waiting for the train coming east, when a young man was seen through a window smoking a cigarette. The impression grew so strong to go and explain to the boy the bad effect on the health, and finding openness, his address was obtained, and some of the little booklets sent by return mail. A few weeks ago the young man of near nineteen years visited us, and to our surprise we found he had some of the tracts translated into the Armenian tongue, and two of his companions with himself have quit the smoking habit. Also an old doctor who was a friend of the boy, and an occasional smoker, gave up the use of tobacco through his influence. I mention this as one little instance of good, as the result of faithfulness, and the little Tracts thou hast been sending me."

A person who felt a prompting to post conspicuously in various public places large placards with Scripture texts on them, applied to the Board for its co-operation in preparing and publishing the same. After careful consideration it was decided to print 200 each of three different selections, on cards 11 by 14 inches, and 375 of them were recently forwarded to the individual, who proposes placing them in waiting-rooms, public buildings, etc.

The distribution of Tracts was the largest in the past three years, averaging over 11,000 per month, and including 28 States and four foreign countries, while 601 of the Tracts were in foreign languages. The Almanac and the Card Calendar were published seasonably for 1914. Of the latter, 5,103 copies were printed, the largest number we have published; and at the close of the fiscal year there were but 163 on hand, with sales still continuing. No less than seven business houses now annually place their orders for Calendars, amounting to between 1,100 and 1,200, which they distribute to their patrons about the first of the year. Three distant Yearly Meetings, through their Book Committees, use nearly 1,500, and six or seven individuals regularly purchase and distribute among their friends about six hundred copies.

When in the ordering of an all-wise Providence, our beloved Friend and fellow-member, Edwin P. Sewell, was removed from our midst, the Board of Managers sustained a loss of no ordinary proportion. For nearly twenty-five years he was one of the most faithful and interested members of this Board, and his regular attendance, his warm sympathy with the work, and his practical services were all very helpful to us. A clear and sound judgment and large executive ability, combined with true Christian courtesy and a fervent desire to promote his Master's kingdom here upon earth, endeared him to us in no ordinary degree, and while it is with sorrowful hearts that we feel his loss, we can be truly grateful for his long and loving service, and can even more truly rejoice in the great and eternal gain which he has experienced.

Signed by direction of the Board of Managers.

WM. C. COWPERTHWAIT, Clerk.

PHILADELPHIA, Third Month 19, 1914.

WHAT IS SPIRITUAL PROGRESS?

Where there is spiritual life, there is growth and progress. In nature there is a period where growth ceases, and decline of strength and vitality begins and continues until our physical is wasted away; but not so in our spiritual life: "The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree. . . . They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be full of sap and green."

The growth in grace and knowledge of the Christian life should be marked in every individual. It is impossible to be spiritually healthy and vigorous and stand still. We must progress continually. This will not be a difficult and unpleasant task, but as natural as life, if we keep spiritual. As in nature, so in grace, where the normal attitude is maintained, there will be the adjustment of every difficulty encountered, and progress will be manifested. There are many things to be overcome, but the effort and exercise in this respect will only increase our spiritual development. This is as true with the people of God collectively as it is individually. We shall never grow out of grace, but in grace. The boundless expanse of heaven's grace affords abundant room to grow on and on; not out and beyond the blessed old Bible, but more and more into its glorious depths of light and truth. Some souls have erroneously thought they could progress beyond the Bible but such a spiritual condition is not progression, but deception. The more spiritual one is, the more the truth of the Bible becomes illuminated to the soul.

Spiritual progress, then, means to grow out of all error and human tradition into all truth; out of our individual understanding of the past, where we have been short of the proper conception of truth, into the more perfect knowledge of spiritual things; more and more out of ourselves and into Christ.—J. W. B., in The Gospel Trumpet.

My faith being renewed in Christ Jesus, the Son and express image of the living God, I bow in humility and hope at the footstool of mercy, looking for redemption and remission of sin.

NEWS ITEMS.

FRIENDS of Germantown announce an interesting meeting for the 15th to consider the right attitude and preparation for the approaching Yearly Meeting.

THERE is a plan on foot to establish a Union Christian College for Women in Japan. There is great need for such an institution, and it will receive the sympathy and moral support of all our workers. In such an institution our graduates will be able to pursue advanced courses of study.—From Missionary Quarterly.

THE appreciation of the late Dr. Thomas Hodgkin which appears in the current Commonwealth by Harold Anson, co-editor with Canon Scott Holland of that magazine, is of considerable interest to Friends, one sentence especially. The writer says: "Here was a man who had never known the Sacrament of Baptism, but who was beyond all manner of doubt 'born again' and seeing every day the Kingdom of God, here was one who had never partaken of the Eucharist and who fed daily on the Heavenly Bread."

This hearty recognition by a strong Churchman of the fact that there are other means of grace as efficacious in this instance as any provided by his own system for the upbuilding of sound Christian character is not limited to one exceptional case, for Harold Anson goes on to remark that "we find just the same ideal of simple and profound spiritual vision combined with great practical sense, the same ardent love of education, the same independence of outward rites, the same simple and beautiful courtesy in many an artisan home of our great industrial towns. Surely English Christianity was meant to produce just such characters as these; they are to us in England what St. Francis is to the Latin races; they show us the ideal of our stern and homely race transformed by the indwelling of Christ."—The Friend (London).

Quite in harmony with the above are the lines often quoted by our Friend, Catharine Shipley:—

"Whenever the bread that is broken,
And mine is transmitted to thine,
Tho' the lips may grow ashen and falter,
There on God's holy altar
Standeth the bread and the wine.

For love is the bread that is broken,
And the chalice upheld to the brim,
And the tenderness shown to a brother
Is done in remembrance of Him."

SOME EXTRACTS FROM A RECENT LETTER FROM DR. WM. W. CADBURY.—"Since I moved back to the College I have had my hands full with a number of things. Much time has been spent in the reorganization of the Canton Hospital. I try to get there daily. Yesterday, with the chief resident physician, Dr. Thomson, I helped to install four new Chinese internes and nine male nurses. Quarters for these are being prepared as quickly as possible. There is to be a complete reorganization of the whole running of the institution along modern lines. This means much careful thought. Then I have promised Dr. Mary Fulton to give one lecture a week to her medical students. I want to give some lectures to the nurses at the Canton Hospital, and Dr. Todd is very insistent that I continue the courses started before I left the Kung Ye. I still give quite a little time to the Chinese Medical Journal.

"Our hospital here is full. I have helped Dr. McCracken with several serious operations here lately. I have written an article telling of my experiences in the cholera epidemic of last summer. I shall send a copy of it later. I am now preparing some data of my work done at the Kung Ye during the eight months I was there. I shall send a copy of that also.

"Though I firmly believe in broad lines of co-operation in religious work on the mission field, I remain as staunch a Friend as ever, because it seems to me that Christianity is assuming more and more of the attitude of Quakerism.

"There is a wonderful openness to receive the Truth here in this school. We are trying to teach by our lives as well as by our words what the Christian life should be and if anything is at fault in ourselves it tends to spoil the whole."

A GOOD MEETING.—Friends at Woodland and George, N. C., feeling they had a concern to hold a meeting here, wrote to know if they could get a suitable place here. Their letter was immediately referred to the Methodist people (for there are only three meeting houses here, Methodist, Baptist and Episcopalian), and they at once gave leave to hold it in their meeting-house. They selected Fifth-day evening, the 2nd inst. The following from Woodland and George came to the meeting, viz.:—Benjamin P. Brown, Elisha J. Bye, Thomas Mott and Alfred Copeland. At the beginning a few introductory remarks as to the manner of holding Friends' meetings were made by Alfred Copeland. Benjamin P. Brown spoke from the text: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven." He commended the audience to read the fifth, sixth and seventh chapters of Saint Matthew and to dwell upon them. He was followed by Alfred Copeland, and by Elisha J. Bye, and supplication was offered. Thomas Mott also spoke very briefly and effectually. The house was nearly full, supposed by many to be about 250 persons. They were attentive and the power and admonition of the Lord seemed a reality.

J. C. ALLEN.

NEW GARDEN MONTHLY MEETING held at West Grove, Pa., on the eighth inst., granted a minute to William B. Harvey, to accompany Wm. C. Allen on his extensive Gospel journey to foreign lands. The minute, after reciting the places contemplated in the year, including Japan, China and Australia, continued: "After a time of absence from our unity was expressed and he was freely absented with respect to such that these our Friends, who feel called of their Heavenly Father to make this extensive visit to foreign lands, may know of His all-sustaining power, to be round about and underneath, to support and enable them to perform the service to His honor and glory." Wm. Harvey plans to leave Philadelphia about the 15th of next English Month, joining Wm. C. Allen in San Francisco, and leaving there early in Ninth Month.

ELIZABETH C. COOPER at the same New Garden Monthly Meeting was granted a minute to visit Friends in certain parts of Iowa, especially the Quarterly Meeting at Hickory Grove and Coal Creek Monthly Meeting.

SINCE last week's editorial an inquiry has come to the office for the correct title or form to use in making a gift or bequest to THE FRIEND. The answer may be of interest to more than one:—

I give, devise and bequeath to the Contributors—Managers of THE FRIEND, a religious periodical published in Philadelphia to represent the Society of Friends, which holds its Yearly Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets.—

DR. RENDEL HARRIS'S precious original, almost accidentally discovered, the "Odes of Solomon," has now passed into the possession of the John Rylands Library, Manchester. Writing in the Manchester Guardian of 25th ult., Professor J. H. Moulton remarks: "The Odes can best perhaps be characterized by saying that they are singularly like what their editor might have composed had he lived in those golden days. Those who know Dr. Harris's own devotional works as well as his research will agree that there was a curious felicity in the chance which reserved the recovery of these delicately spiritual poems for his hand."—The Friend (London).

THE good news is to hand from India that the Government has granted Friends three acres of land at Harsi as a site for the new Women's Hospital, which when built will be under the care of Dr. Hilda M. Robson and Lydia Fox. In a letter dated the twentieth of Second Month, Joseph Taylor reports that the site is due west of our school compound, separated from it by a road.—The Friend (London).

ON Second Month 20th, the faculty and students [of Christianburg] were favored with a visit from Jas. M. Moon, a member of the Board of Managers. He arrived early in the evening and spoke to the School at 8.35 in the chapel of Bailey-Morris Hall. On the following day he made a thorough inspection of all work departments then left on an evening train for Philadelphia. Again on Third Month 15th, we were greeted by a visit from J. Henry Scattergood, Treasurer of the Board, and Morris E. Leeds, Secretary. They gave short talks to the students at the evening prayer service, and on the following day made a thorough inspection of all the school's departments. They spoke to the students at prayer service on the fine condition of the grounds, buildings and rooms; also of their fine manners about the grounds.—From The Freeman's Friend.

The Freeman's Friend announces a summer Normal to be held at Christianburg, from Sixth Month 29th to Seventh Month 31st. The subjects given will be in accord with the topical outline furnished by the State Board of Education.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch of the 6th from Sacramento, Cal., says: "Seventy-five millions ladybugs will be distributed to California farmers this spring to destroy insect aphids that attack principally the melon, hop, bean and grain crops. More than 50,000,000 already have been distributed by the State. They are kept in cold storage by the State Insectary."

It has been recently stated that an analysis which has just been completed of 215,279 efficiency tests made on the New York division of the Pennsylvania Railroad during 1913 shows 99.65 per cent. of perfect performance. On the observation of signals set at "danger" 1057 tests showed practically perfect results. Two trains ran past the signals, but only to the extent of 16 or 17 feet. J. B. Fisher, superintendent of the New York division, in his report says that failures each month are becoming fewer and co-operation in obedience to the rules is increasing.

Recent city-wide agitation for an increase in the salaries of women teachers in the public schools, has had favorable effect, and a sub-committee of a special committee of the Board of Education has reported a recommendation providing an increase in the annual salary expenditure of from $350,000 to $400,000. This recommendation was adopted and will be reported to the Board of Education.

It was stated from Washington recently that a record-breaking winter wheat crop is in prospect this year, the Department of Agriculture estimating on a conservative basis that the yield may exceed 551,000,000 bushels the largest ever predicted by the department.

A despatch from Des Moines, Ia., says: "A home for girls who earn less than $7 a week will be opened here within a week or two through the efforts of the Iowa Welfare League. Classes in stenography, business education, typewriting and domestic science will be provided."

A despatch of the 6th from Vancouver, B. C., says: "The largest consignment of Chinese eggs ever shipped from the Orient to America was received here to-day on the steamship Empress of Russia. The shipment, weighing 100,000 tons, contains 6,792,360 eggs."

A telegram of the 7th from Pittsburgh, Pa., says: "The Academy of Science and Art to-day announced plans for a floating hospital for tuberculosis patients. It will have a full crew of doctors and nurses and will be for patients while they are waiting admission to the State or county hospitals. A considerable sum of money has been subscribed, and it is expected to have the boat ready for patients early in the summer."

It is stated that the Secretary of the Navy has approved Senator Weeks' plan to make use of the cruisers of the Navy. The Senator would have these idle warships carry mails, passengers and freight to and from South America. A resolution to this effect was promptly passed by the Senate of the United States by a unanimous vote.

A "Correct Posture League" has been incorporated in New York State. Its declared object is to teach children and adults to stand up straight. It expects to work in schools and factories chiefly.

It is stated that no intoxicating liquor will be allowed in the United States Navy after Seventh Month 1. The Secretary of the Navy has signed an order to that effect. It absolutely banishes liquors from the Navy except for hospital use when ordered by the surgeons.

A despatch of the 7th from Chicago says: "Beginning to-day, women and girls who come to Chicago or who pass through the city to other destinations will have the protection and assistance of policewomen at the railroad stations. Ten of the twelve city's policewomen, after a special course of instruction, were assigned to the railroad stations yesterday."

At a recent election in Chicago women voted for the first time. Approximately 73 per cent. of the Chicago women qualified went to the polls. The percentage of men was 72. There were 158,686 women voters and 328,987 men. Analysis of the returns also emphasizes the influence of the women's vote against the liquor traffic in territory outside of Chicago. In those townships approximately 70 per cent. of the women voters favored the anti-liquor ticket.

It is stated that keeping children off the streets during the summer months by sending them to work in the country is the plan which will be tried this summer by the Pennsylvania Child Labor Association, co-operating with the Children's Aid Society and various Grange organizations. It is believed that such a plan will materially decrease the number of children who fail to return to school after their summer vacation, as well as improve the health of many.

It has been stated that women helped decide elections in Alaska lately. It was the first time women had voted in Alaska since enfranchised by the first Territorial Legislature a year ago.

FOREIGN.—A despatch of the 6th from St. Petersburg says: "Labor troubles are assuming critical proportions here. More than 100,000 men are out of work to-night. By order of the Government the principal factories of the city have shut their doors and declared a lockout. A hundred thousand families are penniless."

A despatch from Peking of the 9th says: "Brigands under the notorious 'White Wolf' to-day killed hundreds of inhabitants of the towns of Hubsien, Chowchih and Meishien, in the vicinity of Sianfu, capital of Shensi province. They looted the three towns after capturing them and are sweeping the entire country roundabout."

It was stated from Copenhagen on the 8th inst. that Dr. Reyn, head of the Pinsen Light Institute, has made interesting experiments in the treatment by means of electric light of patients suffering from tuberculosis. The cases were such as have hitherto necessitated an operation. The patients are placed about a yard's distance in front of an ordinary arc lamp and the rays are directed against the affected parts of the body. The irradiation lasts in the beginning 15 minutes, but is increased gradually, until it reaches two and a-half hours. The most satisfactory results have been obtained, nearly all the patients so far having been completely cured. It is expected that the treatment by artificial light, will, in many cases, give better results than the prolonged and expensive treatment by high sunlight. It is suggested that the light cure may also be useful in cases of lung tuberculosis, but this has not yet been proved.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. Sixteenth Street, Phila., will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M.—Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 29th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when they are temporarily out of school or are unduly burdened in keeping up with their classes, or have been seriously interrupted in their studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Months strengthens the health, and the children gather up the lines of their Westtown studies so that they can get an easier start for their year's work the next autumn.

Applications for admission should be made to

RHODS LEATHER BELT PRESERVER

Cuts Down Belt Cost

How often do you lubricate your belts? Many of the belts which come to us for repairs are dry and brittle. They need treating with a lubricant that preserves leather, and keeps it limber and glove-like, so that it will grip the pulley.

Rhods Leather Belt Preserver meets these conditions. It has been doing it for twenty years. It is highly beneficial to leather and its frequent use in light applications saves many break-downs. It saves both repairs and belt bills.

It also saves output and idle wages lost during stops.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

THE surgeon who had charge of our late beloved Friend, Edwin P. Sellew, has written the following remarkable testimony in a letter to C. Virginia Sellew:—

"Friend Sellew's heroic and enduring courage, sustained to the very end, was soul-convincing testimony of the sustaining strength of a real Christian's faith. He is surely numbered among its saints."

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

The two hundred and twenty-ninth session of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting will probably be brought to a conclusion before the present number of THE FRIEND reaches a majority of the subscribers. Next week's number will give an outline of the proceedings. We are able now to refer to the session of the Representative Meeting held on the 17th, and to the opening session of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders held on the 18th.

The usual business of the Fourth Month Meeting of the Representative Body is to receive reports from standing committees in form to be forwarded on the minutes to the Yearly Meeting. The activity of the Book Committee the past year, in addition to the usual lines of distribution of the approved writings of Friends, had included care of a translation of John Woolman's Journal into Japanese and the publication of a pocket edition of Stephen Grellet. In the Japanese translation the Committee had received most valuable assistance from Inazo Nitobe, who has also written an introduction to it. During the year a Friend in Paullina, Iowa, Anna Oelson, has made a gift of $1000 to further the work of the Book Committee.

The Willits' Trustees during the past year have published and circulated the little periodical, The African's Friend. There is no lack of appreciation of this effort both in the Southern States and in Liberia.

The Doukhobor Committee has been hampered this year as formerly by the "selfish leadership" that exists amongst those who maintain the communal system. A very considerable number (probably near 2000) are now classed as "independents". These are open to educational and in some degree it is hoped to religious influences. The Committee has built a meeting house at Thrums, B. C., during the year and some hopeful reports are at hand from that quarter. It was explained that many of the Doukhobors are literalists. The declaration of our Lord "Lo I am with you always" is interpreted to mean that He is reincarnated in their leader. A Friend felt that this belief might be corrected so as to inculcate a right view of Christ's spiritual presence in the hearts of true believers. By nature industrious and thrifty, the need is only the greater that in the progress of civilization amongst these extraordinary people shall not lose hold of elevating religious ideals.

The situation in regard to the Senate action in Panama Tolls Exemption claimed serious consideration. While to many the problems seem to be those of honor and justice alone, to others serious questions of law and politics seem to be involved. It was concluded to commit the matter of stimulating the President and Senators to right action to individual responsibility.

A woman Friend sent a communication to the meeting in regard to the impending consideration by Congress of the subject of National Prohibition. This brought the meeting into deep exercise. It was finally concluded to propose that the Yearly Meeting appoint a small committee to consider the present duty of the Society in this vital matter.

The session of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders on Seventh-day was attended by about one hundred and fifty Friends. The period of worship preceding the business was an occasion when "deep seemed to answer unto deep". fervent prayer ascended for the help of the Most High. After the roll call of the representatives and the reading of the appointing minutes the concern of William C. Allen to visit in China and Japan and Australia was spread before the meeting by a letter from San José, Cal. The concern was fully and freely endorsed, as was also that of William B. Harvey to accompany him. The clerks were directed to prepare and submit minutes of liberation to present to the session Third-day morning.

Appreciative mention was made of Joseph Elkinton's prospect, with members of his family, to visit meetings and missions in a journey round the world. He had chosen to ask for a certificate of membership and commendation from his Monthly Meeting for the four members of his party. This had been freely granted and also endorsed by the Quarterly Meeting. It was not, however, put in the form to come to the Yearly Meeting. Many hearts were drawn out to him as to the other Friends in desires for preservation and guidance.

The First Query was read with Answers from the Quarterly Meetings. Under the solemnity of a vocal offering of prayer the meeting adjourned till Third-day morning at ten o'clock.

J. H. B.

CATHEDRAL SILENCE.

There has recently come to hand a report of special "services" held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston. To quote from the Dean's message. "A quiet half-hour will be observed on three mornings at eleven o'clock. The purpose is that each worshipper should listen to God, rather than speak to God, during this period." One in attendance at these meetings, it may be for the first time, wrote of them thus, "First, there came very quietly the sense of a Presence. The work of prayer grew strangely easy. We were not resolutely fixing our thoughts upon a friend in a far country; we were listening to One who was there in the building, speaking."

The experience reminds one of what Robert Barclay felt when in a worshipful spirit he came into the meetings of Friends. Alluding to the meetings at St. Paul's, another has written, "Those who have shared in these meetings testify in most appreciative words to their value. They offer an opportunity for the realization of the presence of God in silence, which is peculiarly welcome in our active age."

John Wesley wrote more than a century and a half ago, "A silent meeting was never heard of in the Church of Christ for sixteen hundred years." We know that he was mistaken as to history, and was alike rather inaccurate in his outlook upon the future in this particular, for the same report from which we have already quoted, continues, "Quiet half-hours seem to have sprung up spontaneously in several of our churches." It is amusing to hear the comments made upon first proposals of such services. That people should go to church and not hear any talking and not do anything themselves seems to them very queer. But if there is anything the American people need it is the power to sit still. That would be often "their strength." And again, "In our Communion with God there is both speech and silence, and the highest is silence. He speaks by His living spirit and tells us all we can know, and makes us all we desire to be. And we speak to Him, both by words and by acts and by silence, but silence is the highest, because in it deep replies to deep." These experiences may seem new to some of our fellow-Christians; they are at least the high ideal which Friends have had in mind for more than two centuries.—[Eds.]

WHAT JUST ONE WORD MAY DO.

The short poem under this title in THE FRIEND for First Month 22, 1914, prompts me to narrate an incident that forcibly illustrates "What just one word may do." (Inasmuch as all the persons are living and they do not seek personal popularity I refrain from giving names of exact places.)

If one would go out into the suburbs of Philadelphia, say for less than five miles from the county line any First-day in the early spring or summer, he would find hundreds of boys and young men collected in groups of from four to a dozen along any of the streams, especially in the more secluded sections, engaged in the very doubtful pursuit of happiness (?) by playing cards, drinking and gambling.

Such a group, consisting of twelve young men, found themselves in an isolated location in the early summer several years ago. As the place was to their liking they met there the following First-day, playing cards till late in the afternoon. On the third day in the woods they were somewhat chagrined when they found approaching them an old gentleman with white hair, a kindly face and a cane, who when he came up to them glanced over to them and said kindly, "Good morning, gentlemen." About a hour and a half later he returned and again greeted them with the words, "It is a beautiful day."

After he had gone one of the young men threw down his cards and said, "I for one am not going to play cards anymore. I believe that kindly-faced old gentleman goes to church somewhere around here and next Sunday I am going to go with him, if he will permit me." True is his promise the following week found our twelve at their accustomed rendezvous, but one of their number not playing cards.

When the old gentleman arrived punctually, the young man spoke to him and asked him if he was on his way to church, and if so, could he accompany him. Getting an affirmative answer, they started down along the creek through the woods, and across fields to the edge of the city. On the way hither no curiosity was expressed on behalf of the old gentleman as to the boy's interest, but instead he pointed out to him the wonderful beauties of nature as shown in the growing trees, flowers and birds, and how good it was to be out in the open and see God's handiwork.

Arriving at the "Church," it was found to be only a little mission building built of plain lumber and furnished very simply. The congregation consisted of forty or fifty persons, evidently gathered from the immediate neighborhood, which was near a large mill district. The pulpit was filled that day by a volunteer minister, the congregation not being able to support a regular pastor. In simple language the minister explained the Scriptures and urged for a further understanding of them a reading of the Bible in a true spirit of seeking the Truth.

Our young man left the meeting, went back to his boarding-house and dug down in his trunk and brought out his Bible, which he had really never read before, and the whole night through searched diligently and found in the Scriptures that promise of better things.

The next day he told his companions of his experience, and the following First-day morning he was able to take two more with him and the old gentleman to church. This was repeated each succeeding week with ever-increasing interest, until finally all twelve of those young men gave up their card-playing and became actively interested in the success of that mission, with the result that not only were they saved but through them hundreds and perhaps thousands of young men have been brought to see the error of their ways.

The little mission has grown by successive steps in a few short years to a large congregation. An immense building now occupies the site of the former house, and it is no uncommon sight to see a company of young men after meeting in the summer accompanying a kindly old gentleman homeward. His loving sympathy and quiet advice have made, through only a few words, not only twelve boys happy but the whole community better.

"What can it matter in a little while,
That for a day
We met and gave a word, a touch, a smile
Upon the way."

HARRISBURG, PA., First Month 25, 1914.

W. G. HEACOCK.

"FOR what is our proof of immortality? Not the analogies of nature; the resurrection of nature from a winter grave, or the emancipation of the butterfly. Not even the testimony to the fact of risen dead; for who does not know how shadowy and unsubstantial these intellectual proofs become in unspiritual frames of mind? No, the life of the spirit is the evidence. Heaven begun is the living proof that makes the heaven to come credible, 'Christ in you [is] the hope of glory.' It is the eagle eye of faith which penetrates the grave, and sees far into the tranquil things of death. He alone can believe in immortality who feels the resurrection in him already."—F. W. ROBERTSON.

It is true that the nervous rush and turmoil of society at the present day makes the tranquil life possible to only those happy few who are temperamentally blessed with poise, or who have won their spiritual battles by dint of conscientious endeavor.—AMELIA M. GUMMERE, in The Christian Advocate.

ONLY TRUST ME.

Only trust me; do the shadows
Darkly o'er thy pathway lie?
Was there ever earthly shadow
That could hide thee from mine eye?
Dost thou shrink and fear and waver
Look upon my outstretched hand,
Waiting through these shades to lead thee
Onward to a better land.

Only trust me! dost thou ask me
Why the way should be so rough?
Thou shalt know the need hereafter,—
Here my word must be enough.
When I tell thee all is working
But to make thee meet for heaven,
Wilt thou not accept thy portion,
Take thy lot by wisdom given?

There's a place within my temple,
For long ages kept for thee;
I must fashion thee to fill it
Through a bright eternity.
From the quarry I have hewn thee,
Rugged, hard and sin defiled;
I must change and I must cleanse thee,—
Wouldst thou stay the work, my child?

Ask it not; 'twill soon be over,
Then thou'lt thank Me for the pain;
See how every pang was needed,
Not one stroke bestowed in vain.
Tools of earth, sharp axe and chisel,
Will have ceased their work at last;
Perfect to thy place I'll bring thee,
Every tear and trial past.

Only trust me till that hour,
When all need for trust is o'er;
Never weary days to fret thee,
Never sin to harm thee more,
Never change or pain to greet thee,
Friend's neglect to wring thy heart,
But the friend who loved thee always
From thy side no more to part.

NOTES ON WAR.

COMPILED FROM THE WRITINGS OF JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

"Isolated as this country is from the jealous, warring powers of the Old World, and hence peculiarly favored by its situation, free institutions, and abundant and varied resources, for pursuing in peace the even tenor of its way, it is lamentable to see what a little thing may serve, when unreason and passion have their way, to launch a whole people upon a course which must surely bring sin, suffering and destruction in its train. So it is evident that the most favorable surroundings are not potent enough to keep away strife when the hearts of a people are turned away from their God. The Apostle has definitely answered the query: 'From whence come wars and fightings?'"

"Our naval authorities are now (1888) felicitating themselves on the fact that our former effete navy is rapidly being replaced by a fleet of war vessels of stancher build and greater speed than perhaps those of any other nation. And it is to be feared, at the same time, that, going forward in our boasted strength, we will not fail to manufacture opportunities for bringing these great vessels and big guns into deadly requisition. We have already as a nation, represented by the treaty-making branch of the government, perpetuated within a few days such an act of gross indignity toward the Empire of China (in the Chinese Exclusion Bill matter, as would have sufficed, had it occurred in connection with any of the European powers, to have called out a declaration of war. For the present the great empire beyond the Pacific may smother its wrath, and no overt hostilities ensue, but meanwhile, we have been instructing the Mongolians concerning the most improved military and naval appliances, and at the port of Shanghai they have established an immense navy yard, which, should the day arrive when the autocrat of Peking should order an avenging host to pour forth, may deal terrible retribution for the wrongs inflicted upon China by the opium wars and the exclusion edicts of the Anglo-Saxons. Only by getting down to the beneficent principle of the golden rule in our state affairs, will our country be saved from those awful calamities which will otherwise surely overtake us, as a judgment for our national and social crimes."

Again in 1888, he writes: "All my political affiliations are Republican, nevertheless I believe it will be my duty at the coming election to vote for the party that has declared unmistakably for peace and the amicable arbitration of international differences as well as for 'Home Protection'. Many other Friends will vote the Prohibition ticket on this account, and desire us to call special attention to the eleventh plank in the platform, declaring in favor of arbitration. It is a plank on which every Christian can stand."

From Anti-war Notes, 1883:—"Of the powerful Chancellor, Bismark, we hear a great deal in the public despatches and prints of the day, but an item which opens to us something of his more inner private life has recently been published, causing us to put the query whether the career of this man of iron and ambition may not have been a splendid failure. We are informed that he is subject to fits of dejection, when he declares that his life has been indeed a failure, that he has never made any one happy, neither himself, his family, nor the nation at large. 'If it were not for me,' he once said, when in a despondent and remorseful mood, 'the world would have seen three great wars less, and eighty thousand who died in their bloom, might have lived, and how many parents, brothers, sisters, widows, would have been spared their grief and tears!'"

"Several years ago, when Germany appeared to be in the heyday of prosperity, following the organization of the new empire, and the influx of the great war indemnity from France, it was remarked to the writer of this, that there was an instance where war had been followed by a beneficial result. He remarked that it might be well to wait and see. What now is the aspect? Politically we behold an empire with an immense standing army, and a trained reserve, where in view of jealous and powerful enemies without, and ever ready plotters within, the soldier and his occupation hold the first place. As regards religion, the feeling of indifference may be inferred from the fact that in Berlin, the capital, with a population of upward of a million, about fifty thousand only attend a place of worship; and even of these, how many, it is allowable to ask, do really worship the 'Father in spirit and in truth' when it is so common a practice to go to the military review, the beer garden or the play-house, when the morning church going is done? . . . As indicating a better way it may be appropriate to quote a remark of J. F. Manning of Boston, made at a large meeting in Connecticut. Having made the statement that the latter state has probably within its borders more manufactures of fire-arms and cartridges than all the rest of the Union, he continued: 'I am told by a friend of his that General Grant says he has devoted a lifetime almost to the study of the war system, and has become convinced that there never was a time when the sword of one nation was drawn against another, when, had there been wise statesmanship and skilful manipulation of politics at the lifting of that sword, war would not have taken place.' That is a wonderful declaration coming from that source."

In speaking of the "Dress-Parade" at West Point, J. W. L. writes: "Whilst I do not forget my own feelings of delight and exhilaration as a lad, in witnessing with all its pomp and circumstance, the soldiers march, yet I do confess that the Spirit of my God has brought me to a better mind upon the subject, and that now to behold a parade of the military—especially when participated in by the orphan-pupils of Girard College or Soldiers' Home—will bring moistened eyes, and quivering lips and an averted face.

"I do not deny that Christian men may have been soldiers, but can there be any question that the profession of arms is an occupation, which the followers of Him who defended not Himself with the legions which He could have called, and who said that 'my kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight,' are enjoined to come out of."

"It is not by chronic quarreling with our neighbors and with foreign powers, nor by a show of great military preparations, that republican institutions are to be commended to the people of other lands. This will be infinitely better done by steadily adhering to a policy of peace and by fair dealings at whatever cost. The one result from the other whichever we put first. It ought to be enough to make peace advocates out of every apologist for war, just to read and reflect upon the telegrams which come to us in quick succession from the Great German Empire, telling us how that stalwart body politic is still loading and overloading itself with all the ingenious appliances and engines of destruction."

In his preface to the history of the United States, which he published, he speaks of "inclining the minds of the young to a consideration of that more excellent way of settling disputes which does not involve the dread appeal to arms." . . . eliminates illustrations calculated to stir up the lust for bloodshed, and in lieu of any teaching which might seem to support so narrow and mischievous a political maxim as that which declares for "My country, right or wrong," the attempt has been made through the lessons deduced from our history to magnify the truthfulness of that noble and more Christian motto of our late president (Lincoln): "I would rather be beaten in the right than succeed in the wrong."

The following petition presented to the Senate and House of Representatives by Charles Sumner a few days before his death was prepared by Josiah W. Leeds.

"Whereas, the successful issue of the Geneva Court of Arbitration has satisfactorily demonstrated that international difficulties may be amicably, honorably, and efficiently settled by such sensible, quiet means as were employed in that connection.

"Therefore we, the undersigned, loyal citizens of ——— do respectfully petition your honorable body to take steps as promptly as possible in co-operation with other governments for the settlement of international difficulties by the plan of Arbitration, and likewise the formation of a High Court of Nations, or such other pacific measures as your wisdom may suggest, for the adjustment of every such difference without a resort to arms."

THE QUAKER MISSION AMONG THE INDIANS OF NEW YORK STATE.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

In 1868, Thomas Wistar, Dr. James F. Rhoads, Joseph Scattergood, and Ebenezer Worth attended an important Conference on the Cattaraugus Reservation to settle, if possible, the claims of the Ogden I and Company, but the treaty then signed was never ratified by Congress.

The two last-named Friends then visited all the Indian settlements in New York and they reported that "they were encouraged to believe that there is a steady advancement among an increasing number of Indians, in orderly conduct and industrious habits, and more concern is manifested for the proper instruction and restraint of their children. Many have joined religious societies from conviction, and seemed much interested in promoting the views held by those bodies, and encouraging their associates to lead moral and religious lives."

In 1870 a similar Committee of Friends succeeded in getting the Indians residing on the Corn Planter Reservation in Pennsylvania to divide that tract so their title would be more secure. The work thus accomplished proved to be timely, as very shortly afterward the only surviving child of Corn Planter died, and the Indians affected by this change showed much more interest in their own affairs, as the improvements made during the next three years were more than had been made for six or eight years previously.

To enlighten the Senecas on the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservation, Joseph Scattergood prepared and circulated among them "A Brief Statement of the rights of the Seneca Indians of New York to their lands in that State, etc.," including a Memorial to Congress, prepared for them to sign, and the draft of an Act to enable them to divide the remaining portion of their lands and to hold them in severalty.

Forty years ago there were 5,140 Indians in the State of New York, the greater part of whom were settled on the Cattaraugus and Allegheny Reservations. There were 1,870 children between the age of five and twenty-one, and of these 1,418 had attended school part of the year. Thirty schools were kept for Indian children and twelve Indian teachers were employed, teaching on an average thirty-three weeks during the school year. These figures included all the Indians in the State.

The census for 1910 gives an Indian population of 6,046, so the increase is small, but the value of their lands and individual property has greatly increased. An Act, providing for the appointment of three Commissioners, of whom one was Joseph Scattergood, was passed in 1875 to regulate the dealing of the whites with the Indians on the Allegheny Reservation. This resulted in a survey of the entire reservation and in marking the limits where whites could settle in the villages of Salamanca, West Salamanca, Vandalia, Carrollton, Great Valley and Red House. They also suggested a more satisfactory way of collecting the rents due from the whites by a U. S. Agent, and of paying them to the Nation. This has since been ratified by the Federal Government and $2,500 is annually paid to the treasurer of the Seneca Nation—some $10,000 being divided among the individual members of the tribe, together with an equal amount as their regular annuity. This distribution has been made for ten years past, and the past year (1913) amounted to about six dollars per capita. The Cattaraugus Reservation was also resurveyed and its present acreage found to be 21,977.

Samuel Morris, Joseph S. Elkinton and George J. Scattergood visited these Indians many times and their memory is cherished by them. Aaron P. Dewees was Superintendent at the Boarding School for twelve years, and his services were much appreciated. The school building was burnt down in 1886, while he was in charge, and he narrowly escaped with his life while trying to save the lives of the students. A new building was promptly erected and the Committee in charge of this institution are now equipping it with appliances for manual training and agricultural instruction.

There is a good dairy of fifty cows, which produce marketable butter of the finest quality, and the boys are taught practical farming.

The influence of the school upon the home life of the Indians is quite marked, wherever the women in them have attended it as scholars, and much credit is due the women Friends who have taught in the school.

The Y. M. C. A. at Quaker Bridge is cordially supported by the Friends and its most active members have been trained at the Quaker school. When we consider the present condition and needs of these Indians in the light of their past history, there is much to encourage those who have their best welfare at heart to persevere in their efforts to help them on the road of Christian civilization.

Perhaps the greatest hindrance to the advancement of the Red Man on this road is the continuance of the system whereby they hold a communal interest in property, so that the children born to members of a tribe secure a patrimony from the tribal estate rather from their parents as an inheritance.

This communal holding of property does not result in activity on the part of Indian parents. Relieved of the necessity of accumulating property it fosters slothfulness in themselves and a lack of incentive to prepare their offspring for the duties of life. It strengthens the continued reliance upon the Government in caring for their every need, thus relieving them of that individual responsibility so essential in the development of character. The communal interest in Indian property should cease at a fixed time to be determined by law, after which time all the lands, funds and other assets of the tribe should be credited in pro rata shares to the definitive membership found to be entitled at such fixed time to participate. Indian associations, the Mohonk Conference of Friends of the Indian, and students of the Indian problem generally, have approved of this principle in the management of Indian properties.

MOYLAN, PENNA., First Month 3, 1914.

PICTURE-MAKERS AND WAR-MAKERS.

BY WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

The writer, while abroad during the summer of 1913, was so profoundly impressed with the psychological effect produced by the illustrated press of England in aiding to develop and extend the fever of militarism, which has that country within its grasp, that he purchased at random a typical copy of the popular weekly, The Illustrated London News, Seventh Month 26, 1913, with the view of writing it up. Here is the result:

At the rear of this number, and mixed with advertisements, are six one-half pages devoted to various subjects. These one-half pages, because of their unimportant and inconspicuous position, need not be analyzed here, but the illustrations include a picture of the German Army Air-Ship Cruiser No. 1. We will, however, consider the character of the pictures on the prominent pages of this number.

All the space in eleven of the full pages that contain no advertisements is devoted to military suggestions or to the exploiting of the army and navy. Two others are largely so utilized. Two more also contain some picture or reference of a similar character. In contrast with the above fifteen full pages that have no advertisements, only ten are discovered that do not in some degree suggest militarism or explain the latest scientific methods of preparing to kill men.

This magnificent advertiser on behalf of the "War Traders" poses as a family magazine for Christian England! The frontispiece has a full-page picture of a dreadnaught "bunkering" in the open sea.

The next pictorial page is a fully illustrated one, and exhibits "Naval Manœuvres on Land" and "hand-worked battleships," showing an ingenious method of training officers and men in fleet evolutions adopted by the New York Naval Militia. This is interesting to those engaged in the naval profession, and also helps to suggest to the British people that other countries are making great strides in naval affairs, and that it is necessary for England to further lavish money in competition.

The third page displays the portraits of five men, four of whom are army officials and one a scientist. On this page is an article by G. K. Chesterton, who, while writing on the subject of cranks, says:

"Now I say it is a crime to tell a child that militarism is a crime. It is giving the child a false conscience at the very time when the conscience is most direct and most realistic. . . . To tell a child that militarism is a crime appears to me to be simply a wicked act," etc.

The fourth page is full of illustrations, most of which are devoted to showing the horrors of war and exhibiting "some of the worst atrocities of which the Bulgarians are accused." A picture of one ruined town is supplemental by the comment, "We believe absolutely that at least 470 villagers have been killed or burnt alive in this town alone." It is an interesting coincidence that this page containing various pictures that comment and exhibit the horrors of war exactly faces the above-mentioned statement on the third page that "it is a crime to tell a child that militarism is a crime."

The fifth and sixth pictorial pages of the Lancet magazine have on them a double-page picture representing the Restoration by George V. of a Ceremony Installing Knight of the Bath, which ceremony had just previously been celebrated in Westminster Abbey. This big picture indicates the dramatic moment when the Great Master and Knights of the Order offered their swords to the altar, and when the Dean restored his sword to the Great Master with this admonition, "I exhort and admonish you to use your sword to the Glory of God, the Defense of the Gospel, the Maintenance of your Sovereign's Right and Honor, and of all Equity and Justice to the utmost of your Power." We all understand that this exhortation means that only the British nation and government are to exercise their right as judges as to what constitutes the "Glory of God," etc., and if deemed necessary are to use their swords against other nations who, with equal sincerity, may invoke the help of God and the clerical blessing.

The next, being the seventh, illustrated page is also full of numerous pictures depicting scenes connected with the Bulgarian war. The first shows the Serbian General Tankowitch leaving Ishtip Cathedral with his staff after the Thanksgiving service celebrating the recapture of Ishtip. No doubt, if the Serbian general's Bulgarian opponent had succeeded in retaining this city, he and his staff would have been the men to have given Almighty God their most profound thanks, because they had been able to kill enough Servians to hold it.

The eighth pictorial page is actually not directly devoted to militarism, and to a sane person should be one of joy. There are four illustrations portraying the royal garden party to the teachers of the United Kingdom at Buckingham Palace. Only one of these pictures carries with it a military suggestion. It is entitled, "Representatives of Education, War and Religion." It represents Colonel Seely, the Secretary of State for War, Dr. MacNamara, and the Archbishop of Canterbury conversing together. It is very suggestive as showing how, under monarchical institutions, education, war and the religion of Jesus can be considered as being in close relations with each other.

Now, for a wonder, we pass four illustrated pages without finding any references to the military, one being a beautiful sepia portrait. These are immediately succeeded by the following:

Two full illustrated pages are devoted entirely to preparations for war, and particularly refer to the Admiralty's decision to use oil instead of coal as a fuel. Among them are pictures showing how the Admiralty stores oil at its great reservoirs at Port Victoria. It is hard to believe that the Creator intended his bounties to be thus diverted from the useful channels of peace and enlightenment. One of these eight pictures refers to the exhausting labors in the stoke-hole of a coal-burning warship. Another exhibits a ship without a funnel, with a clear deck, in time of action, and the sea light with all its "glory" is on.

The succeeding page is given over to three scenes in Afghanistan and central Asia, with an account of that part of the world; but even this article has references to some of the military expeditions which have penetrated those distant lands.

The next page has one full illustration: "A Gate of an Empire: Ali Masjid—A Fort in the Khyber Pass," showing where Nadir Shah rode through after the sack of Delhi, and referring to the belief that this fort "is one of the most interesting strategic posts in the whole Empire."

Our next two pages are also covered with pictures connected with war. One shows the "Royal Interest in Roumanian Troops," and King Charles inspecting his men before their going to the front. The King has been "snapped" walking by his soldiers, who lie on their stomachs during his inspection. Truly it would seem as if men, like the lower beasts of the field, crawl when preparing to kill their fellows.

Opposite the above is a full-page picture representing the King of Greece sitting in an easy chair and giving instructions to an officer of artillery. He looks very grand sitting there in comfort and safety. A comment underneath this picture quotes his Majesty as follows: "Protest in my name to the representatives of the civilized powers against these monsters in human form, and declare before the whole civilized world that I shall be compelled to take vengeance in order to inspire terror into these monsters (the Bulgarian troops) and to make them reflect before they commit any more such crimes, which surpass in horror those committed during the incursions of the barbarians." It is only fair to add that the King of Bulgaria has also made apparently just as well supported and atrocious charges against his foes.

The next five illustrated pages grant us a respite from the predominant and horribly suggestive characteristics of this family magazine. Within them there is only one unobtrusive reference to war, viz: a portrait of Earl Loreburn, who is referred to as author of the new book, "Capture at Sea." The next page is a large sepia reproduction of Vereschagin's "Before Moscow," representing the fateful moment when Napoleon, gazing upon the city, prepares for its occupation. The Emperor, with hands behind his back, stands holding a telescope, surrounded by his generals, and contemplating the city which, through fire and sword, he has just reached. Is this scene simply intended to quicken the imagination of the children of England?

The armament manufacturers—who of all people are thoroughly cosmopolitan, and who are without any patriotism toward any one nation, because they make money by setting different nations by the ears and manufacturing for all—must rejoice at such advertising of their trade as is herein depicted. One wonders if these manufacturers hold stock in the great British periodicals that thus assist them; or if the owners of these publications are shareholders in the syndicates whose wares they thus exploit week by week?

After the amazing revelations that have recently been made, we may well conjecture that the Christian sentiment, business common sense, and sane family thought of England are being poisoned at the fountain-head that the dividends of war-breeds may be enhanced.

Whether there be collusion between the illustrated press and armament manufacturers or not, the fact that taxes are being rapidly increased and that the people's assets are gradually being transferred to the coffers of the war traders is, after all, only a secondary matter. Far more damaging is the unholy spirit of fear and the continued thought of preparation for wholesale slaughter which are thus fostered in family and business life.

In contrast with the above magazine is Life, of New York City, which recently devoted a whole number to depicting the futility and folly of war. One of the many telling pictures is that of a stalwart officer tenderly parting from his little daughter, who, as she tip-toes on a chair to embrace him, asks, "Daddy, are you going to kill some other little girl's father?"

From the Advocate of Peace,
San José, California.

Called upon a young woman, not of our Society, whom I had before visited when she was under the reducing effects of sickness, and when her mind was susceptible of good impressions. Returning health, youthful vivacity, with an attractive share of personal beauty, and mixing in gay, dissipating, fashionable amusements, and those frivolities which allure from seriousness, and fail not to mar the growth of holiness, have, I fear, for a time at least, laid waste the engaging loveliness of a humble and broken spirit, though there are still tokens of a tender mind.

Dear young woman! my heart feels an interest in her true happiness, and I am well satisfied in having made the call, which she seemed to receive kindly, expressing her sense of the motive, with rising tears.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

Read at Westtown.

EARLY LIFE AMONGST PENNSYLVANIA FRIENDS.—You remember that Pennsylvania was rather late among the Thirteen Colonies to be settled, so when Wm. Edmundson, a very staunch and earnest Friends' minister from Ireland, came over to America on a Gospel mission he found Friends living in New England on the north, and in Maryland and Carolina on the south, some few in New Jersey, but only a mere handful in Pennsylvania. Mounted on his horse, we see him riding to these parts from New England, crossing the Jerseys, the Delaware River, and southeastern Pennsylvania, sleeping at nights under the open sky, exposed to the rain, swimming his horse across the creeks, and rocking in a hired boat on the larger waters, having Indians for guides, whom he hired with wampum. In such fashion he came to this section of country.

One First-day morning in the latter half of the year 1675, he had reached Upland, now Chester, on the Delaware River, at the mouth of Chester Creek. This little stream that flows down through the Westtown meadows is a branch of the larger Chester Creek, upon whose banks Wm. Edmundson found himself nearly two hundred and forty years ago. There, on its right bank, at the house of a certain Friend, named Robert Wade, Edmundson discovered a Friends' meeting in progress. How good it must have seemed to him and his companion, to sit down with the few congenial souls gathered in their Heavenly Father's worship! How inspiring it must have seemed to the American settlers to have these two good men to mingle with them in this way, and offer up perhaps their spoken message! And after meeting how much they must have had to say to each other of all their experiences—giving the travelers messages to their friends at home when they should return across the waters! But all that Wm. Edmundson says about it was, "We were glad of one another and comforted in the Lord." His stay was brief, for after meeting he was off again, by boat this time to Salem, N. J., thirty miles, where he had another meeting, heard some differences, tried to make peace, and the place worthy of its name (Salem). Was not this a strenuous life? Yet he had many days more strenuous than this, for of him it was afterward said, "He was in journeyings often, in perils by sea and land, and in the wilderness, both by wild beasts and bloody men, in the time of the Indian wars in America, and by robbers or rapparees in this nation [Ireland], who burnt his house and carried him away with his two sons, almost naked in the winter season, to kill him; but after much hard usage for several days, they were all three, by the good providence of God, delivered out of their hands." Yet Wm. Edmundson lived to be nearly eighty-five.

Now, we will go back to Robert Wade's house at Chester. This, I think, must have been a pretty fine house for those days, and the so-called Essex House, where Wm. Penn was entertained on his first arrival in Pennsylvania, and where the first Pennsylvania Assembly was held in 1682. Here, then, at the Essex House, was probably held the first Friends' meetings in our commonwealth; here about 1681, they began to hold a Monthly Meeting, and this, remember, was before Penn arrived.

In 1682, Friends came over in great numbers, some landing at Philadelphia and some at Chester. It is the Chester immigrants that I have to do with now. They pressed inland with their families, some going up this stream of water, and some up that, taking up their broad acres, and settling their habitations in the woods in Darby, Concord, Springfield, Middletown, and then up to this neighborhood. They had Indians in their wigwags for neighbors, wolves to howl around their dwellings at nights, rattlesnakes to glide through their gardens and cornfields, and wild turkeys to grace their Thanksgiving dinners, only they did not have any special Thanksgiving day.

Of these early families that came to Chester, the one whose history I know most about sailed from England, entered Pennsylvania Eighth Month, 1682, carried their goods on their backs up Ridley Creek about two miles inland, and cutting down a tree made a booth of its boughs and here lived for six weeks. Then they moved into a cabin they had built against an upright rock and dwelt in it about twenty years. The youngest of the three sons helped to build a house nearby, built it so well that it still stands, and looks as if it might stand for two hundred years more. Stout wooden pins fasten the floor boards in place, and by the fire-place is a little closet, which, opened, shows a row of slats neatly placed one above another to provide for ventilation! So these early settlers had ideas on this subject a hundred years before Benjamin Franklin taught its necessity!

What is true of this family is true in a general way of many others. They lacked many of the comforts we now have, but they were not exactly poor. Many of them had their furniture and plate brought from England, pieces handed down to families now living. They had their hundreds and hundreds of acres, perhaps thousands. Some of them were amongst Wm. Penn's trusted advisers, members of the Council and the Legislature. One of the most influential of the early Pennsylvania politicians I shall have occasion to speak of by and by. The examination of the meeting records shows their familiarity with parliamentary language, besides their sound wisdom and keen interest in the welfare of the community. They set up schools, or had teachers in their families. Let me repeat that here in these very parts, all around us, such people delved and spun.

But what I wish most to bring to your attention to-night is that they went to meeting. They went thankfully, knowing that here no sheriff with his posse, no body of soldiers would burst in uproariously upon their solemnity, arresting the preacher and prominent men, a whole group of them together, and, carrying them off to prison, leave the women and children to go home to spend sad and anxious nights. That was in England. But here they had "freedom to worship God," and they appreciated their privileges, braving many hardships. The wife of the immigrant aforesaid, who lived in the booth and in the cabin against the rock, walked to meeting and back, a distance of four miles, when she was eighty, preferring that mode of travel. Over at old Kennett meeting-house on the west side of the Brandywine, a traveling Friend records that a woman over ninety walked two miles to attend his meeting there.

Elizabeth Ashbridge was a minister in Goshen Meeting, and as far as I know, her good husband made it easy for her to go and went himself. But previously, when she lived in Jersey with a sorry sort of man for a husband, she had a sorry time of it. She had to walk eight miles to meeting, her husband had a horse, but she might not use it. When her shoes wore out, he thought that would settle the matter, but no—she tied them on with strings and plodded along! How many of us would be equal to these women in devotion?

There were no wheeled carriages at first, and the universal mode of travel when not on foot was on horse-back, a pillion or raised seat behind the saddle carrying the wife or daughter. Thus they rode by indifferent, unfenced roads, through the woods and streams, climbing hills as steep as those on the road to Milltown—for the roads were straightforward, like the people—and meeting cattle straying and browsing here and there, turned loose by their owners, after being branded, to find their own provender.

When I was at Greenwich, in South Jersey, a few years ago, I was shown a door in the back of the meeting-house, about eight feet up from the ground, and opening out upon no platform or steps—nothing but space. I was told that this was the place where the people mounted their horses—the women, I suppose, when the men brought up the steeds.

Friends at first met for worship in dwelling-houses, as at Robert Wade's. Monthly Meetings and even Quarterly Meetings were held at the houses of members. Concord Quarterly Meeting, then called Chester Quarterly Meeting, met for about seven years at a tavern near Chester, and the keeper of the tavern was a Friends' minister! What do you think of Friends' standard on intoxicating drinks in those days?

It was sadly painful, however, to depart by a boatload, and in course of time they began putting up meeting-houses on parts of the graveyard lands.

A great colony of Friends then grew up in southern Pennsylvania. When minister from England came there, they mentioned the large number of people that came to the meetings. So many came that the meeting-house would not hold them, and they would stand outside, even in the snow of winter perhaps, to catch what they could. A catalogue of 1684 the regular attendance at weekly meetings in Philadelphia was eight hundred. We have had yearly meetings occasionally. I remember one about four years ago, and a good meeting it was. Youths' meetings were more frequent two hundred years ago. I rather think they had at times in the year for holding them regularly. Then I say they had Yearly Meetings for worship in various parts of the country. Some four miles from here, over at Goshen meeting-house, one of these great Yearly Meetings was held, and now only a little band gathers there, and they not of our branch.

Then you know Friends had negroes living with them either as slaves or free servants, but they felt obliged to give them instruction and frequently there would be meetings held for their uplift. But not all their servants were blacks. Well-to-do farmers and others put out their children to other Friends to learn a trade or business, and sometimes the servants came from richer families than their masters. So they went to meeting with their masters and were well treated.

There were also indentured servants, who were poor people from the old country; they wanted to come to America, but not having the money to pay their passage, would get some one else to pay it for them, and were then put out by him to service for so much money, which they would work out.

In some such way as this came Jane Fenn to this land when about eighteen years of age. In one respect she was another Elizabeth Haddon. When very young she felt herself divinely called to come here. "Go to Pennsylvania," the inward voice said. She was not rich, like Elizabeth Haddon, so she had to work out her passage money after her arrival. She was indentured to some Friends for three years and taught school at Plymouth above Philadelphia. The children learned very fast, and she says, "My love to them was great and theirs equally so to me, so that all my commands were obeyed with pleasure." She joined Friends, becoming convinced that they were "a brave, living people," and that their manner of worship showed them to be God's people. She afterward became a minister. After she gave up her school, she crossed the Schuylkill and stayed some time at Haverford, waiting to see where she should next live. "One First-day," she said, "after I had sat sometime in Haverford Meeting, David Lloyd from Chester, with his wife and several other Friends, came into meeting. As soon as they were seated, it was as though it had been spoken to me, 'These are the people with whom thou must go and settle.' They being strangers to me, and appearing as persons of distinction, I said, 'Lord, how can such an one as I get acquainted with people who appear so much above the common rank?' The word was in my soul, 'Be still, I will make a way for thee in their hearts; they shall seek thee.'" Now, David and Grace Lloyd were, as she says, "persons of distinction." He was an able lawyer, had been attorney-general for the province, and also speaker of the assembly. He was ever a forceful man, and took a very active part in the politics of the day, being considered by some the great champion of popular rights. He is one of the very interesting colonial characters. Perhaps he was a political boss, but Jane Fenn says nothing of this, but only that he was to her "a father and a sure friend." He was exemplary in his family, treating all about him with humanity, choosing rather to be loved than feared.

Jane Fenn afterwards Hoskins traveled much in the ministry, crossing the ocean twice to her native land. But we will now leave her, hoping this brief account may give you a little clearer view of the early life in southeastern Pennsylvania. A. S.

THE WAY OF THE CROSS.

Beneath the shadow of thy wing,
O Love Divine, my restless heart
Hath found a refuge and doth sing,
Though all earth's transient joys depart.

Beneath the shadow of thy cross
I fling my garnered treasures down.
Life's vaulted gains are bitter loss,
A fleeting breath is earth's renown.

But o'er thy cross still gleams the star
That once, o'er Judah's hills of old
Shed its prophetic beams afar,
And victory over death foretold.

Enough for me that by its light
My weary spirit holds its way,
And waits in faith through darkest night
The dawn of Heaven's eternal day.

THOUGHTS.*

We have had a good deal of discussion recently on the teaching of the Scripture and of "Friends' Principles."

To those of the older generation, the knowledge of the Bible, familiarity with Scriptural characters, and the possession in our memories of many beautiful Psalms and other passages of Holy Writ are very precious. Knowing the value of such training, we are very anxious that our children should in turn possess the knowledge that has been of such unspeakable comfort to ourselves. Again, we feel grieved to think that there is among the younger members of the Society so little knowledge of those "principles" that have been so dear to ourselves and our fathers before us.

Let us cast our eyes back to our own childhood in Quaker homes. Most of us remember the revered institution of "family reading," generally twice a day, at breakfast time and again before retiring to rest. In most cases, the head of the family, slowly and reverently, with a prayerful pause before and after, read a chapter from the Old Testament in the morning and from the New in the evening. Sometimes, in the pause that followed, prayer was offered. Whether we think the practice commendable or otherwise, the result was the foundation of, at least, a verbal knowledge of the Bible. On this, in after years, some have been able, by other reading, to erect a structure of real knowledge of this precious volume ("library" rather) of Hebrew and early Christian literature. There is no doubt that this study has had a formative effect on Quaker character and literature, and on dignity of language.

Again, if we look back to the Quaker homes and revered guardians of our childhood, we observe, without much talk about them, Quaker "principles" in action. We saw, in our elders, "the frequent practice of waiting upon the Lord in private,"—"diligence in the private perusal of the Holy Scriptures." We were taught, by example and precept, to "make a profitable and religious use of those portions of the first day of the week which were not occupied by meetings for worship." Novels and light literature were not in evidence on that day, or, indeed, much on any day, for we were "guarded carefully against the introduction into our homes of publications of a hurtful tendency."

With regard to our clothing and the furniture of our houses, we saw sincerity in every line. Things were bought as they were needed, and not for fashion or show; their quality was sound and the best that our purses could afford, and they were not cast aside for any whim of fashion, or because our neighbors had something different.

No desire to make themselves "agreeable" induced these Quakers to "depart from the truth;" withholding complimentary phrases, they maintained a serious demeanor. Personal criticisms behind people's backs were severely suppressed, as "talebearing and detraction."

* Read at the Adelaide Meeting, by Alice J. Bell.

We saw kindness, liberality, and consideration shown to those who served us and to our poorer neighbors, and a loving interest taken in their spiritual welfare as well as their outward concerns. In this way, we were taught to "live in love, as Christian brethren."

As we grew older and started in life, perhaps in houses of business, we saw a scrupulous honesty as to the quality of goods offered for sale and sometimes possible profits lost by a refusal to "make something" out of the weakness or ignorance of a customer, remembering that "we must account for the mode of acquiring, as well as for the manner of using our possessions."

The great occasions of life were not made opportunities for display or merry-making. The birth of a little child was marked by the appointment from the Monthly Meeting of a motherly Friend to visit the young mother, and, if way opened, to speak helpful words as to the care and training of the precious little life entrusted to her.

A marriage was not an opportunity for the display of expensive garments, and a paragraph of description in a newspaper, but an event of deep and earnest moment in the lives of two young people, who took each other in the presence of the Lord, promising, not as a mere necessary form of words, but with heartfelt meaning, to be "loving and faithful, till it pleased the Lord by death to separate them."

When the end of life came, neither adulatory funeral addresses nor flattering tombstones were encouraged, even in the case of the most saintly, lest they should transgress "the bounds of truth." Truthfulness and sincerity were the watchwords of life. Lives, developing in this atmosphere from the cradle to the grave, had a something of earnestness and gravity about them, and a real, solid worth.

But we must remember that this character is a plant of slow growth and continuous tendence. It must be fostered in the right atmosphere. We cannot put it into a "forcing-house" for a year or two and see a strong plant emerge, even if a "forcing-house of Quakerism" were a possible thing.—The Australian Friend.

OLD-FASHIONED SPELLING-BEE AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.

During the past week vigorous contests in spelling have been in progress at the Friends' Select School. Classes have met with classes in preliminaries, semi-finals and finals for the class championship of the School in spelling and finally, on Sixth-day, the last contest for the individual championship of the School was held by the six contestants from each class who had stood the highest in the preceding class matches.

For the class championship, all the grades above the Primary competed. For the individual championship, six members out of each of the seven classes above the Fifth grade were the competitors. Some of the class contests were very close, but in the finals the Seniors won over the whole School, with the D class, the first year of the High School, a close second.

In the individual contest, first honors were won by Dorothy Shoemaker, a Senior, while second place was taken by Amalia Shoemaker of the C class. The individuals who stood highest in the class matches were Dorothy Roberts of the Senior class, Marion Synnott of the A class, Dorothy Chesnut of the B class, Robert Cowerthwaite of the C class, Dorothy Biddele of the D class, Rouse Burns of the E class, and Paul Haviland of the F class, or the Sixth grade.

The word which mowed down more good spellers than any other was "ecstasy," while the champion of the School was obliged to take her seat upon failing to spell "erysipelas." Other words which brought many to defeat were: asphyxiate, antecedent, dissipate, discipline, dyspepsia, italicize, alcohol, daffodils, Nebuchadnezzar, oblivion, frivolous, occurrence, villain, awful, separating, anemic, irresistible, resurrection, pacify, syllable, preparatory, censor, abbreviate, quadrilateral, igneous, indeterminate, possessions, Pharaoh, all right, sacrilegious, corresponding, diacritical, anoint, apostrophe, bituminous, shepherd, sanitarium, pursued.

NEWS ITEMS.

The New York Quakerism Class has sent a letter of greeting to other study centres from which the following is an extract:

"Another outcome from our winter has been a series of meetings held in Columbia University neighborhood on First-day afternoon, where members from several branches of the Society of Friends, and a number not members, have rejoiced in meeting together in unity for worship. We strive to carry into life to-day some measure of that spirit which was in Fox and Penn and Woolman and Whitier and Elizabeth Fry. The wonderful message of those giant Friends would, we feel sure, speak to the need of the world to-day if we were but able to voice it, and we are constantly surprised at the response we get from those not members of the Society of Friends. The world is calling for an individual Spiritual Faith. Can the Society of Friends answer? We feel that we need all the help from others we can get. Help us by telling us your struggles and aspirations.

OUTLINE OF STUDY.—The Board of Young Friends' Activities of the Five Years' Meeting has issued an outline of study for Young Friends. It covers the history and ideals of the Society. Its purpose is "To make the acquaintance of some of the Early Friends; to discover for oneself the reasons for their struggles and their strength; to discover in what Friends differ from other religious bodies, and why; to trace the growth, or failure to grow, of Quakerism to the present day; and to discover the needs and capacities of the Society of Friends in and for the world."

Copies can be had by addressing the Chairman, Willard O. Trueblood, 313 East Thirteenth Street, Indianapolis.—The American Friend.

The members of the Four-way Lodge have very kindly presented the Senior Boys' parlor at Westtown with a beautiful quartered oak table, and with subscriptions to the Atlantic Monthly, Scientific American, Popular Science Monthly, and The World's Work. Both of these gifts are much appreciated by the Seniors.—The Westonian.

AFTER some discussion by the managers of The Westtown Old Scholars' Association, a motion was carried that the Autumn Meeting be held at the Arch Street Meeting House, Philadelphia, on Sixth-day, Eleventh Month 13th, 1914.

The recent volume of the "Journal of Prison Discipline and Philanthropy," published by the Pennsylvania Prison Society, contains seventy-two pages of commanding interest. The president of the Society and about a dozen of the Managers are Friends, but the subjects they have at heart should appeal to our whole membership more than is apparent.

The forty-ninth annual report of the Home for Aged and Infirm Colored Persons at Girard and Belmont Avenues, in which Friends are liberally interested, shows an enrollment of 149 and expenditures for the year of $27,000. The institution is open to visitors. A cordial invitation is extended. Cars on Market and Arch Streets pass near the premises.

ADELAIDE NOTES.—We all feel very much the loss of William Ingle, his wife and family, who have been forced to return to England owing to the persuasion they have received under the Defence Act. Wm. Ingle himself served fourteen days in prison for not registering his son, who, under a fresh regulation, was then registered by an area officer without the boy's or his father's consent. Some months afterwards the boy was summoned, tried and sentenced to fourteen days in a military fortress for not drilling. The lad bravely refused to obey military orders or to do any drill while in the fortress; he was placed for two days in solitary confinement on bread and water diet. Wm. Ingle would gladly have stayed to help in our fight for freedom of conscience; but the nervous strain was too much for his wife, and they thought it best to return.—The Australian Friend.

The following is from a letter printed in The Australian Friend, showing activity for Peace in Great Britain rather out of the ordinary:

"I wonder if you'll have heard of an effort some of us made in Birmingham last the other day. There was a meeting in St. Mark's Church, with Lord Curzon as speaker, and Friends from all parts of the country principal streets as sandwichmen bearing banners for the abolition of the 'Compulsory Service Act' (Liberty). It was a very interesting affair. Peace, not War," and so on. I thought it very interesting, especially when we got into procession behind a banner bearing the motto 'No War', were advertising the consumption of C.V.V.V. (Cigarettes, Vegetables, and Vitamins), and there was a discussion on the subject of the meeting, though questions and answers were not given."

CAROLINE J. WELSHAKE, well known as an author of several books of spiritual uplift, the last entitled "The Inner World of the Soul"—died on the fifth of last month at Southampton, England, at the ripe age of eighty-nine years.

ARTHUR BRYAN TURNER, only surviving son of the late Wm. Letford Turner, with his wife and daughter, were killed in an automobile accident at Berkeley, Cal., Third Month 31st.

The Church Peace Union recently endorsed by Carnegie is about to enter upon an interesting inquiry. Commencing upon it Prof. Wm. F. Hull, who is one of the Trustees, gives the following details: "To make the inquiry complete, therefore, it was proposed to play fairly before a non-church-member the question of whether, and also of why, he or she is or is not conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms. It is believed that the majority of people are "drifting"—unconsciously, subconsciously or hastily—upon this fundamental question in regard to warfare; and that the first result of such an inquiry would be an excellent education of one, especially for the large number of men and women who profess the religion of Jesus Christ and the civilization of the twentieth century. It is believed that the second result of the inquiry would be to procure the information necessary either for further education along the most needed lines, or for calling upon the governments concerned to take the appropriate action. If it be found that a majority of the people, men and women, are already conscientiously opposed to warfare in the sense, or to the extent, indicated, the voice of the people in this case as in all others now-a-days would act upon the governments as the voice of God, and warfare would come to an end or be placed outside of the pale of international law, as has been the case with duelling and the feud within the nations."—Friends' Lubliner.

SINCE the publication of the editorial entitled, "Supporting 'THE FRIEND,'" a liberal gift of $1000 has been received to be added to the endowment fund. Such encouragement is greatly appreciated by the Contributors.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Dr. Samuel G. Dixon, in his week-end talk on health and hygiene, extols fresh air as one of the prime factors in contributing to health. He says: "The use of the spade, the hoe and the rake prove the equivalent of many of the gymnastic exercises which everybody concedes to be beneficial and few persons take. In addition to the advantages of exercise in the open air, it is a keen satisfaction to the vast majority of men and women to see things that they have cultivated grow and mature."

It is stated that the arrival of the steamship Chalcedon last week from Melbourne at New York was important as marking the introduction of Australian meat by direct shipment under order.

The prisoners at Lansing, Kansas, are to have an opportunity to select subjects which will enable them to go out into the world again and take up a respectable occupation and conduct themselves so that they will be an asset to the community. The courses which will be opened to the prisoners will include bookkeeping and accounting, machine starting, motor engineering, architectural drawing, steam and electrical engineering, mining, chemistry, pharmacy, literature, sociology, addresses and languages.

The Board of Health of this city lately announced that 15,867 quail eggs have been condemned and made unfit for consumption during the year. In several instances jail sentences were imposed.

In reference to the use of radium, it has been lately stated that a reaction may be the reaction in public feeling in regard to the radical claims made as a remedial agent in cancer, owing to certain over-statements and excessive claims made for it, there is absolutely no question, according to the experience of the medical officers of the New York State and Cancer

Hospital, that this remedy has been and can be an agent of supreme service in a certain number of selected cases of this dire disease.

It is said that ignorance and carelessness cost the nation and Canada $196,029,570 in fire loss last year.

In order to prevent the occurrence of fires citizens are advised that there shall be no rubbish accumulations in the cellar, old rags, waste paper, cotton waste, scraps and excelsior, that metal receptacles shall be used to hold waste papers, especially in laundries, and that there shall be no swinging unprotected gas jets in the cellar.

In order to prevent damage by frost it is stated that two thousand oil stoves, sunk in the ground, burn nightly in a large peach orchard on the outskirts of Dover. On nearby acreages a large percentage of trees have been nipped by frosts.

A recent despatch from Trenton, N. J., says: "Following Commissioner La Barre's statement that he would not vote to renew the license of a saloonkeeper who sold liquor to an intoxicated person and would also vote against the saloonkeeper who ignored the warning of a relative to refuse to sell to the person or persons complained of as drunkards, the City Commission has indorsed his attitude and all the commissioners will adopt the same rule in granting licenses. It will also apply to the cancellation of licenses."

As a result of a campaign instituted by the women of Cleveland, the police there have been instructed to reprove all men who are heard using profane or foul language in public. If they persist in the use of objectionable expletives they are to be arrested and each oath will cost them $1.

It is stated that the Department of Agriculture at Washington has made a success of growing the dasheen, a rare and rich vegetable of the tuber order, which has just appeared in the Washington markets. The plant is a native of the Philippines, and also of South America. For years the inhabitants of tropical and subtropical countries have lived on this food, which is a good substitute for meat. The scientists have introduced it in the Southern States and have brought it to perfection. Various parts of the plant are edible. The young blanched shoots of the dasheen make a salad which resembles the flavor of the mushroom. The chief food part is the large, spherical tuber, which has a nutty flavor when steamed or baked. These usually weigh from one and a half to three pounds.

It is stated that Chicago is now our most influential city so far as voters go. By the registration of 219,000 women voters under the new suffrage law the total number of voters there is brought up to 694,000 or 20,000 more than New York. The Chicago women had their first vote at the aldermanic election Fourth Month 7th. Their votes made about one-third of the total number of votes. It is said that in the smaller cities and country districts the influence of the women was more distinctly felt. There they voted strongly against the saloons. Eleven cities and sixteen counties changed from the "wet" to the "dry" column. Twenty-one women were elected to office in the smaller towns.

A despatch from Washington of the 15th says: "Prohibition advocates to-day presented to the House Judiciary Committee arguments in support of a constitutional amendment to enforce prohibition throughout the United States. They urged the resolution of Representative Hobson, of Alabama, providing for the submission to the States for ratification against the sale or manufacture for sale of all alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes. Led by Representative Hobson, the prohibitionists argued that they were simply appealing for an opportunity to present to the people of the country through the State Legislatures a definite referendum on the liquor question."

A despatch of the 15th from Washington says: "President Wilson's present purpose does not contemplate war with Mexico. But it does contemplate the seizure of Mexican ports and the maintenance of 'a peaceful blockade' until the Government of Mexico furnishes adequate reparation for the arrest of an American naval officer and American blue-jackets at Tampico. No time limit for compliance by the Mexican Government with President Wilson's demands has been fixed, and there will be no seizure of any Mexican port until after the arrival of the Atlantic fleet under Rear Admiral Charles J. Badger at Tampico."

Figures assembled by the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor show that in 1910 there were 29,499,136 children under 15 years of age in the United States. These children out of every five live in villages of less than 2500 inhabitants, or in rural neighborhoods.

C. M. Dudley, principal of the General Birney School, told members of the General Birney Home and School Association that since the common drinking cup and towel had been forbidden in the public schools there had been a great decrease in the number of contagious diseases. He said this was particularly true of his school.

Governor Glynn of New York has signed the bill restricting the sale of habit-forming drugs. Under the provisions of the bill the sale of such drugs, except on the prescription of a licensed physician, is forbidden. If the prescription contains more than four grains of morphine, 30 grains of opium, two grains of heroin, six grains of cocaine or four grains of chloral, the authority for the prescription must be verified. Every package must carry a label or certificate stating the name and address of the physician upon whose prescription the sale is made, the date of sale and the name of the person to whom it is sold. All drug dealers and physicians must use official order blanks supplied by the health authorities in making purchases of these drugs, and these orders will be serially numbered in duplicate.

FOREIGN.—A recent despatch of the 13th says: "Ratifications of the renewed arbitration treaty between the United States and Italy were exchanged to-day by Secretary Bryan and the Italian Ambassador. Later Secretary Bryan and Minister Bryn exchanged ratifications of a like treaty with Norway."

In order to prevent the spread of intoxicating drink in Russia, it is stated that cars are being fitted up with exhibits showing the bad effects of drink, and these cars, in charge of competent speakers, are to be sent over all the railroads. Stops will be made at every station and reform work will be carried on in the neighborhood. The Russian government draws over $100,000,000 in revenue from the tax on vodka and the loss of revenue will have to be made up in other ways, but it is realized that in the end there will be a vast saving to the people when the liquor habit is stamped out.

It was reported from Leeds, England, on the 15th inst., that a settlement of the Yorkshire coal miners' strike was reached to-day when the men voted to resume work. The strikers, numbering 170,000, left work on Fourth Month 2d demanding the introduction of a minimum wage scale. A conciliation board was appointed to discuss the points at issue and succeeded in obtaining the men's consent to the taking of a ballot.

It is mentioned that in certain country places, especially near towns, a new source of food is being exploited, says the London Globe. At one stockyard after another you may see village laborers stretching foldnets for sparrows and the birds are being caught simply for food. They keep down the butcher's bill. The number of sparrows is now immense, probably greater than it ever has been. The regular winter population of one small stockyard near London is estimated by the farmer at over 2000. These 2000 mouths he fills largely with his grain. The sparrows have completely driven away almost all other varieties of bird except a few finches.

A despatch from Shanghai received at London says a formidable revolutionary movement has appeared in southern China. The regular troops at Sianfu, capital of Shensi province, are said to have mutinied. The rebellion, however, centres at Nankin, where there is a reign of terror among the populace and feverish excitement among the official classes.

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.32, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone 114A.

WM. B. HARVEY, Superintendent.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 29th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when they are temporarily out of school or are unduly burdened in keeping up with their classes, or have been seriously interrupted in their studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Months strengthens the health, and the children gather up the lines of their Westtown studies so that they can get an easier start for their year's work the next autumn.

"DEAR friends, keep all your meetings in the authority, wisdom and power of Truth and unity of the blessed spirit; and the God of peace be with you."

THE YEARLY MEETING.

I.

The five days in which the membership of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was united in living exercises at the session of 1914 will long be regarded as memorable days. The conclusion of one middle-aged Friend probably expressed the conviction of many. "This is the most remarkable session of the Yearly Meeting I ever attended. It seems to me we have been making history!" Are there any evident reasons for such a conclusion?

During the session on Fourth-day, after the Annual Queries had been read, a dearly beloved Friend from the upper gallery made a feeling appeal that baptized the meeting into a remarkable sense of loving unity. He referred to the time when he had sat amongst the youth in the back of the meeting, of the tendering visitations of that time, and to the growing interest from year to year until finally he found himself shoulder to shoulder with dedicated men to whom the Truth and the service of Truth were most precious. One by one these dedicated servants had been called to their eternal reward, until his heart was saddened and he felt much alone. Then there came upon him a sense of the tenderness and devotion of many younger hearts who were very evidently yielding themselves unreservedly to the forming hand of Divine Love. He could feel the spirits of such in their deep exercises, and could realize how this Gospel power had so far overspread us as a body as to bring us all into a blessed oneness.

It is quite impossible to do justice to such a communication, but it made very clear what has happened in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The unity of the body has come to be a unity of life. It is thus that its service is extended and its power to do things enlarged. This enlargement had manifestations the present year in three notable directions:

First, a method to extend the membership of the Representative Meeting to women, in a wholly natural way, recognizing service and not sex as the basis of qualification, was formulated to good satisfaction. Following, the election two women Friends were appointed to fill vacancies in the Yearly Meeting's representation.

Second, the meeting of Ministers and Elders was enabled to release Friends for religious service in the antipodes, and the Yearly Meeting itself to receive messages from distant parts, and to unite in most loving letters in return.

Third, pressing matters of public welfare in our own beloved country found the meeting a prepared instrument for united service. These matters will be somewhat disclosed in the items we are printing from the Minutes, while the brief abstracts of proceedings may give Friends at a distance and members of the Yearly Meeting not in attendance a general survey of the sessions. We shall gladly be the instrument of mailing copies of the printed minutes to any who may desire them.

It is a matter for profound gratitude that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting seems able through Divine help to show that our ancient foundation can be well preserved in activities calculated to serve the present time.

II.

The session of the Yearly Meeting that has just closed will no doubt be regarded as a memorable one, in the number and variety of fresh concerns that claimed attention, and in the fact that almost all of these took shape in definite action. This was true of both men's and women's meetings, several of the aforesaid matters requiring joint approval, and some others being peculiar to the separate meetings. As will be seen from the Minutes, the Yearly Meeting has jointly and rather notably put itself on record in some vigorous declarations and addresses relative to Prohibition and Peace, while the women's meeting has issued a timely address on card-playing and kindred evils. The activities of the week were characterized by certain public-spirited interests, as shown not only in the proceedings above referred to, but in the several letters addressed to Friends in distant lands.

As regards women's meeting in particular, it is perhaps safe to say that the general interest was never more conspicuous—at least for many years past—and that the official action of the meeting was in several instances evidently gratifying in a large degree. The increase of communication between the two meetings, and the recognition of women's meeting as a factor in authoritative councils, add importance and responsibility to our deliberations. If a review of the transactions of the past week leaves on our minds a sense of some deficiency: if there was at times a little lack of the solidity and carefulness that should mark such assemblies, it may at least be said that much consideration, sympathy and unanimity were evident, and that the meeting as a whole might have been an impressive object lesson to a stranger.

There was no want of the activity usually assumed to be an "indication of life". There was much expression of outreaching love and interest, and there seemed a zeal for the spreading of the knowledge of the Gospel. It is an occasion for rejoicing when the Lord's servants are truly called out into this work; but there is also a ground of rejoicing in that fundamental Christian truth, that though many in the dark places of the earth have not heard outwardly the preaching of the Gospel, yet they are not on that account denied the Gospel itself. As the power of God unto salvation preached in every soul, it is one with that universal Grace which bringeth salvation; and so the ministry which the Apostle Paul said he had received of the Lord Jesus was to testify the Gospel of the grace of God. Let us keep to this great truth.

MINUTE OF EXERCISE OF THE YEARLY MEETING OF MINISTERS AND ELDERS.

As we gathered in this our annual assembly, and throughout its sittings, we have felt the near presence of the Unslumbering Shepherd; under a sense whereof our petition went forth to Him that we might be brought closer together as a flock, and guarded and led according to the Divine will.

We were exhorted to be one another's helpers in the Lord, and commended to the teaching of the text which sets forth the strength, the excellency, and the outreaching effect of true brotherly unity.

We rejoice that some of our number have felt called of our Lord to go forth to distant lands bearing His message of peace on earth and good will to men.

Thankfulness was expressed, that as the Fathers and Mothers of our Israel are called away, the young are coming forward to take their places under the qualifying power of the Lord Jesus. These were encouraged to humbly submit themselves to this holy influence, that they may be truly fitted for the work of the church.

Refreshed and quickened by the felt presence of our Holy Redeemer, under which we have been enabled to transact the business that has come before us in a large measure of Christian love, the meeting closed, to convene again at the usual time next year if consistent with the Divine will.

TO WHOM THIS MAY COME,

Greeting.—William C. Allen, a beloved minister of the Gospel and member of this meeting, informed us by letter written from San José, State of California, and bearing date Fourth Month 8, 1914, that he has for several years felt that religious service in the constraining love of Christ might at some not distant date be required of him abroad: the field of labor appearing to include parts of Japan, China, Australasia, and probably a little in the British Isles, together with such service en route as he may be led into.

The feeling regarding this apprehended duty having deepened of late, he had sought and obtained minutes expressive of sympathy and unity regarding it from Chester Monthly and Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meetings, State of New Jersey, whereof he is a member, which were now read.

The scope and nature of this apprehended call for labor for the blessed Master met with the full approval of this meeting, which encourages him to proceed in company with his near friend and companion, William B. Harvey, to perform as ability may be given the work set before them for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom of peace and righteousness upon the earth.

In their going forth we commend our dear friends, including Elizabeth C. B. Allen, wife of William C. Allen, to the keeping and power of Him Who is a God that heareth prayer, and Who has promised to be a present help in every time of need.

To them we commit a message of Christian love and good will which has in freshness arisen upon this occasion, and desire it to be delivered on behalf of this meeting wheresoever they may come.

By direction of a Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders of the Religious Society of Friends, held in Philadelphia, U. S. A., the eighteenth day of Fourth Month and twenty-first of the same, 1914.

TO WHOM THIS MAY COME,

Greeting.—Our beloved friend, William B. Harvey, an elder of New Garden Monthly and Western Quarterly Meeting, Pennsylvania, having for a considerable time felt near unity and sympathy with our friend William C. Allen in his prospect of religious service abroad, has believed it right to offer to accompany him therein; and having received the full concurrence of his Monthly Meeting has asked for our endorsement thereof. During a time of prayerful deliberation there was much expression of loving sympathy for him in this call to assist his friend in laboring for the Gospel in distant lands.

Freely do we encourage him to perform the service unto which he may be called, trusting that, under the Divine blessing, having gone forth together unto the harvest field of our Lord, our friends may in like manner be permitted to return, bearing their sheaves with them.

SYNOPSIS OF THE YEARLY MEETING SESSIONS. MEN'S MEETING.

Second-day, 10 A. M..—Solemn covering and baptizing offering of prayer. Opening minute. Appointment of verbal Committee to consider communications. Letter of Jonathan E. Rhoads. Consideration of the time of holding the Yearly Meeting proposed by Isaac Sharpless. Sessions originally held in autumn. Changed to spring to avoid yellow fever epidemics and made as early as roads were fit for travel. Now interferes with farming operations and divides school terms unfortunately. Subject referred to representatives. Minutes of Representative Meeting read to point of recommendation that women be admitted to that meeting. Three principles defined. Appointments in future to be based on fitness, without regard to sex. The relative number of men and women not to be fixed, and the total number not to exceed the present limit, forty. Meeting adopted recommendation and named a Committee to unite with women Friends in making nominations for two vacancies. Minutes of Representative Meeting continued. Concluding suggestion in them to appoint a small Committee to consider how best to further the interests involved in the resolution before Congress favoring Prohibition approved and Committee appointed. Committee named on Treasurer's account.

Third-day.—Davis H. Forsythe and Walter L. Moore appointed Clerks. Verbal Committee reported on three communications. Following their suggestion, letters from Australia, from China and from London read. Committee appointed to draft replies to Australia and to China and also to prepare a general message of love from the Yearly Meeting to be carried by Joseph Elkinton and delivered by him to all to whom he and his family may come. Ann Sharpless and Jane W. Bartlett appointed members of Representative Meeting. Three Queries read and summaries adopted. Several weighty messages prompted by these welcomed by the meeting.

Fourth-day.—Letter to Australia and to China adopted. Epistle for Joseph Elkinton to deliver approved. Remaining Queries and Annual Queries considered. John B. Garrett presented concern in regard to Mexican situation. Committee appointed to interview or to communicate with the President.

Fifth-day.—Telegram sent to the President read and approved. Two Friends appointed to keep in touch with William C. Allen and William B. Harvey in their extensive religious service in order to supply the needed financial aid. Report of Committee to consider the duty of meetings toward those just outside our membership adopted and subject referred to subordinate meetings in form proposed. The report of the Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education read. Proposal to add three men to the Committee to assist with project for Teachers' Retiring Allowances approved and nominating Committee appointed. Report of Westtown Boarding School considered. Proposed advance in price of tuition to $275 a year approved. A Nominating Committee to propose to next Yearly Meeting names for the new appointment, due at that time, named. The report of a joint session of the Representatives to men's and women's meeting suggesting the last Second-day in the Third Month for the beginning of Yearly Meeting was accepted and the change made. A minute in regard to the Prohibition amendment was received from the Committee on the subject and adopted. Arthur Richie expressed a concern that the effort for Peace in the present excitement be extended to editors of newspapers. A Committee was appointed.

Sixth-day.—Henry J. Cadbury proposed that the meeting unite a few moments as they might be qualified in silent intercession that the impending conflict in Mexico might be averted. This was done. A memorial of Josiah W. Leeds was read. The report of the Indian School at Tunesassa was read and approved. The report of the Committee to examine the Treasurer's account was received. The question of tenure of appointment to the Representative Meeting was discussed and referred to that meeting for consideration and report. Eli H. Harvey was liberated to make a visit to women's meeting. The Committee to influence the press for peace made a report. They were continued to prosecute the concern. A memorial of Mary Bettle was read. A minute embracing some of the exercises of the meeting was read. After a solemn offering of prayer the concluding minute was read and the meeting separated.

WOMEN'S MEETING.

Second-day.—Letter of J. E. Rhoads read. Clerks directed to draft reply. Proposed change of time of Yearly Meeting referred to Representatives. Proposal to admit women to Representative Meeting approved. Committee to join men Friends in making nominations for two vacancies appointed. Four Queries read and answers adopted. Clerks requested to prepare letter to college students.

Third-day.—Jane W. Bartlett and Mary M. Cowperthwaite appointed Clerks, Mary R. Williams reader. Remaining Queries answered. Minute embracing exercises read. Committee appointed to audit Treasurer's account. A Committee appointed to join men Friends in considering action on Prohibition amendment. Ann Sharpless and Jane W. Bartlett approved for Representative Meeting. Lunch Committee's report presented. Three letters from distant parts read. Committee appointed to join men Friends in drafting replies.

Fourth-day.—Minutes of the Representative Meeting read. Concern on card-playing committed to a number of Friends to be expressed in a letter for general circulation. Letters and epistles to distant parts read and adopted.

Fifth-day.—Auditing Committee's report received. Educational statistics read. The report of the Committee on Education considered. Nominating Committee named for three Friends to join in consideration of Teachers' Retiring Allowances. Report on extension of care to those just beyond the membership of the meetings approved. The Westtown report considered and recommendations approved. Nominating Committee for next year's appointment made. Report of Representatives on time of holding Yearly Meeting accepted. Letter to J. E. Rhoads and to all students approved.

Sixth-day.—Telegram sent to the President read and commended. New Lunch Committee appointed. Anna P. Sharpless, Mary Stokes Roberts and Alice H. Yearl appointed on teachers' retirement plan. The minute on the proposed prohibitory amendment adopted. The letter concerning card-playing approved and directed to be signed by Clerk. The Annual Queries were read. Two memorials were read. After the closing minute and a recessive pause the meeting concluded.

TO PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS:

Dear Friends.—It is with a fervent desire for the upbuilding of the Church of Christ, of which let us humbly believe our Yearly Meeting as an organized body of believers forms a part, that I am drawn to address you, and to plead that it may be our united prayer that our Saviour's intercession on behalf of His followers shall be effectual in our experience. "That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in me and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us! That the world may believe that Thou hast sent me." The position of our body will be greatly strengthened by presenting a united front in advocating and practicing that purity of life which Jesus Christ exemplified in His walk among men. This purity does not admit of adulteration by the worldly spirit, which quickly contaminates the holiness of a disciple of the meek and lowly Jesus.

Farewell.

Your brother,

JONATHAN F. RHOADS.

Fourth Month, 1914.

"TO THE GENERAL MEETING OF FRIENDS IN AUSTRALIA:

Dear Friends.—The letter from your General Meeting held in the Tenth Month, 1913, has been read in our Yearly Meeting now in session.

Our hearts are cheered by the assurance that you can rejoice in your sufferings for the cause of Christ.

We wish to convey to you some measure of the deep and heartfelt sympathy and affection which has found expression among us, and especially to you, young men, upon whom the operation of the Defense Act falls so heavily. Your example is a strength to the youth of the world.

We are grateful for your devotion and faithfulness to the teachings of our Redeemer, by which we believe all war is forbidden, and we lift our hearts in prayer to Him, Who is the God and Father of us all that He will protect and guard you unto His Heavenly Kingdom.

And now we commend you again to His sustaining Grace, whose eternal purpose is to establish righteousness in the earth.

Fear not, nor be dismayed. Hold fast to that Arm which shall never fail you. The love of Christ constrains us.

We remain your friends."

"TO ALL TO WHOM THIS LETTER MAY COME,

Greeting.—The Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends of Philadelphia, United States of America, in regular session assembled, desires to send by the hand of Joseph Elkinton, a beloved Minister of our Religious Society, a message of peace, good-will and Christian love to all to whom he may be led by the Master.

We perceive that in our day many nations are being drawn nearer together in sympathy and service by the working of the Spirit of God. May we all look into our hearts, and there find the deep current of this spiritual fellowship, and thereby become fellow-workers with each other and with God. There may we feel the love and joy of the Lord, Jesus Christ our Saviour, as our strength. There will He send forth His Light and His Truth; let them lead us.

On behalf of the Yearly Meeting "

"TO FRIENDS IN CHINA:

Dear Friends.—Your letter of 1913 was received and has been read in our Meeting. Our hearts were touched and tendered with sympathy and love for you. The difficulties and trials which you have to meet may be different from anything we know, yet we believe the love of God, through Jesus Christ our Saviour, will be abundantly bestowed upon those who come to Him in living faith. We recognize our own weakness and infirmity and have been brought to pray for help and strength, that we may be enabled to do His Will.

We ask the same blessing for you. We desire you may become quick of understanding in the fear of the Lord, that you may be made very instrumental in turning the hearts and minds of your people from darkness to light.

If called upon to suffer, may you be supported by Him Who died that we might live. What a blessed Saviour, seeking lost souls, and strengthening living souls!

May we serve Him, and thus be bound in one bundle of love to the glory of God."

"TO WOODROW WILSON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

The Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends for the eastern part of Pennsylvania and for New Jersey and Delaware, now in session at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, sends greetings to the President.

We heartily sympathize with the expressed intention of the administration to avoid war, and would welcome the earliest possible withdrawal of American forces from Mexican territory.

The State Department has repeatedly urged upon other nations the desirability of delay in all cases of international controversy, in order that the facts may be investigated. How can our country consistently abandon this policy thus urged upon others and precipitate a conflict without investigation or delay?

We believe that the thoughtful Christian people of the United States deplore, as we do, this present conflict. We cordially join in the message transmitted yesterday by the federation of churches held in New York City, and we stand on our testimony to the unrighteousness of all war.

We are therefore constrained to express to the President our profound regret that actual conflict has been allowed to occur, as indicated in to-day's dispatches, and we make this earnest appeal for a cessation of hostilities."

"RECOGNIZING the enormous evils associated with, and growing out of the liquor traffic, the Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends for Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Eastern Maryland, now in session at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and representing about 4400 members, earnestly urges the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States to take favorable and prompt action on the joint resolution now pending which provides for the submission to the Legislature of the several States of a Constitutional Amendment prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes."

"FROM THE YEARLY MEETING OF THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, NOW IN SESSION, AT FOURTH AND ARCH STREETS, PHILADELPHIA:

Dear Friend.—In a great crisis such as our country is now facing, an unusually heavy burden of responsibility rests upon owners, editors and publishers of newspapers. We earnestly ask thee to consider thy peculiar opportunity for Christian service in the right handling of news and comment on the present grave difficulties with Mexico.

By the editorials published, the head-lines exhibited and the news columns in the (), the attitude of many hundreds of citizens is moulded. If the pages of thy paper are kept clear of all incitement to a warlike spirit, and if a strong stand for peace is taken, much can be done to instill a truer patriotism than one which demands support for war."

Dear Young College Friends.—It is with real pleasure and gratitude that we learn of your practice of meeting on the First-day of the week for a time of silent worship. We greatly commend you for this, feeling it must require some courage and determination of purpose thus to show your loyalty to your religious belief. We desire that you may ever be concerned to uphold the high standard of spiritual life professed by the Society of Friends, and so to live that wherever your lot may be cast you may be known as faithful followers of the Inner Light.

A person not in membership with us, in speaking of a college mate, said that she admired her mental abilities and her high moral character, but most of all she admired her for her loyalty to the principles of her own religious Society.

The cultivation of intellectual gifts is a duty if it goes hand in hand with spiritual insight. May your college training strengthen you in the use of the sword of the spirit, which will enable you to pierce between good and evil, between truth and falsehood.

We commend to you a portion of the message sent by our dear friend Jonathan E. Rhoads to this Yearly Meeting, which he was unable to attend: "The position of our body will be greatly strengthened by presenting a united front in advocating and practising that purity of life which Jesus Christ exemplified in His walk among men. This purity does not admit of adulteration by the worldly spirit, which quickly contaminates the holiness of a disciple of the meek and lowly Jesus."

Signed on behalf of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Women Friends.

REBECCA S. CONARD,
SUSANNA S. KITE,

PHILADELPHIA, Fourth Month 24, 1914.

REALIZING that the situation of the present day is different from that in which our mothers found themselves, we ask your attention.

The attitude of society towards woman has radically changed, opening avenues of service to many new fields, with accompanying disadvantages.

The increasing love of change as an element of our pastimes gives much concern for the community. The word "gambling" is disagreeable to all. Yet must we not face the danger of being often in close contact with it? It is about us in greater or lesser degree, from the little children dabbling in it at marbles, the older brothers and sisters raffling at a so-called benevolent fair, to the maids in the home buying lottery tickets, up to the mother at the bridge table, and the father on the stock market.

We do not condemn healthful games, many stimulate the intellect and brighten the wits, others develop instinctive obedience, loyalty and the ability to work harmoniously with our fellows.

But why is it that such a large percentage of Christian people object to the use of playing-cards? Is it not the gross waste of time for intelligent people, and that their use tends to abuse?

Edward C. Wood states that no other game is exercised to so great an extent in this way. Say what we will about the possibilities,—and he acknowledges the possibility—yet the tendency and majority of practice is in the other direction. Gambling in its various forms, such as betting, raffling, lottery, has been under discussion for many years and the world's best opinion is practically against it.

Even when the games played are so easy and the chances so nominal as to be little considered, the unsound habit of regarding the getting of "something for nothing" as honorable is steadily being ingrained into the character.

Dr. Porter, former President of Yale, says that gambling owes its elements of capacity for tenacious hold on the feelings and its rapidly accumulating strength, to its capacity to occupy and interest the imagination, and to excite the passion of hope and daring and self-confidence.

And Dr. James E. Rhoads, former President of Bryn Mawr College, said, "If amusements exhaust the energies that should be reserved for more serious duties, if they waken tastes and form imaginary schemes of life that are false and impracticable, or render the plain work of life distasteful, if they arouse unholy passions, they should be exchanged for others free from such results."

Let us look at gambling when combined with hospitality; it is there perhaps that we see its most ugly feature.

Even the barbarian's guest is sacred, to be given of one's best and sent upon his way unharmed. And what shall we think of gentle folk, of good society, who invite friends to their homes with the intention of retaining some of their property when they shall leave? Or of the guest who is willing after an otherwise delightful evening, to walk away with a number of dollars belonging to the kind hostess?

The essential feature common to both stealing and gambling is the transfer of property to which the recipient has no honorable title.

And this includes no glimpse of a girl who goes home to her parents, sick and mortified with her losses, or of the young man who is so hampered and so pinched by his disastrous play, that his imagination can suggest no means to help himself but that of more playing.

Do you feel the sketch is drawn too harshly? Men and women who permit themselves to indulge in such things have dulled the keen edge of their sense of honor. Unless they awaken to the need of high principles in their daily lives, and appeal to our Lord for His power to overcome temptation, what shall restore their usefulness to society?

The responsibility lies with those of us who are convinced of the evil of all gambling. If we desire high standards of honesty and fidelity to promises in the government of our nation, the individuals composing that nation must uphold those standards in the fruitfulness of their daily lives.

MINUTES SUMMARIZING EXERCISES. WOMEN'S MEETING.

THESE summaries brought the meeting into exercise calculated to correct the deficiencies that have been disclosed, and to stimulate the spiritual growth of the members. It was pointed out that the Queries are like a searchlight turned upon the meeting, presenting the condition of the membership as a whole, and giving us pictures of ourselves as individual members. There may be two attitudes unfolded in this exercise, the first is expressed by the charge: "One of you shall betray me," and the second by the encouragement, "Ye are they which have continued with Me in My temptations."

The presence of children in a meeting is helpful in proportion as a oneness of spirit in the gathering is realized. This will encourage a ministry suited to the minds of children. This ministry will serve the meeting, and will not be exercised in a condescending spirit, but in recognition that the children have a part in the worship, as they seek for Heavenly help. Let our love go out to them in great tenderness. As these learn to recognize the voice of their Heavenly Father, they will find that He will interpret messages to them. Thus it is realized that out of the mouth of babes is wisdom proclaimed, and "of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

The importance of attending mid-week meetings was urged. If parents do not value these meetings and faithfully attend as a privilege, the children will lightly esteem them. Children are often just critics, and they will judge of the importance of such occasions, more from parents' example than from their precepts.

The value of silence in worship is being more and more acknowledged by those not of our religious Society. Various gatherings with this object were referred to, in some of which our members have participated. These may very easily be the nucleus of a Friends' meeting and it was stimulating to hear of young Friends at colleges and even in foreign lands, supporting our religious principles and, in some cases, definitely holding a Friends' meeting. A salutation of love and encouragement went out from the meeting to all such.

When absent from home on vacations, it is profitable to remember the value of small meetings. Often meetings held in private houses have been times of special blessing, and they show how unimportant place or time or organization is to the worship of our Heavenly Father.

The personal habits of our members in regard to the reverent reading of the Holy Scriptures, claimed the interest of the meeting. Such habits are best formed in youth and the devotional attitude toward the Bible should be encouraged in children. Combined with the practice of committing passages to memory, this will be found to be an unfailing source of help through life.

Simplicity of life is closely associated with a careful attention to the admonitions of duty. As these are waited for and attended to, we shall grow from strength to strength, and realize what is meant by the admonition, "De-pise not the day of small things." Job Scott said that he could not sit down and wait upon our Heavenly Father for a manifestation of His will, without soon feeling a thirst for righteousness. This thirst becomes the basis for right conduct in the obedient disciple, and develops a growing sensitiveness to the restraints and constraints of Divine love. That we may be filled with a knowledge of our Heavenly Father's will, is an aspiration that may well be applied to the difficult problems of life.

We were reminded that those in whose hearts the love of God has first place, lose the desire for such diversions as those mentioned in the Fifth Query. The young people were encouraged to avoid such harmful diversions, as they tend to weaken the character and cannot satisfy the longings of the immortal soul.

Mothers were urged to strive to be living epistles which can be seen and read by the dear children, who may thus take knowledge of them that they have been with Jesus. If they observe in their parents' lives the fruits of the spirit, love, joy, self-control, this will be a constant invitation to love and to follow the dear Saviour even in the narrow path. Although parents feel their weakness and shortcomings, yet all-sufficient grace is ever given to the humble sincere seeker.

It was encouraging to learn from the answer to the Seventh Query that some testimony is borne to the world in regard to the practices therein enumerated. Those who are in the habit of playing cards were asked carefully to consider the kindred relation of such games to gambling. May we as a body of women uphold the ancient testimony of our religious Society on this subject and by watchfulness and prayerfulness be kept from temptation. There are other ways of enjoyment and relaxation and many of these may be such as help others. Let us avoid the appearance of evil, lest we cause a weaker member to stumble.

The suffering of Friends in Australia due to their faithful and consistent protest against military service, was feelingly alluded to. Such deserve the loving interest and sympathy of Friends here who do not suffer such persecution.

In the large gatherings that have assembled from session to session of this Yearly Meeting, great diversity of gifts, of training, of point of view must have been represented. The harmony which has characterized the meetings of the past week has been possible because the members have realized a good measure of the "unity of the spirit in the bond of peace" and the messages which have been sent out from the meeting have come from hearts bound together in Christian love.

For the manifold blessings, the precious seasons of united prayer and praise and the oneness of purpose, thanksgiving has arisen from humble hearts to Him who has again manifested Himself to be the "Head over all, blessed forever."

May the blessing which has descended upon us not be dissipated as we go to our various homes, but may we experience a deepening in the root of life and a daily growth in grace "until we all come to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

MINUTES SUMMARIZING EXERCISES MEN'S MEETING.

The test of practical religion is expressed in the words of the Divine Master, "By their fruits ye shall know them." No change in ethical standards since Jesus walked upon earth has effected this simple rule whereby we so directly measure the intent of the heart of man.

The value which we set upon the periodical reading and answering of the Queries will depend upon our readiness to consider them as wisely ordained for the discovery of what so vitally affect us, whether as individuals or as an organized body—the church. They are intended to reveal to us our weaknesses, that these may be corrected; and our excellencies, if we have them, in order that we may rejoice in our strength.

As a religious body, we have for our fundamental principles of belief the intercommunion of each soul with the Author of its being. Our system of church polity centres therefore in the meetings for worship. As these are held in the power of God, as our worthy forefather in the Truth, George Fox, phrased it, we shall know of their strengthening influence; while if, on the other hand, they are allowed to become perfunctory seasons of mental and spiritual dulness, decline and decay are already in store for them.

And yet, that a meeting is small may not be a criterion of essential weakness, and should not be made the occasion of discouragement upon the part of its membership. Well has it been said, "He who finds God a sweet consoling thought to him, never counts his company." The promise of the Master to His followers has come across the centuries with freshened meaning—"Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them."

We have a number of small meetings within our limits, and these were commended to our serious consideration. Some of them in particular, it is felt, may again be built up as the result of the present growing tendency of Friends to seek settlement in rural neighborhoods. Though we have this cause for hopefulness in some localities, we must not blind ourselves to the fact that others of these smaller meetings are steadily declining in membership. May our eyes be open to see the vision and our hearts ready to respond to the call which may come to us, as it did to the great Apostle—"Come over into Macedonia, and help us."

Has the time not arrived for the bestowal, on the part of some, of less time upon the gathering of earthly riches, and more upon the acquisition of those things which belong to the life eternal? remembering that upon each one of us depends in some measure the bringing down of the Divine blessing upon our meetings for worship, be they large or small.

The reports from the Quarterly Meetings gave evidence that we are favored with the attendance of a considerable number at our meetings for worship of those who are not members. Our responsibility towards these is great. We believe their number may be largely increased if we can assure them, as did some formerly, when with evident sincerity of purpose, they sought to bring others into fellowship with them, they gave the invitation—"Come with us; we will do thee good."

It should be a matter of deep interest to us to notice the increasing emphasis which is being placed by thoughtful people of other religious denominations upon the efficacy of silent prayer. When companies of business men, amid the stress and hurry of present day conditions, are found coming together at stated intervals for a period of silent devotion, as a means of spiritual uplift whereby to better meet the excessive drain upon their higher nature, surely it is a time for Friends to remain steadfast to the foundation principle of their meetings for worship, and to endeavor in every way to emphasize its value before the world.

As we are enabled through definite personal experience to increase the emphasis which we may lay upon the positive side of our testimony for a waiting, spiritual worship and a ministry exercised, under the immediate anointing of the Minister of Ministers, we shall find less need to bear a negative testimony to our principles by discouraging a ministry that is staid or paid.

One of our younger Friends called attention to what he believed was a loss sustained through lack of flexibility on the part of some of our ministers and elders in failing to enter into vital sympathy with the younger members in their difficulties, and thus be to them a real source of encouragement and inspiration in a love for our principles.

In our reading of the Scriptures, both in private and in the family, we were exhorted to make the exercise one of the heart as well as of the head. In this connection was cited the remark of a distinguished English scholar and statesman (not a Friend) who after having been present at the family devotions of the late John Bright, stated that "the most impressive and pure piece of religion that he ever witnessed, was the reading of the Bible by John Bright to his maid servants, after his wife's death, followed by the Quaker silence."

A loving caution was extended against amusement halls, now so largely increased in number, and, in general, of so harmful tendency upon the morals of the young; tending to excite in them unholly desires and depraved passions. "The theatre is no place for a follower of Jesus." We should always desire, in the event of sudden call from this world, to be found where we can face the Eternal Judge with calmness, and leave to our relatives and friends no sorrowful reflections.

We have felt at various times during the sittings of this Yearly Meeting the quickening influence of Divine love, under which our hearts have been turned to our brethren in Australia, China, Japan and the British Isles. We rejoice that some of our number have been called to visit these in the fellowship of the Gospel, and that we are commending to their keeping a message of love and goodwill unconfined by the limitations of clime or race. Is it too much to expect that their faithfulness and the prayerful support which we give them will, through the Divine blessing, redound in measure to the deepening of our own ministry and joy in religion? Then will pass into our own experience the prophetic utterance:

"If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon-day: And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones; and thou shall be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not."—Isa. lviii: 10, 11.

MEETINGS OF FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS DURING YEARLY MEETING WEEK.

As usual afternoon and evening meetings were held in the Twelfth Street Meeting House when the Yearly Meeting was not in session. The following report is mostly adapted from the accounts printed in the Ledger.—Eds.

In the afternoon of First-day there was a special meeting of the Friends' Foreign Missionary Association in the Twelfth Street Meeting House.

Asa Wing read the parable of the Good Shepherd and introduced the speaker of the afternoon, George C. Doolittle, who has been for twenty years a missionary in Sidon, Syria. After paying a high tribute to Daniel Oliver's work in Syria, he gave a graphic description of places in Palestine, and recounted the parable of the Good Samaritan as teaching a world-wide sympathy and helpfulness.

When asked what changes most impressed him since his last visit to America, ten years ago, he said that while he saw the great developments in material civilization, he was more profoundly impressed with the spiritual awakening among Christian denominations. Nor was this confined to the churches. He referred to John Wanamaker's interest in missions of India.

Asa Wing said that while all Christian missions were working harmoniously, the evangelization of the world opened so wide a field that it was found more practical for each mission to concentrate its efforts in some particular place. The Philadelphia Friends were bending their energies to support their mission in Tokio, Japan, where Edith Sharpless was at work. Another young Friend, Esther Balderston, who expects to join her this autumn, was present and was called upon to make a few remarks.

In a pleasing address she said that they must all find out their neighbors—in Japan or elsewhere—and help them.

Second-day evening was devoted to the interests of the Freedmen. The report of the Executive Committee of the Christiansburg School indicated a year of significant results. A commission of inquiry amongst a half dozen or more schools had given Christiansburg a first place in the essentials of service to the race. The Board of Managers now desire to make the agricultural work more practical by the employment of an "extension" farmer, who will be in degree at the service of the farmers of the neighborhood. They also desire to establish a small hospital. Edgar A. Long, the principal, gave an interesting report of the work of Christiansburg graduates. J. Henry Scattergood and Morris E. Leeds have recently made an extensive tour of Southern colored schools. The former reported on this tour and emphasized the interest of the Southern white man as an important encouraging feature of the present situation. Leslie Pinckney Hill, of the Teachers' Training School at Cheyney, made an impressive and stirring address. He pleaded for the colored children that they should actually be put to school. Statistics show clearly that many of them are not there. In addition, the patent fact that many so-called colored schools are so poorly taught as to be a travesty on the name school calls for correction. He pleaded for co-operation by the three hundred voluntary institutions serving the great cause. Often now they work at cross purposes and with a feeling of competition that is most unwholesome for the cause. Finally, he pleaded for teacher training as the most direct, effective and economical means of making the race help itself.

Third-day evening the annual meeting of the Friends' Temperance Association brought out a large audience.

Henry N. Pringle, assistant superintendent of the International Reform Bureau, of Washington, gave an address on "The Fight Against Liquor, National and Local." He urged co-operation of different reform parties and a straightforward kindly appeal to the everyday man to support good legislation.

The president, Thomas C. Potts, announced that a petition had been sent to Congress in favor of the constitutional amendment for national prohibition.

Benjamin F. Whitson proposed that the meeting should memorialize our Representatives to have a law passed to establish a general censorship of motion-picture films. This motion was adopted and the president was instructed to forward it. Deborah C. Leeds wished it to be understood that while they were opposed to bad pictures, they wanted to support the good ones, which were of advantage to young people.

Fourth-day afternoon and evening there were full programs reported as follows:

Yesterday afternoon, in connection with the Friends' Yearly Meeting, was devoted to problems of social reform. First came the Young Women's Auxiliary, which was addressed by Edith Stratton and Esther A. Balderston, who were delegates to the recent Student Volunteer Movement Convention at Kansas City. Then came a meeting to discuss social work, at which Isaac Sharpless presided.

Anna Medary and Anna King Wood read papers on the year's work at the North House, on Marshall Street, the youngest of the Friends' missions. This was followed by Hannah C. Reeve's report of the Aimwell School, at Sixth and Noble Streets, which has been doing effective mission work for 117 years in the educational uplift of poor girls. The claims of the Catharine Street House of Industry for the Employment of the Poor were next presented.

Francis R. Taylor gave a practical talk on the "Combination of Friends' Activities in Social Work." He said that efficiency was as much needed in religious work as in mercantile matters. To this end he suggested having the three missions under one roof with a strong staff of workers. This would be one step toward a federation of the many Quaker charities throughout the city, under care of a board of directors. Emily Stokes said that they should aim to abolish drink from the homes.

President Sharpless recommended that young people take up sociology and said it was a promising career. He spoke of two workmen's groups, one at Germantown and the other at the North House, which meet on First Day. They seemed to have a place through the work that will be a great blessing to the saloon. In England the excellent schools include recreation.

Prof. J. P. Fichtenberger of the University of Pennsylvania spoke on "Problem in Social Progress." He said that it was that there are endless possibilities, only limited by imperfect knowledge. Crime he said arose partly from imperfect social conditions and partly from defective individuals and be carefully guarded and segregated.

In the evening Dr. Elihu Grant of South College addressed the First-day School Association on "What Contribute to a Full Biblical Study?" The leading idea of the three lectures was that the study of the Bible was chiefly of value when it called up spiritual power, with a conviction that the inspiration of the past is just as potent in the present and can be reenacted in our own life.

Fifth-day evening was the meeting of the Indian Aid Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. They furnish $680 a year toward the associated work of Friends in America for the Indians.

The executive Committee, in their report, commended the present Indian Commissioner and the Government administration under him. A resolution, voicing this sentiment, was adopted to be forwarded to the Commissioner.

Rayner W. Kelsey, of Haverford College, had visited most of the missions in Oklahoma the past summer. Lantern slides added to the interest of his address. He said the work in hand for the Indian might seem to progress slowly, but no sympathetic visitor to them could have any other view than that it is quite worth while.

YEARLY MEETING NOTES

The following is a partial list of Friends of other Yearly Meetings in acceptable attendance at part or all of the sessions: George Sykes and family, of Birmingham, England, William Stanley, of West Branch, Ia., Edward Edgerton, wife and two daughters, Charles E. and Lydia Bean Cox, of San José, Cal., Augustus T. Murray, of Palo Alto, Cal., Benjamin Swan, of Boston, Charles and Emma Perry, of Wexley, R. I., Rufus P. King, of N. C., Joshua Brantingham, of Ohio, Sarah Edgerton, of Barnesville, Ohio, Henry S. Harvey and wife, of Ohio, W. Jordan Brown of N. C., Harriet Underhill, of N. Y., Margery Rawlings, of Reading, Eng.

During the consideration of the question of card playing and gambling in Women's meeting, Hannah P. Morris recommended the reading of the following books:—"Quiet Talks on Personal Problems," by Gordon; "The Christian and Amusements," by Beiderwolf.

In presenting the subject of communicating with the President in regard to the Mexican situation, John B. Garrett cited the following:

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

We, representatives of the federated forces of 17,000,000 Christians in the United States, desire to put on record our steadfast friendship for the Mexican people and to express our sympathy with them in the disorders which now trouble their country. That a way out of their distresses be found is our earnest and constant hope. We wish them prosperity and peace.

We wish, further, to express our conviction that the thought of war between Mexico and the United States is abhorrent to the vast majority of our people, that the citizens of our republic want no war with our southern neighbor, nor do they desire to dominate it or to interfere with its internal affairs, but, on the other hand, they desire cordial relations and friendly intercourse.

We rejoice that in our President and our Secretary of State we have men who are lovers of peace and whose purpose it is to maintain peace, if at all possible, not only with Mexico, but with all the nations of the earth.

That the purpose of our President and his councillors shall be carried out is not only our hope, but our confident expectation.

We wish to assure our Representatives and Senators at Washington that the voices clamoring for war do not represent the sentiment of the sane and substantial people of our Republic, and we would remind them that the few newspapers which would hurry the Government to extreme measures are voicing the wishes not of patriotic and disinterested citizens, but of mischief makers and of certain vested interests whose aggrandizement is furthered by war.

"Blessed are the peacemakers." So we believe, and we are confident that the glory of the present Administration will be enhanced and its fame augmented not by the slaughter of tens of thousands of young men of the two republics, but by the peaceful solution of a difficult and vexing problem by the forbearance and long suffering and calm wisdom of a Christian statesmanship.

The following list probably contains the names of Senators and Representatives to whom Friends might write in the interest of the Prohibition Amendment:

MEMBERS OF THE SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS FROM PENNSYLVANIA, NEW JERSEY AND DELAWARE.

Senators—From Pennsylvania: Boies Penrose, Geo. T. Oliver; from New Jersey: Jas. E. Martine, William Hughes; from Delaware: Henry A. duPont, Willard Saulsbury.

Representatives—Wm. S. Vare, Philadelphia, Geo. S. Graham, Philadelphia, J. Hampton Moore, Philadelphia, Geo. W. Edmonds, Philadelphia, Michael Donohoe, Philadelphia, J. W. Logue, Philadelphia, Thos. S. Butler, West Chester, Robt. E. Diefenderfer, Jenkintown, John H. Rothermel, Reading, Edgar R. Kiess, Williamsport, A. Mitchell Palmer, Stroudsburg, Wm. J. Browning, Camden, N. J., J. Thompson Baker, Wildwood, N. J., Thomas J. Scully, Perth Amboy, N. J., Allan B. Walsh, Trenton, N. J., Wm. E. Tuttle, Jr., Westfield, N. J., Walter I. McCoy, East Orange, N. J., Edw. W. Townsend, Montclair, N. J., Franklin Brockson, Clayton, Delaware.

A well beloved elderly Friend had the following message on his heart during the consideration of the report of the Committee to consider our responsibility toward those closely allied to our membership. We gladly give place to it here.—EDS.

Example With Precept.

The force of example was impressed upon me in early life and I imbibed a love for good people which has strengthened as the years pass—their manner and their words seasoned with Divine grace—their quiet and reverential demeanor at meetings for worship—their neighborliness, truthfulness, humility, "carefulness," raised in me a desire for personal holiness—I hungered for it. Then their everyday Scriptural language to all alike, and their simple dressing showed their faithfulness to the injunction to put no stumbling block in the way of any one. I read in one of our denominational papers of hundreds and thousands being "converted" by an eloquent preacher who tells his audience, "You see three women walking on Broadway; one is [a sinner], one is a society woman, and one a Christian, and you can't tell them apart."

"Example is better than precept"—let us have both, but precept alone, contradicted in daily life by the preceptor, is useless." Anon.

BEAUTIES OF FRIENDSHIP.—Friendship—that select and sacred relation which is a kind of absolute and which leaves the language of love suspicious and common, so much is this purer and nothing is so much Divine.—EMERSON.

The joyful life is the life of the larger mission, the disinterested life, the life of the overflow from self, the "more abundant life" which comes from following Christ.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

MOLDING CHILDHOOD.

I took a piece of living clay,
And gently formed it day by day,
And molded with my power and art
A young child's soft and yielding heart.

I came again when years were gone,
It was a man I looked upon;
He still that early impress wore
And I could change him nevermore.

THE SMALLEST HOSPITAL IN THE WORLD.—The tiniest hospital in the world is the bird hospital in West Sixty-eighth Street, New York. All sorts of feathered patients lie in the tiny wicker baskets filled with soft white cotton and supported on tall wicker stands, that form the beds. Here is a canary with a splintered leg, there a thrush with a dragging wing. Over in the corner, under a green bough, lies a green and gold parrot, screaming hoarsely with the pain of an attack of neuralgia, while just opposite is a convalescent little robin, trying stoutly to utter a faint "cheep! cheep!"

Virginia Pope is the owner and director of the hospital. She knows how to take care of birds, and she acts as surgeon, nurse, and druggist all in one. There is an operating-room with all kinds of tiny sterilized instruments, fairy-like casts and splints, a sun room where the birds may flutter back and forth in a bower of green, and a tiny delicatessen store stocked with fat wriggly worms in small glass bottles, hundreds of brilliantly colored dragon flies, and just the right kind of seed for each patient's diet.

Every one of the birds loves "Doctor" Pope, and when she passes on her morning rounds, rows of little feathered heads bob up over the sides of the baskets, and dozens of bird voices—some of them very faint and weak, others loud and shrill—chirp and scream and "cheep" at her. One very handsome parrot, called "Charlie," hops boldly on her shoulder, and waits for her to ask him for a kiss, which he gives quite gracefully, although it is a peck instead of a kiss. When she picks up a helpless little robin and takes it into the operating-room, it perks up its small brown head as if in gratitude, and actually seems to know that something is being done to help the pain of its broken wing. There have been as many as seven hundred birds on the books of the hospital at one time.—Youth's Companion.

SENTENCED TO READ THE BIBLE.—Social service workers and reformers are interested in a plan being tested in one of the police courts of Baltimore by Justice Henry Ulrich of that city. He has taken to sentencing habitual violators of the law to read the Bible. The first of such sentences was imposed on a young woman of respectable parentage, who had been arrested more than one hundred times.

The case appealed to the sympathies of Justice Ulrich. He was not ready to believe that she was a hopeless defective, and he racked his brain for some new avenue of attack. Then was born the Bible sentence idea. He did not have to wait long before testing its practicability. A few days later, the young woman lolled against the brass railing that rims his desk and pleaded, "Guilty and proud of it. Do you get that?" to the charge of being drunk and disorderly on the street.

After a lecture Justice Ulrich said: "Now, Victoria, I'm going to give you another chance to make good. Can you read?"

She answered, "Yes, sir!"

"Then I sentence you to come to this station house every Sunday morning and spend an hour with the matron, reading the Bible. Either that, or the 'cut.'"

Victoria chose the Bible. When she appeared the next Sunday morning, she had evidently made a brave effort to appear respectable. She has been going to the station house every Sunday for weeks now, and she thinks she will never fall by the wayside again.

That was the first case. Justice Ulrich was led to apply it again, and it is working well. He is positive that he has found a plan that works.—C. E. O., in the Christian Herald.

NEWS ITEMS.

In commenting on a proposed Conference in the Autumn "to focus the thought of the Society upon certain questions of far-reaching import for the future of the Church and the world," The Friend (London) says:

"Let us make no mistake. Our need as a Society is one from which we cannot escape. It is ever new and ever old. In a word, it is to apprehend that for which we have been apprehended of Christ Jesus. We need that apprehension, that understanding of our purpose and calling, re-interpreting and revitalizing. We need not only a vision of the world's hunger but of our mission to satisfy it—by the invincible power of the Risen Lord and by the diversities of gifts which in the same Spirit may be restored and inspired, and then courageously dedicated to the service of the Kingdom of God among men. As Carlyle told us, the supreme fact of life is the fact of God—of His presence, of His love, and of His will concerning us, revealed in nature, in history, in the life of our Lord, and in the hearts of men. He is the source of light and life, His is the power of all true Resurrection.

"For with Thee is the well of life;
And in Thy light shall we see light."

MINISTRY AND OVERSIGHT.—London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting then proceeded to consider the question of setting up a Ministry and Oversight Committee. . . . This point had been previously raised by Devonshire House Monthly Meeting when reporting on the extent to which the duties formerly committed to the charge of Meetings on Ministry and Oversight are being carried out. The Clerk reviewed the present position as laid down in the Book of Discipline. J. B. Braithwaite and other Friends, representing the view of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting, referred to a considerable sense of loss that had arisen since the abolition by the Yearly Meeting of the old Ministry and Oversight Meetings. They looked back upon those meetings as times of spiritual uplift and fellowship, when those most concerned for the religious welfare of the Church gave unburied consideration to the deeper side of our corporate life. The great value of the devotional times was also emphasized. Edward Grubb and several other Friends sympathized with the desire for more opportunity for spiritual fellowship, communion, prayer, and conference, but doubted whether the right way to meet this need was by re-establishing Meetings on Ministry and Oversight. The memory of those meetings was not so glowing as some seemed to think. There was a distinct need for committee work in connection with ministry and oversight subjects, but that was the function of the Monthly and not of the Quarterly Meeting. A. Tuke Alexander, whilst not entirely sharing the view expressed by his own Monthly Meeting (Devonshire House), supported the proposal advocated by many Friends that half-yearly conferences for the consideration of Ministry and Oversight subjects, with ample time for devotion, should be arranged. The meeting as a whole was in favor of this course, and a minute was adopted accordingly. The Elders of the Quarterly Meeting were asked to have charge of the useful arrangements.—The Friend (London).

THE General Meeting for Scotland was held at Glasgow on the 4th inst. Consideration was given to the subject: "The Contribution of Quakerism to the Universal Church," introduced in a most interesting manner by Richard Beck, who on the previous evening, gave his lantern lecture on "Madagascar."—The Friend (London).

THERE was a Pilgrimage to Newark Meeting under the auspices of the New York Joint Fellowship Committee on the 19th. In addition to visiting the morning meeting at 11 A. M., Friends met in a conference at 2.30 P. M., to consider the topic, "Who is my brother's keeper?" The Newark meeting is held in the Y. M. C. A. building, corner of Cedar and Halsey Streets.—The American Friend.

FOR the benefit of persons who cannot conveniently attend the meeting at Twentieth Street, New York City, a Friends' meeting has been held for each First-day afternoon in a room of Union Theological Seminary

These meetings have been established by the Society in New York, and there has been large freedom of service. They close with the previous month, and will probably be resumed in the winter. The American Friend.

REINFORCEMENT OF THE CHURCH.—PUBLISHED recently was the publication of Norman Angell, "The Great Illusion," the tendency in some circles has been to conclude that the moral and spiritual progress of Christians are becoming retrograde and retrograde is accompanied with the economic argument. The publication of Canon Grubb's book on "The Passing of War," is doing much to counteract this tendency within and without the Church to a new realization of the urgent importance and the conquering power of the Christian spirit. About fifty copies of a printed review and summary of the book have been prepared by this Committee to representatives of the various missions in Japan. The reading of this book is a good time for faith and purpose relative to Christian activity in behalf of peace. GERRIT BOWLES, Secretary the Japanese Peace Movement.

THE acute stage of the anti-Japanese agitation in China was averted in 1914. The Carnegie Endowment in America and the Tokyo Mission Council of the Japan Society of New York have unambiguously done much to lead the press of the two countries to give a fairer representation of the situation than would have been the case if nothing had been done. The Japanese Peace Movement.

As the years pass by, so far from becoming in any degree indifferent to the existing condition of the Church, or doubtful as to its recovery, we are more and more assured that the old foundations are those against which the gates of hell cannot prevail, and that if those who are "built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone," will continue loyal to Him and to His written Word, the wave of unbelief that has already wrecked the faith of thousands, and is intent upon wrecking that of thousands more, will be turned aside or driven back by Almighty power—and the church again be blessed with a tremendous revival of religion and a marked and marvelous baptism with the Holy Spirit.—Ecumenical Friend.

NORMAN ANGELL, Author of "The Great Illusion," the work on war and peace that has aroused more interest than any other, has written an open letter to the American Business Men and one to the American Student. These have been issued for distribution in two booklets of the American Association for International Conciliation, 407 W. 117th St., New York City) from whom they can be had in single copies or in quantities without cost.—Friends' Intelligence.

FRIENDS in Harrisburg are sensible of a serious loss in the sudden death of Granville E. Wood. Although not in membership with the Society, she was active and useful in building up the group of Friends in Harrisburg.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

Plans are being completed for the reunion of old scholars to be held on the afternoon and evening of Sixth-day, Fifth Month 22nd. A representative of each decade of the school's history, from 1830 to the present, is expected to address the afternoon gathering, while the evening session is to be addressed on various phases of the general subject, "Our Ideals for Our School," by Zebulon Himes, Frank B. Gammon, J. Henry Bartlett and Stanley R. Yamall. All former pupils of the School, even of mature age, as well as all former and present committee members and teachers, with their husbands and wives, are to be invited, as far as their addresses can be obtained.

Owing to the necessity of possessing the athletic field at Twenty-third and Market Streets, leased for the School's use from the Aldwoodbrook Club of the John Wanamaker Stores, in the hope of getting a good school established, our boys have been obliged to go their baseball practice elsewhere. While the School-yard is large enough for good practice on the in-field, the work of the out-field requires the large grounds.

A Camera Club has recently been organized at the School. It is planning for an exhibition at the time of the Old Scholars' Reunion.

Ruth Sharpless Goodwin recently attended our morning collection, and spoke helpfully to us on the lessons to be learned from the spirit-shown by the Wellesley girls at their great college fire.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A meeting of experts in child welfare is about to occur in Washington. The Governors of 36 States and the governments of many foreign countries have appointed official representatives to attend it. In addition to these official delegates, who are coming to Washington at the invitation of the Department of State, a large number of officers and members of the National Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations in the cities and towns of the United States will be present.

A despatch from Washington of the 20th says: "President Wilson told the Washington correspondents to-day not to get the impression that the United States was going to have war with Mexico. He pointed out that in no circumstances would the United States fight the Mexican people; that it was their friend."

It is stated that the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission show that in the entire United States, with a population of approximately 100,000,000, there were killed last year, in all kinds of railroad accidents, 10,550 persons, of whom 5558 were trespassers. Including the trespassers, the deaths from railway accidents were 105 per 1,000,000 of population. Excluding the trespassers, the deaths per 1,000,000 of persons who were rightfully upon railroad cars or property were only 53 per 1,000,000.

On the 20th inst. President Wilson appeared before a joint session of Congress, in which he said: "It is my duty to call your attention to a situation which has arisen in our dealings with General Victoriano Huerta at Mexico City which calls for action, and to ask your advice and co-operation in acting upon it."

A despatch of the 19th from Chicago says: "The crop prospects in the West are probably better than at any time for a decade at this date, in spite of a shortage of moisture in some areas. Notably this is true in the Dakotas, which are the most uncertain region west of the Alleghenies. In the mountain country there is a large storage of snow and water, and all through the winter wheat country nearly ideal conditions."

On the 21st inst. Vera Cruz, the Atlantic port of Mexico City, was captured by marines and sailors from Rear Admiral Fletcher's fleet with a loss of 4 killed, 20 wounded on the American side, and 200 killed and many wounded and captured on the Mexican. A general exodus of Americans and other foreigners from Mexico City has begun.

President Wilson has lately stated to persons connected with the press: "Do not get the impression that there is about to be war between the United States and Mexico. That is not the outlook at present at all. In the first place in no conceivable circumstances would we fight the people of Mexico. We are their friends and we want to help them in every way that we can to recover their rights and their government and their laws. It is only an issue between this government and a person calling himself the Provisional President of Mexico, whose right to call himself such we have never recognized in any way. I have no enthusiasm for war. I have an enthusiasm for justice and for the dignity of the United States, but not for war. And this need not eventuate into war if we handle it with firmness and promptness."

A despatch from Chicago of the 23rd, says: "The gains of the anti-labor people in Illinois are constant and rapid, and this year shows a more satisfactory record than any in our history. The town and village elections of this week closed 959 saloons."

A despatch from Saratoga, Pa., of the 21st says: "Wireless telephone messages were sent 63 miles to-day by Dr. Lee De Forrest, the inventor, from the Lackawanna station here to his assistant, C. V. Logwood, at Binchampton, N. Y. This is the record for the wireless telephone. The best previous distance was 50 miles and that at sea."

In a late meeting of the Congress of Mothers, held in Washington, the President of the Congress said: "By actual experiment, the congress has proved that education of mothers in infant hygiene will prevent 60 per cent. of infant mortality. The National Congress of Mothers has asked every Parent-Teacher Association to have a Child Hygiene Committee, which will visit every mother of a baby under two years and invite her to come regularly to have a record kept of her baby's progress and to study how best to promote health. The United States Public Health Service has prepared a valuable bulletin on the care of the baby available for every mother. State Boards of Health have prepared valuable bulletins and city Health Boards have done the same."

A despatch of the 23rd from Chicago says: "A moderate and general decline in the cost of living has been noted all over the world, according to Secretary Redfield, of the Department of Commerce, who made a prosperity address before the Industrial Club of this city to-night."

The total number of islands under the possession of the United States at the present time is 8000, according to a report just received by the National Geographic Society at Washington, D. C. The wonderful development of our island possessions is shown in the report, which follows: "The islands under the possession of the United States now support a population of 10,000,000, or more than the entire United States a century ago. Their commerce exceeds $300,000,000, or more than that of the United States in any year prior to 1850; the American capital invested in them aggregates approximately $400,000,000; they send us $100,000,000 of their products every year, and take in exchange nearly $100,000,000."

FOREIGN.—The text of a treaty lately concluded between the United States and Columbia has been made public. It contains the following article: "The government of the United States, desiring to put an end to all disputes and differences with the Republic of Columbia, occasioned by events which have brought about the present situation on the Isthmus of Panama, in its name and in the name of the people of the United States expresses sincere regret for anything that may have interrupted or altered the relations of cordial friendship existing long between the two nations. Columbia, in her name and in the name of the people of Columbia, accepts this declaration in the full assurance that in this way will disappear all obstacles to the restoration of complete harmony between the two countries."

A despatch from El Paso, Texas, of the 23rd says: "General Francisco Villa, head of the rebel military forces, informed George C. Carothers, special agent of the State Department, that he will decline to be dragged into a war with the United States by anybody. Pancho Villa arrived in Juarez this afternoon and immediately announced that he wanted no war with the United States or any foreign country. 'Mexico has troubles enough of her own without seeking a war with a foreign country, certainly not the United States,' said Villa. 'I have come to the border for the purpose of conferring and seeking the good advice of some of my good American friends, and I believe that my visit to the border at this time will mean more friendly relations between the Mexican people and the American people. Say for me that we want no war, are seeking no war and wish only the closest and most friendly relations with our neighbors of the north.'"

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The following books have recently been added to Friends' Library:—Cabot—What Men Live By.

Hubbard—Boy's Book of Aeroplanes.

Johnson—Highways and Byways from the St. Lawrence to Virginia. Shore—John Woolman.

Taylor—Character Development. LINDA A. MOORE, Librarian.

MEETING at LANERCH.—Under authority of a committee appointed by Concord Quarterly Meeting, a meeting for Divine Worship will be held in Paiste Hall, Pa., on First-day afternoon, Fifth Month 3rd, at 3 o'clock. All interested are invited.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.32, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone 114A.

WM. B. HARVEY, Superintendent.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The Spring Term will open Fourth Month 29th, and new pupils will be received at that time. While the autumn is the natural time for most children to enter a new school, it has sometimes been found desirable to start children at Westtown in the spring. This is particularly the case when they are temporarily out of school or are unduly burdened in keeping up with their classes, or have been seriously interrupted in their studies by illness.

The open air living of the Fifth and Sixth Months strengthens the health, and the children gather up the lines of their Westtown studies so that they can get an easier start for their year's work the next autumn.

Applications for admission should be made to

THOMAS K. BROWN, Principal, Westtown, Pa.

RHODS LEATHER BELT PRESERVER

Cuts Down Belt Cost

How often do you lubricate your belts? Many of the belts which come to us for repairs are dry and brittle. They need treating with a lubricant that preserves leather, and keeps it limber and glove-like, so that it will grip the pulley.

Rhoads Leather Belt Preserver meets these conditions. It has been doing it for twenty years. It is highly beneficial to leather and its frequent use in light applications saves many break-downs. It saves both repairs and belt bills.

It also saves output and idle wages lost during stops.

SOME SIGNIFICANT POINTS IN THE YEARLY MEETING.

There were three communications from Friends in distant parts addressed to our recent Yearly Meeting; two of these, letters from Friends in Australia and China, have received due attention in recent issues of this paper. The third communication was a short letter from London Yearly Meeting held almost a year ago, and accompanied by the General Epistle of that meeting, addressed to the Subordinate Meetings in the home land, and to Friends in Ireland, Australia and indeed to all in religious fellowship with them.

Doubtless many readers of THE FRIEND have seen this Epistle. It has during the past year appeared in at least two Friendly weeklies, and several months ago the Westonian published it in full. It was suggested by more than one at our late Yearly Meeting, that in lieu of reading it there, means be taken to give it as generous a circulation as we could and THE FRIEND willingly pledged itself to do a part.

We commend to our readers a careful review of the Epistle, and especially call your attention to the spirit of service that seems to us to pervade it, a service which is so outreaching and all-embracing that no places and no classes are omitted, but a service at the same time that rests all its expectation of being a fruit-bearing service, not on the strength and ingenuity of man, but on a true dedication of soul and body to the "inshining of Christ's Light" as made manifest in us.

It is not in the least probable that the deliberations and exercises of our Yearly Meeting were influenced by this Epistle, for as just mentioned it was not read and probably those of us who had seen it had forgotten the points it contained, but it is significant to reflect that the four topics specifically alluded to in it were prominently before us as they had never been before in the Yearly Meeting's history.

The four items alluded to, as will be seen from the text, refer first to the present-day agitation of the advanced position of women; second, to the religious awakening in China; third, to the advance in the Peace Movement, and lastly to their and our supreme duty and privilege of extending wherever we can the blessings of Christ's kingdom.

Is it not significant that our Yearly Meeting, which has always recognized the equality of women with men in very many of the services of the church, this year more fully recognized this equality, and the frequent passage from one meeting to the other with messages that required joint action showed that the late changes in our Discipline were practical rather than theoretical in their scope? In addition to this, the nomination of two women to vacancies in the Representative Meeting met with ready response in the Men's Meeting and that at a time when Men's Meeting was not lacking in available material to fill the vacancies? Again, is it not significant that in response to a letter from a little company of Chinese Friends in Western China, our meeting issued a cordial reply, couched in the tenderest language of Christian love, and was able to enter into sympathy with some Friends of the Yearly Meeting intending to travel during the year in Gospel labor in distant lands, each of them embracing some called-for service in China, and one of them expecting to reach this little band of Christians, though the journey to do so would cover many hundreds of miles up the Yangtsekiang River, and then an additional toilsome journey by sedan chairs many miles back among the hills? Again, was it not significant that twice during the deliberations of the Yearly Meeting we willingly turned from important routine business to consider our present-day duty toward those carrying heavy responsibilities and wielding great influence as the war spirit day by day was becoming more threatening? The issuance of the telegram to President Woodrow Wilson was nothing less than the "religious concern" of the Yearly Meeting, and the appeal of younger Friends that the Meeting put its influence on the side of Peace with the editors and publishers of the great papers of our community, was a practical token of the deep-seated connection that our duty is first to ourselves, but that it is not completed unless we use our advantages to the advantage of others. And lastly, there was the appeal from the Yearly Meeting to its subordinate branches, that those who might be termed "seekers" and who came within the apparent scope of the Monthly Meetings, should be treated as brothers and sisters, and that a field of service opens wide to all of us, to cherish the liberty and encouragement of our Yearly Meeting and to see that the new year just now beginning be a fruitful one—not that our object be to enlarge our membership, but that an outreaching concern for many be exercised in a living trust that He, who marks our doings and knows our motives, will help us to pass to others a fuller measure of spiritual blessing than many of us have done in the past.

D. H. F.

The London Epistle alluded to bears date Fifth Month, 1913.

IN the Women's Yearly Meeting were some animating remarks made on the encouragement to be derived from the peaceful close of those who had been obedient in the day of the Lord's power, and who held fast their confidence to the end."

MARY CAPPER.

LONDON GENERAL EPISTLE.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

We feel that we are on the eve of fresh and quickening revelations of the Power of the Living God. Let us be still for a moment and listen. It may be that we shall catch the voice of the Spirit as He speaks to the Churches.

The world around us is throbbing with new and joyous life. It is good to be alive. Men are searching into the deep mysteries of nature and leading us into a new understanding of its hidden forces. Those who have been down-trodden and neglected are reaching upward and demand a fuller life, and hands are being stretched out to help and raise them. New intellectual quickenings and an awakened social conscience are being felt, even in remote corners of the earth and among isolated communities of men. Changes not less than those which marked the Revival of Learning have taken place. To many there has been a time of doubt and darkness; but to-day we see already the bright streaks of dawn. We are being led of the Spirit into a new Day of Faith. Let us go forth to welcome it with glad hearts and outstretched hands.

Four aspects of these world-wide stirrings of life have claimed our special attention.

In almost every nation, womanhood seeks for a fuller recognition and a larger sphere of service. It has been given to few generations to witness a movement of such surpassing importance. It belongs to no one country; it is the vision of no one people. It has swept round the world, and East and West to-day are linking up their forces. Out of great and bitter need, the women of the world are asking for their opportunity to serve their generation. The history of our Society brings abundant evidence of the advantage which comes to the community through a full recognition of the dignity of woman, and through according her her rightful place in family, social and church life. We as Friends, both men and women, are called to bear our share in bringing this movement to its full fruition, and in saving it from the serious dangers with which it is threatened. This can only be done as we derive our convictions on this subject once more from their true source, and so, by bringing Christ into the heart of the movement, lift it on to the highest possible plane.

The awakening of China can be compared to nothing which has hitherto taken place in the world's history. The results of western learning, and the appeal of Christianity, coming suddenly upon a dormant nation, have startled it into an amazing outburst of new life. And this nation is the largest on the face of the globe, containing probably not less than one-fifth of the entire human race. In the moment of her re-birth she has turned with pathetic eagerness to the Church of Christ and asked her prayers. Has Christ an answer for China's cry? Without doubt He has, and to His followers He looks that the answer may be given. Into the rich new life which opens out to her He alone can lead the way. Only thus can she be saved from a debasing materialism, and from the bondage of military ideals. Only thus can she receive the gift of spiritual vision and moral energy, that will enable her to lead in the things that make for a true Manhood.

With thankfulness we note an advance in the Peace Movement. We are probably nearer to a complete understanding with Germany than has been the case for many years. The forces that make for arbitration and international goodwill are gaining in strength and confidence. Aid is given to the cause from new, and sometimes unexpected quarters. Never was there greater need. Not only the great European nations, but the hitherto peaceful peoples also, are being sucked into the vortex of military preparations. The Church of to-day needs to rediscover its Lord as the Prince of Peace. Here again we must take the highest ground. Here again as a Society we have work to do which we must not leave to others. Our Friends in Australasia already suffer for the faith committed to them. Our sympathy goes out to them; we rejoice that they are called upon to fill the post of honor in leading the resistance to oppressive measures, and we desire that wisdom, courage and love may be given them in this hour of trial. We do not forget the strength of the movement for universal military training at home; the time may not be distant when we too shall be called upon to defend our principles at heavy cost. We need ourselves to enter into the "virtues of that life and power that takes away the occasion of all wars." It was in following his Master that George Fox entered upon that experience, and, unless even this Peace Movement derives its impetus from Christ, it will go astray or end in failure.

There is yet another direction in which we note the stirring of new life around us. Outside the borders of the Churches, there are large numbers of men and women whose eyes are turned to the light, and whose hearts are in some degree on fire with Divine Love. At the same time we cannot be deaf to the often inarticulate cry of those around us, who long for a deeper sense of the Unseen in their lives. They speak to us in many voices—through the printed page, or through the unsatisfied look in the eyes of men and women whom we meet in daily life. Have we anything to give to them? Ought not our Society to be a means of bringing these modern Seekers into the fellowship of Christ?

Facing all the baffling problems of this interesting age, we are indeed filled with astonishment, but not with dismay. Throughout our deliberations the ringing note of joyful certainty has sounded clearly forth. To many of us has been given such an experience of Jesus Christ as our Saviour from sin, that we cannot henceforth question His power fully to meet the deepest needs of men and of nations. He is our Gospel, and He will not fail us.

To these four movements, as well as to others, Friends are giving much active and fruitful service. We believe that we have not been wholly blind to the signs of the times. For every indication of life in our Society we give thanks to God the Giver of life. No false sense of security, however, must betray us into forgetfulness of our many shortcomings. To meet the new burst of national, social and intellectual life, which we so gladly welcome, we need a fresh breaking out within ourselves of the irresistible life of God. This comes as a challenge to every single member of our Society. The work must no longer be left to the few. The spirit of complete and continuous concentration on the work of the Kingdom must spread throughout the whole body. This is no time for sitting idly by. Even in small and out-of-the-way places, we can link our lives to the great forward movement of humanity. Once laid hold of by the Spirit of God and by the sense of need, whether in far-off India or China, or at our very doors, we cannot allow our amusements, or even our business, to take too firm a hold upon our time and our thoughts. We shall understand something of the spirit of Father Tyrrell, who, on the eve of a dreaded controversy, though feeling what a relief it would be to escape from it all, wrote, "but then there is that strange Man upon His Cross who drives one back again and again."

To the poet of nature, wandering through the country at daybreak, and drinking in "all the sweetness of a common dawn," there came a summons which he could not resist—

" I made no vows, but vows
"Were then made for me; bond unknown to me
"Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
"A dedicated spirit."

In the dawn of this new day of Christ, when we can almost catch the sound of His advent feet as He walks among the children of men, we too are summoned, scarcely knowing how. We may have caught the sound but faintly, but for us vows are made and we must, else sinning greatly, dedicate our lives to the service of the Son of Man.

When we try to put this experience into words, they seem, indeed, to be faulty and incomplete. What we have to bring seems to be nothing worth. But there is a compulsion in His love which cannot be withstood, and we are fain to recognize that the experience we have of Him, small though it be, is precisely the one solid thing, of which the sophistries of our, day can never rob us, and for which the men and women around us cry out, so often in vain.

We do not forget those amongst us who cannot confess to any personal experience, and who long earnestly that such may be given them. This very longing is the witness of the Spirit of God striving with your spirit, and we call you to cast yourselves upon Him who has richly honored the faith of so many, in our own as well as in other days. The venture of faith will not lead to disappointment. We are not relying on a mere formula handed down from a dead past. That same Jesus who trod the fields of Galilee, who went forth to die upon the Cross—He it is who is known to us by the sure token of His vitalizing power in the soul, and whom we enthrone in our lives as the risen Lord of Glory.

To step into the life of liberty and joy and power we need to cease from ourselves. We may not shirk the drinking of the cup which our Master drank. Indeed, it is true that the full meaning of His death for mankind is only known by those who accept the Cross in all its consequences. "In order to understand the Cross we must endure it." Into this sacred fellowship we would press with trembling feet, and as we do so we become aware that the power of God is actually manifesting itself in us. We triumph in infirmity. Out of weakness we are made strong. The channel connected at one end with the source and at the other with the need is used beyond all calculation or expectation, and into the life of our day, we, even we, may bring the healing streams of Divine Grace.

To Thomas Story, one of the early Friends, was given this deep vitalizing experience and, in closing, we leave with you his simple account of it.

"He called for my life, and I offered it at His footstool; but He gave it me [again] with unpeakable addition.

"He called for my will, and I resigned it at His call; but He returned me His own in token of His love.

"He called for the world and I laid it at His feet, with the crowns thereof; I withheld them not at the beckoning of His hand.

"But mark the benefit of exchange! For He gave me, instead of Earth, a Kingdom of Eternal Peace, and, in lieu of the Crowns of Vanity, a Crown of Glory.

"He gave me Joy which no tongue can express, and Peace which passeth understanding.

"He gave me power to do wonders also; to keep His commandments, through His Holy Spirit, and to walk in the paths of Righteousness with joyful Songs.

"I begged Himself and He gave me All."

Signed, in and on behalf of the Meeting,

JOHN H. BARLOW, Clerk.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS FOR PENNSYLVANIA, NEW JERSEY, DELAWARE AND PARTS OF MARYLAND, FOURTH AND ARCH STREETS.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Fourth Month 27, 1914.

To the proprietors and editors of the newspaper press of the United States:

Urged by an abiding conviction of the unrighteousness of all war and especially impressed by a belief that the existing and impending armed conflict in Mexico is as unnecessary as it is wicked, the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends has authorized the sending of this communication, to which we earnestly invite attention.

The United States now finds itself in the position of inflicting death and destruction upon the inhabitants of Mexico, with whom we have been and still profess to be at peace. We have thereby exposed not only our soldiers but our citizens sojourning in that country—men, women and children—to great danger, from which they already suffer.

This destruction of human life is sought to be "justified" not by any great national peril; not on account of some moral issue; not because of the suffering and danger of innocent people who must be protected; not even because some policy of the nation is thought to be endangered, but because those temporarily in charge of our government were unable to arrange the details of a salute.

The dreadful consequences of this war, already suffered and likely to ensue, cannot be justified on any such ground before God or before the enlightened public opinion of the world or before our sister nations in the western hemisphere, to whom we have always professed warm feelings of friendship and regard.

Whether a nation shall prosecute a war is determined finally, not by those holding authority but by the power of the opinion of her people. That opinion is formed in large degree by the Public Press.

We believe the intelligent citizenship of this country is almost a unit against this war.

Whether this same opposition shall continue depends largely upon the action of you who control the policy of the great newspapers. We urge you to STAND FIRM for the patriotic policy of reconciliation.

We are aware of the strong pressure which will be brought to bear on you to uphold the course marked out by the officers of our government on the plea that patriotism requires it, but true patriotism does not require a blind following after a mistaken leadership.

We remind you that many of the greatest men of history opposed unrighteous wars in which their own countries were engaged—that, during the American Revolution, William Pitt was the friend of America, that John Bright opposed the course of England in the Crimean War, that, in 1846, Abraham Lincoln ridiculed in Congress the causes assigned as an excuse for our own country's having commenced hostilities against Mexico.

Now, if ever, is such leadership required. The news may be published in such manner as to arouse unduly the military ardor of the nation and obscure the true aspect of this question. We ask your earnest attention to this important matter and that in your Editorial Comment you will keep constantly before the people, not only the awful consequences of further hostilities but the trifling character of the reason assigned.

If, after the expenditure of blood and treasure, and after losing the trust and confidence of the smaller nations who believe us to be as just to them as to the great nations, we win our point, what will be our gain?

Ours is a great Christian democracy which has stood prominently for justice and for peace. It is unworthy of our Christian citizenship that because of a personal resentment against one whom we do not recognize as representing that people, we should attack a distressed and suffering people wholly unable to stand against us.

There are already many public men who have taken the position that no justification for armed conflict has been exhibited. We urge you to support this view and to use your great opportunity to assist in crystallizing public opinion so that the officers of our government may be led to undo the wrong already done so far as that may be possible.

If we exercise patience and forbearance and show a willingness to do what the present State Department has repeatedly urged other nations to do—investigate the facts and wait a year before considering the use of force—either the present cause of friction will be shown not to exist, or by the lapse of time and the change of conditions its importance will have so diminished that it will be forgotten.

Meanwhile, the United States should cease its menacing attitude and should strive to reassure the Mexican people and all other nations that it has not suddenly entered upon a career of conquest or forsaken utterly the principles it has so often professed; namely, that reasonable and peaceful means of settling international disputes be exhausted before there is any thought of force, and that the same consideration be given to a weak nation as to a strong one.

Signed by authority and on behalf of the Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends in session in Philadelphia, Fourth Month 20 to 24, 1914.

George Abbott, Carroll T. Brown, Henry J. Cadbury, John B. Garrett, Walter W. Haviland, Samuel W. Jones, Arthur R. Pennell, Arthur L. Richie, J. Henry Scattergood, Isaac Sharpless, George Vaux, Jr., George M. Warner, T. Raeburn White, Stanley R. Yarnall.

SOME OBSERVATIONS ON THE YEARLY MEETING OF 1914.

"This Yearly Meeting has made history." Such was the sentiment voiced by a number of our earnest young Friends, and though we have been making reputable history for more than two centuries, it may be that the positive note of progress sounded by our recent Annual Meeting is a harbinger of blessings to come. Our deliberations were distinguished by good fellowship and harmonious co-operation. Occasionally our Yearly Meeting has seemed committed to a policy of negation without announcement of any constructive propositions. This year, at least, we have returned to our homes with something definite to consider.

The seating of the Friends in the rows facing the body of the assembly is wisely not arranged by any official set of regulations. It is left to a sense of the fitness of things aided by suggestion of some concerned Friend. In our meetings while we recognize that those who have long been able exponents of the truth and whose counsels are of acknowledged weight should have the "upper seats," yet according to our polity "each member of the body hath his appropriate function," so that we defer to no Bishops or Rulers as such. But the seven dear Friends in the upper row in the east wing appear almost lonesome, and the symmetry of our assembly would be enhanced if other Friends whose fitness is well recognized would occupy the vacant places. Our system of government admits of no distinctions of so-called clergy and laity, so that mere position in our assemblies does not of itself carry much weight, and yet it is worth while to observe some proper proportion of arrangement.

The reading of the Queries elicited much valuable counsel and exhortation. We recall but little of that vague, formless, tedious type of appeal, which, though doubtless arising from a full heart, is somewhat out of place in our deliberations. We must not take too literally that pronouncement, made some years ago by a very dear Friend who sat next the Clerk, to the effect that the Yearly Meeting was held for the transaction of business and not for preaching. We trust that all of our business is pretty closely connected with the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Personally, there are some of us who would be quite willing to accept the summaries, made by the Clerks, possibly aided by a small Committee, of the Answers to the last four or five of the nine Queries. The Answers to these from the various Quarterly Meetings are very similar, and the time spent in reading them might be better employed. The general summary is the thing, and it is not of particular importance to know whether the weakness in regard to oaths, to business transactions, or to other matters is presented in the reports from this or that Quarterly Meeting. The Clerk might be encouraged to read any report containing helpful suggestions or information.

The proposition to limit the terms of service of the members of the Representative Meeting to a fixed number of years should be cautiously considered. Of course a re-appointment for term after term would fall to the lot of many, so that practically in the majority of instances membership would continue so long as there was ability for the service or willingness to accept it, but it is still very evident that the nominating committees should be composed of judicious Friends, not subject to bias or to an ultra radical spirit. However, as the committees, which have been appointed from time to time to fill the vacancies have not been charged with error, so we trust that future committees, though they may be more frequently appointed, may exercise the same careful judgment as hitherto. The appointment of women on this body appears to meet with expressions of general satisfaction. There is reasonably a large diversity of opinion with regard to the number which should constitute this Representative body. Many of us think the number is sufficiently large, and while we are not prepared for the authorization of other organizations subordinate to this Meeting, it is greatly to be desired that all of our members should in their respective lines of service actively engage in promoting the growth of the community and society in morals and religion, and should thus co-operate with the Representative body instead of shifting the entire responsibility upon their shoulders. The idea that the Representative Meeting is the Executive body of the Yearly Meeting, while in a sense correct, does not include the corollary that the other three thousand, more or less, adults are simply spectators. A healthy meeting finds something for each member to do.

The reading of the memorial to our esteemed friend, Josiah W. Leeds, has recalled many instances of his devotion to duty, a devotion that was characterized by intense industry and a whole-hearted conscientiousness. A few years ago, a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, while traveling in a western state, found, on one of the seats of the "Pullman," a book with a garish title, and, after reading a page or two, threw the book aside in disgust, sorely regretting that such poisonous stuff had been touched. Some weeks later, he saw the same book exposed for sale at a book stall along one of our thoroughfares. He reported the matter to Josiah W. Leeds, who soon wrote a letter thanking the friend for the information and stating that the sale of the book on his motion had been forbidden in Philadelphia, and also that he had instituted measures to have the book excluded from the list to be sold on the trains. There was no delay in the matter. Many of us, doubtless, noted after the decease of our friend, a greater disregard of law indicated by the flaunting of indecency in public places. Hence, we were gratified to learn that the Representative Meeting has appointed what may be termed a Committee of Censorship to whom we may report flagrant instances of disreputable literature and exhibitions with the confident hope that such matters will receive due attention.

The admonition to study brevity in condensing the exercises of the Yearly Meeting was heeded, and there was submitted a very excellent and helpful epitome of the offerings of concerned Friends. Perhaps there was a service in the insertion of a caution to some of the ministers and elders (to a very few, we are inclined to think), that they should more fully enter into sympathy with the work and energies of the younger members still, there were some of us to whom the necessity of this allusion was not apparent. There have been times in our history when such an admonition would have seemed more appropriate. So far as the knowledge of many of us in the body of the house goes, the relations between what are colloquially called "the heads of the meeting" and the rank and file are generally harmonious. But where there is lack of harmony, it may be accepted as a general proposition that not one party but two parties should weigh well their attitude.

A highly interesting report was made by the Committee appointed to consider our duty toward those who have some relation to the Society of Friends, though not actual members thereof. Their proposition, approved by the meeting, places some definitely constructive work before each of our meetings. It is not presumed that there will be need of uniformity of action in dealing with this matter. But there are some localities where the method of the "General Meeting" is recommended, at least, for consideration. In the Journals of Ancient Friends, there are frequent allusions to the General Meetings. The following quotation is taken from "Friends in the Seventeenth Century":

"1672. Referring to a General Meeting, held at Treadhaven, G. Fox says, 'This meeting held five days. The first three we had meetings for public worship, to which people of all sorts came; the other two were spent in the men's and women's meetings. To those public meetings came many Protestants of divers sorts, and some Papists; amongst whom were several magistrates and their wives, with other persons of chief account in the country. Of the common people, it was thought there was sometimes a thousand at one of those meetings. . . . It was a very heavenly meeting, wherein the presence of the Lord was gloriously manifested, Friends were sweetly refreshed, the people generally satisfied and many convinced." Many convinced; a phrase of especial significance, and often found in the early records of our Society. We do not need to follow exactly this plan of a General Meeting. We do perhaps need to study how the general principle involved in it may be applicable now to our several neighborhoods.

The deep exercise of the meeting on this subject was manifestly not brought about by a mere desire to increase our numerical strength, but by a sincere yearning for the welfare of souls.

ALBERT H. VOTAW.

GLIMPSSES OF WOMEN'S YEARLY MEETING.

A true preparative meeting was held the week before the Yearly Meeting. There one suggestion was given, that we each strive to make this the best Yearly Meeting we had known. This fellowship group was few in numbers, the rain pouring down outside. But within the meeting-house no less real showers of blessing were felt, and those present can but believe that its results were with us the next week.

The unwonted fact that all Representatives but one were at the opening of the first session, pointed to younger members having been appointed to that service.

The knowledge that no longer we should be guided through the business by the Clerks that had done so much for us saddened the close of the first session. They had been at the desk through years that had seen our meeting become more united, more trustful of the members comprising it, more earnest in the wish to learn in what way the Master would have us serve Him.

When the Representatives' report was read, the whole meeting seemed to feel that true loyalty and gratitude to those who were leaving the desk could best be expressed by honest and complete allegiance to those who should now take their places. In so doing we were allowed to help the Head of the Church give the blessing He had in store for us. The Clerks have shown that it was their continued effort that this should be the best possible Yearly Meeting.

With the reading of the Queries there was less supplementary comment than usual, and general satisfaction was felt in the answers. Not that we had attained. But the answers showed an awakening to the principles underlying the Queries. They rang with more spirituality, sincerity and open-mindedness, and were more constructive than often.

Remembering the wonderment and mystification caused in girlhood by the use of the mere number of a Query, as though that were synonymous with its full text, they shall not here be enumerated. Some glimpses may be given of the trend of thought for those who were not in those vigorous yet dignified sessions.

Certain fresh phrases caught heart and mind as well as ear—"The attendance was reverent and worshipful," "The deportment is good," "One meeting was occasionally held," "In the sincerity and simplicity of the Gospel teaching."

The need of a ministry adapted to children was urged, that should be sympathetic, practical and in strong, simple language.

The desire that in our social life we avoid what weakens our spiritual helpfulness; the direct question whether the mothers are living the Gospel and so expressing Jesus' invitation to the children; the reminder that where there are two Friends it is sufficient to hold a meeting, and that not for their own upbuilding; these roused the Meeting to its responsibilities.

Letters coming from London, Australia and China at this time brought us into close sympathy with these sister peoples. All of us are in need of special guidance and strength. The Friends in China wrote, "Your letter of last year caused us to feel as if we met in one building." In what simplicity this expresses the ideal of one household of faith under the loving care of the great Father! "They tell us that respectable society seek to know the practices of Christianity;"—is that the case nowhere in our own land? "China's government is like a ship at sea calling for help by wireless telegraphy." "Pray that our weakness be turned into strength."

The imprisonment of one thousand Australian men for maintaining their peace principles made many search how deep were our own convictions in this matter. We would learn what directions greater zeal would best take. "Such a book as Isaac Sharpless' "The Quakers in the American Colonies" is calculated to impress true peace principles upon the intelligent minister and teacher. The day is full of opportunities for the alert Quaker.

The group of students holding true Friends' meeting each First-day at Wellesley was pictured to us, and brought us sympathetically to them. A letter was written to send them and any other such group as we were told of those at State College and Hartford. In one of Boston's churches just such services are being held this season, in silent waiting for the Lord's direction, in a realization of the need of more spiritual power among its members. Friends visiting Paris, Florence and Rome will find similar groups. Knowing that every worshipper may be a minister, we rejoice to learn of these fellow-travelers. Summer vacations may be planned near home that will give opportunity to help others and to gain lessons from their faithfulness in coming together as they see is best for them, acknowledging the privilege of showing forth the Lord's truth.

The report of a Committee of the Representative Meeting, in their work against gambling in certain forms, suggested a part women might do to stem this evil. It was felt that our children might unconsciously be taking part from a lack of knowledge of the character of gambling. A letter was written to young women and girls in the belief that when the subject was explained to them they will see the danger of its entering their amusements in any form. Men in other denominations are fighting such issues. We were told of S. D. Gordon's "Quiet Talks on Personal Problems," and of a book by Beiderwolf.

The gathering together of the mothers of children of any one school would surely result in more loyalty to that school, less misunderstanding of methods in use, and hence less criticism. The mothers of Westtown's pupils hope that conferences of this kind may be arranged.

The two memorials read this year are most vivid. Mary Bettle's seemed to bring that sweet Christian lady into our midst. Again we heard her greeting as we entered the meeting house,—“Dear, how is it with thee?” And we would go into the house of worship and prayer more keen to think on spiritual welfare than physical ills. Her freedom from all that savored of even tale-bearing was rarely combined with an unflinching courage to speak to any sin. The account of the unusual services of Josiah Leeds to his city and state must have reminded many of foul spots pointed out to them, with a determination not to let the next slip pass unchallenged if not cleansed. God has not enjoyed success upon us but only labor.

Thankfulness for all that Caroline C. Brown had been to our children while at Westtown School came into full expression. Young at heart through life she was sister and mother to the boys and girls. They knew that home was always open to them. Humility and reticence were beautifully combined with vigor and frankness in her character.

We were interested to hear from day to day of the wider issues occupying the Men's Meeting, and acknowledge with thankfulness the provision that hereafter women may share in the work done throughout the year by the Representative Meeting.

Supplications were made for our President and those closest to him in these moments of demand for quick decision and action, that they be shown how to bring about substantial peace relations with neighboring countries. The telegram sent President Wilson by the Men's Meeting was read with deep satisfaction and thanksgiving. It is a cause for great thankfulness that in the midst of a session full of business the need was recognized of a pause for united prayer.

Let the Yearly Meeting of 1914 be the forerunner of one whose key-notes shall be "Love, Sacrifice, Prayer."

FRANCES B. G. BRANSON.

For "THE FRIEND."

"LET US HAVE PEACE."

"Thou shalt not kill," rang out in tones of thunder
From Sinai's peak;
And all were bowed in trembling fear and wonder
Who heard God speak.

Still that command is ringing down the ages
In accents clear;
Shall we who read and love the Bible's pages
Choose not to hear?

When Christ, the Son of God, to earth descended
For man's release,
With holy anthems angel choirs attended,
Proclaiming "Peace."

And He, the Prince of Peace, was meek and lowly,
No thought of strife
Mars the grand purpose of that pure and holy,
That blameless life.

Let earnest cries arise to God the Father,
For strength and power
Rightly to penetrate the clouds that gather
This trying hour.

Not by the roll of drums, the bugles calling,
The clash of arms,
The cannon's roar, the battle din appalling,
War's dread alarms;

But in a patient, watchful, prayerful spirit,
To wisdom seek,
That firm forbearance may give weight and merit
To words we speak.

Relieve those suffering from oppression bitter,
The hungry feed;
Show to the world we are in name and nature
Christians indeed.

Let savage nations, sunk in superstition,
Claim life for life;
Be ours the grander, nobler, holier mission
To banish strife.

And when our hearts are overwhelmed with sadness
For sin and wrong,
And bitter memories goading unto madness
Around us throng,—

Turn to that Saviour in whose love abounding
We seek to live;
His prayer was, on the cross, fierce foes surrounding,
"Father, forgive."

War's dreadful spectre with blood-dripping fingers
And hideous mien,
Amid the counsels of the Nations lingers,—
Frightful when seen.

The horrid fiend with appetite insatiate,
Greedy for gore,
Not satisfied with victims, wan, enaciate,
Cries still, "More! More!"

"Let us have peace," when Right to Wrong has yielded
Evil seems good.

May our fair country's name and fame be shielded
From deeds of blood.

"Let us have peace." Oh, may all strife be ended,
All clamor cease,
That as a holy dew from Heaven descended
May be our peace.

And when the dove of peace with snow white pinions
Shall float above,

Then shall the earth in all her wide dominions
Know, "God is love." A. Y.

TWO TEXT-BOOKS BY FRIENDS.*

Text-books are often the most interesting reading, especially when they deal with subjects somewhat familiar to the reader. This is the case with the two books here reviewed. The first is by Eleanor D. Wood, of Wellesley College, and was primarily written for use in Adult School home-study. It is far more than a mere outline of Paul's career. It is a continuous and suggestive narrative of all the known events of his life, based on the book of Acts and on the autobiographical parts of his letters quoted in such a way as to throw the fullest light possible upon the circumstances of the several churches. Recent discoveries and the illustrative material of ancient writers have been drawn upon to make vivid and real the successive scenes of his life and ministry. Especially satisfactory is the rapid survey of his early environment before he became a Christian. The book aims more to picture the man's deeds and heart than his extraordinary mind, yet none of the more important phases of his teaching is wholly omitted. Difficult critical questions are not discussed, though their existence is noted in each case, usually with references to other books that treat them more fully. The chief value of the book seems to be that it is simpler and shorter than other books on Paul, but at the same time presents the reader with a clear picture of his life and times. It enables one to read with greater freshness and with new insight the familiar phrases of his Epistles.

Professor Allen C. Thomas has added to his list of histories—of the United States, of England, of Friends in America—another, a history of Pennsylvania. It is intended for use in the schools of our commonwealth, but as an important chapter in national life it is interesting to all. Few adults in this or any State can read it without discovering how much of the history that they ought to know best has been vaguely fancied or forgotten by them. Author, illustrator and printer have conspired to make this concise volume as attractive as possible to old and young. The woodcuts are particularly quaint and interesting. Of course, William Penn and the Friends figure very prominently in the first half of the book. It provides an excellent historical background for the study of local colonial Quakerism. Friends' religious views and especially their attitude toward war, oaths, the Indians and the slaves is explained in a simple manner. Two chapters recall vividly the stirring times of the Revolution, and another is entitled "Pennsylvania and the Civil War." But the commercial and industrial development of the state receives the large amount of attention that it deserves. Nothing less than a long list of headings could give a notion of the great variety of topics treated—from "Christ Church" to "Reform in Philadelphia, 1911; Pennsylvania 'Progressive.'" HENRY J. TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

LOCAL OPTION.—A correspondent writes, "I hope that neither THE FRIEND nor its Temperance Department will say anything in favor of local option, but that this scheme, or compromise, will be condemned as a remedy for the liquor evil." The Representative Meeting of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting did not regard as a compromise on the subject of capital punishment their action in going twice before legislatures of the State of Pennsylvania and urging the passage of a law that would allow juries to fix life imprisonment as a penalty for murder instead of the death penalty. The proposed measure would not have prevented juries from choosing the death penalty if they so willed, but it was felt that if they had the option of doing differently they would, in most instances at least, choose the more humane and efficient penalty of life imprisonment. No one of sound mind would charge Friends with favoring the death penalty. But here was a proposition that did not prohibit the death penalty, but merely provided a substitute that gave to the juries and courts the privilege of avoiding the death penalty. In like manner local option, as applied to the liquor evil, is an effort to secure for the people the power to abolish the saloon where now they do not have the power. Chester County, Pa., would be free of saloons to-day if the people had the power to abolish them. It would have abolished them twenty-five years ago, as shown by the vote of its electors in 1888.

VENANGO COUNTY DRY.—When one thousand saloons are outlawed in one day by virtue of the votes of women in the State of Illinois, one might wonder why we should give special notice to a single county in Pennsylvania, involving only twenty saloons and three wholesalers. But the Keystone State has been the pride of the liquor men. They have made of the Brooks' High License Law a strong entrenchment. But Judge George S. Criswell, of Venango County, is not in sympathy with the liquor business, and the personal equation is all powerful under the Brooks' Law "to give or to withhold." How refreshing to read the "opinion" of this brave jurist, viz.:

"It is axiomatic that the purpose of all government is the promotion of the public good, and that laws should be construed with that purpose in view. This thought was anciently expressed by the Latin maxim, 'Salus populi suprema lex.'"

"While, therefore, necessity for liquors depends primarily upon the demand therefor, the effect of any such demand in moving the court in the exercise of its discretion to grant a license is necessarily modified by the considerations to which reference has been made. In the investigation and determination of these matters an applicant for either a new or renewal license has no standing to arrogantly insist upon a grant to him. There has never as yet been recognized any aristocracy of privilege along such lines. There is no presumption that an applicant is entitled to a license, and neither he nor any other person in this state has any property in the right to sell liquor."

THE YEARLY MEETING ADVISED its members to use their personal influence with their senators and representatives in an effort to induce them to work for the passage of the "Prohibition Amendment." We printed in last issue the names of all the Congressmen from the territory covered by our Yearly Meeting. In writing letters, address the individuals representing your district by their official title, Washington, D. C. (not at their home address).

SOME REASONS for favoring the Amendment are as follows:—"The license system, instead of eliminating the evils of the liquor traffic, has become its last and strongest fortress. The traffic refuses to be regulated or controlled. It is a federal evil; a national menace, too powerful for state authority, requiring national jurisdiction and treatment. It beggars the individual, burdens the state and impoverishes the nation.

It commercializes vice and capitalizes human weakness. It impairs the public health, breaks the public peace, and debauches the public morals. It intimidates and makes coward of public men. It dominates parties and conventions. It cajoles, bribes or badgers the makers, interpreters and administrators of law, and suborns the public press. Retain all domestic regulation and control, it leaves the American people but one alternative—the abject surrender of their inherent right of self-government, or its national annihilation. Between such a choice free men should not hesitate."

PRIMARY ELECTION DAY in Pennsylvania this year will be Fifth Month 19th. There will be some contests of great importance to the cause of Local Option and Prohibition. Every one who is old enough to be concerned for the public welfare should endeavor, by vote or by influence, to secure the nomination of the best candidates on the tickets. No candidate of bad moral character, or representing corrupt interests, should be permitted to obtain the endorsement of his party without some protest, even though it be only the guarded expression of the supporters of other parties. It is a poor policy that leaves all the "sifting out of undesirables" until the general election in the autumn. Make it your business to find out how your candidates stand on the liquor question, and do not be a party to the nomination for Congress, or the Legislature, or any other office of men who would deny to the people any longer the right to refuse to license the sale of intoxicating liquors. Of the possible candidates for Governor, all have declared favorably to local option except Michael J. Ryan, on the Democratic ticket. He is opposed by Vance C. McCormick, a former Mayor of Harrisburg, and highly esteemed also as an editor, a Presbyterian, and is sound on the liquor question.

For Lieutenant-Governor, Frank B. McClain, the present Mayor of Lancaster, is running on the Republican ticket with little if any opposition. But his record is one of loyalty, not to temperance legislation, but to the liquor interests. The aspirants to the office of U. S. Senator appear to be satisfactory to the no-license people with the conspicuous exception of Boies Penrose. He is opposed on the Republican ticket by J. Benjamin Dimmick, of Scranton, a highly-esteemed manufacturer and ex-mayor, a member of the Episcopal Church, and favorable to local option and prohibition.

THE DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT of the U. S. in the case of an appeal from the action of a court in Nebraska holding a saloonkeeper responsible, financially, for losses incurred through the drunkenness of a patron, has aroused much interest and comment in that the inferior court was sustained, and the liquor dealers of Nebraska must face the likelihood of many future damage suits of like character. The State of Pennsylvania is said to have on its statute books a similar law which might now be invoked with good chance of success in cases where damage is incurred by a drunken person. In the case of our law, however, no penalty attaches unless the saloonkeeper shall have been duly instructed within one year not to sell to the individual in question. Would it not be well to begin proceedings at least, by instructing the venders of intoxicants not to sell to persons (giving their names in full) of known intemperate habits?

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD yesterday (Fifth Month 15th) took a step which is said to mark "the beginning of the end" of every connection of the liquor traffic with the big railroad system.

Sale of liquor was discontinued at the Union Station in Pittsburgh.

Decision of the railroad company concerning the sale of liquor, though coming somewhat as a surprise, is in line with the company's demands for strict prohibition among its employees and the abolition of rum from its dining cars about a year ago.

The action was taken without any preliminary announcement. The superintendent of restaurants simply failed to make application for the renewal of the old liquor license which expired the end of Fourth Month.

This leaves Broad Street Station, Baltimore and New York the only terminals with bars on Pennsylvania Railroad lines east of Pittsburgh.

Another important anti-rum move taken by the Penny was in connection with the new law designed to trace shipments of rum to speakeasies in the "dry" counties of Maryland.

Freight agents of the Baltimore, Chesapeake and Atlantic Railway division of the Penny were notified to make a record of all liquor sent by rail over its lines to the saloonless counties. —North American.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

VICIOUS HABITS.—Evil associations are the first steps toward evil habits. And the point of least resistance to temptation is found when some one urges the suggestion that "everybody does it." That particular argument usually brings the youthful freshman to time if anything will. A certain young man attended one college six successive years and managed in that time to get into the junior class. He was known to be an expert at inducing younger boys to learn to smoke. In fact, he seemed to possess a passion for this thing, as he always carried a good supply of materials which he would furnish free of charge to learners. Three of his victims came personally to the attention of the author, who attempted in vain to assist two of them to break off the habit after it had got a firm grip on them. All finally failed completely in their college-work before reaching the junior year and had to leave.

Elsewhere (in a widely-circulated bulletin entitled "The Cigarette Smoking Boy") the author has made a study of 2500 cases, and has shown that the smokers among college students rank 17½ per cent. lower in their class-work than the non-smokers; also that they are predisposed to half a dozen serious ailments in the eyes, throat, lungs, heart and nerves. In the Kansas State Agricultural College, enrolling about 2500 students, few of the habitual smokers are able to be graduated, and none ever come through as honor students.

The National Hygiene League, with Ex-President Charles W. Flot at its head, asserts that our annual tobacco bill has now reached $1,200,000,000.

When we understand the fact that probably ninety-five per cent. of the men who learn to use tobacco early in their teens are never able to quit the habit, and that probably ninety per cent. of those who do not take it up before they are fully matured never do so, the tobacco problem becomes a still more interesting one.

The tobacco-producing interests are organized in form of powerful trusts. They support expensive lobbies and keep not a few of their friends and representatives in the National congress and in the State assemblies.

A part of the important business of the big tobacco organization is that of making the use of this insidious narcotic enticing to boys. Attractive advertisements are displayed everywhere; the makers of fine clothes and other articles dear to the heart of every youth are induced to show their attractive models in the attitude of smokers. The typical college youth is pictured everywhere as having a cigarette or pipe in his mouth. Thus in every conceivable way the young boy is made to believe that smoking is one of the manly accomplishments without which he cannot get into the best circles of society. Training the Boy, by Wm. A. McKEEVER.

A FATHER one day said to his son, Tom, who, he knew, had refused to fill his mother's wood-box that morning: "Tom, I'm sure you'll be glad to go and bring in some wood for your mother." And without a word, Tom went. Why? Just because his father showed so plainly that he expected him to do the right thing. Suppose he had said: "Tom, I overheard what you said to your mother this morning, and I'm ashamed of you. Go, at once, and fill that wood-box!" "I'll warrant that wood-box would be empty yet, so far as Tom was concerned. From Pollyanna.

NOTES FROM ABROAD.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

As our many and dear Friends may be interested to keep in touch with us while abroad, it has been suggested that our itinerary should be stated, as the first in the series of these notes.

The Celtic is due to arrive at Queenstown on the 30th inst. We propose to go directly to Dublin, as the Yearly Meeting is sitting there between the 29th inst. and 5th prox. There will be about two weeks between its sessions and those of London Yearly Meeting, which will be spent in Ireland.

After London Yearly Meeting there will come seven weeks, during which it is our prospect to visit English Friends, making Birmingham our chief home or centre from which to visit meetings and places of common interest. Denmark Yearly Meeting assemblies in Copenhagen, Seventh Month 23rd, where we hope to meet with some of our Scandinavian Friends and afterward visit those in Norway. The Eighth Month will probably be spent in that country and in Germany. The Ninth Month is to be devoted to Italy, while the Tenth Month may find us in Greece and Syria and Palestine. It is planned to make a short stay in Egypt and Ceylon, as it will be desirable to reach China by the first of 1915. The Yearly Meeting of Chentu will be held in the Second Month, and this is one of our chief points of visitation on the borders of Tibet. It will require three months to traverse China and we desire to reach Japan by way of Korea, about the first of Fourth Month next, so as to spend two months in that land of cherry blossoms before returning to America about the first of the Seventh Month, 1915.

NEWS ITEMS.

The following communication has been addressed to the Monthly Meetings at Fourth and Arch Streets and at Sixth and Noble Streets:

The undersigned, being a Committee appointed by the three Associations conducting charitable work at the Ainswell School, the House of Industry and North House, desire to lay our aims and situation before you, in the hope that you may feel willing to co-operate with us in furthering our common purpose.

Being located in one community, with its true welfare as a common purpose, we have felt drawn to co-operate with each other under one roof, and thus to avoid duplication of expense and effort.

The fulfilment of this plan involves no small amount of foresight. The Ainswell School is housed for another year, the House of Industry owns property and must make disposition of that before it moves, and the North House cannot immediately leave its present location. We feel, however, that the effort is a good one, and that by the Fall of 1915 our plans might be fulfilled. The question of funds is, as always, a leading one.

The House of Industry is independent, provided it can sell its house. The Ainswell School also has an endowment, though smaller than the House of Industry, and both of these Associations have lists of contributors. The North House is entirely dependent upon contributions, amounting to about $2400 annually.

As an ancient Monthly Meeting, composed largely of non-residents, we know that the burden of the community is also upon your hearts, with the desire that your influence may be for its best welfare. As this cannot, as formerly, be exerted by your homes, we suggest to you the form of influence which our work involves as the best available means for effecting this purpose, and discharging our undoubted responsibility, believing that the benefit would accrue to you and us as well as to the community.

We lay this matter before you in the hope that your interest, in common with us, in this locality, may incline you to appropriate from such funds as may be at your disposal a sum of money to aid us in the furtherance of the Kingdom hereabouts.

There are many details which should be laid before you, if you unite with our concern, but we feel that this can more appropriately be done later.

With sincere regards, we remain,
Your friends,

ANNA M. W. SHIPLEY, Clerk
(For House of Industry.)

HANNAH C. REEVE, Clerk
(For Ainswell School.)

ISAAC SHARPLESS, Vice-President
(For North House.)

AN ATLANTIC CROSSING IN 1726.—In "The Life and Travels of Samuel Bownas," 1756, p. 136, we read:

"I left my home the 22nd day of the Tenth Month, 1726, to Pool, being to take shipping there, but the ship was not quite ready; and when it was ready, the wind being against us, we were obliged to stay there about five weeks, so I had sundry satisfactory opportunities both amongst Friends and others.

"All being ready and the wind fair, we set sail the 24th of Eleventh Month with a fair wind and pleasant weather, which carried us a considerable distance off the land; but it held but three days and then it was very contrary hard winds after that, which made me very sick and other ways out of order. . . . We had a very long and tedious passage, being eleven weeks and two days upon the sea, from land to land, and on the fourteenth of the Second Month 1727 we landed at Hampton, otherwise Kickatan, in Virginia."—The Journal of Friends' Historical Society.

PROFESSOR RUFUS JONES'S new book, "The Spiritual Reformers in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," is about to be issued by Macmillan & Co. This is a volume in the series of books designed to deal with Quakerism and Mysticism, two of which already stand to the credit of Rufus Jones.—The Friend (London).

In concluding a review of the life of John Edward Ellis recently issued by Macmillan & Co., The Friend (London) has the following:—

"Only the other day a leading Englishman placed him alongside John Bright as one of the greatest Quakers of our day and generation. No doubt he had characteristics which veiled from our eyes some of those inward traits which really predominated in his life. A lover of nature, a disciplinarian, a stickler for exactitude and accuracy, a prodigious worker, sympathetic and responsive but reserved and careful, without the gifts of genius he arrived by native honesty and force of character. He loved duty, human equality and integrity. He ensued peace. He sought to obey God rather than men, and he loved truth. These surely are the greatest things for which to live. He followed Burke's example of serving his constituents by educating them. Membership of Parliament was not self-aggrandizement or self-advertisement to John Ellis. He could truly say: 'Huecknal is always near to my heart, and to my dying day my highest ambition will be to serve its people.' And faithfully he fulfilled that ambition. On the way thereto he trod the grand orbit and played his part in large enterprises. But always he kept the inward light burning, always he came back to his garden, to his own people, to the Unseen. His roots lay deep, and in his heart, in spite of outside conflict, there reigned a peace which the world could neither give nor take away. We do well to keep his memory green, and to be thankful for the testimony of his life."

FRIENDS belonging to Westley Yearly Meeting have been holding occasional meetings for worship in Boston to which they invite all who have had connection with the Society of Friends. They are appreciated by those who are able to attend, for there had previously been no meeting conducted by this branch of the Society.—The Olney Current.

THE pupils of several of the primary Friends' schools in Ohio have kept up a circulating letter among themselves the past year. As it is received from the last place a committee is appointed to represent the school and send it on. In this way they have an interesting opportunity to compare notes and progress.—The Olney Current.

OUR Harrisburg Friends have lost another valued co-worker in the death of Anna Middleton Smallwood, in her seventy-eighth year.

A COPY of the fac-simile reproduction of the very rare portrait of George Fox advertised in this number has been sent to the office of THE FRIEND. It has the merit of looking like the George Fox of our imaginations. It will be of much interest to those who have a taste for such things.

HAVESFORD MONTHLY MEETING invites Friends to three addresses on some distinguishing views of Friends, to be given in the meeting-house on First-day afternoons, at 4.30 P. M.

Fifth Month 10th—The Message of John Woolman, by Annetta M. Gunnere.

Fifth Month 17th—The Meeting for Worship, by Rufus M. Jones.

Fifth Month 24th—In a Friends' Meeting, Nobody's Business is Everybody's Business, by Anna R. Ladd.

MOORETOWN, N. J. An opportunity of rare value was afforded men Friends and some others of Mooretown and vicinity on Saturday evening, Fifth Month 1st, when, after a supper had been served in the Friends' Academy, they were addressed by G. Sherwood Eddy, International Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association for the whole of Asia. About one hundred were in attendance, who listened spell-bound to the wonderful achievements of the past few years in the awakening of Asia to the influence of the Gospel, which the speaker had before his audience with marked ability and power. It is safe to say that few if any left the meeting, which was throughout of the most impressive character, without a clearer vision of the great Christian awakening of the Orient, its deep needs, and call for concerted service upon the part of those who may be fitted to administer to them.

THE FIGHTING QUAKER.—To the Editor of the Friend.—DEAR FRIEND.—It was the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson who once wrote that Gladstone was "struggling in the breakers, Encouraged there by fighting Quakers!" and still to-day—unhappily not without justification—there are those who are really alert to detect our defections from high principle.

In a recent issue of the Nation a correspondent—a man of war from his youth, or possibly not yet past the period of adolescence—harks back to a certain Adult School meeting at Sheffield where an influential Friend confessed himself a convinced National Service Leaguer and no Friend present had a word to say against it.

One danger to Quakerism in our days seems to be that it has become too gentle to make a stand against wrong, for fear of hurting someone's feelings. The fighting Quaker, however, is not an anomaly, although there are many who fail to distinguish the real nature of his campaign from that of the militarist. One can scarcely wonder that people who see everything through red spectacles should misunderstand the Quaker. One would have expected a better estimate from Tom Hughes when he said in "Tom Brown's Schooldays":

"After all, what would life be without fighting I should like to know. . . . Everyone who is worth his salt has his enemies who must be beaten, be they evil thoughts and habits in himself, or spiritual wickedness in high places, or Russians or Border ruffians, or Bill, Tom or Harry. . . . It is no good for Quakers or any other body of men to uplift their voices against fighting. Human nature is too strong for them, and they don't follow out their own precepts. Every soul of them is doing his own piece of fighting somehow or somewhere."

Let us who are Quakers not confuse the issue. Let us not whittle conscience and principle down to a question of mere political expediency. "I don't see how the world could get along without war and war preparation, and so I must adopt the motto of laissez faire." "We must take the world as we find it." "It's no use living in the clouds." "We are not in the millennium yet!"

What thin, hollow maxims! Had these been the watchwords of Fox and Penn and all the great world reformers, how would their moral victories have been won? Slavery, intemperance, the Mosiac doctrine "an eye for an eye," and all the downward drift of the unregenerate would never have been faced. To be in the minority, alone in the crowd, like Elijah or John Bright, should be an inspiration to the earnest soul. If we see the right way, let us tread it. Let us not, as Canon Crane finely says, "bury the sword of the spirit in the scabbard of compromise."—BEDFORD POLLARD, The Friend (London).

LONGSIGNS, Manchester.

THE address at our concluding Meeting was a powerful call to each of us to walk according to the rule of the new creation, if we would learn the secret of Practical Evangelism (Gal. vi; H. B. R. V.). We must know newness of life through a new birth; newness of worship in the spiritual sanctuary of God's presence; newness of vision and of guidance in daily life and service; and newness of exultation in the Cross of Christ, and in finding all our supplies in the risen Son of God.—Friends' Witness.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

SCHOOL has reopened for the spring term, the net enrollment being three fewer than for the session which ended Fourth Month 7th last; quite a number of pupils were detained at home because their quarantine period had not expired, a number of cases of mumps having developed during the vacation period. In order to complete the notes for last term, it may be stated that on First-day evening, Fourth Month 5th, Henry J.

Calbury spoke to the boys on Quakerism; the girls were addressed by Mary G. Branson and Ryu Sato concerning the Student Volunteer Convention, held in Kansas City last First Month.

The usual variation renovations have been attended to, though there have been fewer important repairs about the premises than at some other times. Three new tennis courts are being made on the boys' campus east of the house occupied by Walter Magill and family; the five courts on the girls' side have been overhauled, the terraces regraded and other improvements made. The Old Scholars' Association is supplying the cash for these improvements. Six wells have been sunk in the meadow to an average depth of about fifty feet; four of these have proved themselves to yield a satisfactory flow of excellent water. Arrangements are being made to transform the old mill into a first-class pumping station, using these wells for a supply. It is likely that the water power will be used for other purposes when contemplated plans have been completed. For the present no grinding is being done at the mill, though the old punning outfit is in operation.

The orchard department has been pressed with work; a cistern having been finished to complete the water system; a large tool shed is being erected, and the spring crops have been planted to some extent. An acre of radish seed, $1\frac{1}{2}$ acres of spinach seed have been sowed, and about 15,000 strawberry plants have been cared for; 10 bushels of onion sets have been put in; a few additional apple trees have been planted.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Washington of the 27th says: "The United States Supreme Court to-day found no constitutional objection to a State law making saloonkeepers liable for damages resulting from their sale of liquor."

Philadelphia's population in 1914, according to a bulletin issued by the Census Bureau, is estimated at 1,657,810, an increase of 108,802 in four years. The population in 1910 was 1,549,008. Pittsburgh in 1910 had 533,905 persons and to-day its population is estimated at 564,878, an increase of 30,973. New York's estimated population is 5,333,537, including the five boroughs, as against 4,706,883 four years ago. Chicago grew from 2,185,283 to 2,333,325 in four years. The population of the United States and its possessions was estimated at 109,000,000, as against 101,748,209 in 1910. This is an increase of more than 7,000,000 persons in four years. The estimated population of continental United States is 98,781,324, as against 91,972,266 in 1910.

Liquor dealers who persist in selling to a person of intemperate habits are liable, under the laws of Pennsylvania, to pay damages to the wife, child or parents of the injured one. In addition to the liability of paying damages the offending saloonkeeper also may be fined and imprisoned.

President Wilson has ordered Federal troops sent to the scene of strike disorders in Colorado and issued a proclamation directing all persons "engaged in or connected with said democratic violence" to retire peacefully to their homes on or before Fourth Month 30th.

A bill has been passed by the House of Representatives at Washington, appropriating $500,000 for the transportation of American citizens in Mexico to their homes in the United States. The action was in response to a request by President Wilson transmitted to Congress earlier in the day.

A despatch from Washington of the 28th says: "Prevalence of powdery mildew to-day caused the Department of Agriculture to declare quarantine against Maine potatoes, effective Eighth Month 1st."

Steps have been taken in Wilmington, Del., to prevent the spread of mosquitoes by leaving lots in the city properly drained where possible, and where it is not possible the owners of marsh lands and lots containing water will be asked to use oil on the water.

A despatch from Washington of the 1st inst. says: "Constant increase in the forest production of the country is predicted by experts of the Federal forest service in announcing to-day an increase in the number of live stock for which grazing permits have been authorized on the 150 national forests for 1914, as compared with last year. This year nearly 41,000,000 animals are to be grazed, including nearly 2,000,000 head of cattle and horses, nearly 2,000,000 head of sheep and goats and about 65,000 hogs. This is an increase for the current year of about 38,000 more cattle and horses and 347,000 more sheep and goats, although the gross area of national forests at the beginning of the year is almost 1,000,000 less than at the beginning of last year. During 1913 more than 27,000 technicians paid the Government for grazing permits on national forests."

FOREIGN.—The Spanish Ambassador has announced that a formal acceptance of an offer of mediation by Argentina, Brazil and Chili had been received. It is stated that Secretary Bryan on the part of the United States having accepted the offer of the good offices, the first step now is completed and the way for actual negotiations looking to a peaceful clearing up of the difficulty between the United States and Mexico.

Secretary Bryan has received a telegram from the Brazilian Minister in Mexico City, who is representing American interests there, that the capital was quiet and that Americans were being permitted to leave the city freely. The Minister said that Americans were departing from the capital on every available train.

It is stated that electric power for operating plows has been tried with satisfactory results in the neighborhood of Florence, Italy. The advantages of this system are: the small cost of equipment compared with other mechanical systems; comparatively low cost of maintenance; but few laborers needed; all expense for power can be instantly stopped by shutting off current when plows are not desired to be operated; and surplus power from motors and transformers can be used for other purposes.

It is stated that according to the last official census, the production of coal in the whole world may be estimated for 1913 at 1,250,000,000 tons, compared with 1,245,000,000 tons in 1912, 1,184,000,000 tons in 1911, and 500,000,000 tons in 1910. Of this amount the United States mined about 4 per cent., Germany and England about 21 per cent. each.

A despatch from Peking of the 1st inst. says: "The amended Constitution for the republic of China, remarkable for the powers it confers upon the President, was formally promulgated at noon to-day."

PREPARATION FOR SERVICE.

There has been much in our Friendly periodicals of late concerning John Woolman; always a rich topic in Quaker circles, his life and writings for some reason seem to have called forth unusually copious notices within the past few months.

A new life of the saintly man has just been written by W. Teignmouth Shore, which has called forth reviews that are themselves as rich in John Woolman history as the biography itself. The Philadelphia Friends' Historical Society have in process of composition, under the special oversight of Amelia Mott Gummere, a new and complete edition of the Journal, which will contain considerable of interest and of value that most of us have never seen. A translation of selected parts of the Journal has been made into the Japanese language, and through the generous assistance of Inazo Nitobe, that which is too subtle for many translators to grasp has been fixed into the pages of this Japanese volume, and the simplicity and tenderness of spirit of John Woolman made to speak in a foreign tongue much as it has spoken to the many who have come under its spell in the language in which he wrote it.

It has often been brought home to us that the Society of Friends has rendered a full measure of service to the cause of human advancement in the various fields of reform that have opened out as generation has followed generation. It is indeed well that this has been so, but it becomes us to under-emphasize rather than over-emphasize its importance. This is in no sense the mission of the Society of Friends, nor are we to be over-anxious as to the outcome of our effort. We have ample assurance in the words of our Lord that the fruits of the spirit will be to His praise and to our exceeding joy.

The service rendered is a necessary by-product for which the Society has stood and must continue to stand if it expects to hold to its original teachings, but this is a secondary matter; it exists because the other which we wish to speak of has previously existed. What we claimed and must continue to claim as fundamental is a profounder belief in and a fuller participation in the felt presence of God in our daily lives. All about us are evidences of the lack of this, not essentially in individuals, but emphatically so in organizations.

It must never become with us a mere routine and matter of form that when we assemble to transact important business in committee capacity we wait in reverent silence a few minutes before we enter upon the task that has brought us together. It is this feeling after and acknowledging His Presence that is the principle, the work we do, the relief we offer, the memorials we may be enabled to draft and the countless other things that go under the all-embracing title "good works" will savor of this spirit if it be genuine.

What is it in John Woolman's journal that leaves the keenest satisfaction? With some it may be little more than the simplicity of his English, but to most who turn over the last page with a feeling of real satisfaction it is much more than this. It may be in part due to a keen admiration for the spirit of courage he has shown and the everlasting patience he has manifested. It may, we admit, be one of several other reasons that is responsible for the feeling that has come to so many who have enjoyed John Woolman's message, but ultimately, if the spirit of the man is allowed to pervade us, it will be felt that more than all else it is his absolute trust in the fatherhood of God, in the feeling that fatherhood stands for guidance, and that the guidance of His Spirit made manifest in the heart will be the only safe one to follow.

We cannot all be John Woolmans in the measure of usefulness we render our fellows; possibly no man ever lived who gave less thought than he did to this phase of his life. We can, however, imitate him in the only way it is essential that we should imitate him, and we can do this to the full extent of our powers by waiting, as he did, for the guidance, and by following it day by day as strength is granted us to do so.

This is the central thought of Friends' message, and in this John Woolman stands for the heart and kernel of Quakerism far more even than he does as the exponent of equality and freedom. This, too, is why we may be allowed to rejoice that a new life of John Woolman has been written, that the full extent of his written message is soon to be printed, and that into yet another foreign tongue has gone not only the words he wrote, but the spirit of the man that was the mainspring of what he did and what he said.

In our late Yearly Meeting some of the "exercises" that were so feelingly introduced by those deeply concerned to be upon their Master's errands may have seemed to lose somewhat of their essence as in the quiet of home we tried to reproduce them; it is the exercise that is blessed; it may return to us, and its purpose for the time being may be fully served, or it may take outward form and find expression in an action of far-reaching importance.

Now if this spirit we have alluded to is the father of the works in John Woolman's life, is there a way we can foster it in ourselves and in one another? Surely a religious Society that recognizes the great importance of a principle would not fail to find a way of developing it. Years ago, more than now, there was a little expression "creatively activity" which we often heard. It has almost been lost from our language now, but we know what was meant. Like everything else it opened up a question that admitted of over-emphasis on either side, but rightly interpreted it meant that there is an activity that finds expression in service, and that activity is rich in final and lasting results which has a foundation on something broader, deeper and stronger than mere desire; it rests upon the principle that God guides His children who seek His guidance, that He asks them to come aside and listen to Him, that He will plan for them better than they can plan themselves.

This it seems to us is our explanation of the value of silent worship. It may be in the closet of our home when the quiet half hour is found free from care and worry, or it may be in the closet of our heart, when our hands are busy about some simple but important task, it may be in family or congregational worship, or what is most to be desired, it may be in all of these ways that we listen and hear what our hearts long for, "the blessed words that proceed out of His mouth".

In a recent number of the Australian Friend, a young man alluding to the value of this silent waiting as a fitting introduction to what we may have to do, writes:

"This quiet time is essential for reading, for meditating on deeper things, for reviewing the use made of past opportunities, and above all, for seeking God's guidance in the coming day. The daily circumstances of each of us vary greatly, but none of us can afford to leave this undone. We can make the time if we are really honest about things. And so much may depend upon it; the deeper beauty of our own lives, the spiritual state of our meetings for worship, the impetus for all our commercial, social and philanthropic life. One year's earnest carrying out of this by ten per cent. of the attendance at our meetings would make a wonderful difference in the power of the Society to attract and influence others. Ten years with continuous growth of such a movement can leave its mark upon the century. Are we willing to make the necessary sacrifice of time and convenience in order to strengthen not only our own lives, but the life of the Society which we love so well?" D. H. F.

KAISER AS BIRD PROTECTOR.

On the personal request of the Kaiser an order has just been issued by the Ministry of War pressing local commanders to see that protection and hospitality be extended to wild birds settling in the immediate neighborhood of barracks and other military buildings. The Ministries of Agriculture, Public Works and Railways have, upon the same request, issued circulars recommending the protection of birds nesting in or near churches and castle buildings. The swallow is specially mentioned in these circulars. On their own initiative the foregoing departments have also instructed their subordinates to plant bushes on hospital grounds and at railway stations and even to erect bird houses under the trees within their jurisdiction.

Within the last twelve months the Emperor has also completed the planning of a portion of the estate of his castle at Celle, near Hanover, which is to be reserved as a "birds' paradise." The laying out of this little artificial wilderness is said to be accepted as a model by the German National Society for the Protection of Wild Birds. Special nesting boxes of various shapes and sizes adapted to different families of birds have been skillfully disposed of so as to be at once hidden from men's eyes and accessible to winged creatures. The designer of this colony has since been engaged in laying out a second one on similar lines on the Island of Hiddensee.--Late Paper.

EXPRESSED AT A MEETING IN GERMANTOWN PRECEDING THE YEARLY MEETING.

"The comprehensive nature of the promises of God respecting the Holy Spirit, is a point to which the attention of our religious Society has always been directed with peculiar force. They believe them to be addressed to the whole Church of Christ in all ages, for they read that the Comforter was to continue with the disciples of Jesus 'forever,' that His influence was to be bestowed not merely on the earliest converts to Christianity, but on their children also, and on all that are afar off, even 'as many' as the Lord our God should 'call.'

"And what are these promises? Large and various indeed! That the spirit should be poured forth from on high and convert the wilderness into a fruitful field, so that the work of righteousness should be peace, and the effect thereof quietness and assurance forever, that God should write His law on the hearts of His people, and that all should know Him, from the least to the greatest.

"That the Holy Spirit should convince the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment, that he should testify of Christ, that he should receive of the things of Christ and show them to His disciples, that He should teach them all things and bring all things to their remembrance whatsoever Christ has said unto them, that He should be in them and dwell in them, that He should show them things to come, finally that He should guide them into all truth.

"There is probably no body of Christians by whom these precious truths have been more clearly advanced than by the Society of Friends. It has appeared to them, that the free and immediate teaching of the Spirit of Christ is the main characteristic of that new covenant which was established in the world by His propitiatory death. It seems, indeed, to have been the chief business intrusted to them, in the Church of Christ, to wean men from an undue reliance on an outward ministry, and from all merely human systems of religion, and to lead them to the feet of Jesus. Rightly they have deemed it to be the highest privilege of the Christian believer to draw near to the Father of mercies, through His Beloved Son, to wait on God in the silence of all flesh, and to be guided and governed, in all things, by His Holy Spirit.

"It is under this guidance, as Friends have always believed, that the disciples of Jesus are enabled to apply to particular occasions the general rules of God's law; and that even in temporal matters which, more or less, involve their spiritual interest they may be led along in a path of safety. Christ, their Divine teacher, cannot be removed into a corner—His light shines in their consciences. If they patiently wait upon Him and pray for His Spirit, He will, from time to time, arise for their help, He will guide them with His 'council,' and make His 'way' straight before their face.

"But if this be true respecting our common course of life and duty, who shall deny that it is also true in relation to the particular services into which we may be called for the benefit of the Church? It is on Scriptural authority, that Friends have always asserted, that no voice can lawfully call into these services but the voice of the Holy Spirit, and that nothing can truly qualify for the performance of them but the Lord's anointing.

"Shall we exchange a child-like obedience to the Shepherd's voice for the mind which is ever ready to criticize and argue?"

"If such, through the wiles of Satan, should be our course, how awful and affecting must be the consequences! The gracious purposes for which we were raised up to be a people, will be frustrated through our want of faithfulness. By forsaking our own place and sphere of duty in the fold of Christ Himself, we shall become wanderers in the barren wastes of an empty profession. But if, on the contrary, we are bold in the Lord to answer these questions in the negative—if we resign ourselves, through every loss and cross, to the disposal of our Holy Head, and diligently endeavor to 'keep' all His 'testimonies,' if we resolve to follow the Lord's Spirit in all things—we may reverently believe that He will preserve us unhurt. The humble hope may then arise, that His eternal power will again be known to abound among us, and that many living witnesses to the truth will yet be raised up, within our borders, to the praise of His glorious name."

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.

The first of the series of Quarterly Meetings was held in regular course on Third-day, the 5th. A downpour of rain just at the hour of meeting affected the attendance very perceptibly. During the period of worship a visiting Friend of another Quarter had service in the ministry and there was fervent supplication from one of our own ministers.

The business of the meeting was principally transacted in joint session. Selections from the Yearly Meeting Extracts were read. These included the portions referring subjects to the subordinate meetings, the minutes of Exercise and the epistles prepared by Women Friends for College Students and on Gambling.

The report of the Committee to consider the situation of "those just outside the membership," given in the Extracts, was read and referred to the Monthly Meetings for action in the form determined by the Yearly Meeting.

A written report of a Committee to consider the hour of holding the Quarterly Meeting was presented. The meeting accepted the proposal to change from 10 to 10.30 A. M. It also approved the recommendation that the Second Month Quarterly Meeting should have a morning and afternoon session with lunch intervening.

After some years' experience it has been found to cost about $400 to serve lunch to the four Quarterly Meetings in the year. A minute authorizing this expenditure and directing Monthly Meetings regularly to forward their proportion of the amount was adopted.

A supplemental report forwarded by the Western District Monthly Meeting elicited much approving comment. It was suggested that this report might profitably be printed in THE FRIEND. It therefore follows:—

AT A MONTHLY MEETING OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT, HELD IN JOINT SESSION, FOURTH MONTH 15, 1914.

A supplemental report of the condition of this Meeting was brought forward by the Overseers. It was satisfactory to the Meeting, and a copy was directed to be forwarded to the Quarterly Meeting.

To the Monthly Meeting:—

At our Monthly Meeting, held Twelfth Month 17, 1913, the Overseers were directed to prepare and present at a future meeting a supplemental report of the condition of this Meeting. They have given the matter careful consideration and feel that this is the right time to submit such a report to the Monthly Meeting, that it may be forwarded to the Quarterly Meeting, held in Fifth Month. It is as follows:—

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT OF WESTERN DISTRICT MONTHLY MEETING.

In 1812, when the Meeting House on Twelfth Street below Market Street was built, it was thought by some Friends to be in the suburbs and too far west, and that it would be inconvenient for Friends to attend meeting held at this place. Fifty years later, most of our members lived within walking distance of the Meeting House. Now it is situated in the centre of the business section of the city and very few of our members live near. The property is a valuable one, and many feel there is a real testimony, in this age of materialism, in retaining for religious purposes, a place for quiet meditation and prayer in the midst of a busy neighborhood, while others take exception to this view.

Our total membership is 605, consisting of 501 adults and 104 minors. They are scattered over the world from China on the east to Honolulu on the west, and being thus situated it is difficult to ascertain what proportion of our total membership attends meeting.

Our Meetings for Worship are held at 10.30 on First and Fourth-day mornings. The average attendance during the winter months on First-days is near 175, and on Fourth-days near 70. The meeting held First-day evening is under the joint responsibility of the three city Monthly Meetings and from 30 to 60 are present. During the summer months many Friends are absent from their homes and the attendance at all meetings is small.

Our Meetings for Discipline are held on Fourth-days before the next to the last Sixth-day at the close of morning meeting. The men hold an adjourned evening session during eight months. Most of our members take an interest in our business meetings, and are concerned to be faithful therein.

In addition to our members there is a large number of students, of whom a printed list is kept, and efforts are made to interest them. Strangers in the city often visit us and afford opportunities to distribute Friends' literature, which is kept in boxes at the doors of the meetings-house.

During the school year a part of the Twenty and 300 or more of the pupils from the William Penn Charter School attend the Fourth-day morning meetings. Although very few of these are members of the Society of Friends and many have had but little knowledge of our views or practices, yet we believe they are a very important part of our meeting and on this account a deep concern rests upon us. We desire that our manner of worship, the message spoken, and the whole atmosphere of the assembly may as this becomes our profession. We would have these boys and their instructors feel that they are one with us in communion with our Heavenly Father, and that together, we may be permitted to partake of that spiritual refreshment which He graciously gives to those who wait upon Him. We trust and believe that much good seed is sown in this way and who can tell what the harvest may be?

We are brought under much exercise on account of the ministry amongst us, as well as the manner of our silent worship, not only for our own members, but also for those who may meet with us—that those who speak in these meetings may be instant in season, rightly dividing the Word—and yet careful in the exercise of their gifts to wait for the ability and the message which God alone gives. With these vital interests upon our hearts, we would ask each member of the Quarterly Meeting to seek to know whether he should share in any way or any time this responsibility with us.

At present there is under appointment a large joint Committee to consider what can be done that a greater number of our men members may have the privilege and opportunity of attending the mid-week Meeting for Worship.

Our meeting-house property and the Friends' Institute built thereon, are by reason of their central location, used during the week, not only by our own members, but also by many other Friendly organizations.

It is no easy matter to summarize our various activities. The officers and committees work harmoniously and unselfishly together for the good of each other and the uplifting of the body. A large Committee on Attention to Members and Attenders is actively occupied in visiting, welcoming the stranger in our midst, arranging Tea Meetings and Yearly Meeting Teas, keeping the boxes at the doors filled with suitable literature, and having the oversight of young Friends coming to the city, and those attending schools and colleges.

The First-day school, including the Adult Bible Class, held at the close of meeting, are now under the care of a joint Committee of the Monthly Meeting.

Through the kindness of our late friends, Rebecca White and Hannah W. Richardson, funds were given to our Monthly Meeting, the income of which is used to support the Western District Colored School, which is under the care of our Women's Meeting. It is now located at 718 Catharine Street and is attended by about 100 colored boys and girls who receive religious and industrial training, as well as the regular school course.

The Southwestern Burial Ground is under the care of the Monthly Meeting. Together with the other two Monthly Meetings our members are active on the "Committee of Six" and in having the care and oversight of Friends' Select School, Friends' Library and the William Forrest Estate.

During the past year, we feel there has been a growth in love and unity among our members and in the spiritual life of our meetings. A living concern exists that we may be willing laborers in the vineyard of Christ and doing our share of the work in spreading the knowledge of His kingdom. We have only two recorded Ministers, one of whom resides in Canada, but the responsibility of the meeting is very largely shared by the body, and the spirit of true worship is apparent by the manner of those assembled. A living, vocal ministry is exercised amongst us and we believe precious gifts are being developed.

THOMAS HODGKIN.

[The following extracts from the notice of Thomas Hodgkin in the Annual Monitor have more than passing interest.—E.S.]
 "It must be understood at once that the business into which, as he himself said, he put all the hardest work of his life, never obsessed him or became in any way his master. He was able to bring a strong, sane Christianity right into the centre of his commercial life. So much was this the case, and so plain to him were the issues between the right course and the wrong, that in later years he found it difficult to believe that complexity of conditions might seem to leave no choice except between two inevitable evils. It puzzled almost as much as it pained him that Friends whom he loved and admired should feel it their duty to engage in undertakings which they did not fully approve, in order to compass the good of the nation as a whole. Historical work, during the years at Newcastle, had already won him wide fame, through his great book, 'Italy and her Invaders,' and to this he brought the same broad Christian outlook. He read the past in the light of the present, and he was able to see in the present the forces at work in the past. The problems of old Rome had for him their corresponding problems in England to-day; Paul's arguments with the Jews on the subject of outward ordinances lived again in the testimony of Friends against water baptism."

"With regard to his outlook on doctrinal questions, it seems best to quote his own words in 'The Trial of Our Faith':

"The Spirit of the risen Christ still dwells in the hearts of the children of men. It is not merely certain historical facts which occurred under the sway of Augustus and Tiberius Cæsar that we as Christians believe; it is a living and abiding Spiritual presence in the world to which we bear witness."

"Whoever so thinks about Christ, whoever can truly say, 'He is to me unique among the sons of men, He brings to me a message from the Eternal One such as none other that I know of has ever borne'—such a man seems to me to be my brother in the faith. I know that many, perhaps most, of those who are called "heterodox," could come as far as this; still it seems to me that all who have got thus far have at least their faces towards the light, and I would say to all these, 'Let us live with this Man, Who is above all other men, as much as we can, let us imitate His spirit, study His words, and translate them day by day into acts, and then our understanding of Who and What He is will grow.'"

"I can only speak that which I do know; but I know I am in a temple of freedom, and even those who differ from me will let me say the things which I know for myself to be true. It was well that I was called Thomas, for truly I have always had an infinite capacity for doubt; and yet the longer I live, and increasingly with every year in later life, I feel intensely that Christ is the key to all my spiritual difficulties. He said, 'And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me.' He is the remedy for all our sins and all our sorrows. . . . 'In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth I would say unto paralyzed humanity, 'rise up and walk.'"

SECRETARY BRYAN is not appalled and turned aside by the fact of mystery in religion. He says: "People should not reject the Bible because of its mysteries. If a man never ate anything until he knew the mystery of its growth, he would die of starvation. But mystery never bothers us in the dining-room. It is only in religion. If people will live up to the things in the Bible they do understand, they will be so busy doing good that they won't have time to think about the things they do not understand."—Selected by W. C. Allen.

CHARACTER is made by the Bible. Daily Bible readers are sure character builders. But they must read the Bible, not skim it, so many verses a day. To read one Beatitude and keep it before the mind, is better than to read many chapters only to forget them as soon as you close the Book. —Selected by W. C. Allen.

OUR TOO MILITANT IDEA OF OVERCOMING.

The word overcoming was one of the favorite words of the Apostle John, and this fact is one to stir a great deal of reflection. For John seems to most of us the serenest and the least military of all the disciples. His work was done in a different way from that of Paul, and overcoming difficulties by might and main does not seem consonant with most that we know of John. But here lies, perhaps, the reason why so many of us fail—namely, that when we think of overcoming, our most natural thought is that of force. We want to fall upon our enemy and crush him, or we want to strike a blow which shall be so marked and decisive that all our lives we shall remember with a thrill of pride the stroke by which we conquered our sin or our adversary. Many of our most natural metaphors are military ones, and we hardly have room yet in our minds for the truth that when the victory does take place, it is more likely than not to be a very quiet experience, and accomplished by seemingly inadequate means.

The means by which men win great moral battles are, as a rule, strangely lacking in the spectacular qualities which we so naturally covet; yet it is not enough for us that we gain deliverance from our enemies, but we often think more about the flying colors than about the reality of our success. If one watches the prevailing thought of men to-day in religious warfare, one cannot help feeling that there is an inordinate craving for showy ways of doing it, and these large programs, great conventions, and the prowess and fame of well-known leaders, are apt to dishearten many a solitary struggler fighting out his battle in some corner where the pageantry of moral effort never comes.

Overcoming then, perhaps, in most cases is rather lacking in dramatic color. Many a man might have achieved it if he had not been so intent on watching for the romantic signs which we are apt to demand as the accompaniment of victory. No doubt by far the greater number of victories take place by way of supplanting something, than by some sudden onslaught and rout. The good thing which good men try to build up tends to take the place of the evil. The terms of building operations are far more true to the spirit of conquest than the terms of battle as ordinarily understood, and the words which describe growth and gardening are more applicable yet. Our main contest is for the good rather than against the evil. The Christian's triumph is in the fact that he is there, on the scene and in possession of it, when the enemy is no longer there. When our sin is taken away we do not know just how it went. Something else is there instead. Glad as we should all be to realize that by some definite and memorable blow of ours it was conquered, most of us have to do without such knowledge.

Looking in upon people like John and his followers as pitted against that strong and rampant world of Ephesus, a worldly mind would have said it was impossible that such as they could ever make any serious impact against it. The one way of overcoming known to the world of that day was that of hurling yourself against your enemy in pitched battle and with main force. But new forces were entering the scene, and there were unsuspected ways of conquest which the world had never seen before. To most of those early Christians there came, as there comes to us, the temptation to wish they could make some valiant stroke to forward their conquest. But it was seldom that the opportunity came; yet they went on, and one day the scene was changed.

And it is not very different to-day, after all these centuries of Christian life and effort. If evil is overcome, it is not by some swift, military foray in which the victors are distinguished at once, but more likely it is achieved by settling down to one's task, resisting the desire to do something splendid, and keeping on until at last one has the field and freedom.

Many times our overcoming takes the form, not so much of receiving the surrender of the enemy, as in realizing that the atmosphere is changed. A changed atmosphere is perhaps a greater achievement than to be able to enumerate the number we have conquered. Perhaps, also, more personal victories are won by our fleeing than by our pursuing. What failures all of us can count, because in some given situation we did not simply walk away! We lingered a moment too long, and out came the word from our own lips which defeated us. Then we realize how near and modest and quiet a thing our greatest victory may be. "He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city."

As it was men's fanciful and showy notions of how a Messiah ought to come that made men reject Christ at the first, so it is even now. We cannot understand how all that we need of Him may be accomplished gently and obscurely, without banners or pomp. There are many who are overcoming and do not know it, just because it has been a long time since they have seen any of the popular signs of conquest connected with anything they do. They were never nearer to it than in just those moments of self-abasement, which are so frequent with them that they feel almost excluded from the list of those who achieve. And to all such, word needs to be brought that they should not give over because they cannot see the ordinary and worldly signs of their success. Without mentioning one of the usual marks of what the world counted a conqueror, John's quiet insistence on overcoming shows us how different a thing it is from the prevailing martial view of it. Overcoming is a very quiet thing. Perhaps the quietness and patience of it are altogether the hardest thing about it. And one may be doing most when he seems to be doing nothing.—The Sunday School Times.

MARY CAPPER'S EXPERIENCE IN REJECTING WINE, AS RELATED BY JAMES BACKHOUSE.

In the course of the conversation, she informed me that she had adopted the principles of total abstinence as regards intoxicating liquors; that, though on the first mention of the subject, she had doubted its propriety, yet on reflecting upon it, and considering the numbers led away into inebriety, and that all these began their course of drunkenness by taking intoxicating liquors in what had been thought to be moderation, she came to the resolution, that no one should be able to plead her example for taking them at all. At the time she left them off, she was upwards of eighty years of age, and in the practice of taking a single glass of wine daily with her dinner, and having been for many years unable to take animal food, this glass of wine had been thought almost essential to her existence, especially as she had been accustomed to it from an early period of her life. She told me that she expected to have something to suffer, in making this change, and that she might probably have to endure a greater sense of feebleness during the remainder of her days, but the welfare of those by whom she was surrounded, and on whom her example might have some influence, she considered to be of much greater importance.

On making the trial she was, however, agreeably disappointed; for though she felt some languor for a few days, she soon became sensible of an increase of strength, and was more vigorous without the wine than she had been with it; so that she had cause to commemorate the goodness by which she had been enabled to make this little sacrifice.

And I believe that her example in this respect, as well as her Christian practice exhibited in a great variety of other points, had a beneficial influence on many.

At an earlier reference to her, James Backhouse wrote: "She is an encouraging example of the power of religion in old age; and while her heart expands in Christian love towards all, she retains a clear and strong attachment to those views, or rather, I might more properly say, to those experiences of Christianity to which true Friends through faith have attained."

She died on the twenty-third of the Fifth Month, 1845, in the ninety-first year of her age.

THEY are slaves who dare not be in the right with two or three.—LOWELL.

THE CAPITAL ON THE JAMES.

BY CHAS. E. GAYSE.

If there is a Niobe among American cities it is Richmond, Virginia. Not that she stands like Rome in other days,

"An empty urn within her withered hands."

Richmond is not sunk in despair. On the contrary, a busier, more ambitious, more metropolitan and rapidly-growing town of its size can hardly be found. Hope prevails there. The people, more than 125,000 of them, are self-reliant, are traditionally a ruling class, and accept the responsibility of high birth, polished manners and ancient leadership. More and more since peace was renewed in her walls has prosperity come to be within the palaces of Richmond. Yet as one goes about and sees the memorials of the city, when one realizes what hard-ships it has been through, how much its history includes (if alliteration be pardoned) of devotion, defiance, defeat, desolation and despondency, yet how resigned, half reconciled, to the failure of their cause the citizens, even the older ones, seem generally to be, one is so touched by the pathos of it all and so stirred to admiration by the way they have accepted their baptism of fire, as to invest the town to one's fancy with that haunting melancholy which we associate with the name of Niobe or of Rachel.

One coming from the North with Northern sentiments regarding slave labor and State rights, is apt to approach Richmond for the first time in a spirit of hostility, with the feeling that a chasm lies between him and what Richmond has stood for, that he is going to be an alien there in his own country. Well, differences do exist between Massachusetts and Virginia. It is possible to find bitterness in one and want of charity in the other. But after he sees the dismantled importance of the city and catches the people's spirit, sympathy rises, or ought to rise, like a tide over prejudice. He begins to say "perhaps," "I see it differently now," "if one had been brought up here," phrases that crowd out sectionalism till the visitor finds that he has come and seen and been conquered.

It becomes quickly evident to a stranger that Richmond has been more than a State capital: fifty years ago it was the seat of government of a republic. Its present State-house was a national capitol. There is in the city a mansion, now a museum, which was the home of a president and was called the White House. Monuments about town commemorate not only Virginians but other sons of the South, as should be the case at the seat of a national government. The Confederate dead buried in Hollywood Cemetery are remembered like the soldiers who lie at Gettysburg and Arlington. These features give the city historic worth of a high order, though at the same time they impress the visitor with a sense of departed influence, of fallen greatness.

Another feature of Richmond easy to remark, is the comparatively small scale but the sound, artistic and economic judgment on which and with which the city is built. The State-house, used now by the legislature and formerly by the Confederate Congress, is not large, but is of noble design and proportions; it stands in a park of moderate size set with ancestral trees, and wears the priceless beauty of dignified age; but if it had to be measured with the yardstick of cost it would rank low in a list of capitols, including those at Albany and St. Paul, Harrisburg and Austin. Compared with the Executive Mansion at Washington the Richmond White House, especially as to the ground about it, is meagre, yet it carries an air of distinction. In Hollywood Cemetery stands an obelisk in memory of Confederate troops. The obelisk is majestic in height and solidity; its rudely-dressed blocks of stone are beautiful in their drapery of climbing vines; but in point of size and expense it dwindles beside the shaft that towers over the Potomac at Washington. Nothing in Richmond approaches in splendor Grant's Tomb on Morningside Heights, yet grace and refinement attach no less to the colonnade commemorating Jefferson Davis and to the unobtrusive but touching plot of ground in Hollywood where he and his family lie buried. No, Richmond is not big or costly, but it rebukes mere expenditure by its reasonableness, harmony, just proportions, taste and finish.

What the Old North Church is to Boston, the Old Swedes' to Wilmington, Delaware, or the Franciscan Monastery to Santa Barbara, that to Richmond is little St. John's—quaint little St. John's, yet twice as big to-day as it was in 1775, when the House of Burgesses, driven out of Williamsburg by Benedict Arnold, removed to it and heard Patrick Henry, standing in that very pew yonder, call on the future to give him liberty or give him death. Hearts that make their appeal through tone, are, even in these days of the Victrola, more or less ephemeral in their effect, but Patrick Henry has been spared the orator's usual doom, thanks to a hundred thousand schoolboys and also to the verger of St. John's. Now the verger of St. John's must not be ranked with schoolboys, though like them he cries out for liberty or death. There are ways and ways of doing things, some crude, some skillful, and the verger, who is in fact a plain janitor, from sweeping and dusting Patrick Henry's pew has reached such a pitch of understanding and emotional insight as to deserve a place by himself. Born in Genoa, he has yet lived nearly all his life in Richmond and speaks English with a rich negro accent. You will be sorry to hear that fate has not been kind to him. "What are you doing here?" say distinguished visitors who hear him recite, "when you might be in the pulpit or at the bar or on the stage?" "Yes, sir, right many people come to hear me declaim, members of Congress, cabinet officers, Supreme Court judges, professors, actors, great ladies, everybody of quality, and they all say, 'you're a wonder.' I gave the speech for Pres. McKinley when he was here, and for Pres. Roosevelt and his wife. Admiral Schley brought a big party down from Washington to hear me, and before I got through he done went and cried, for I tell you I gave it to 'em hot. Thank you, I couldn't do it justice to-day, never can in summer. You come sometime when it's cold. Besides there's only two of you and I can't git het up unless I have a crowd. Suppose though I might give just the last few sentences." And so we heard the great peroration. At the time of my reader's visit may the weather be propitious for spouting! Never mind if the janitor's voice isn't in its usual fine condition (it never is); a little urging will prevail against hoarseness, especially if it be hinted that a performance so peerless is worth more than applause. Let me caution the visitor not to allude to the passage about Charles the First having his Cromwell as being part of this speech. The janitor fairly blisters such ignorance, as if everybody didn't know that "If this be treason make the most of it" was said ten years before at Williamsburg.

In order to get a little understanding of the people when one is visiting a strange city it is well to find accommodation in a private family. You sometimes meet in this way with interesting examples of vicissitude. In Tallahassee I have stayed with a young man and his wife, cousins to each other, who are descendants of William Bradford, governor of Plymouth Colony, who are great-great-grandchildren of Thomas Jefferson and great-grandchildren of General Branch, once governor of North Carolina, governor of Florida, U. S. representative, U. S. Senator, and Secretary of the Navy. In Richmond I have three times been entertained by Major H., deceased since my last visit, who with his wife, children, grandchildren, relatives and friends maintained with dignity and refinement a representative household of the reduced and scanty sort. Theirs is of course a family ruined by the war, though still counted among the Old Dominion gentry. The younger members are setting themselves to the conditions of this generation, but those who remember the 60's seem unequal to the new era. Earning and saving money was not the way of the older time. Slavers bred an indolent plenty which the war swept away, bending many a proud lip above a humble plate. Opposite me at the major's table sat a young woman stenographer, whose grandfather was president of the United States, President Tyler. In speaking of the war there was about the major a considerate restraint. He had lived through the siege of Richmond. If the old antagonism at any time kindled his eye it was when he touched upon the period of Reconstruction, which he said was harder on them than was the war itself. "No, I have never been North. There was a time when I might have gone, but I was principled then against going, and now when I feel differently, I'm not able to go." We talked about some of the figures in the "Irrepressible Conflict." "General Lee," I said, "comes in for high admiration among Northern people, but I can't say we feel the same towards Jefferson Davis." The major replied, "Neither do we," a feeling that may in part have sprung from the fact that after his death the wife and daughter of President Davis by fixing their home in New York seemed to Southern people unwilling to share the general distress. The major's loyalty to a government that had passed away appeared by the following incident to be shared by one of his daughters. Her little son was sitting on my young companion's knee and was asking to have "something real pretty" played on the mouth organ. Apollon chose "Dixie." The little chap heard it through and then said, "Now play something real pretty." This time it was "Marching Through Georgia," at the close of which he said, "Now that is real pretty." "The little traitor!" laughed his mother.

The family sent us to see their burial plot in Hollywood, where are the graves of two or three older relatives who lost their lives in a certain theatre fire, still remembered in Richmond with a shudder. They sent us to see the church that stands where the theatre stood, and to visit St. Paul's. It was at St. Paul's on a certain First-day in the Spring of 1865 that Jefferson Davis was at service when an orderly dashed up to the door and had the president called out. Richmond, the messenger said, was being evacuated by the Confederates and would soon be held by the Union army. The president must leave immediately. He did so and thus ended his administration. St. Paul's was recently, at the time of his death, in charge of Robert Forsythe, who was also long and favorably known in Philadelphia. We asked the colored sexton whether they had a new rector or were merely using substitutes. He replied that they hadn't no rector and no substitutes, just got anybody they could.

The major's wife told us that as a young woman visiting from her home near the Natural Bridge at the governor's mansion in Richmond, she found herself in a party of guests that included Robert E. Lee. When the morning came when he must leave, the young people crowded round and shook hands with him, but coming to her she said, "I think I must have a kiss here," which the other maidens most virtuously disapproved of, and said, "You made him do it, you're so pert." The major, however, had already come above the horizon. War and wooing went on together till the wedding day. In spite of servant's freed and farms wasted a festival was prepared for the houseful of guests, who were staying several days. About daybreak on the glad morning the major was called out of bed and told that Union troops would be at the house in half an hour. Two colored men packed a basket of food and with the bridegroom hurried away into the woods. It was glorious not to be captured, but when he was able to come back in safety he found the bride eaten out of house and home. The marriage took place five days late in a banquet hall deserted, for the guests had fled and the feast was strictly a Barmecide one. The Union soldiers alone had enjoyed that wedding breakfast.

AN outburst of temper in a Christian has been known to set back indefinitely the acceptance of Christ by one who was trying to begin a Christian life. The failure of a Christian minister to pay a little debt to a man not a Christian but interested in religion, destroyed the minister's influence over the man, and drove him back into the world.—J. R. MILLER.

If a successful man boasts that he is self-made, do not believe him unless he shows that he is still at the job.

A PEACE TRIP.

WM. C. ALLEN.

The other day I took a flying trip on behalf of the international peace movement to a town which for obvious reasons we will call E. It is a brand-new, beautiful city of about 40,000 people. En route I stopped at a little city that had been on my mind in connection with such work. Leaving the troublesome handbag at the station, I got up to the high school about half-past one o'clock, inquired for the principal, introduced myself and the nature of my errand, and after literally sizing one another up he granted a request to call a special assembly of the student body within the next hour. About two hundred and twenty-five were present, and they, and the instructors, listened attentively to a general talk on the peace movement. All seemed very glad of the opportunity.

It is desirable when commencing operations in a city where you are little acquainted, to start with those who know of you, or at least first call on the most influential people you can reach. They generally are gratified at your asking their assistance, and their help counts for much. Seldom is it well to first see the less influential people—they generally lack in power to help because they are shy or timid, or do not possess clear-cut convictions. The first man I went to see in E. was Bishop S., of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

We had corresponded a little and were mutually glad to meet. His first thought was for me to address the Commercial Club. He rang up sundry officials of that organization and arrangements were soon made to that end. After a pleasant interview, I called on some of the pastors of the city.

These good brethren were bashful about tackling peace work—it was easy to see that. They knew of me, but the thought of specifically preaching or teaching, or aiding and abetting anyone preaching or teaching the doctrines of our Lord on the subject, was new to them, and required care. I soon found that, as has so often been the case, it would be necessary to drop the church people for a time. So the Y. M. C. A. secretary, that never-failing and sympathetic worker, with broad outlook and love for men, was called upon. He could not arrange any program in the limited time at our command, but offered the opportunity of addressing the men at a supper the following evening, which I was glad to accept.

As time was short, I followed the then only and generally very bad plan of ringing up the principal of the high school, but he thought he could not arrange for an address. That was a mistake on my part, because it is necessary for a man in his position to personally see what kind of a person he is dealing with. He evidently did not desire to see me. Defeated here, I could only watch for some other way to get into the high school.

It soon developed. The presiding person at the Y. M. C. A. supper the following evening proved to be the county superintendent of public schools. He was much interested in the peace talk there and offered to meet me the following morning and take me over to introduce me to the city superintendent of schools. The latter listened to my concern on behalf of the young folks, was very sympathetic, and promised to try to arrange for a talk at the high school. This was subsequently accomplished, and, although the evidently-disapproving principal was absent, I had time given to address about eight hundred pupils.

A word about that city superintendent. I showed him a copy of the leaflet, "Waste of War," asking if he could use some in the city high school. He immediately responded, "That is fine; I can use them in the high school and would like them for all our seventh and eighth grades throughout the city." I could but compare his attitude with that of the preachers I had just offered the leaflets to. They had handled them gingerly; evidently did not quite approve of them, and had failed to accept them.

The State Normal president was the next man to see. He was cautious, as was his duty, but arranged for a special assembly the following day. Here I was enabled to ask several hundred young men and women to enlist themselves on the side of the Prince of Peace. It was a most satisfactory occasion. I endeavored to lay before them the moral and economic evils of militarism, and their responsibility in connection with shaping the ideals of the coming generation.

The meeting with about fifty leading business men of that locality in the handsome rooms of the Commercial Club was encouraging. I had previously thought of the anticipated work with some apprehension as their view-point, quite likely to be influenced by political or financial bias, might naturally be such as to excite controversy or disapprobation. Whilst discussing the far-reaching economic damage done by war, and preparation for it, I also was led to plead for a wider vision of the rights of other races and a willingness on our part to admit their claims for justice and for courteous treatment. The increasing close commercial and social intercourse with mighty Asia, awaking out of her long sleep, and the need of adjusting our racial prejudices to new conditions was pointed out. At the close of this meeting a number declared their satisfaction with what had been said, particularly in respect to the moral issues involved.

Having been so happy as to land most of the quickly available listeners in this city I again took up the churches and preachers. The president of the pastors' union was interviewed and he seemed quite eager to assist after being told of the reception the school and business people had accorded me. Ah! if the pulpit only knew how church membership is curtailed because workmen especially feel that the churches only follow where they should lead the way! The real reason for coming to E. had been to interest the church people and all this work had been necessary in order to secure the accomplishment of that end. Anyhow, my good brother, the pastors' union president, helped right royally. As I desired to leave town the following noon he agreed to call a meeting of the ministers for ten o'clock.

This incident recalled an experience of two years ago when in a certain western city I tried to get a meeting of the ministers to consider the heretofore unthought of peace question. Strenuous efforts to have these representatives of Christ interested were made by the dean of a large college in that city. He is a rare Christian, possessing wide influence. In spite of his solicitude the only ministers who turned up were two colored men. A number of other people who happened to learn of the meeting were present and they proved to be exceedingly sympathetic.

But the pastors' meeting this time came off somewhat better. Six ministers were present. I laid before them the moral damage to young men resulting from barrack and warship life, as personally observed in different lands, the efforts of secular organizations and great commercial bodies to secure arbitration, the failure of the churches to lead in the movement, the loss to the churches in prestige at home and abroad, the jeopardy in which the foreign missions are being placed by a failure to protest against militarism. They appeared much moved, promised co-operation, thanked me heartily for the interview, and wound up with prayer that strength and the right words might be granted me at home or beyond the sea.

Of course, the newspapers made some reports of these addresses, but I did not do much with the newspapers. Years ago, I used to try to obtain publicity for the work, through them, and this would be very helpful if reports could only be correctly made. But nine times out of ten an immature reporter, with no doubt the best intentions, will enlarge on the least important things that are said or make some mistakes about matters of larger significance. Occasionally a reporter will seek me after an address and get information for private or public use. Such interest is very encouraging. I have had ground for apprehension that some newspaper editors regard the international peace propaganda in relation to its probable effect on their sales. They seem to think that big headlines and war-scares help business.

To leave home, and live in a hotel, very much alone, and try to reform people who do not particularly care to be reformed, involves some sacrifices. The lack of social contact with excellent men and women, who under other circumstances would gladly welcome you into their houses, is discouraging. They talk about your errand and then let you go your way. But in this city of E. there was an exception. Good Bishop S. hunted me up and called at my hotel. He was full of the spirit of love and cheer, and desired to help. How often we conservative Friends of Philadelphia realize a subtle social and spiritual fellowship with ritualistic Episcopalians.

Were the six days consumed in this experimental trip wasted? Not at all. Some thirteen hundred or more people heard six addresses on a vital subject for the first time. Many of them are at an impressionable age, for young people are generally idealists. A good deal of literature was started on its way. The church people—or their leaders—were finally reached. If I could only go to E. about three weeks later the ministers would no doubt heartily welcome me. The doors of places of worship would be opened. Congregations would be glad of the message. The preachers would thereafter be my sincere friends. If I met them later at some synod or conference they will no doubt be honestly glad to support any resolutions or remarks I may offer. The very ones who at first were a little frosty will later display the greatest warmth. The sowing of the seed of the kingdom is never fruitless. Only by faithfully doing so can we hasten the coming of the transcendent glory of the Lord.

These lines have been written to encourage others. It is not an easy task to carry the message to people who do not think as we do. But it pays.

LOVING God is the secret which reconciles all. This is the secret of being occupied, with great interest, in the things of earth without ceasing to love the things of heaven. But ye divided hearts, who have dreamed of a compromise between heaven and earth, and have appeared tormented with fears and scruples, now know the cause of your condition: Ye fear God, but ye do not love him. Love had speedily cut the difficulty; everything for God; nothing for self, is its motto.—ALEXANDER R. VINET. Selected by W. C. Allen.

NEWS ITEMS.

Journal of the Friends' Historical Society [London] is always interesting to one the least bit of an antiquarian, and even to those who have little interest in that way there is enough to make a careful examination of the pages yield a compensating return.

The number for Fourth Month is recently from the press. The following, somewhat abridged, are from its pages:

The paper by William Charles Braithwaite, read at the Reading Summer School, 1913, entitled "Lessons from Early Quakerism in Reading," has been issued in pamphlet form.

Jesse Edgerton's "A Brook by the Way," noticed in THE FRIEND some months ago, is alluded to and two of the shorter poems—Ambruse Boone, 1871, and Silent Worship, 1886, quoted in full.

Headley Bros., London, have added to their "Friends' Ancient and Modern" series a sketch of the poet Whittier. "This is an admirable production and cheap withal—four illustrations inside and one on the cover, the last named representing a statue to group of Whittier, Beecher and Garrison interviewing a female slave with infant in arms." This is a valuable series. The copies cost five cents each and may be had by addressing 114 East Twentieth Street, New York. The complete list embraces the following—the sketch of William Penn having been written by a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Over 100,000 of these little biographies have already been circulated: George Fox, Elizabeth Fry, Stephen Grellet, Francis Howgill, Joseph B. Braithwaite, Daniel Wheeler, George Whitehead, Margaret Fell, Joseph Sturge, Dr. William Wilson, William Penn, Thomas Ellwood and Richard Hulbert Horne.

There are appearing in a Welsh paper, in a column headed "The Pembroke-shire Antiquary," several papers on the Quakers in Pembrokeshire. In the second article, our late Friend, George Phillips of Haverfordwest of 1880, and sixty-seven, receives warm eulogy. He was born of a Wesleyan family, but he united himself with Friends in 1857, when thirty-six years of age. For long he was the only Friend in the county.

Several papers report interviews with John Gilbert Baker, F. R. S., "the world-famous botanist and horticulturist, who for so many years occupied the position of keeper of the Herbarium at the Royal Gardens, Kew" (Morning Post, 14 i. 11), and who was presented with an address of congratulation on his eightieth birthday. In one interview Gilbert Baker narrates his Quaker upbringing and school-life at Ackworth and York, and mentions some noted school-fellows, as Joseph and John S. Rowntree, Henry Seebohm and George and Henry Brady.

[The following statement is furnished for THE FRIEND. We have abridged it somewhat.—Eds.]

THE HAVERFORD SUMMER SCHOOL.—The plans for the Summer School, to be held at Haverford College, Sixth Month 20-29th next, are now almost perfected, and give promise of one of the most attractive Friends' conferences ever held in this country. A number of well-known speakers, both Friends and others, have consented to take part in the program, and to judge by the advance applications for rooms the gathering will be unusually large and representative. As several times before Haverford College has generously turned over its halls and beautiful campus to the accommodation of the guests, where board and lodging can be secured at a reasonable rate. Various forms of recreation and plenty of good fellowship supply sufficient diversion from the not too strenuous program.

The full announcement, shortly to be published, will show a daily arrangement of two lectures each morning (except first-day) beside a short meeting for worship and an hour for study classes. The afternoons are practically free. In the evenings an address is given by a prominent speaker. Among the speakers are included President W. Douglas Mackenzie, of Hartford, Professor Hugh Black, of New York, Walter Rauschenbush, author of widely read books on Christianity and the social order, Arthur Holmes and J. P. Lichtenberger, Professors in Pennsylvania State College and in the University of Pennsylvania respectively. These speakers will deal in a broad way with some of the present-day religious questions or with permanent spiritual needs. A number of the more prominent Quaker scholars will be on hand, including Eihu Grant, of Smith College, Augustus Murray, of Stanford, Eleanor Wood, of Wellesley and others.

Those desiring to secure lodging and board at the college are advised to apply for reservations as early as possible to Henry J. Cadbury, Haverford, Pa., to whom all inquiries should be addressed. Attendance at the meetings and lectures of the school is free to all.

THE note in No. 44 of the death of Granville E. Wood in Harrisburg was a mistake. Our correspondent intended to say May R., wife of Granville E. Wood. In the sudden loss of two of their number, the Harrisburg Friends have our sincere sympathy.

WITHIN the past two years, three manuscripts of the Journal of John Woolman have become accessible to the student of history and literature. All of them are originals. MS. No. 1 is a small, unbound quarto of forty pages, consisting of the rough draft to the year 1747. No. 2 is thicker, on the same size sheet, and is that into which the first volume has been copied. It is carried down to the year 1770. Accompanying these is the thin paper memorandum or pocket-book, containing the diary of John Woolman's voyage to England in 1772. Together with a few letters, these are all deposited at Swarthmore College.

To the Historical Society of Pennsylvania has been given the leather-bound folio No. 3, made with characteristic care by Woolman as the final and fair copy for the printer. It was the gift of another descendant, now living abroad. This MS. was used by the Committee of Friends who prepared the first edition of the Journal, which was printed in Philadelphia by J. Crukshank in 1774, two years after the death of the author.

Many editions of this famous Journal have been published in Europe and America and various translations have been made into foreign languages, but not since 1837 has any attempt been made to collate the printed copy with the original. The text has been very severely edited. John Conly's edition of 1837 [in which his name does not appear] is the most faithful to the text, but he also follows many of the corrections and omissions of the original editors. For instance, two dreams, a half page on inoculation, the only case where Woolman went to law, and several pages and many paragraphs, are wanting. "Everyman's" edition omits an entire chapter—the tenth—which is given in the London "Century" edition and also in that of J. G. Whittier, in both cases with much alteration from the original.

The Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia proposes to publish a final and accurate edition of this great Journal, with full biographical notices of each person mentioned in the text, fac-similes, unique illustrations, and a sketch of the life of John Woolman, based upon material now for the first time accessible. The volume will be edited by Amelia M. Gummere. This book should make a strong appeal to all who are interested in Quaker history, as portraying the life of the earliest of our modern philanthropists.

John Woolman's Journal is one of the few Quaker classics whose literary form has made a world-wide appeal ever since its first appearance, just before the stormy days of the American Revolution.

This will be called the "Raneocoe Edition," and will not be a large volume. It will be published at the price of one dollar and seventy-five cents ($1.75). Cheques may be made payable to Mary S. Allen, 24 West Street, Media, Pa.

THROUGH Walter G. Hraecok, Friends in Harrisburg give notice that their meetings must be suspended for the present as the room they have been using is no longer at their disposal.

FRIENDS are again urgently solicited to consider their duty in the matter of writing to Senators and Representatives on behalf of the legislation to secure a Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution. Progress with the bill is reported from Washington.

THE Committee of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting on an appointed meeting at Greenwich, N. J., has had some difficulty in arranging a date. The announcement for Sixth Month 7th is printed this week so that Friends may be informed well in advance.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

THE plan has been adopted of having every member of the graduating class appear publicly before the School during the latter part of the Senior year, with some appropriate exercise, either the recitation of some worthy literary selection, or an original essay. Up to the present time essays have been read on the "Movement from the City to the Country" and "The Panama Tolls Question," and the following selections have been recited:—"The Legend Beautiful," and "King Robert of Sicily," by Longfellow, "My Soul and I," by Whittier, and Shelley's "Ode to a Skylark."

EXERCISES suited to Arbor Day were presented by some of the younger children at our morning collections last Fifth and Sixth-days. There were several recitations, individual and concert, and the Primary class made presentations of pussy willow twigs for planting to the class and teacher just above them.

MUCH interest is shown in the plans for the reunion to be held on the 22nd. It is the first general reunion of all who have ever been connected with the School that has been held, and promises to be an occasion of much significance to the School, as in previous years such reunions have proved to Westtown.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

At the present writing (Fifth Month 8th), most of the pupils who were detained at home on account of quarantine regulations have gotten back, and thus far there has been no fresh outbreak of the mumps, so that we feel justified in having prolonged the vacation.

THERE is but slight variation in the school program between the winter and spring terms; some regret has been expressed that the outhay made in the school gardens yields this year no return, for the class has been discontinued. Probably a year hence it will be resumed.

THE annual tree planting took place during the week. This dates back so far as Westtown knows it as a ceremony to the year 1876. In the spring of that year the graduating class, numbering six, planted a silver linden, which has grown to be one of the handsomest trees on the campus; many others, almost as large, have had a like origin. Last year's class planted an extensive grove on the slope to the south of the new lake, the year previous a cluster of hemlocks near the lake house were planted, prior to that the different angles of the girls' hockey field offered attractive sites for groups of evergreens, so this year, there still being one unclaimed angle, a group of twelve or more white pines were planted. The exercises attending the tree planting are always interesting and this year was no exception. Each member of the graduating class has some part, and it is nothing more than the putting in of a handful of soil upon the roots. There were speeches by various members of the class and a few of the teachers when called on had a word to offer.

CAMP suppers are again popular; a party of boys spent the afternoon and evening of the 2nd at "Cedar Rocks," and a large company of girls have their schedule for a full afternoon on the Brandywine. On the afternoon of the 7th about half the members of the faculty enjoyed a similar outing, their objective point being a serpentine hillside on the hospital farm near Newtown Square. Here a large tract, embracing several acres, was literally covered with mountain pink, the finest display of its kind any of us had ever seen.

MOST of the voluntary clubs and societies that have been quite active during the winter months have adjourned until autumn, the hour immediately after supper is better spent on the campus; the "Union," however, is an exception, and at the first meeting of the term the following officers were elected: President, George H. Buzby; Secretary, Elizabeth H. Bidle; Treasurer, Donald Kellum; Vice-President, A. Douglas Oliver, and Curator, Samuel H. Brown. The program planned for next week is to embrace five-minute speeches on the Mexican situation.

ANNOUNCEMENTS have been made concerning the Ellison P. Morris Peace essays, and already work on them has begun. The last of the month is the date fixed for these being completed.

With the advent of spring the lake and lake house are in demand; the latter has dates already scheduled for Seventh-days near the opening of next autumn term. This has not been a popular year in canoe-building, due to the fact that the place is well stocked. The canoe-room at the lake house contains between thirty and forty canoes, most of them Westtown-built. A well has been bored near the lake house, and when the needed plumbing is complete it will give the kitchen there the water supply that it has never had. The new well is about thirty feet deep.

WE have had no Committee Friends during the week, but on the second and third a company of twenty-five young women, most of them Westtown graduates and all of them identified with the interests of the Friends' School in Japan, had a meeting at the lake house and later took supper there; they were acceptable guests at the School and farm-house the following First-day. At the same time we had the company of Francis R. and Elizabeth R. Taylor and their little daughter. The former addressed the boys in their First-day evening collection. His topic was "Attainment," from the familiar text of Paul, "I count not myself to have apprehended," etc. He drew a strong lesson that it were well for us all to heed. The same evening Esther A. Balerston spoke to the girls. Her talk centered about the word "Intercession." As our thoughts and aspirations and prayers include others and grow less and less selfish, so shall we the better be fitted to reflect the Image of Him who knew no selfishness.

These visits from the old scholars are one of the richest privileges the school-family enjoy. It is a cause for real rejoicing that among some of the more recent graduates, quite as much as among those who date farther back, are those who carry the serious questions of life in no light or trifling style. This of itself would lead us to reflect that beneath the surface of our daily life in the School there is a strong religious feeling. There is much to foster this and we believe it in good measure abounds. We would in this connection commend to all who have our best interests at heart a paper written by George L. Jones, which appeared in the Fifth Month Westonian this year.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A despatch from Washington, D. C., says: "The United States is now a country of 109,000,000 people, according to the bulletin containing the estimates of population for the years subsequent to the 13th census, soon to be published by Director William J. Harris, of the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce."

It was stated on the 3rd inst. from Washington respecting the Osage Indians: "There are 2230 members of this tribe, and their average wealth is $20,000. The Osages own the richest oil and gas lands in the United States, and the royalties they draw from these lands amount to more than $4000 a day. Each member of the tribe has an allotment of 160 acres of land, besides participating in the royalties. There is now on deposit in the United States Treasury more than $9,000,000 belonging to them, and this, together with the further income from the tribal lands, will be kept intact by the United States until 1921, when it will be divided equally among those who are qualified to participate in the distribution."

It has been recently published that at the first annual banquet of the National Association of Waste Material Dealers, held in New York City, it was brought out that by collecting and utilizing waste products the members of the association transact an annual business of $700,000,000, says Bradstreet's. The utilization of cotton-seed oil and of cotton seed, until very recent years a mere waste product of the cotton crop, it was pointed out, is now valued in the United States alone at $30,000,000 a year.

Military government was lately established at Vera Cruz, with General Funston as Military Governor.

Three new postage stamps are announced by the Postoffice Department—7, 9 and 12 cents. The new seven-cent stamp will bear the likeness of George Washington; the nine and twelve-cent stamps that of Benjamin Franklin.

Forest fires at many points in Pennsylvania have lately caused great damage to the timber. Volunteer firemen in several instances saved valuable property, and hundreds were engaged in attempting to stay the flames.

Coal tar is now used as a fuel in steel furnaces at Gary, Ind. It is first heated to liquid form, then sprayed into the furnaces, mixed with blasts of air under pressure. A somewhat similar use of coal dust has been made as an experiment. The dust is fed to the furnaces in a continuous stream, mixed with air under pressure. The success of this plan has been so great as to raise the question whether it would not be economical to crush and grind all the coal used in large manufacturing plants. The dust burns with an intense heat. There is no smoke, because the combustion is perfect.

A despatch of the 5th from Washington says: "National prohibition and woman's suffrage will be leading issues in the congressional campaign of this year. In many States, from present indications, these two questions will push into the background the tariff, currency, foreign policy and all other national problems. The advocates of suffrage and national prohibition, particularly the latter, have for months been insisting that, once the resolution reached the floor, victory was assured."

It is also stated from Washington that thousands of women from every State in the Union will march in the suffrage parade, arrangements for which have been completed. The demonstration will be under the auspices of the Congressional Union for Woman Suffrage, and the march will be from the White House to the Capitol, where the women will present to every member of Congress a petition adopted by suffrage bodies in every State asking a constitutional amendment to enfranchise women.

A recent despatch says: "One hundred thousand students are enrolled in professional schools in the United States this year. Nurse training is the profession which has the largest number of students, 34,417. Law comes next with 20,878, and then follow medicine with 17,238, theology with 10,965, dentistry 8015, pharmacy 6165 and veterinary science 2324."

A despatch from Ridgway, Pa., of the 6th inst. says: "A 6,000,000 gas gusher was drilled in to-day on the P. R. Smith lease in Elk County, making a new record for this wonderful gas field. When the record gusher was struck rocks and earth were blown high into the air and persons nearby narrowly escaped. The well is about two miles from Ridgway. It was decided to-night to continue drilling, as the pressure might be increased at a greater depth."

It was stated from Washington on the 5th inst.: "Announcement was made to-night in behalf of the mediators of Mexico's troubles that Niagara Falls, Canada, had been selected as the place of their proposed conference with the contestants involved. This announcement was made by Secretary Bryan. The mediators have notified the different parties that Niagara Falls, Canada, has been selected as the place where the mediators will confer with the representatives of the different parties interested in the mediation, and that the 15th inst. has been fixed as the date when the conference will begin."

The crop-reporting board of the United States Department of Agriculture has made public its report on growing crops. The prospect is for a yield of 630,000,000 bushels of winter wheat, the largest in the history of the country.

A suit at law has lately been brought against the Mount Holly Water Co. It is stated that the suit was an action of B. Harry Jones to recover for the expense incurred by reason of the illness of three of his children with typhoid, which illness he attributed to their drinking the water furnished by the Mount Holly Water Company. Repeated analyses of the town water during the typhoid scare showed evidence of bacillus coli, and testimony that sewage was undoubtedly finding its way into the source of the water supply at Mount Holly, Smithville, Pemberton and New Lisbon for a period of three years prior to 1912 was adduced by the plaintiff. It was alleged that the water company knew of this and was negligent by reason of its failure to correct conditions. The jury decided that the illness must have been caused by the water, and awarded damages accordingly.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from London of the 6th says: "The woman's suffrage bill was rejected to-night by the House of Lords by a vote of 104 to 60. One speaker said the arguments for the extension of the parliamentary suffrage to women which were based on the results obtained in those States of the United States where it had been tried did not apply in the United Kingdom because in those States men were in the majority, while in the British Isles they were in the minority. Consequently, he argued, the granting of the parliamentary vote to women in the British Isles would mean the handing over of the destinies of the country and of the empire to a female electorate, which was a perilous step to take."

It is stated from Washington: "Secretary Bryan and Marquis Cusani Confalonieri, Italian Ambassador, have signed a treaty providing that any question between the United States and Italy which cannot be settled by diplomacy shall be submitted to an international commission. The treaty follows in a general way the terms of a similar pact negotiated with the Netherlands. It is the 15th of the new Bryan peace treaties."

A despatch from Mexico City of the 5th says: "Refugees arriving here from the north to-day report that Villa's troops are advancing southward leaving a trail of devastation in their wake. Demoralization and anarchy are rapidly spreading before their van."

NOTICES.

NOTICE OF APPOINTED MEETING.—By arrangement of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, an appointed meeting will be held at Greenwich, New Jersey, on First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 7, 1914, at 3 P. M. Friends interested are invited to join in this opportunity.

RHODS LEATHER BELT PRESERVER
Cuts Down Belt Cost

How often do you lubricate your belts? Many of the belts which come to us for repairs are dry and brittle. They need treating with a lubricant that preserves leather, and keeps it limber and glove-like, so that it will grip the pulley.

Rhoads Leather Belt Preserver meets these conditions. It has been doing it for twenty years. It is highly beneficial to leather and its frequent use in light applications saves many break-downs. It saves both repairs and belt bills.

It also saves output and idle wages lost during stops.

WAITING AND PRAYING.

A waiting spiritual worship and a living spirituality have become so precious to us—so satisfying in efficient reality—that we guard with especial care the byways and hidden paths that lead away from such a vital experience. To some of us who heard the feeling request for a short season of silent prayer for a most laudable and definite purpose—to appeal to the Throne of Grace, that the gathering war-clouds might, in the Divine Wisdom, be dissipated—the question presented itself, are we thus opening the way to something akin to will worship and thus marring the pure and holy way of access to the Father of spirits into which we have been so mercifully led? The spirit and purpose of the request my whole being most fully responded to, but when I looked into my own heart and there realized that without the extending of the scepter of Divine love and favor the essence of real prayer is wholly wanting, I questioned the wisdom of such a request, feeling that possibly there were others in that large congregation in a similar spiritual condition to myself. We cannot doubt there were many spontaneous prayers lifted to Him who rules the destinies of nations, and the expression of the body was crystallized in a way not to be mistaken or misunderstood.

It is no unusual thing for exercised minds to request a season of silence in social gatherings, thus recognizing our dependence upon our Heavenly Father and preparing the way of the Lord, and many vitalizing experiences have followed such faithfulness. The restlessness of our minds is such that we often need to pause in the hurry and bustle of this busy life long enough to realize a preparation for the coming of our Lord, and, blessed be His name, He does come to those who look and wait for Him.

Our Lord and our God, our Atoning Sacrifice, and our Mediator, has most fittingly taught us how to pray, exemplifying His holy pattern on His knees in Gethsemane—interceding with the Father, that if it were possible the cup of suffering which He well knew was before Him might pass from Him—but let us ever remember the glorious words which follow, "Nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt." Would that we might be favored to emulate the spirit of this most remarkable invocation and in holy confidence in the wisdom, goodness and love of the Almighty Father be prepared to say, "Nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt." We remember, many years ago, when the Chief Magistrate of our beloved country, stricken by the assassin's hand, was lying at the point of death, almost the whole Christian Church in our nation were by prearrangement praying for his recovery. How many could say, "Nevertheless not as I will, but as I Thou wilt" we do not know, yet He who rules over the destinies of nations and through His well-beloved Son, our Saviour, rules also in human hearts, saw mete to "cut short the work in this case in righteousness, and call the sufferer home."

It is not ours to say, "What doest Thou?" but it is ours to dwell so near to Him that we may recognize the wisdom and glory of all His works, and bowing in humble submission to His will be enabled to see that the essence of all true prayer is a Divine influence emanating from the Living Fountain through the favor and mercy of God, and flowing back to its source—an acceptable offering—a sweet incense before the Father's throne.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

On Fifth Month 7th, Abington Quarterly Meeting held its usual session in Germantown. The beauty of the day with its spring sunshine and the opening blossoms and foliage was felt as a benediction. Elwood and Sarah Cooper and Anna Crawford were visitors whose service of interested sympathy was helpful.

The business meeting began with a joint session, when the extracts from the Minutes, both of the Men's and the Women's Yearly Meeting just past, were read. The helpfulness, interest and beauty of these reports was felt, and the meeting was impressed with the active work which had been accomplished.

The charge from the Yearly Meeting that subordinate meetings make a careful study of our relations with those who, in their church affiliation, lie just outside our membership was received as a solemn trust. The Quarterly Meeting, under a deep sense of its responsibility to these, and with the earnest desire that the fostering care of the meeting may be the means of help and strength to them, could but pass on the trust to the subordinate Monthly Meetings for their active labor. While it was hoped that loving, tender care would be immediately extended, statistics are desired in the Twelfth Month Monthly Meetings.

On account of the resignation of Samuel Emlen from the Representative Body, which was a Quarterly Meeting appointment, a joint committee was named, in accordance with the recent decision of the Yearly Meeting, to bring forward a name to the next Quarterly Meeting to fill his place.

The hour for lunch was a helpful and pleasant time, when members from the different meetings had opportunity to extend to each other the right-hand of fellowship.

Early in the afternoon the Germantown Branch of the Friends' Foreign Missionary Association held a meeting to which all were invited. Julia Cope Collins told of the two Japanese girls from the Friends' School in Tokio. Toki Iwasawa and Ryu Sato, who are studying in this country preparatory to returning to teach in their home-land. One is doing good work at Columbia, and the other winning high honors at Brn Mawr. The needs of the famine sufferers in Japan have so touched their hearts that they have been active in gaining financial help for them. The meeting was told of the spread of interest among children in forming helpful bands. Every year boxes of presents are sent out to workers and pupils in the schools. We were told of the great pleasure these gifts have given.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.

Concord Quarterly Meeting was held at Media on the 12th inst. Memory calls up the picture when a generation ago a long string of carriages drove into the capacious enclosure at the old Concordville house and unloaded their occupants who had driven from the four corners of the compass to attend the spring Quarterly Meeting. There was every thing in the meeting of last week to remind one of the meetings of generations back, nothing that was essential to the solidity and dignity of a Friends' meeting was lacking, the same air of importance that attached to it then pervaded the assembly last week, the same spirit of reverence by the magic which no one tries to explain soon passed into the higher stage of worship as we gathered within the large and comfortable meeting-house and it was made clear to all of us why we had left our daily tasks at this busiest season of the year, for that which we had anticipated upon leaving home soon passed into realization.

We were favored with the company of two Friends not members of our Quarterly Meeting, and each in turn was given a clear Gospel message for the meeting; so closely did the other vocal offerings, and these were not few in number, follow in thought the two that had already been given, that there was a most beautiful harmony in the service of the meeting and no heart could help but be impressed with what Friends have always claimed for their mode of worship, that if in all simplicity and truthfulness they would give the management of their meetings over to Him who rules by laws which we neither fathom nor question, those meetings would be held to His honor and to our help and comfort.

It is often profitable to review a set address and give it a much wider circle of readers than the audience to which it was originally spoken; on the other hand, so much in a really devotional meeting depends on the time and the spirit of the occasion that in one's endeavor to pass the message or messages on to others the most precious element is lost and the value of the opportunity very much minimized. One who tries to pass to others the real spirit of a Friends' meeting oftener than not fails in the task he sets himself. The meeting at Media was a fresh confirmation that our faith in the efficacy of silent worship and the willingness of the Master to pour out His gifts upon whomsoever He will should not waver.

The second meeting presented several matters of interest. One of the large Monthly Meetings, feeling that the best welfare of their membership would be served by holding their business meetings jointly in the future, the request was willingly granted and the way left open for them to return to their former practice should it seem wise to do so.

In connection with the inquiry among our members respecting the use of intoxicants as a beverage, which has long been the righteous concern of the Yearly Meeting, the Quarterly Meeting encouraged its Monthly Meetings to appoint their committees on this subject in the very near future; they were advised to meet in conference with similar committees of other Monthly Meetings beyond the limits of our Quarter, or if it seemed wise they were encouraged to initiate such a conference of committees, with the feeling that there was much to be learned from an honest interchange of views on the part of those who should be appointed by their meetings to this important service.

The concern that originated in our Yearly Meeting in the spring of 1913 touching our duty toward those just outside the pale of the Society of Friends, but in one or more ways affiliated with us, came before the meeting, as it has already been before others and will in due time be considered by all our Quarterly Meetings. Doubtless different meetings will take different action, but it is certainly incumbent upon us all to give the matter the deliberate and prayerful consideration the Yearly Meeting expects at our hands. The following was in substance the minute adopted by Concord Quarterly Meeting—"That Monthly Meetings be encouraged to give serious care to this matter by the appointment of committees, and that the Monthly Meetings report what progress they have made to this meeting next Eleventh Month. It is recommended that these committees meet together collectively before the reports come to the Quarterly Meeting."

A question of such importance as the foregoing naturally and properly called up much exercise of spirit. It was the manifest concern of the meeting that whatever our duty might be in the lines suggested by the Yearly Meeting minute, we should be diligent in all our subordinate meetings to do our full task. It was felt that by the appointment of committees, individual members, wherever situated, would have a channel whereby their views and feelings could best reach the superior meeting. It is expected that six months hence the report of these committees can be submitted to the Quarterly Meeting, and there will still be a period of three months during which suggestions that they may make can be worked out and put in form for a report to the Yearly Meeting.

The most important matter to come before the meeting at its business session was the report of a committee of six men and six women Friends who have been under appointment the past year to visit the "indulged" meeting at Llanerch and for some other Gospel service to which they may have felt called. This report can best speak for itself, and we hope to be able to print it, if not in this issue, in that for next week. The extracts from the Yearly Meeting Minutes were read, some other routine business attended to, and with the hour well advanced the meeting closed with the feeling that the days to follow should have something well worth while contributed to them by these few hours spent apart from our accustomed tasks.

THE QUESTION OF THE PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

BY THOS. RAEBURN WHITE.

The controversy now in the Congress of the United States relative to the repeal of the Panama Canal Act is deserving of serious attention. It involves not only questions of economic policy, but the good faith of the United States in performing its treaty obligations.

The Act of Congress under discussion provides that the President shall have power to exempt from the payment of tolls American ships passing through the Panama Canal, which are engaged in "coast-wise traffic," that is, vessels plying between two ports of the United States.

Soon after this Act was passed, it was contended by Great Britain that it was a violation of a treaty which the United States made with Great Britain in 1901, commonly known as the "Hay-Pauncefote Treaty." This treaty provides that the United States shall adopt as the basis of the use of the canal by all nations certain rules, which are substantially those which have long been in force for the use of the Suez Canal. The Treaty then provides:

"The canal shall be free and open . . . to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules (the rules above referred to) on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise."

In passing the Panama Canal Act, giving the President power to exempt American vessels engaged in coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls, it was assumed that the expression "all nations," as used in the above language, means all other nations except the United States, and that there was no intention by the treaty to prevent the United States from discriminating in favor of its own ships if it saw fit to do so. It has also been suggested that it is not a discrimination against vessels of other nations to allow American coastwise traffic to pass free through the canal, because, it is said, no foreign vessels can engage in American coastwise trade, and therefore there would be in fact no discrimination in favor of American vessels as against any foreign vessels of the same class.

Considering first the last proposition: A little reflection makes it clear that to exempt American vessels passing from one United States port to another, through the canal, from the payment of tolls would be a discrimination against vessels of other nations engaged in similar traffic, and especially that it would be a discrimination against citizens or subjects of other nations engaged in like trade. For example, it is apparent that vessels moving between New York and San Francisco would have a great advantage over vessels moving between Canadian ports on the Atlantic and Pacific coast in the transportation of similar merchandise. This would clearly be a discrimination against citizens of Canada engaged in coastwise traffic.

It is perhaps even clearer when we consider that a vessel from a Canadian port on the Atlantic, passing through the canal to San Francisco, would have to pay tolls, whereas a vessel from an American port on the Atlantic, although perhaps but a few miles distant from the Canadian port, and destined also for San Francisco, would pay no tolls. Such vessels might carry the same character of cargo, and it is obvious that the American shipper would have such an advantage that his Canadian brother could not compete with him at all.

It is, therefore, clear that the Panama Canal Act may operate as a discrimination against the citizens or subjects of foreign nations. There still remains the question, whether it is a violation of the treaty, and whether the words "all nations" above referred to were meant to include the United States.

It is not possible in a brief article such as this to review fully all the evidence bearing upon this subject, but a few general references may be made.

The United States made a previous treaty with Great Britain relative to this same subject. It is known as the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty and was made in 1850. Great Britain prior to that time had certain exclusive rights over a portion of the coast of Central America, including what was then thought to be every available location for a canal. The United States had recently acquired California from Mexico, and was more interested than it had ever been before in the question of a ship canal through the Isthmus of Panama. It therefore requested from Great Britain a treaty by which Great Britain should surrender its exclusive rights and the two nations should engage to build a canal and control it jointly. In making this request of Great Britain, it was expressly stated by our representatives that the United States did not seek any exclusive privilege or preferential right, but that it merely wished to be admitted to a share in the construction and control of a waterway which should be "dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms, and a footing of perfect equality for all."

It was further said by our Minister to Great Britain, in a communication to Lord Palmerston, "that the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind."

In pursuance of the negotiations in which this declaration was made, the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty was concluded. It provided for the construction and control of a canal jointly by the United States and Great Britain, and that the canal should be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms."

Subsequently the United States became dissatisfied with the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, deeming it more advantageous to the United States to have the right to construct and control the canal, without the concurrence of Great Britain. Accordingly, overtures were made to Great Britain for a re-examination of the whole subject and the conclusion of a new treaty. The modification of the existing contract between the two nations was proposed as far back as 1881, at which time James Russell Lowell, who was then our minister to Great Britain, said in endeavoring to secure such modification of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty:

"Nor, in time of peace, does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ship in respect to precedence or tolls through an inter-oceanic canal."

There were other similar declarations, made from time to time by the United States ministers to Great Britain, but enough has been said to make it clear that both in seeking the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, to admit us to an equal right with Great Britain to construct the canal, and in seeking a new treaty to take the place of the one last mentioned, which subsequently became the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty now in force, we repeatedly declared in a most unequivocal and solemn manner that we sought no special privileges for American ships, but intended to treat the ships of Great Britain and the United States, as well as all other nations, on equal terms.

When the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty was under consideration, by the Senate in executive session, it was proposed to insert a clause giving the United States the right to exempt her coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls. This proposed amendment was defeated by a large vote in the Senate, and many of the Senators who were then present have said that in their judgment the reason the amendment was defeated was because it was believed to be inconsistent with the understanding then existing that the ships of both nations would be treated on equal terms. If this be true, it would show conclusively that in adopting the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, without the amendment, the Senate believed itself to be binding the United States to treat her vessels on equal terms with the vessels of all other nations.

There are some Senators who claim that the amendment was rejected because it was thought unnecessary; that in any event the United States would have the right to exempt her coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls, if she saw fit to do so. The weight of opinion, however, is the other way, and it does not seem reasonable that if it was then believed that we could consistently with our representations to Great Britain exempt our coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls, we would not have done it, as proposed, in terms so clear that there could be no future misunderstanding.

It is difficult to escape the conclusion that the President is right in the admirable stand which he has taken for the repeal of the Panama Canal Act without further delay. The arguments which have been urged against repeal, so far as they attempt to justify the Act, conspicuously fail. Some argue that there is no discrimination, and others attempt to uphold the Act on the theory that "all nations" as used in the treaty means all other nations. As we have seen, neither of these propositions is tenable.

The real obstacle to repeal is the feeling on the part of Senators and Representatives that it would be unpopular. This is due to the fact that thoughtless members of the community, without considering the merits of the question, desire to reject Great Britain's view of the treaty. There are many persons who believe that patriotism consists in asserting a position which it is thought would be to our material interest, without regard to the justice of a claim which may be advanced by another nation. It is the clear duty of those charged with responsibility in connection with this matter not to yield to clamor of this kind, but to do what they know to be their duty, and is only simple justice to another nation, and in fact to all nations, for we have guaranteed that all of them shall have equal treatment in the use of the canal.

If this controversy shall have served to impress upon a greater number of our citizens the lesson that we must regard principles of right and justice before we do our material interest, it will have served a useful purpose, even though it has for a time placed us in a false position before the world.

HERE is an earnest question, "If a man love not the immigrant whom he hath seen, how shall he love the foreigners in other lands whom he hath not seen?"—Evangelical Herald.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF WESTTOWN.

This subject, "The Religious Life of Westtown," shapes itself in my mind under three aspects: first, our religious life as an outsider might gather it observationally from a visit of a few days; second, the real underlying current of life, which one can gather and interpret only feebly at best; third, our duty to the Society at large.

First, the external aspect, briefly summarized. Our imaginary visitor would, at the end of a week's stay among us, label us as a fairly religious community. He would have listened thrice daily to the reading of the Bible, followed by a longer or shorter period of silence, a silence almost invariably genuinely reverent. He might discover that a fair proportion of our boys and girls have a short period of devotion of their own. Twice a week he would find the whole school, in sections of fifteen or twenty, engaged in Bible study—on Fifth-day in oral recitation of memorized selections; on First-day in regular Bible classes for study and discussion. On First and Fifth-days also he would attend our regular meetings for worship, and on First-day evenings the half-hour collections addressed, by prearrangement, by some outside speaker or one of the officers of the School. He would discover two groups of boys, fifteen or more in each, meeting for mutual spiritual development. The officers of the School gather occasionally in devotional meetings of their own, which are open for concerns which any may have for our spiritual welfare. Several of our number are connected with various outside religious interests and movements, a fact which has a very definite reflex influence on the School at large. Thus would our visitor judge us—a fairly religious community.

Second, a closer view. A longer and more intimate knowledge of our religious life does not weaken this judgment. Compared with many schools as to religious activities, we do not, it is admitted, exhibit much of the emotional and demonstrative. But beneath the undemonstrative exterior there is, as I see it, a life that is solid and substantial. That two hundred young people, still under twenty years of age, should gather twice a week in our meeting-room, and, with few of the outward allurements to worship, should sit for an hour in reverence and quietness, not a quietness due to disciplinary compulsion but to a native sense of appreciation of the purpose of worship, indicates a pretty satisfactory basic religious conception, either inherited or acquired; and that there should envelop us at times a very sensible covering of Divine power, due in no little measure to a receptive and responsive attitude of soul on the part of the boys and girls themselves, shows a spiritual capability that is full of promise. One potent reason for this rather gratifying condition is that those who render service in our meetings do so almost invariably under weight of concern, felt by the speaker and recognized by the listeners; visiting ministers come to us because they have a message for Westtown; our teachers who speak do so out of a living concern for our spiritual growth; and we can easily believe that no pupil's voice is heard in our meetings except as a result of a long wrestling of spirit, out of which he is emerging with a very definite sense of a drawing to service.

In no spirit of boasting, then, but rather of gratitude, it can truthfully be said that our student body has a good intuitive conception of the mea-uring of the spiritual life, and a well-defined appreciation of the reality of the voice of God.

That there also is a strong spirit of mutual helpfulness among our students impresses me. A goodly number of our boys interest themselves, in some younger pupil, or one who finds it hard to "fit in," or one who is going wrong. I have been surprised at the number of boys who come to various teachers with a concern for some other boy or with some proposition in mind which bears on the welfare of the School. The evidence of a genuine interest in one's fellows and of a conception of the spirit of Christ, working itself out, it may be unconsciously, in practical Christian service, is most gratifying.

I am not sure but that, in this connection, we suffer from isolation, and from a somewhat self-centered and self-contained life. Were we situated in a large, active Friends' community, whose meetings for worship we attended, losing thus the element of a school collection, which is now too apparent, merging our religious life in with theirs, and being swept along irresistibly on the current of their greater activities and broader interests, it would without doubt quicken our spiritual pulse. There is, of course, ample opportunity for helpful service within the School; but so nearly do we constitute one large family that after all it savors of service spent by ourselves on ourselves. The broader, altruistic, self-sacrificing motive is not always in evidence. If there were some special religious activity around which our interests rallied, something for which Westtown stood specifically responsible—a neighboring mission school, or the support of some foreign missionary worker—our religion might gain in vitality and potency. Young people are by nature hero-worshippers; they admire the man who has "done things;" the lecturer who comes to us with a reputation of having accomplished some noteworthy achievement in the world is always sure of close attention. I am not sure, then, but that we should place greater emphasis on activity, encouraging outward expression of the inward life, idealizing those who, in self-sacrificing devotion to their Master, have accomplished and achieved.

In the third place, I believe that Westtown, in its religious mission, has a profoundly important work. Its environment, its history and traditions, yes, and its very restrictions, lead it, whether it will or no, to a task peculiarly its own. It is none other than this—with mind facing toward the light and with soul open to the truth, to comprehend clearly and to give to the world, by the teaching of voice and pen, by spirit and life, and consecration, through faculty and student body, our interpretation of the spirit of the Quaker message, going back not simply through the traditions of the decades to the source of Quakerism in George Fox, but on back through the centuries to the fountain head of all truth, Christ himself. To Westtown come yearly the successive groups of boys and girls from almost every Yearly Meeting in our country, and often from beyond the seas. They represent every type of Friendly community and every phase of Quaker belief. It is as if Westtown were the heart of our Quaker organism, into which flows regularly from near and distant parts the life-blood of our Society; and whence, under the pressure of our impelling strength, it should again flow out and on, sparkling and clear and life-giving. Westtown's duty and Westtown's opportunity are not toward itself alone, nor simply toward our Yearly Meeting, but to the Society of Friends at large. I know of no school or college with so unique a privilege or so peculiar a fitness for the task. With elderly Friends in our midst, ripe in experience and clear in judgment, occupying important positions in our Society and in closest touch with its work; with younger Friends intensely loyal, open-minded, clear-visioned, willing for service; with a student body alert, vigorous, pliable, yet with positive convictions of its own; with a multitude of supporters, open-handed and loyal—surely, as the young life of our Society, with its variety of belief, and practice, and inheritance, draws in to Westtown year by year to catch our spirit and our life, it ought to find here a positive, thoughtful, vigorous interpretation of a Quakerism that satisfies the cry of a needy world; and so deeply imbued should it be with the reality and power of this life that, at its outgoing from us, it will carry back to our Quaker communities near and far our spirit and our message, not so much to standardize and to unify as to vitalize and upbuild. GEORGE L. JONES.

DOUBTLESS thou hast had accounts of my weak state of health; I am indeed again reduced very low, but I see it is my place to be quiet and patient, which is the petition of my spirit more often than the day. Subjection of the will, and the reduction of all that is contrary to the righteous law of Christ, however secret it may be, is the work and end of pure religion in the soul; whatever our name, situation or rank in life.

EDITORIAL IN "THE OLNEY CURRENT," FOURTH MONTH, 1914.

One of the reasons given why the School should take up the subject of industrial training is that in our present-day civilization the home as a training place for the growing child has lost its former importance on account of the changed manner of our life to-day as compared with what it was a generation or two ago, and has become so lacking in some of the most important matters of training, like housekeeping, manual training, etc., and in many cases even in moral and religious training, that if our race is to still progress the School must more and more assume these functions that formerly belonged to the home. Taking it for granted that these things are so, and the writer believes that in a measure they are true, it does seem on the surface of things that it is a deplorable condition into which our civilization is falling, if the home and the home life is to lose its very important place in the life of the child. That we have to bring up our children like chickens are brought up in a brooder is not pleasing to the thoughtful. Is it not within the province of Friends to check this tendency away from the home as much as possible? It is no doubt true that our modern system of industry, even in farming communities, is forcing a different condition on us and that Friends have to fall into the same condition as the world around them seems inevitable, especially in places like Philadelphia, but it is also true even here in the country communities of Ohio that the pressure is felt, and from time to time we are urged to introduce this and that new thing into the curriculum of our already overloaded schools. And while the first thought is one of discouragement at the condition things are taking, a second thought reveals a wonderful opportunity, the like of which has seldom been vouchsafed to the people of any other age of the world. The common brotherhood of all of us will perhaps be understood better as we grow to have a common interest in the children in the public school, in the university and the college; that is, when we begin to realize the very important place the school has to play, we will see to it, more than we now do, that our neighbors' children are what they should be for the sake of our own, and thus will grow that feeling of brotherhood mentioned. If the school and the college can be made the proper training ground for the race in all the things that the age demands of them, if we can be made to feel in a very real sense how much we are becoming in these days our brother's keeper, then will the knowledge of the Lord cover the land as the waters cover the sea.

In all of this work we as Friends must hold our own if we are to live up to the best traditions of our past. Never before since the early days of our Society has there been such a demand for the simplicity of the true Friend, never before has there been felt such a need for these things by the thoughtful of the outsiders, and the spirit of brotherly love that is manifested when we go amongst them is touching in the extreme. It would seem that somebody with the authority like the Yearly Meeting's Educational Committee might carefully investigate the prevailing conditions in our home life, and in what respects it is failing and in what ways the schools are also failing to meet these deficiencies of the home. That there are such deficiencies on both sides needs no proof here now. It might be a great help both to the home and the school to know the things that such a body would discover. Home life might be made nobler, purer; school life truer to the great ideals of educational effort. To jump blindly into what for a better name is called the new education, without proper investigation, may bring on us more woes than the plagues of Egypt. All agree there is need of some changes both in the school and home. Let us have more real light thrown on the situation, the demand both of the concerned parent and the concerned teacher. We would like to see in these pages articles from both parents and teachers telling in what ways they think the home is failing and in what ways the school is deficient, and how these conditions may be improved.

"I LISTEN FOR THE COMING OF HIS FEET."

On one of those last sad days of my precious Elizabeth's life, after her severe stroke, as she lay moaning her life away, I thought to allay her pain, or call her attention from it, by reciting a little poem, which we had together learned, "The Coming of His Feet," the last verse of which was:

"He is coming. Oh, my spirit! with His everlasting peace,
With His blessedness, immortal and complete,
His coming. Oh, my spirit! and His coming brings peace,
I listen for the coming of His feet!"

As I came to the last line, the dear sufferer joined with me, finishing the line, then repeated it again and again.

"I listen for the coming of His feet."

These being, I believe, the last words she uttered,

Yes, dear heart! thy ears have listened
For the coming of His feet!
Night and morning, late and early,
In the home and on the street!

Turning from the stir and tumult
Of the busy world away!
Oft thy ears have heard the trailing
Of His garments by the way

In the gloaming of the evening
And in labor's glad success,
Like a footfall of the angels
Comes the whisper of His peace.

When the dawning of the morning
Breaks upon the eastern hills,
And the glory of the sunrise
All the heart with rapture fills,

Then thy ears have caught the music
Of the coming of His feet!
With a soft and gentle rhythm,
With a melody complete!

But to-day the nearer footfall
Of His blessed feet we hear,
Drawing nearer, ever nearer,
But it brings to thee no fear!

And as morning breaks, we gather
At thy side, where, still and sweet,
Thou dear sufferer, still art waiting
For the coming of His feet!

They have come! the eternal morning
Breaks for thee, a blessed boon!
And we'll list, a little longer,
For His feet are coming soon!

DAMASCUS, OHIO, Second Month 6, 1911.

BEING favored to feel some liveness of spirit, and interest in those things which make for peace, I earnestly desire the increase of spirituality among all professing Christians; that we may manifest of a truth, that we believe in God and in Jesus Christ whom He hath sent. To experience the change from nature unto grace, is more to be desired than kingdoms; and it is worth enduring conflicts and distress, to know realized in ourselves; and if so might be, to prepare us, to strengthen, help and encourage other burdened souls.

THE nature of silent waiting, for the renewal of our spiritual strength, was a little explained; it is but little understood, among Christian professors; and to be fully so, its incalculable benefits must be, in some degree, experienced.

THE SPIRIT OF THE DISCIPLINE.

(SHOWN BY EXTRACTS FROM OLD AND NEW EDITIONS.)

BY EDITH SHARPLESS.

Our Discipline is a subject in which I am glad to know many of our younger members manifest much interest. Its beginning and development doubtless have been treated amongst you, but there are parts, perhaps, that can yet be reviewed and not become burdensome.

George Fox at different times wrote Epistles to Friends advising them regarding many particulars; from these the body of our Discipline was formed. Quotations from some of these and from our own present Book of Discipline, show the concern of the living members for the help and preservation of Friends. Quoting from the Institution of the Discipline. "Scarcely had those who embraced the Christian principles promulgated by George Fox and his co-workers, been recognized, as a distinct body of professors, ere occasions arose in which the exercise of a brotherly care over each other became necessary."

In those days, when the faithful were so severely persecuted, many in certain parts were brought into suffering, while in other parts it was not so severe. It seldom happened, however, that the storm fell with equal violence on all parts at once; sometimes it was severe in one county, while others adjoining it would be comparatively exempt, so that some were mostly in a condition to extend help to the sufferers. None appeared to regard what they had as their own exclusively, but as a trust for the general benefit of all, to be freely applied in relieving the wants of their more destitute brethren. The history of the Society at that period furnishes numerous examples of disinterested affection and self-devotion on which the mind delights to dwell. The exercise of the spirit of kindness and accommodation towards each other established a habit of benevolence, which showed itself in their conduct towards others and became proverbial. It was from this source that the first meetings for the affairs of the Church originated.

That we may have a glimpse of the love and zeal of these early Friends, we will quote from George Fox regarding one of these meetings held in 1660:—

"From Warnsworth I passed in the Lord's power to Barton Abbey where I had a great meeting and thence to Thomas Taylor's and so to Skipton, where there was a general meeting of men Friends out of many counties concerning the affairs of the Church. . . . To this meeting came many Friends out of most parts of the nation, for it was about business relating to the Church, both in this nation and beyond the seas. Several years before when I was in the north I was moved to recommend the setting up of this meeting for that service, for many Friends suffered in divers parts of the nation, their goods were taken from them contrary to law, and they understood not how to help themselves or where to seek redress.

"But after this meeting was set up, several Friends who had been magistrates, and others who understood something of the law, came thither and were able to inform Friends and to assist them in gathering up the sufferings that they might be laid before the justices, judges or parliament. This meeting had stood several years and divers justices, judges and captains had come to break it up; but when they understood the business Friends had met about, and saw their books and accounts of collections for the relief of the poor, how we took care, one county to help another and to help our Friends beyond the seas, and provide for our poor that none of them should be chargeable to their parishes, etc., the justices and officers confessed we did their work; they passed away peaceably and lovingly, commending Friends' practice. Sometimes there would come two hundred of the poor of other people, and wait till the meeting was done (for all the county knew we met about the poor) and after the meeting Friends would send to the bakers for bread, and give each one of these poor people a loaf, how many soever there were of them, for we were taught to 'do good unto all; though especially to the household of faith.'"

It appears from the preceding account of the meeting at Skipton, to have been with our Society as it had been with the primitive church, that the care and provision for its poor members was amongst the earliest occasions of disciplinary arrangements. A second and perhaps contemporaneous object of the meetings for the discipline of the Society, was the obtaining of redress for those illegally prosecuted or imprisoned, as also appears from the extract relative to the meeting at Skipton.

Our Discipline contains much valuable counsel and advice, some of which may be brought before us in the order of the Queries, which are all read and answered in our meetings yearly.

First, Regarding religious meetings, "We exhort all to a Christian zeal for the performance of worship of Almighty God, and as we are not capable in our own strength to perform this great duty, we recommend to a diligent waiting in true silence and retirement of mind for the renewed sense of the inward power and virtue of His spirit whereby alone we can be qualified to worship Him in an acceptable manner."

"Let our faithfulness and sincerity herein appear by the humility, meekness and circumspection of our lives and conversation, adorning the doctrines and principles of Truth, as declared by Christ and his apostles;" also "that Friends be careful to encourage their children and those under their charge in this important duty, believing this practice would do more for us and them than any outward acquisition of wealth, and without doubt some of these who have been placed under our direction, may with thankfulness have to view our pious care in taking them from worldly business to seek a city eternal in the heavens."

George Fox advises on this subject, "Friends meet together, waiting upon the Lord, that nothing but His life may reign among you, and that you may grow up in love and wisdom. All of you wait in the measure of the grace of God received, that by it your minds may be guided up to God.

"The anointing of the mental vision, to behold the excellency of inward spiritual worship; and the goodness of the Lord in giving us faith to sit down in silence, depending wholly upon the Shepherd of the sheep to feed his flock, are among the unspeakable favors for which we must give an account. We do not doubt there are many who would rejoice to be liberated from the bondage of human ordinations and to receive the same precious confidence in the immediate teachings of the great Minister of the sanctuary, waiting for the bubblings up of the waters of life with which He refreshes the thirsty soul. For the gifts conferred on us our responsibility is great, and the desire has been felt that we may not suffer the things of the world to deter us from the steady and right performance of the duty of public worship."

"And it is advised that such as come late to meetings, or when there fall asleep or otherwise demean themselves unbecomingly our holy profession, on those solemn occasions, be tenderly and seasonably admonished." "Also where a drowsy spirit appears upon any of the members in our religious meetings, there should be caution used in employing such in the weighty services of the Discipline."

A MISSIONARY in Nvassaland, traveling in a distant part of his field, where no European preacher had yet been, found that a negro boy passing that way on business had told the Gospel so effectively that the people had built a wooden church in which to worship God. "And how do you worship Him?" said the missionary. "We just come together on every Seventh-day," was the reply, "and sit down in the House of God, and there we wait before Him and are quite silent. We have no one to read to us or teach us, and we do not know how to pray, so we just sit still, and we think that the great God will see us, and He will say, 'There are some people who have no one to teach them, and who want the Word,' and perhaps He will send us a teacher."—*Copied from Our Missions, by E. YOUNGER FRIENDS.

WILLIE'S WILL.

A TRUE INCIDENT.

Clear brown eyes whose wistful wonder
Lifts to mine, long lashes, under Which the thought awakes from slumber

And the rosy healthful shining
Of the cheeks, whose dimpled smiling
Shows a child above repining.

Yet my Willie, tired with pleasure,
Comes at even, seeking leisure
From the books above his measure.

Droops his tangled curls down slowly
On my knee—then speaking lowly Whispers, "Mother, God so Holy

"Might, some day, call me to Heaven,
I'm a big boy, nearly seven;
Cousin Walter was eleven;

"When he died. Life is a vapor
You have told me. Now some paper
And your pretty wax and taper.

"Make a will for me, dear mother,
All in writing, just like other
People do; my top to brother;

"Cousin May likes my red flower,
Little Frank the wind-mill tower."
Thus his words come in a shower.

Ah! my heart aches silently
At his prattle flowing free,
And the thought of what might be.

From his brow I stroke the tresses,
Tighter clasp the hand that presses.
That his earnestness confesses.

While I see, far off, a vision
Of a time when full fruition
May be changed to sad submission.

Gaze into his eyes, and falter
"Oh, my darling! let me alter
Your bequest, but do not stir

"Till you tell me, what dear token
Will be mine, what gift unspoken
Is for me, when life is broken?"

Quick revulsion, sudden feeling
Shadows all his face, revealing
Tenderness beyond concealing,

As he answers, "None! I knew
Nothing need be left for you,
When I die, you will die too."

(This boy, now grown to manhood, still lives to gladden his mother.)

HANNAH P. MORRIS.

business is a confused memory, but the "concerns" aroused by the queries and reports, etc., remain. The second Query brought forth the beautiful quotation from Matt. 5: "Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar and go thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." Each one who thinks of the meaning of this Query feels a sense of guilt in regard to unkind gossiping. There is an unconscious answering in the heart of each one who listens to these Queries. They cannot but mean something as year after year we hear them read and answered. The concern which arose second-day in regard to the young children, helped many of them to realize that they are included in the heart of the meeting, even if they do not take an active part.

The letters of encouragement written to the young Friends at college give courage to more than those at college. Many of the summer-resort meetings are helping young people to find themselves. The lack of formality of a meeting in a home often makes the younger persons feel the responsibility more keenly.

The telegram sent to President Wilson made us feel how vital the Friendly principles of peace are.

No less important was the message sent to the legislators, referring to the National Constitutional Prohibition Amendment. Old and young were asked to impress this message by personal letters to their state Representatives in Congress. This action cannot help but stimulate the local temperance organizations.

Perhaps the subject which aroused the keenest interest, among the young people out of school, was the one referred to as gambling. Often the extreme views of some who speak arouse antagonism, which makes some impervious to persuasion or conviction; nevertheless, the sweet powerful concern of others is not without its results. It sets some to thinking. May we not hope it will be with those who play for prizes, as it was with Wm. Penn and his sword? He wore it with an open mind and with a desire to know what was right, and when he realized it was not right for him to wear it, he was not afraid of the jests of his friends and took it off. A Friend referring to this subject spoke of the parable of the blind man who first saw "men as trees walking," but, after Christ's second touch, saw clearly. Could it not be the duty of those who enjoy the privilege of "seeing clearly" to do as the friends of this poor blind man—beseech Jesus to touch, even twice, the eyes of those who are leading and those who are following?—perhaps to ask more, even, that their lives may be so filled with Him that they will not have the desire for or pleasure in unprofitable pastimes. Two books treating this subject were mentioned: S. D. Gordon's "Quiet Talks on Personal Problems," and Biederwolf's "Christianity and Amusements."

The testimonies from those in the meeting as well as the memorials of deceased Friends show how worth while and far-reaching a good example and a useful life are.

It is impossible to give a complete outline of Yearly Meeting, but there is a common cause for thankfulness with us all, I think. There was a spirit which pervaded the entire meeting, one which made us bear and forbear, and realize that other opinions may be just as right as ours. This humility and sweetness, which drives out dissension, we cannot help but feel is a gift from our Heavenly Father to our meeting. Let us all (we cannot start too young) strive to realize this gift, and be in our later years the blessing to our families, friends, neighborhoods and meetings that some of His special instruments are to our meeting, who, with their spiritual insight, pour oil on troubled waters and lead us into peaceful paths.

YEARLY MEETING AFTERTHOUGHTS.—What are the little children, who come with their parents, and the school children, who are one stage older, taking home with them this year? With most of them only an impression, but it is a beginning. Even with the older ones the regular routine

"I WILL NOT LEAVE YOU DESOLATE."

A MEDITATION.

Sometimes a declaration like this comes home to the heart, as though personally addressed to one by the Divine Speaker.

This saying of our Saviour, so consoling and encouraging as it is, may possibly catch the eye at a juncture when all within is depression and perplexity.

Then—perhaps in a moment, through the infinite goodness of God—the troubled soul may find itself visited, cheered, enlightened, and glowing with a sense of our loving Lord, fulfilling His promise even now.

We can readily call to mind the memorable occasion on which these gracious words were uttered, and we can realize, to some extent, the "desolation"—as of "orphans"—which was about to overtake the company to whom Christ addressed them.

On that Gethsemane evening, when Judas had withdrawn into the night, our Lord seems to have expressed Himself with an added dignity; announcing His glory as "The Son of Man," speaking of God as being glorified by Him, and of Himself as shortly to be glorified by God.

At that supreme moment of exalted contemplation, the eleven men before Him seemed but as "little children"—and as children, in some respects, they might then have been regarded—in their spiritual life but recently begun,—in their knowledge of Divine truth; of Himself; His power; His purposes; His unparalleled destiny. In all these things they were as yet but children, as well as in their characteristic impulsiveness, and, in common with us all, their absolute dependence upon the Lord Almighty for every breath they drew.

So now, the voice of Him who had invited the young children to His arms was heard by these eleven men, addressing them also as "little children" in descending love, as though to inspire them with renewed affection and confidence in Himself; notwithstanding the portentous prospect which He soon began to uphold, as He told them of the mournful parting which—all unsuspected by themselves—as already nigh at hand.

"Little children," He said, "yet a little while I am with you." Then came further allusion to their impending separation, accompanied by loving commands, while an ever-growing feeling of apprehension, on the part of the disciples, led to question after question, which met with veiled replies from our Lord, who, at length, gave forth a personal prediction so startling and so sad that, to calm them after it, He exclaimed, "Let not your hearts be troubled," and encouraged them to higher hope in, and expectations from, Himself.

Then followed yet more questions with answers from Him no longer veiled, but many of them "precious and exceeding great promises," which were triumphantly recalled by Peter, afterwards, as "granted unto us," that by means of them we "may become partakers of the Divine Nature."

Promise followed promise, and revelations of the profoundest truth, as He claimed their loving obedience and faith, holding forth to their view the magnificent results that should follow their continued fidelity to Him.

At length, perceiving them still oppressed with the gloom cast over their spirits by His mysterious foreshadowings, and to encourage their hope in Him, He sweetly said:

"I will not leave you desolate, I come unto you." And we well know how wondrously and graciously He made good His guarantee.

Is it not true that in His "coming unto" us is involved the fulfillment of all His promises, and do not they all belong to those who "let themselves be led" by Him—to "any man" who fulfils the conditions of discipleship: "If a man love Me he will keep My word, and My Father will love him, and We will come unto him and make Our abode with him." "He that loveth Me shall be loved of My Father, and I will love him and will manifest Myself to him."

May we not ask, Is not this love, this manifestation, all-sufficient? Does He not manifest Himself to us as our Light, our Guide, our Helper? As our Spiritual life, our Wisdom, our Strength? Indeed He surely does.

"If a man love Me"—perhaps here we might remember that, as no doubt many of us are aware, the form of expression used by our Lord implies: If a man continually loves—feels an unceasing flow of affection to Me; and similarly, "He that believeth" conveys, by the same form, the notion of incessant trust, unwavering confidence.

But is not the most wonderful promise of all undoubtedly this: "He that believeth on Me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater than these shall he do; because I go to the Father." Who can measure the full content, the profound significance of such promises as these? How very much more in them there is than meets the eye. May we not yield, for a moment, to our feelings and exclaim: "Oh! what a marvelous recompense is this for 'leaning' on the bosom of our Lord!"

The thought occurs that possibly in some mind the recollection may arise of occasions when one might truly say: "My lot is that of the desolate." At such a time, it may be, that one is suddenly confronted with some vicissitude or crisis in which immediate and decisive action is absolutely necessary. Yet with us all is uncertainty and indecision, every way closed up. We know not what to do. Time presses, and yet there seems no way, no light, no one to ask, no one to help. At last He who "will not leave us desolate" comes into our mind, and when, in the very height of our silent longing, we kneel to Him for help, He has pity upon us, and shines upon the path that we must take; so that in His light we can walk with confidence and a joy all the greater for the depth of our previous distress.

Circumstances of another kind, however, may present more serious conditions; when, for instance, through carelessness our treatment of Him is quite unworthy. Or we fall into some dereliction of known duty, or even into actual delinquency, whereby our spiritual life in numb, if not absolutely paralyzed. And though, for awhile, all seems to go smoothly and well, the tendency is to drift still further astray, until—with something like a shock—we awake to the discovery that He is gone! That has taken place which Isaac Pennington calls "the withdrawing of the life and sweet presence of God from the soul."

A thick cloud has choked the light of our existence. Things drag on heartlessly, miserably, and perhaps go seriously wrong. Then come fears and nervousness. "The Peace of God" hath given place to irritability and confusion. The Earthly hath hid the Heavenly entirely from our sight. "The darkness deepens." Should He who will not "leave us desolate" then come into our mind, how needful at once to catch at the relief, though ashamed in His presence, and humbled low in the dust before the Divine Majesty, before the offended Love.

There—what can we possibly feel, but that contrition which is due? and how happy it is for us if then, through Faith in our Redeeming Lord, the joy of forgiveness is ours.

J. S. K.

CRITICIZING WITHOUT JUDGING.—We all of us have to use our brains and judgment under certain circumstances in forming an estimate of our fellow-men. It may be a positive duty to know what others' weaknesses are, as well as wherein their strength lies. Yet we are told plainly in the Scriptures not to judge others. What, then, are we to do about it? A Missouri reader seeks light on this practical problem as she asks: "When does 'criticism' become 'judging' or what is the difference between these?"

We have no right to condemn others. Judgment, in the sense of condemnation of the individual life, belongs to God, not to men. "Judge not, that ye be not judged," says our Lord. "Who art thou that judgest thy neighbor?" asks James. Only God is competent to pass judgment, as meaning condemnation, upon the lives of men. We may safely leave this to him; we may never safely take it as individuals into our own hands. The sentence of a judge on the bench is another matter; he is there to express the law of the commonwealth as related to the legal offenders who are brought before him. But he can do this as the representative of the law, while at the same time refraining as an individual from judging the person who is before him.

Criticism, in the best sense of the term, is a consideration of the qualities, the strength and the weakness of that which is before us; and it can be exercised without condemnation of an individual, even when weakness is revealed.

In their root meaning, the words criticism and judgment are practically the same; either one may stand for a wrong action or a right action. But as distinguished in the ways suggested, one may criticize without judging; that is, he may form a discerning estimate of the strength or the weakness of an individual, or of the qualities of the actions of that individual, without assuming to condemn the individual. Thus there are other Scripture passages that recognize or enjoin judging as a duty; but so far as judging in this life is concerned, they may evidently be understood as referring to the forming of estimates rather than the condemning of a life.

Only the spirit of love can hold us true in this distinction. One in whom the love of Christ abounds is kept by the power of Christ from the sin of judging his fellows even while discharging the duty, when it is laid upon him, of forming an estimate of their work or actions.—From the Sunday School Times.

[The following communication from Salem Quarterly Meeting, Ohio, shows that our neighbors are alive in the Peace Cause.—Eds.]

Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and William J. Bryan, Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIENDS: It is with feelings of keen appreciation that we have noticed your earnest efforts to preserve peace between the United States and Mexico, and your expressions of sorrow for the lives sacrificed in the occupation of Vera Cruz; and we are craving Divine guidance for you in the trying and strained relations existing between the two countries.

We desire that you may be strengthened to uphold the cause of the Prince of Peace and that your attitude as the President and Secretary of State of a great and enlightened nation, may continue to further the cause of world peace and thus redound to the glory of God.

Signed by direction of Salem Quarterly Meeting of Friends, held at Salem, Columbiana Co., Ohio, the Ninth of Fifth Month, 1914.

NEWS ITEMS.

JESSE EDGERTON recently obtained a minute from Salem Quarterly Meeting, Ohio, to attend New England and Canada Yearly Meetings, and the meetings composing them, and, if way opens, some other service within their borders; also the school for Indian children at Tusnessu, N.Y.

Ethel Fowler was also liberated by the same meeting to attend New England Yearly Meeting.

Under authority of a Committee appointed by Concord Quarterly Meeting, a meeting for Divine Worship is appointed to be held in the M. E. Church, Glen Mills, Pa., on First-day afternoon, Fifth Month 31st, at 3:30 o'clock. All interested are invited.

ABBARILLA COWGILL, whose death was noticed in our last number, was some years ago active in religious service with her husband, Eli Cowgill. In 1876 they attended London and Dublin Yearly Meetings and had service in Scotland, Denmark and Norway, being absent from home three years.

Eli Cowgill died in 1894. Since then Abbarilla Cowgill was not called to any extensive service, although she continued a faithful ambassador of her Lord Jesus.

The fig tree and the other trees are putting forth leaves and shooting forth. Summer, therefore, is drawing near. In the light of these things no Christian should be indifferent to the study of the prophetic Scriptures, which constitute so large a portion of the Bible which God has given us to read, and from which to gain instruction about His great plan for His church and people. It is our desire to help every person who wants help on this line.—The Friends' Minister.

ON Third Month 29th, we recorded the fact of the presentation, on the 12th, of the Meeting for Sufferings memorial on the Defence Act to the Australian Premier and the Minister for Defence. From details now to hand we learn that the deputation included William Cooper, who headed it in the absence of Alfred H. Brown, Indiana Pearson, Ina Allen, Thomas B. Robson, Frederick Coleman, Joseph B. Howe, Charles E. Howe, Christopher Flynn and Frank A. Erskine. In reply to the Premier's criticism of the reference to the imprisonment as criminals of boys with conscientious objections, the cases of Sydney Croeland and Douglas Allen (whose mother was in the deputation) were cited. As indicated in the previous note, Ministers gave little hope of alleviation, and their attitude to the deputation certainly suggests that unless the law can be altered through a change of public opinion, very difficult times lie ahead of Friends with young families in Australia.—The Friend (London).

ON Fourth Month 23rd, T. C. Gregory, of Bristol, met on arrival at Avonmouth from New Zealand, H. Worrall and his wife, parents of J. K. Worrall, a leading Passive-Resistor in Christchurch who has endured gold and imprisonment on Ripa Island for his peace principles. In course of conversation, he writes, "H. Worrall had particular emphasis upon the right attitude towards the Defence Act—namely, that no sort of Alternative service should be entertained for one moment, as by recognizing alternative service, the right of Government to demand compulsory military service was thereby admitted, and such right should not be acknowledged in any way whatsoever."—The Friend (London).

The connection between the wealthy Quaker merchant, Benjamin Furlf and John Locke, the famous philosopher, is illustrated in the current Journal of the Friends' Historical Society. It is suggested that Locke had the rim of Furlf's remarkable library of over 4,000 volumes, sold in 1714 at Rotterdam for the sum of £7,638 19s. An interesting letter of Locke's written to two women Friends in 1699 is quoted from the Annual Monitor of 1828, in which it was stated that Locke, in company with King William III (imbecile), had previously attended a meeting of Friends in London. The last paragraph has its bearing on present-day controversies. "Women, indeed," he wrote, "had the honor first to publish the resurrection of the God of love, why not again the resurrection of the spirit of Love? And let all the disciples of our Lord rejoice therein as does your partner John Locke."—The Friend (London).

A TEACHER'S encouragement is suggested in the article on "The End of Education" by Christofer G. Nash in the new Our Missions. He quotes from the essay of a boy who had been studying the life of Livingstone. At home and at other schools previously this lad had grown up in an atmosphere of warlike sentiment and the direct inculcation of Peace principles had seemed to produce little effect. Now he wrote of Livingstone, "His love to Christ was very great; always he used to depend on Him and not on his 'own strength.'" "He is more famous than generals are, although he did not attack or invade one fortress and take it like Napoleon; but he fought a good fight in which he took his renown, and his fight was for Christ and for humans. . . . In his fight he averted bloodshed."—The Friend (London).

"THE SUFFERINGS AND THE GLORY" is the title of a new volume of addresses delivered at Woodbrooke by Rendel Harris, just published by Headley Brothers. The volume is dedicated by the author to Isaac and Mary Snowden Braithwaite, in remembrance of seven years of united service with them at Woodbrooke.—The Friend (London).

WILLIAM LITTLEBOY in Liverpool recently urged steadfast continuance in prayer, in spite of the difficulty of its apparent non-effectiveness, for "it does pay." We should apply ourselves to the practice of the presence of God, and the real presence would impress itself on our consciousness, and we should find ourselves at home with God. The unseen, unfelt presence was always seeking to impress itself on the mind of man. The Quaker message, if adequately presented, would meet a wide response; wherever there were spirits crying for light and liberty, there was the opportunity for the Quaker evangelist.—The Friend (London).

EXTRACTED from letter from Herman H. Sharples, of Calgary, Alberta, Canada, dated Fifth Month 6th, 1914, to George Vaux, Jr.:

"The Society of Friends in Calgary seems to be in a flourishing condition. It is practically just a year ago since Friends first came together and every week they have held a meeting in the home of one of their number. But a month ago some of the Friends thought that the time had come for us to have a little home of our own. (One of our friends) had a garage on their property that they made no use of except as a tool-house, so we have rented that and remodeled it to some extent, and last First-day we had our first gathering in it. We are a mixed body and as yet have not associated with any Monthly Meeting. Many of the Friends are from England or Ireland and do not feel that they can wholly subscribe to the practices endorsed by Young Street Meeting. So until more meetings form in the West I think this gathering will remain unattached. We have about forty attenders here. Since we started Friends have come together both in Winnipeg and Edmonton, but at each of these places they have but about ten attenders. Vancouver has an established Monthly Meeting, but the number of its members I cannot state. I have thought that the above might be of interest to thee."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated that "Illinois women who for the first time have just voted in township elections in that State have decreed the closing of more than 1,000 saloons outside of Chicago and have added 16 counties to the 30 already dry. Women's votes put 11 of the State's larger cities on the "dry" list and prevented three others which were "dry" from going into the "wet" column."

A despatch from Panama of the 11th inst. says: "The Panama Canal was opened to the traffic of the world to-day without ceremony of any kind."

A despatch from Reading, Pa., of the 11th says: "A shipment of 10,000,000 pike perch, to be planted in Berks and Lehigh streams, arrived in Reading to-day. The fish are known as the Susquehanna salmon."

It was stated from Detroit, Mich., on the 12th: "A heavy rainstorm swept over Michigan and parts of Ohio and Illinois last night and to-day causing large property losses. The rainfall here was 2.36 inches, the heaviest within 24 hours in 42 years; in Bloomington, Ill., the fall was 31.2 inches."

A despatch from New York City of the 14th says: "Wireless telephony, as developed at the Marconi station at the Wanamaker store building, has made it possible for New York to talk to Philadelphia and to steamers at sea. One of the operators in New York City has said: 'Under moderately adverse conditions we should talk 500 miles, and under the worst conditions should always reach Philadelphia.'"

Thomas A. Edison is reported to have lately stated in regard to cigarette-smoking: "The injurious agent in cigarettes comes principally from the burning paper wrapper. The substance thereby formed is called 'acrolein.' It has a violent action on the nerve centers, producing degeneration of the cells of the brain, which is quite rapid among boys. Unlike most narcotics, this degeneration is permanent and uncontrollable. I employ no person who smokes cigarettes."

Wireless telephonic connection for commercial purposes has lately been established between New York and Philadelphia.

It is stated that Board of Health are urging the destruction of the common house fly, which is now known to be a great danger to health. Flies are especially dangerous when they alight on food. Typhoid fever is often conveyed in that way.

FOUNDED.—It is stated that a giant biplane is making daily flights over St. Petersburg and its environs. Carrying 16 persons, the machine has made flights extending over one and a-half hours, and when carrying only the regular crew of eight it has remained in the air for more than two hours.

An earthquake has lately occurred in Sicily, by which many persons have lost their lives. A despatch of the 11th says: "The official estimate of the dead as a result of the recent earthquake which destroyed many villages on the eastern slope of Mount Etna places the number at close to 200. This is said to be the largest percentage ever recorded, considering the smallness of the area affected by the disturbance. On the 15th it was stated that earthquake shocks continue with alarming frequency. Mount Etna is extremely active. A number of the houses weakened by previous shocks have fallen. There have been no fatalities, as the residents of the city and country-side are camped in the open."

A despatch from Panama of the 12th says: "A seven-days' quarantine has been declared against all ports of Columbia, owing to reports indicating that the outbreak of bubonic plague there has become serious."

The latest figures showing the tonnage of the merchant fleets of the principal maritime powers prove that Great Britain has a tonnage nearly one-third greater than that of all other maritime powers combined. Thus Great Britain possesses 20,275,791 tons; Germany, 4,998,746; United States, 3,489,736; the greater part of which is domestic shipping. Norway has 2,475,323 tons; France, 2,246,504 tons; Japan, 1,700,062, and Italy, 1,571,761.

It was reported from St. Petersburg on the 14th inst.: "A hundred thousand factory employees went on strike here to-day. The strike is an expression of the workers' anger and discontent under the present system of political repression of the labor classes."

It is stated in reference to the new large steamship called the Vaterland, which has lately started from Cuxhaven on its first trip across the Atlantic with 600 passengers: There is no question that the Vaterland embodies every imaginable device for making a transatlantic trip under the most luxurious conditions. Seven and a half million dollars were spent on her and her first-class accommodations are unexcelled by the finest hotel in the world. Her third-class passengers travel in quarters which would have been considered first-class less than a generation ago. Even her stokers work under comparatively pleasant conditions, as the new arrangements for ventilation of the stokehold are working admirably.

Immense deposits of phosphate rock are reported discovered in the northeastern part of Africa. They appear to extend, with some breaks, all the way from the Delta of the Nile to near the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb.

A despatch of the 14th says: "For the first time in the world's history, traffic is now passing through the Panama Canal." A barge service is to be operated on a 12-hour schedule from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which allows about an hour's delay in each of the locks.

NOTICES.

A MEETING to be held at Upper Springfield, N. J., on First-day, Fifth Month 31, at 3 P. M. This meeting has been arranged by the Committee of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting. All interested persons are invited to attend.

NOTICE OF APPOINTED MEETING.—By arrangement of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, an appointed meeting will be held at Greenwich, New Jersey, on First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 7, 1914, at 3.30 P. M. Friends interested are invited to join in this opportunity.

HISTORICAL GLEANINGS.

I.

JAMES MONTGOMERY AND THE FRIENDS IN YORK CASTLE.

It occasionally happens that an interesting bit of history is picked up from an obscure or neglected source, or is fallen upon unexpectedly in the course of one's reading. By some such circumstances the following facts and incidents have come to notice, and they are here presented on the supposition that they may not be too familiar to yield interest to some of the readers of THE FRIEND.

In the latter part of the eighteenth century there lived in the region of Lothersdale, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, a community of Friends who still suffered heavily from ecclesiastical oppression. In the spring of 1795, eight men of the aforesaid group of Friends were taken from their farms and trades, on prosecution by the Vicar of Carlton, and sent to York Castle for non-payment of tithes. Here one of their number, John Wilkinson, died, and a funeral was held in York Meeting-house. Much sympathy was aroused among the people, and it would seem that public opinion had some influence, for the Friends were finally released by Act of Parliament in the autumn of 1797. This release did not free them from the demand for tithes, however, and heavy distrains followed.

During the period of their imprisonment the Friends wished to be employed, and indeed they could ill afford to be idle; so other Friends in Yorkshire raised a relief fund, part of which was laid out in buying a loom for the use of the prisoners. Thus they were able to assist their families. Meetings for worship were held in a room allowed them for the purpose; and others, both prisoners and visitors, met with them. It is related that Ann Tuke once brought to the meeting forty girls from the Friends' school in Castlegate.

Whilst these Friends were confined in the Castle, the poet Montgomery was for a time also a prisoner there (unjustly, to be sure), for having given some political offense through his newspaper, The Sheffield Iris. He became much attached to his Quaker companions, and some years afterward, on the death of Joseph Brown, who had been one of these fellow-prisoners, Montgomery wrote a memorial poem, "Spirit, leave thine house of clay."

In one of his letters written from York Castle, he thus pleasantly describes his situation:

"In this building there are four well-behaved persons, who have lived in the most respectable circles and seen better days; and also eight of the people called Quakers, who are confined for refusing to pay tithes, though they never did nor ever would have resisted the seizure of their property to any amount the rapacious priest required. There are three venerable grey-headed men among them, and the others are very decent and sensible. One of the old Quakers is my principal and my best companion: a very gay, shrewd, cheerful man, with a

MILITARY POMP AND GLORY.

In three at least of our largest cities we have recently had great demonstrations intended to emphasize the side of duty and of service in sacrificing one's life in pursuance of military operations. In Philadelphia much larger numbers of our fellow-citizens filed past the bier of the two soldiers who were laid in state in Independence Hall than were in the famous line on the occasion of Lincoln's funeral in the same place. Of course, the city has grown immensely in the fifty years since then, and any one could easily recognize that the crowd was largely held by the "pomp and circumstance" of the occasion. In the main it was much else besides an expression of commendation of the kind of service rendered by the "boys" who had "fallen so gallantly at Vera Cruz." It should concern us, however, should concern all opponents of war very specially, to remember the great principle of sacrifice involved in the transaction thus celebrated. In the last analysis it is that principle which appeals to intelligent men and women who still believe in war. In our peace work we need to magnify this principle as the very root of civic virtue. Somehow in the development of the world the "game of politics" has come to be regarded as a field in which great rewards are to be won. Even reformers very soon after espousing good causes, seem to be very specially bent in winning place and salary. Men (and women) cannot give up their time and strength without some adequate return, but it is necessary that a way shall be found so that all public service will partake, in much larger measure indeed than military service partakes, of the ennobling spirit of sacrifice. Those who seek public office—those who accept it, must willingly sacrifice something, else the very essence of good citizenship is lacking.

So a military demonstration, which must have been very painful to us in most of its aspects, may be turned to good account if it enables us to restore the lost emphasis on service in all public engagements. "Public office," Wm. Penn said, "is a public trust." In proportion as it is made so the "glamour of military glory" will be eclipsed. For it is surely true that the "sacrifice" involved in war will not bear close scrutiny. It is lacking in the very essence of sacrifice because a gun is aimed at an opposing party.

J. H. B.

heart as honest and as tender as his face is clear and smiling. My time, on the whole, passes away in a smooth and easy manner. I employ myself in reading, writing, walking, etc., and never, on the whole, enjoyed better spirits in my life."

After six months at York Castle, Montgomery was released on bail, and thus had, as he said, "the miserable privilege of being a prisoner at large for two years longer." Yet he must have thought even this condition greatly preferable to that of prisoner in York Castle, and he did not now forget those with whom he had been a companion in bonds. To Henry Wormald, who no doubt was the cheerful, tender-hearted Friend referred to in the letter above, he wrote:

"I have observed with much concern the slow progress of the Bill before the House of Commons in your favour; it is adjourned, and adjourned again, so often and under such trifling pretences, that I do really fear it will never reach the House of Lords. I believe you are prepared for the worst, Henry, and that you are as much resigned as a man and a Christian ought to be under such severe and undeserved calamity. . . . I hope your worthy friends and brethren in misfortune support their spirits and submit to their cruel and infamous fate with their wonted cheerfulness. Remember me most kindly to them all, and assure them of my warm and undiminished friendship."

Surely the Friends in prison could not fail to reciprocate this kindness, affection and esteem. Henry Wormald, it appears, followed the good custom of "ancient Friends," and kept a journal—at least while he was in prison—and the following journal has happily been preserved:

"Seventh Month 5th, 1796.—Went from this place James Montgomery, a very kind and social young man; he was to me a pleasing companion, and he has left a good report behind him. Although he is qualified with good, natural parts, and has had a liberal education, yet he was instructive and kind to me. I think I never had an acquaintance with any one before that was not of my persuasion, with whom I had so much unity. I was troubled and thought it a loss to part with him."

The friendship between these two men continued, presumably through the remaining years of Henry Wormald's life, and letters were occasionally exchanged. Henry was evidently a political sympathizer of his young literary friend, and a patron of The Sheffield Iris; but as physical infirmities came on, his circumstances (already affected by discontents, no doubt) became much impaired, and he finally felt obliged to discontinue his subscription to the paper. On being informed of this condition, Montgomery sent him a five-pound note, desiring him to accept it as it was sent—in the name and for the sake of Him "who though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, and by suffering all the ills of poverty . . . sanctified them to his people."

Allusion has already been made to the death of Joseph Brown and to Montgomery's verses thereupon; but from the "trembling hand" of Henry Wormald there has come down an account which not only describes more clearly the qualities of his departed friend, but reflects his own solid character as well. A short quotation from that account falls rather appropriately into place as a conclusion to this little narration:

"He was a rightly-qualified minister and prophet also; very useful in the discipline of the church, though he did not meddle much except when he was influenced by the Lord's Holy Spirit; a peacemaker amongst his neighbors, and useful to them in many respects. He was also a good example when confined in York Castle on account of tithes, and serviceable to his companions there, administering admonition, advice and counsel, and often had to hand forth a cup of consolation to spirits in prison."

"CALN QUARTERLY MEETING."

One of the impressive features of that gathering on the fifteenth of this month at 10 o'clock was the living silence which seemed to baptize us into sympathy one for another and love for the Church. The messages that came forth from under that baptism were very much united. Christ was lifted up in our midst and the way pointed out for his redeemed and ransomed ones to walk in, "And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon; it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there." (Isaiah, xxxv, 8, 9.) "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." (St. John xii, 32.)

The offices of Christ in the Church conferring his gifts on his people were clearly set forth, "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ." (1 Cor. xii, 12.)

We were called to consider the gifts of ministry, prophecy, healing and teaching; and then the smaller gifts. "For the body is not one member, but many." (1 Cor. xii, 14.) And each gift is helpful to the church. "But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him." (1 Cor. xii, 18.) "And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." (1 Cor. xii, 28.)

We were to cherish the smaller gifts as all were needed to make the whole, and we were led to remember the admonition, "Covet earnestly the best gifts, and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way." (1 Cor. xii, 31.) And then we were encouraged, even though we felt our spiritual poverty, that "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them." (Isaiah xli, 17.)

If some of us went to that small Quarterly Meeting discouraged, we went away feeling that God has not forsaken his people. We were commended unto his unfailing love and care; remembering, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain who build it," but "through Him we can do all things." The "Church" is his care and his burden and he will lift it and help us bear our part as he directs.

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.

A somewhat detailed account of Dublin Yearly Meeting is given in The Friend (London) of Fifth Month 8th. The following abstract is made from that report.

About eighty Friends attended the Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight Fourth Month 29th, and upwards of one hundred were present at the following session. The usual reports indicated that much good work is done by the "Oversight Meetings." A committee was appointed to summarize these reports for the Yearly Meeting. At the Second sitting this summary was adopted. Its conclusion is reported as follows:

"In doing [our work] the great danger is staleness, the great difficulty to keep fresh. As sitting in a closed room tended to make us stupid, lifeless, dull, and letting in fresh air restored our faculties and imparted to us new life, so in the spiritual we needed that breath of life which we gained by contact with Christ, and which if we were faithful might so surround us, that it would accompany us as an atmosphere wherever we were, to the refreshment of others as well as ourselves."

The regular session of the Yearly Meeting, Fourth Month 30th, brought about one hundred and sixty Friends together. Wm. Frederick Bewley was appointed Clerk and Edgar A. Pim and Sarah R. Barcroft assistants. The London epistle and letters from Australia and Pemba were considered at the first session. In the afternoon the American epistles were read. Seven Friends who spoke to them had been in America. They all referred feelingly to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and it was concluded to address a letter to it this year.

The evening session, Sixth-day, gave attention to a letter from Ceylon, approved James G. Douglass as a member of a delegation of young Friends to go from England to America this summer, heard a report on Home Missions and on the work of Meath Place Free Breakfasts.

The subjects of Temperance, The Press and Gambling, and Peace elicited interest and concern on Sixth-day.

At the Sixth-day afternoon and evening sessions, "the State of the Society" was under review. Max I. Reich said he had noticed a tendency to blame the Church for defects in the ministry. But the Church, as a church, was not called upon to minister. Christ, its head, gave gifts to men to use individually. The Church's part was to make provision that the various manifestations of the Divine Spirit might have room to be exercised through the members. The remedy for a dead silence was not a dead activity, but as the members entered into and rested and spoke in the Divine Spirit, the dead silence would become charged by the life of God.

Just at the conclusion of the sitting Joseph and Sarah Elkinton came into the meeting.

The Clerk, in reading the certificate of membership, said the visit was one of much interest. That after so many years we should have amongst us Friends officially representing Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was most gratifying, and the Meeting extended the most hearty welcome to our Friends and their two daughters who accompanied them.

Many Friends expressed concurrence, and the gratification which they felt in this visit.

Joseph Elkinton said that they brought a message of love and warm interest from Friends in Philadelphia. They had lived to see a day better than they had hoped, and they looked forward to the dawning of a better day still. The tide of spiritual life all over the world had been perceptibly rising for some years past. They desired to promote a solidarity of Christian life and spirit and the expression of that life more perfectly. Towards that end we could work, and towards bringing about such a union of spirit that all should rejoice together in Him who is our Saviour and our hope of rest.

The sessions continued until Third-day afternoon. In the morning of that day the proposed epistle to Philadelphia was submitted. The following is the report of this subject:

"The draft of an Epistle to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was read and approved.

"Joseph Elkinton had entered into deep sympathy with the members of Dublin Yearly Meeting in their work. His desire for them and for himself was that all might realize in all efforts, in all intercourse with each other, the seasoning of the heavenly salt. We wanted our Master to be with us, binding us all to Himself and so binding us all to each other in His eternal bond; not resting in present attainment, but growing, the process of sanctification going on from day to day so that our spiritual life might grow stronger, deeper, wider, and more serviceable, enabling us to help our fellows to those higher levels of life to which they were entitled as much as we.

"Sarah Elkinton was very thankful for the cordial welcome they had received. She believed the time was fast approaching when there would be an exchange of 'living epistles' between Dublin and Philadelphia Meetings, expressing that spirit of love and unity which both felt to be binding them together so strongly that though separated by the sea they would feel as though they were meeting together in one room."

THE AUSTRALIAN DEFENCE ACT.

William Cooper, clerk of the General Meeting of Friends in Australia, in reply to an inquiry sent him in hope of receiving information and reply in time for our Yearly Meeting, writes:

"I fear it is not possible to write at any length in reply to thy kind letter of Second Month 2rd, which reached me only two days ago, and so am mailing under separate cover two lists of Prosecutions under the Defence Act issued only this week by the Commonwealth Secretary of the Freedom League. I trust they will come to hand in time for thy purpose, but almost fear that at this late day this is hardly possible.

"It will occur to thee and others reading these documents that not many Friends have been subject to prosecution. Did the authorities rigidly enforce the law there would be many more such prosecutions, but we have good reason to believe that as far as Friends are concerned, whose principles are well known to those (or some of those) in authority, the authorities are turning a blind eye to them. It is possible that some of the prosecutions (of Friends) which have taken place have been due to force of circumstances rather than wilful intent. Be that as it may, no boy (Friend) at our own school at Hobart has been interfered with, and my own boys, of whom I have three coming within the age for training, have been subject so far to no disability; and there are other Friends in like cases. The authorities have gone so far as to say that if Friends would show them a way by which they could be relieved without opening the door to a host of 'shirkers' they would gladly consider it.

"There is undoubtedly a growing dislike to the principles of our Defence Act, but inasmuch as both of our political parties are pledged to it and the press is practically unanimous in its favor, and for the most part quite unwilling to present the other side, it has not been found possible thus far to focus the opposition and make it practically effective. The Freedom League, of whom Friends may be said to be the backbone, are doing all they can by distribution of literature, and by public meetings at street corners, etc., to make facts known and so overcome this one-sided attitude of the papers; but it is hard and continuous labor. The last General Meeting thought that more should be done toward keeping the Quaker position well to the fore and the General Meeting's Committee is now discussing ways and means. It is very cheering and helpful that we have the sympathy, practical assistance, and above all the prayers of Friends all around the world. As yet we look upon ourselves as scarcely in the battle and are disposed to pray that when the time shall come, as it may at any moment, for us to bear our testimony, we may not be unworthy of the great Name we bear."

From the list of prosecutions, the following are selected, the first two being "conscientious objectors." The following show the hardship to other than "conscientious objectors."

SYDNEY SHARP CROSLAND.—S. C. was registered under the Defence Act (Sec. 142). He was medically examined and passed as fit for training and his uniform and equipment were ordered.

S. C. is a Quaker and having a conscientious objection to train as a soldier he refused to drill.

When S. C. was about eighteen he was summoned to appear at the Waratah Police Court (Newcastle, N. S. W.) to answer the following charges:

1. Failing to attend statutory drills.
2. For failing to return to the custody of the Area Officer. (He had been previously convicted for failing to attend drills and having been released from the custody of the Area Officer under whose charge he was ordered to make up his drill, he failed to return to such custody.)
3. For disobeying an officer's command, "Fall in and drill" in such a manner to show wilful defiance of authority.
4. For refusing to be medically examined. (A necessary requirement for transfer to Citizen Forces.)
5. S. C. pleaded conscientious objection to military drill.

The Magistrate said that he believed the objections to be true and considered that S. C. had made his objection in an orderly manner, but he had to enforce the law and convicted S. C. as follows:

- Charge 1. Guilty. £5 and 6s. costs or one month's military detention.
 - Charge 2. Guilty. 20 days' military detention.
 - Charge 3. Withdrawn. (Technical mistake in charge.)
 - Charge 4. 5 and 6s. costs or one month's military detention.
- (The twenty days' sentence to run cumulative with the sentence for Charge 4.)

Thus S. C. was sentenced to fifty-six days' detention in Victoria Barracks, Sydney. The first night he was placed in a cell, in the morning he refused to drill, and so the authorities suggested that he should do office work. This and all other commands given by the military authorities he refused to obey, though he had voluntarily done some work about the tents, etc., but refused to continue same under military command. This state of passive resistance continued for twenty days, when he was released on June 21st without any reason being given. On his release he was summoned on a fresh charge, which was withdrawn on the eve of the trial.

S. C. has since been ordered to report to the office of the Army Medical Corps; this he did, but on being told to turn up for drill he informed the officer that he would not do so.

May 8th, 1913.

WILLIAM INGLE, a Quaker who came out from England recently and settled at Hectorville, near Adelaide, was sentenced and served fourteen days' imprisonment for refusing to allow his son to train under the Defence Act.

On December 8th, 1913, Herbert A. Ingle (15), the son of Wm. Ingle, was sentenced to fifteen days' military detention in Fort Largs.

When sent to Fort Largs Herbert Ingle still refused to drill and gave as his reason that he had a conscientious objection to military drill. One of the officers threatened to strike him with his cane if he refused to drill, and on his still standing out the officer ordered him into cells. He was then taken to Fort Glanville, where he was kept in a cell for two days on a diet of bread and water, being allowed out only to wash his hands and face and for half an hour on the Sunday night.

All there was in the cell was a straw mattress and three blankets.

On December 26th, after the release of young Ingle, William Ingle and the whole family sailed for England.

FRANK GILES OF BROKEN HILL.—Mr. Giles (the father) was fined £100 and put in gaol, but later this conviction was quashed. (S. A. letter, Jan. 29, 1913.)

Frank Giles, the son of Alfred Giles, the well-known Laborite of Broken Hill, refused to drill for conscientious reasons. He was seized at his work and dragged to a court where he was sentenced to fourteen days in the local gaol.

"On making enquiries at the gaol his father was informed that he would be permitted to send his son food during his incarceration, but last night a police officer called at his house and informed him that the permission to send the lad food had been cancelled, and that for the first seven days he would have to subsist on one pound of bread per day and as much water as he cared to drink." (About October, 1912.)

THE GILES CASE. ("Barrier Daily Truth," Tenth Month 15, 1912.)

Resolution by Adelaide I. W. W.

At a meeting of the Adelaide Branch of I. W. W. held on 9th inst., the following resolution was carried unanimously:

"That this meeting of the Adelaide local branch of the Industrial Workers of the World congratulates A. Giles, Jr., on his splendid recognition of working-class solidarity in refusing to allow himself to be trained as a member of the Australian conscript army, and preferring gaol rather than the degradation of a soldier's uniform, and we urge all the sons of working-class parents to follow his example, and thus prevent the foisting of the cause of militarism on the workers of Australia."

F. P. ALBERT PARK. (Before April, 1913.)—This story is a very sad one. The lad was arrested on the street, and taken to Queenslife. His mother had not the slightest knowledge of the summons (the boy having kept that from her) until an officer called and informed her of his arrest. F. AND HIS SISTERS SUPPORT THEIR MOTHER.

The boy suffers much with rheumatism and is consequently often unable to work. At the end of last year, after a very severe drenching with rain whilst working on a roof, he came home ill. The night happened to be a drill night and he went, with the result that he was laid up for weeks afterwards. HE HAS BEEN ILL LATELY AND HAD ONLY RETURNED TO WORK THE DAY HE WAS ARRESTED.

O. M., MELBOURNE.—(Before April, 1913.)—The sentence of this boy to the fortress illustrates not only the tyranny of Conscriptio, but also shows how our magistrates are in the military grip.

The boy had just recovered from an attack of pleurisy, and had forwarded to the military authorities his doctor's certificate of exemption. They said they did not receive it. WHEN THE BOY OPENED HIS MOUTH TO SPEAK THE MAGISTRATE SILENCED HIM.

The lad's parents had not the remotest idea that he would be sent away, and when an officer came and asked that his clothing be sent on, they were dumfounded. This lad is very delicate and has often been warned by his doctor not to go into the night air.

C. M., SOUTH MELBOURNE. (Before April, 1913.)—C. M., who was sent to Queenslife Fortress, shares with his brother in the support of his widowed mother and younger sisters. The family are strongly opposed to military training, and it was only under protest that C. registered. He was employed in a foundry and had to rise at five o'clock in the morning. He found the drills interfered with his day's work and determined he would not go. For this he was sent to Queenslife.

His mother wrote to his employer asking him to keep the job open for the lad when he returned. The employer replied that he could not do so. SO THE LAD WILL BE AMONGST THE UNEMPLOYED ON HIS RELEASE. IN THE MEANWHILE, C.'S MOTHER IS GOING TO WORK TO SUPPORT HERSELF AND FAMILY.

FRIENDS' ASSOCIATED INDIAN COMMITTEE.

The regular annual meeting of the Associated Committee of Friends on Indian affairs met in Philadelphia on the thirteenth and fourteenth of the Fifth Month. The chairman, Edward M. Wistar, presided, and there were present, aside from the Philadelphia Friends, delegates from New England, New York, Baltimore, Indiana, and Western Yearly Meetings. The absence of delegates from several of the Yearly Meetings was much regretted by those present, and a minute was passed suggesting that each Yearly Meeting affiliated with the work be requested to defray the expenses of at least one delegate to the meeting each year.

Hetty B. Garrett, who has served the Committee long and faithfully as Secretary, felt that she must retire from that position, and Susan J. Allen, of Moorestown, N. J., was appointed in her place. Jonathan M. Steere was continued as Treasurer.

The resignation of the Superintendents, William P. and Abigail C. Haworth, who have had general charge for ten years of the mission stations in Oklahoma, was accepted with regret by the Committee and much appreciation was expressed for the faithful and efficient service rendered by these Friends. The resignation, fortunately, will not become effective until next fall.

By the report of the Superintendents it was learned that a total of 1,054 meetings had been held during the year at the ten mission stations, sixty-two Indians had professed conversion, and twenty-one had been received into membership with Friends. More than five thousand family visits had been made by the missionaries and over seven thousand papers distributed. The Treasurer's Report showed that the total amount disbursed in carrying on this important work was $4,488.68.

One of the most interesting activities of the past year was the evangelistic work carried on at some of the missions by Daniel and Jennie Clinton and Elder Blackfish, full-blood Indians. Great good was accomplished by these earnest Christians as they carried the message of the Gospel to their own people.

A special work carried on by certain Friends interested in the work of the Associated Committee has been the support during the past year of a Kickapoo Indian girl at Friends' University at Wichita, Kansas. It is to be hoped that Friends everywhere will get new courage and inspiration for this great work on account of the good progress made during the past year. The Associated Executive Committee on Indian Affairs has been in existence since 1860, and was the outgrowth of a concern for the Indians which arose in several of the eastern Yearly Meetings in 1795. Thus it is an old work committed to our hands by faithful Friends of an earlier day. It is to be hoped that Friends of this generation may be faithful to this great trust.

NOTES FROM ABROAD.

II.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

If one would see New York harbor to advantage the promenade deck of an Atlantic liner affords an excellent opportunity.

Rounding the Battery the "sky-scrapers" of the metropolises were much in evidence and one can but marvel at them. New York always impresses one by its bigness but never quite satisfies me, as somehow one wishes to put a home feeling into it and warm it up with human kindness. There stands the Statue of Liberty in the entrance of the harbor, with its outstretched torch of welcome to the nations—just a trifle lonely. The immigration quarters, on Ellis Island, are among the most interesting in the world, and Edward A. Steiner's books on immigration reveal the real mission of our Republic among the peoples of the earth.

Mary Antin also, in her fascinating autobiography, "The Promised Land," as well as Jacob Riis, in "The Making of an American," give the true view-point from which we may see how our country not only affords an asylum but gives great opportunities for development and usefulness to those who will fully appreciate and use our institutions worthily.

The Cedric backed out of the dock promptly at noon, the 23rd ult. This White Star steamship has twin screws and is the steadiest sea-going vessel we were ever on—during the past forty-eight hours it has not rolled or pitched perceptibly. Our state-rooms are forward on the upper promenade deck, very roomy, with abundance of light and ventilation, so we are very comfortable. The navigating bridge is just in front of our port-holes, so we can watch the captain as he paces to and fro on it. He stands fifty feet above the water and the vessel draws thirty-one feet and has a length of seven hundred feet, with a tonnage over 21,000.

There are about 1,250 persons on board, which is less than its full capacity by 1500. Of these some 450 make up the crew, among whom there is a survivor of the Titanic disaster. At this writing we are one hundred miles due south from the scene of that terrible catastrophe, just two years ago. We have come nine hundred miles directly east from Philadelphia, and will continue on that course another three or four hundred miles to avoid icebergs, and then take a northeasterly course for another thirteen hundred miles. Our friends were exceedingly kind in bidding us "Bon Voyage," and as the day was perfect, both for temperature and sunshine, we felt the starting on our long journey was as propitious as we could wish, and so far our hopes have been fulfilled.

We have all just returned from the dining saloon impressed with the excellence of the food and of the service. The officers and crew are all English, and it was slightly amusing to hear our steward say to F, as we were leaving New York, and conversing about our steamer chairs, which were under the care of another deck steward, "You have heard that George Washington was a great man, but that deck steward is a far greater man than he was." How refreshing to have one man speaking so well of his fellow countryman! It made us feel sure that between the tender mercies of both we shall not be neglected—and we have not been.

The day has been spent in part reading "John Woolman, His Life and Our Times," by W. Teignmouth Shore, and we have contrasted our situation with his, when he took a steerage passage across these mighty waters at this time of year, one hundred and forty-two years ago. His scruples not to encourage any extravagance in furniture or equipment of any kind is needed to-day quite as much as it was in that day. And surely his sympathy for the poor seamen has valuable suggestions for all of us. After several weeks, with high seas and adverse winds, in a suffocating part of the ship, he wrote, "The latter part of the night,"—which he says, "has been a rough, trying one to the poor seamen,"—"as I lay in bed, my mind was humbled under the power of Divine love; and resignedness to the great Creator of the earth and the seas was renewedly wrought in me, and I was now desirous to embrace every opportunity of being inwardly acquainted with the hardships and the difficulties of my fellow-creatures, and to labor in his love for the spreading of pure righteousness on the earth."

We have one hundred and twenty-six first cabin passengers, who have behaved themselves very well so far, and we have seen no evidences of gambling, which was brought to our attention this week in Yearly Meeting, by the Representative Meeting. Since writing the above I have enquired of a ship's official concerning this habit on board and was pleased to learn that at this time there was no gambling, but at the height of the season, with some twenty-five hundred passengers, it was not so easy to control. He gave me the following "Special Notice," handed to every first class passenger: "The attention of the Managers has been called to the fact that certain persons, believed to be professional gamblers, are in the habit of traveling to and fro in Atlantic steamships. In bringing this to the knowledge of travelers, the Managers, while not wishing in the slightest degree to interfere with the freedom of action of the patrons of the White Star Line, desire to invite their assistance in discouraging games of chance, as being likely to afford these individuals special opportunities for taking unfair advantage of others." Thus I think the concern of our Society has borne fruit. Having just made a tour of this steamship, from stem to stern and to the depths of the engine-room, we are much impressed with its outfit.

There are eight engines, with a normal horse-power of 15,000, driving the two shafts, some three hundred feet long and eighteen inches thick, at such speed as to propel this vessel sixteen and one-half knots an hour (nineteen miles.) There are twelve boilers, requiring seventy-five stokers. The stowage was much more comfortable and cleaner than we thought likely and the passengers quite content, as they had plenty of room to walk and suitable food. So the consideration shown those who take passage on these steamships makes one feel a respect for the Management.

Captain Carter is both capable and agreeable and the crew courteous. It cost $3,500,000 to build this craft and it is now on its two hundred and sixty-fourth trip across the Atlantic. The Olympic, with twice its tonnage (45,000) cost twice as much, and the Britannic, with 50,000, will represent $10,000,000. There are some thirty steamships, ranging between the Cedric and Olympic in size, sailing or steaming between the United States and Europe at this time. I have counted more than three hundred and fifty steamships booked for sailing across the Atlantic during this month. We have received three wireless messages from nearby vessels—the Georgic, Oceanic and Baltic—and talked with a large motor oil tank vessel which passed quite close to us at night, signalling by flash light from the mast-top and using the Morse code.

THE source of nearly all the evil and unhappiness of this world is selfishness. We know it; but we still keep on being selfish. We see that the world might be made ideally beautiful if only all people would live unselfish lives; and yet we keep on being selfish. We strive after the things that will minister to our immediate satisfaction, and hate people who get in our way and hinder the attainment of these things. And so we keep on, and the world jars and is unharmonious and is darkened and is miserable; and we wonder why God has not made things more fair, when it is we ourselves who are marring the purpose of God, which we can plainly see.—Selected by W'. C. Allen.

RELIGION IN SOCIAL ACTION.*

The thesis of this readable and sane book is that in the conflict between employer and employé, between capital and labor, a mediator is needed. That mediator, the author declares, is the body of Christian people who, under various titles, is the church.

As mediator the church must co-operate with both sides, must take the initiative, must organize, must educate. He urges that within each denomination there should be an organization to educate its own members that there may be "organized religion to co-operate with the industry of the American people for the peace and progress of our great democracy and for the coming of the 'Kingdom of the Father.'"

He states the problem and proposes the remedy. "It looks as though the industrial world has outgrown our moral sense, as though our ethics are hopelessly belated, for we seem to want to make our profits under the modern method of combining all available resources, while at the same time insisting that our fellow-workers shall deal with us under the old, outworn and discarded system of individual industry."

"Industrial peace should have its victories at the hand of religion no less than war. The cross and its sacrifice, if they are to mean anything in this industrial age, must be translated by religion into terms of industrial conciliation, intercessional mediation and sacrificial service, which will bring the pact of Christ's own peace in human brotherhood out of fratricidal strife.

"Industry has its cross as surely as religion. There is no other way to the crown for either than the passion of sacrificial service. Sacrifice not only for self but for others, is the only way by which either the strong or the weak can be crowned with that equality of opportunity which is the God-given right of manhood. Until industry takes up its cross with the self-sacrificing passion of religion, neither laborer nor capitalist, employé nor employer, can really come into his own. Unless religion transforms its cross into terms of industrial relationships it can never hold its supremacy over human life in our industrial age. Industry and religion must unite if either is to realize its ideal or function in human life. For they are interdependent, and only on the common ground of their community of human interests can they ever bring 'the new heavens and the new earth' which God has promised to man through them."

"The cross of social self-denial is the Christ-man's burden now as ever—now, in some respects, as never before. For there is an ethical tragedy at hand, such as has not tested Christendom since the Reformation; such as did not test it then at a point of such close contact with the people of the whole world. It remains to be seen where the cross-bearing spirit will find the Messianic people—'the servant of Jehovah' to serve the peoples; the community-serving church, therefore the church of the community."

The author of this thought-provoking book is President of the Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy, Resident Warden of Chicago Commons Social Settlement, etc., etc. "Through family residence in the Chicago Commons Settlement, through constructive efforts for Chicago's civic progress," as editor of The Survey and Chicago Daily News, he has learned conditions at first hand and has become intimately acquainted with "all sorts and conditions of men." He speaks and writes therefore as a practical man and not as a theorist.

The author's view of the qualification for religious service will not be accepted by Friends when he says: "Far too much emphasis has been laid upon the invariable necessity of a direct, supernaturally expressed 'call,' such as some of the prophets and the apostles are supposed to have actually heard from heaven."

The book has an introduction by Jane Addams, who, in her cordial approval of the writer and his point of view, con-

THE SPIRIT OF THE DISCIPLINE.

(SHOWN BY EXTRACTS FROM OLD AND NEW EDITIONS.)

BY EDITH SHARPLESS.

Regarding love and unity, "Our Lord Jesus Christ, graciously instructed his followers in the necessity of a strict adherence to His sacred precepts, that growing up in Him in all things, which is the Head, they might be a compact body, edifying itself in love. 'If ye keep my commandments ye shall abide in my love. This is My commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you.' If any go out of this into strife or contention, causing differences, advised that such be timely and tenderly labored with."

Regarding the care of parents over their children, that they might be restrained from the spirit of the world, etc., "The spirit of Truth which led our ancients to lay aside every thing unbecoming the followers of Christ, still leads in the same path all who submit to its guidance."

"Shrink not from the cross of Christ in your garb, language or manners, but through a subjection of your will to the Divine will, in these and all other respects, walk answerably to the purity of our profession and the simplicity and spirituality of our worship, and so be instructive examples to serious inquirers after Truth."

"We also tenderly advise that Friends seriously bear in mind they should be exemplary to others under their care, that they exercise plainness of speech without respect of persons, in all their converse among men, not balking their testimony in a cowardly compliance, and varying their language according to their company, a practice of very ill example, rendering those who use it contemptible and looked upon as a kind of hypocrite even by those with whom they so comply."

"In a day when pernicious publications, also vain and corrupting amusements are multiplying and presenting strong attractions to young and old, we believe the rightly disciplined and exercised parent, will feel the need of restraining the children from access to them, and while he directs their attention to the convicting Grace of Christ Jesus in the heart by which they would see the sinfulness of sin and be led out of it, he would encourage them in the frequent perusal of the Holy Scriptures and the approved writings of faithful men [and women] who have been lights in the Society [and in the world]."

"Being well assured that the edifying practice of frequently collecting our children and families, in order for religious retirement, would be promotive of essential benefit, Friends are exhorted to seek after a right qualification, under which they may be enabled to maintain it, especially on the afternoon of the First-day of the week, in such places where meetings for public worship are not held at that time, the due discharge of which duty and solidly reading the Holy Scriptures and other religious books, with a steady, watchful care over our young people, to discourage their visiting and rambling about on that day and mixing with unprofitable company at this and at other times, would under the Divine blessing be a means of their preservation out of many ensnaring temptations to which they are liable."

"Agreeably with the pure, chaste path which the Truth leads into, Friends advise against the distillation and use of spirituous liquor, etc., and to avoid places of diversion and to keep to true moderation and temperance on all occasions."

"As our time passes swiftly away and our delight ought to be in the law of the Lord, it is advised that a watchful care be exercised over our youth and others to prevent their going to stage plays, horse races, music, dancing or any such vain sports and pastimes, and being concerned in lotteries, wagering or other species of gaming."

"We would renewedly caution all our members against indulging in music, or having instruments of music in their houses, believing that the practice tends to promote a light and vain mind, and to disqualify for the serious thoughtfulness which becomes an accountable being hastening to his final reckoning." It is affectionately recommended that Friends be careful to use moderation at times of marriages, burials and on all other occasions; a departure from which has been a cause of stumbling to many, and a great obstruction to a more full reformation, as well as attended with other evil consequences, tending to obscure that Light which is graciously bestowed and which we should have more abundantly, if greater faithfulness was lived in; lessening that savor which we ought ever carefully to preserve, agreeably to the monition of the holy apostle, 'Let your moderation be known unto all men, the Lord is at hand.' And as the Allseeing Eye beholds our thoughts, and views us in all our ways and actions, what manner of men ought we to be in all godliness of life and sobriety of deportment."

We then come to the Query regarding the care of the poor, that they be relieved or assisted as the cases appear to require and that their children freely partake of learning to fit them for the duties of life.

"By our faithfulness in the care of these, if they improve their opportunities, they may take their places on the stage of life with those who may have been more favored."

"The education of our youth in piety and virtue, and giving them useful learning under the tuition of religious, prudent persons, having for a great number of years engaged the solid attention of this meeting, advices thereon have been from time to time issued to the several subordinate meetings."

"Under a renewed fervent concern for the preservation of our youth, and their advancement in piety and virtue, it is desired that Quarterly Meetings would enter deeply into the important subject of education and promote in the subordinate meetings the establishment of schools to be taught by members of our religious Society, and that a vigilant care be exercised in all such schools to instruct the children in the principles of the Christian religion, and the peculiar testimonies of our religious Society. The daily reading of the Holy Scriptures, and the regular attendance of the scholars at mid-week meeting, where it is practicable, should be enjoined at all our schools." Advices given in relation to the subjects referred to in the Sixth Query are important: "Advised that our Christian testimony be faithfully maintained against the burden and imposition of oaths, according to the express command of Christ, and the injunction of the Apostle James, 'Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shall perform unto the Lord thine oaths, but I say unto you swear not at all,' etc. 'But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by earth, neither by any other oath, but let your yea be yea and your nay be nay, lest ye fall into condemnation.'" This same Query also asks regarding ministry for pay, or at stated times, bearing arms, etc.

"Our early Friends saw in the light of the Lord that no man's talents or learning, nor any human ordination, can constitute any one a minister of Jesus Christ; it requires a special call and qualification dispensed by the Head of the Church to be sanctified members, whom He separates to the work of the ministry, this gift can only be exercised under His putting forth, not in the will, wisdom or time of man, but under the renewed unction of the Holy One, giving authority and supplying with what he is to deliver to others, without money and without price." This is in unison with the counsel of George Fox, viz: "Friends, my desire is that ye may all be preserved in the Lord's power and in His everlasting seed, in the order of the Gospel, and in the government of Jesus Christ, of the increase of which there shall be no end. And that ye may keep up your ancient testimony in the power and spirit of God against tithes and for Christ, your High Priest, against the hireling priests and their temples manifesting that ye are the temples of God."

THE COLORS OF THE SEASONS.

The colors of the springtime
Are delicate and faint,
The blue-skyd violets star the grass
And all the brooklets paint.

The colors of the summer
Are full and rich and fair,
The green trees in the woodland,
The soft, white clouds in air.

The colors of the autumn
Are bright and gay and strong,
The scarlet maple by the pool,
The row of corn-shocks long.

The colors of the winter
Are flat and dry and cold,
The shimmer of the snow-clad slopes,
The sunset's primrose gold.

THE WHITTIER SCHOOL.—A Morning in the Whittier School.
—Down in Virginia, between Old Point Comfort and the town of Hampton, stands the Whittier School, sometimes called "Hampton's little Sister." It is a day-school for colored children, and began life as the Butler School, in an old army barrack, just after the close of the civil war. When this barn-like structure was replaced by the present attractive building, it was re-christened for our own good "Quaker poet."

Here, every Second-day morning, visitors are welcomed by the gentle, grey-haired lady principal, and may see the opening exercises, and afterward visit classes. The "Ezekiel" stories have given the school some fame of late years, and visitors to Hampton Institute generally stop here also. Of course, in some ways it is just like any other school; in others quite different.

The pupils are very interesting—so many shades of color, so many styles of dress. A few years ago, ragged clothing was not uncommon, and many pairs of shoes were ill-matched, or unbuttoned and unlaced. Now tidy dress is much more the rule. Little boys sport large white collars, and little girls have stiff hair bows. Manners are very correct; toes turn out—chins are well up in air.

On the bright spring morning of our last visit, having heard the opening exercises, we were told that they might be repeated during the morning, for a distinguished guest was expected;—no other than Andrew Carnegie—and he would want to hear them.

After an interesting visit to the kindergarten, we went into a class-room with two teachers, and this is not uncommon, for it is here that the Seniors of Hampton Institute get their practice in teaching, and often while one is teaching, another looks on, or "inspects" as they call it. So, in this room a sweet-faced Indian girl was questioning the class, while a tall colored youth in Hampton uniform looked on. And what was the text-book? A doll's bedstead, set up on the teacher's table; for this is a class in bed-making, and the care of sleeping-rooms. A little girl is at work placing the pillows, but there seems to be something wrong, and hands are up, and wildly waving. "What is it, Arthur?" "She didn't shake down de fulness of de piller-case, and fold it under." "Right! Show her how to do it!" "Arthur" is successful with pillows; but fails on turning the coverlet so as to make "a square corner."

Reasons must be given for everything. "Do you tuck your top sheet in tight?" "No?" "Why not?" "Kase, ef you do, you can't get yo' knees up!"

"Why do we leave our bed-room windows wide open?" "Kase, ef we don't de d'seases 'll get in!" (A little mixed, but the right idea.) Boys seem just as much interested as the girls, and when the little bed is finally properly aired and properly made, it looks as trim and daintily as need be!

Upstairs a cooking-class is busy under the direction of a fine-looking negro woman, dressed in spotless white. Half the class are cooking, while the rest are washing the aprons, caps and towels, using soap made from the surplus fat of the cooking, for nothing is wasted here.

We are shown dolls dressed by the youngest girls in sewing class; rag dolls made by the teacher, and dressed as "the young lady;" and "the cook." The "cook" is especially attractive, in a cunning little sunbonnet, and an ample apron, and with a brown face.

A class of boys working in wood and making furniture out of packing boxes; also plaiting corn-husks into horse-collars, used by the farmers, is interesting; and we hear of, but do not see, the "gumption class," which brings together the boys and girls who must work for a part of the day, and yet have "gumption" enough to give their leisure time to lessons. For it must be remembered that the Whittier School children are poor, most of them coming from the outlying cabin homes about Hampton.

But a bell rings, warning us that the famous little Scotchman has arrived, and we hasten again to the Assembly Room. In march the long lines of boys and girls and form in alternating rows across the room; teachers stand behind them, or mount the platform. Dr. Frissell, principal of Hampton, tells them how much Andrew Carnegie has done for them and for their people, and describes his beautiful estate at Skibo, and finally asks him to speak to the children. How earnestly the small dark faces are turned up to this wonderful rich man, who has so much that they have not. And what has he to tell them? Why just what their teachers are telling them every day. That the only true happiness is found in doing something for others, and we are only given what we have, that we may hand it on to whoever needs it more!

And then the children are asked if they cannot sing some Scotch song in his honor, and they bravely try "Flow Gently, Sweet Afton." But it seems so much less natural than the old songs of slavery, which their soft, rich voices make so full of melody. "Oh, Freedom," is one of these, with its solemn chorus:

"Before I'd be a slave,
I'd be buried in my grave,
And go home to my God, an' be free."

Some people tell us that these were the songs of sorrow and oppression and should be allowed to die out, but at Hampton they teach the boys and girls to love them as their own, and, belonging to the history of their race, they do sing them with all their heart.

Looking over the rows of dark heads, across the room to where his pictured face smiled down on the scene, one recalled Whittier's lines:

"For dear the bondman holds his gifts
Of music and of song,
The gold that kindly nature gifts
Amid his sands of wrong."

Whittier also once called this "A Christ-like School." Certainly, in the sense of doing and of teaching service for others, it is so indeed.

"When the last feeble step has been taken,
And the gates of the City appear,
And the beautiful songs of the angels
Flout out to my listening ear,
When all that now seems so mysterious
Will be clear and plain as the day,
Then the toils of the road will seem us nothing
When I get to the end of the way."

NEWS ITEMS.

[We gladly print the following notice in the form in which it is put in circulation.—Eds.]

OLD SPRINGFIELD DAY (Springfield Friends' Meeting).—All who are interested are cordially invited to Springfield Meeting on First-day, Fifth Month 31, 1914, at 10.30 A. M. We hope that many of the neighbors and those whose families formerly attended Springfield Meeting, including several ministers, will be present.

Take the electric "Short Line" car leaving either Media or Sixty-ninth Street Terminal at 9.32, to Springfield Road and Saxer Avenue, and walk north a mile and a quarter. Those who cannot enjoy the walk will be met at Saxer Avenue at the cars leaving Media and Sixty-ninth Street at 10.02, provided they notify Clement E. Allen, Moylan, Pa.

Kindly pass the invitation on.

Minerva W. Lowmes, Jr., Annie E. Mickle, William M. Parker, George B. Allen, Richard T. Ogden, Joseph Rhoads.

[The following from a recent Philadelphia daily gives evidence that a discerning spirit, seeking to feel the same element of worship in the quietness of a Friends' meeting that Robert Barclay sought and found, will be refreshed by that same Power that refreshed him and that has refreshed countless others who have come in the simplicity of childish faith.—Eds.]

IDEALS OF PEACE.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Last [First-day] I attended a meeting at the Friends' Meeting House in Media. I entered into an atmosphere of solemn peace. Through a silent period one felt the presence of a great brooding Power. Then a man arose and delivered a message so evidently given to him by that Power that no word he said seemed to be his. He spoke of Christ, who said: "I am the way, the truth and the life." "And," the speaker went on to say, "the cross is Christ's way." As he continued speaking such light from above was shed on Christ's way that it seemed the only one to be desired, no matter what trials or tribulations might be met on its shining course, or, rather, those very tribulations shone as means of progress on the way. As one listened one's whole being sang for joy, and reached out for all human kind in the power of that Divine love which alone makes all men one.

The whole world can become a Friends' Meeting House if we will have it so. At present there is some hostility in almost everything we do. In our games even there is no joyous exercise of limb and skill, but a hard, jealous, money-seeking spirit, unworthy of men and brothers. Yet there might be, there should be. We all know not one of us is entirely happy in this lower life, and hundreds of thousands are utterly wretched in it. Why not, then, each one of us lend a hand in making a Friends' Meeting House of the whole world? . . .

AN AMERICAN WOMAN.

The following is abridged from the last issue of the Bulletin of Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia. For 117 years the date of holding Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has continued the same; the two classes of interested attenders, the farmers and educators of the Yearly Meeting of 1914 with no apparent difficulty made it evident to the body of the Yearly Meeting that there were positive advantages in the course adopted last month.

The first Yearly Meeting was held in Burlington, N. J., the last day of Sixth Month, 1681; according to new style this was Eighth Month. In 1685 it was decided that a Yearly Meeting embracing the neighborhood of the new hamlet of Philadelphia and all portions of West Jersey be held on alternate years at Burlington and Philadelphia, the date being the "first First-day in Ninth Month" [new style].

In 1712 a measure was introduced by which Burlington would be deprived of the biennial gathering, but this did not prevail. It was decided, however, "that a meeting shall be held at Philadelphia on the second First-day of the week in the next Third Month [old style] and hold two days for worship and so to be continued annually on the same day."

In 1713, the next year, a change in the date of this Meeting was agreed upon, but it was so slight as to raise the question to-day what could have influenced the shifting of a single week.

In 1755, the date was shifted to the late summer or early autumn; three years later, apparently satisfied with the change from spring to fall, the date was shifted a week or so as on a previous occasion just noted.

In 1760, the following interesting Minute was adopted: "The consideration of the proper place for holding our Yearly Meetings for Business in future, now coming under the solid Notice and thought of this Meeting, and much time being spent thereon, and full opportunity being given for a free communication of Friends' sentiments, and the calving influences of Gospel love being over us, it appears to be the most general sense, that Philadelphia, as it is the nearest central for the body of the Society, it is therefore the most convenient for that purpose." The record shows no change of date, but in 1798 the time was changed to the spring in order to avoid the epidemic of yellow fever and has so continued on the third Second-day in the Fourth Month, till successive generations have grown accustomed to the language of the concluding Minute "then adjourned until the usual time next year."

On Fifth Month 17th, William C. Longstreth gave a capital ten-minutes' temperance talk to the boys and girls of Haverford Bible School. He put the question before them as one of efficiency, showing that none who drank even moderately could be at his best physically and mentally, a fact that is recognized by many who from a business standpoint must have men always at their best. This is seen among the North Carolina miners, and all railroad employees, and by the demand for total abstinence men by Edison in his great laboratories, the Emperor of Germany in his army, and Connie Mack in his baseball team.

JOHN FREDERICK HANSON, who has been granted a Minute by Oregon Yearly Meeting for Gospel labors in Norway and other parts of Europe, expected to sail from New York in time to be in attendance at London Yearly Meeting.—The American Friend.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

SEVENTH-DAY, the 16th inst., was a busy one at Westtown: Visitors' Day, which usually occurs before the spring vacation, was postponed on account of incalls—the above date proved to be a very satisfactory substitute; the visitors missed the usual entertainment in the gymnasium, but had opportunity to enjoy a tennis tournament, cricket, base ball, etc. School was adjourned for the day before dinner, as there was no schedule of lessons for Seventh-day, p. m. Quite a good many parents with their children were with us, and everybody apparently enjoyed the day. An interesting feature of the day was a meeting of parents, held after dinner in the gymnasium, to discuss matters of vital interest relating to the School, its pupils, etc.

THE DELAWARE VALLEY NATURAL HISTORY ASSOCIATION met at the Lake House on the 16th inst., also; there were probably 100 persons in this group: many of them joined the other guests of the school in witnessing the sports in the afternoon.

THE Visiting Committee for Fifth Month made a third company to gather here, though they, for the most part, came near evening. John B. Garrett and Charles S. Carter had visited the School some days in advance, attended meeting in the morning and a number of classes in the afternoon. Other members of the Committee who were present on this occasion were George Abbott, Alfred C. Garrett, Alfred G. Scattergood, Edward W. Evans, Susanna S. Kite, Ann Sharpless, Anne Balderston, Mary W. Trimble and Sarah W. Cooper.

JOHN B. GARRETT and George Abbott were engaged in the ministry on First-day morning the 17th. In the evening collection, Alfred C. Garrett addressed the boys on high thinking and right living. Anna Rhoads Ladd spoke to the girls on "The Man of Nazareth."

It should be noted here that at the collections held one week earlier, Augustin Dwyer gave the boys a talk on the foundation of Christian manhood; Emily Smedley Palmer spoke to the girls on the formation of good habits; all four of the talks were replete with good advice; these First-day evening talks have become an important factor in that part of the School's work which tends to foster right living which includes staunch Christian character building.

An event which is anticipated with pleasure by the School and, we believe, also by the visitors, is the annual meeting of the Westtown Committee, which was held here on the morning of the 19th inst.; all other meetings of the General Committee are held in Philadelphia; the natural beauties of the place are perhaps never shown to better advantage than at this season of the year.

The first cash returns from the orchard department have been from radishes; an acre of the Walnut Hill tract was seeded broadcast, and is now yielding a good crop; spinach will be next in order—markets for these vegetables are not as good as they were earlier in the season. About seventy acres have been planted on the farm with corn, ten acres with oats and peas, for use at the dairy barn, and nine acres in potatoes.

WATER is being used from the new wells in the meadow and it is expected that the supply from the underdrain system in the meadow will be eliminated before this item appears in print.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR FRIENDS:—I am so pleased to find in the issue of Vol. 87, No. 44, two verses of "Molding Childhood" (on page 524). I greatly desire the verses which precede the ones quoted here. Please furnish them to me, if possible, and also the author's name. I had the whole poem in my Bible about a year ago, but my valise was stolen in Palestine and I lost poem and Bible and all!

Gratefully,
JOHN SMOOR KIMBER.

For "THE REVIEW."

I have been reading this afternoon in "Biographical Sketches and Anecdotes of Friends," and I think The Tract Association did a valuable service when they put this book before the public. I have read it before, but the lively anecdotes couched in pleasing phraseology, give the book an air of freshness at each reading. I have been an interested reader of Friends' literature all of my adult life and have been impressed with the frequency of the statement that the subject of the sketch or the author was born in Philadelphia. This leads one to conclude that the Divine blessing has rested in goodly measure on Philadelphia all of its history. The question arises is she garnering food to-day that will be dispensed to future generations as preceding ones have done. Are the energies expended on present activities the result of an inwrought grace that will distil its dewy upon the hearts of coming ages, as well as preserve the present. I have no reason to doubt it for I have sat in sweet communion with many from within her borders who have visited the west. Receiving and much enjoying THE FRIEND each week, besides so much of our Quaker libraries that came from Philadelphia as their source, causes the mind of a concerned Friend to long for its preservation in the truth. Present-day problems must be solved and duties of this generation met, and I still feel that as our day is so shall our strength be. I have felt from my boyhood that what are called minor testimonies were binding upon me, and the non-performance of them separated between me and my God, and instead of being minor became major in their character in my case, for nothing is minor that offends God. I discover that there are many in Philadelphia as well as elsewhere who feel that this singularity is not called for to-day, and are ready to drop what has been called the appearance of a Friend. I cannot dictate for them nor unduly censure: I can only say that the ancient path seems more to me like the one that the vulture's eye hath not seen. At one time in my young manhood I was transacting business in the state of Nebraska. When it was concluded, the man remarked, "I see you are a Friend." He went on to say that he used to live in Philadelphia and spoke in the highest terms both as to the religious character and business rectitude of the Friends living there. This was at a time when liberalism ran the highest in the Western Yearly Meetings and I was in connection with the body of Friends who were separated from sound Friends in the East by the unhappy condition of a generation ago. The Friends' Review was industriously circulated in the West, but I had never heard of THE FRIEND at this time. Further investigation revealed that there were many in the West in perfect unity with sound Friends in the East, both in doctrine and practice, and I entertain the hope that the Society of Friends may maintain its integrity and meet present-day conditions without in any degree slipping from its ancient mooring. Divine grace is as sufficient for us as it was for Paul, and will do for us what it did for him if we don't look more to the "thorn in the flesh" than we do to the sustaining power of this Divine grace.

LEVI BOWLES.

GALENA, KAN., Fifth Month 17, 1914.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Dr. R. H. Harte, Director of Public Health and Charities in Philadelphia says: "More than 1800 babies died in Philadelphia between Sixth Month 1 and Tenth Month 1 last year before they were a year old. Fully six out of every ten deaths were due to impure food and improper feeding." He advises to protect the baby's things from flies, especially the milk, the utensils used for preparing its food and anything which goes into its mouth. Babies need water just as grown-ups do, and should be given cooled boiled water frequently, between or before feedings, not immediately after. Never give the baby tea, coffee, beer, whiskey or alcoholic drinks of any kind. If, in spite of great care, baby shows signs of internal disturbances, stop all feeding, and take it to the doctor at once.

A despatch from Lancaster, Pa., of the 18th says: "The General Synod of the Reformed Church in America, in session here to-day, adopted a resolution expressing a desire for peace with Mexico; sympathy for them in their present troubles; declaring that the thought of war between this country and Mexico to be abhorrent, as the Americans do not desire to dominate that country nor interfere in its internal affairs; rejoicing that President Wilson and Secretary Bryan are lovers of peace, whose purpose is to preserve peace with all nations, and assuring the Senators and Representatives that the voices clamoring for war do not represent the sentiment of the sane and substantial people of our republic."

An interesting fire test was lately held at the Atlantic Refining Company's grounds, Point Breeze, Philadelphia. A tank, 60 feet in diameter and one foot in depth, was filled with oil and then ignited. When the fire was well under way a chemical substance, consisting of carbonate of soda and aluminum sulphide, mixed with leoric, was poured over the flames. It took just eight minutes to extinguish the fire. It is said this new chemical will be of great value in fighting oil fires. As soon as the liquid strikes the oil it causes a soapy crust to form on the surface of the oil and prevents the air from breaking through the flames. The New York and San Francisco fire departments have used the chemical with great success.

A statement of the National Highways Protective Association shows that in New York City alone in the last month 23 children and 21 adults were killed by vehicles in the streets—16 by autos, 15 by wagons and 13 by street cars. Besides these there were 146 serious, though not fatal, street accidents, of which 83 were due to automobiles. An organization has been started called the Safety First Society, with headquarters in New York, the object of which society is to educate the public up to a realization of the sacrifice of life and limb which is now being made not only in the crowded metropolis but in a proportionate degree all over the country.

Several employers were lately brought before Magistrate Eisenbrow in this city and charged with violating the law which forbids employers to work women more than 54 hours a week.

It is reported that the Camden County Commission for the Extirpation of Mosquitoes has taken up its work at Collingswood. The first step was a house-to-house inspection. When completed this inspection showed of 1679 premises visited 376 nuisances were reported. Two small swamps were found which were covered with a thin film of oil to prevent breeding of the pest. Also the attention of the proper authorities was called to each place regarded as a nuisance and breeding place.

Postmaster Thornton of this city has received a communication from the Second Assistant Postmaster General at Washington announcing that on and after Seventh Month 1, 1914, the $50 limit on the value of the contents of parcel post packages exchanged between the United States and Ecuador is eliminated. Under the new order packages are admissible to the parcel post mails without regard to the value of the parcels.

A despatch from Washington of the 18th says: "At the instance of the Chinese Government, the House to-day agreed to a joint resolution of Representative Hay, of Virginia, to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to an engineer officer of the army to accept an appointment under the Government of China on works of conservation and public improvement. China particularly wants a United States Army engineering expert to examine into the flood and famine region in the Hwai River valley."

FOUR D.S.—A despatch from Naples says: "A large part of the top of the crater of Mount Vesuvius is threatening to collapse, owing to the recent activity of the volcano. The activity of Mount Vesuvius augments daily and is causing considerable anxiety among the population. Dense clouds of smoke are emitted from the crater and form heavy clouds. Strondboli also is much more active than usual."

On the 18th a large service was begun by the towing of five banded barges through the Panama Canal.

It was stated from London on the 19th: "The first bill to become a law under the operation of the Parliament act is the Welsh disestablishment bill, which passed its third reading in the House of Commons tonight by a vote of 328 to 251. Renewed interest has been taken in the question of Welsh disestablishment during recent months, because of its immense importance to the Church and churchmen. Under the Parliament act, the bill automatically becomes a law after its third passage by the House of Commons, no matter what action the House of Lords may take. Among other things the bill provides that so far as Wales and Monmouth are concerned, the Church of England will cease to be established by law; all cathedrals and ecclesiastical corporations will be dissolved; the bishops of the four Welsh dioceses will cease to be members of the House of Lords; the present ecclesiastical law will cease to exist as a law, and no ecclesiastical court will have any coercive jurisdiction; the bishops and clergy will not be members of or be represented in the houses of convocation of the province of Canterbury.

Suffragettes in London have been violently opposing the police and constitutional authorities, and many outbreaks have occurred.

The new steamship Vaterland, of the Hamburg-American Line has lately arrived in New York. It is the largest liner in the world and is 980 feet long. Electricity is used throughout, and it is said she has all the comforts of the best hotels, and is manned by a crew of 1234 men. It has accommodation for 5000 passengers of all classes. The voyage of 3177 miles from Cherbourg to Sandy Hook lightship was made in five days and seventeen hours.

It is stated that several parties of explorers are in Edmonton outfitting for trips of from five to eight months' duration in the hinterland of Alberta and the vast, untraversed territory between the 60th parallel of latitude and the Arctic Ocean. Expeditions will be conducted by the Meteorological Service, the Fisheries Department and the Geological and Topographical Surveys of the Dominion Government.

NOTICES.

The annual meeting of Friends' Educational Association is appointed for Seventh-day, Fifth Month 30th, at Germantown Friends' School. At the afternoon session, 3.30 P. M., reports will be received and Anna Kohler Barnes will speak on "Home Direction of Children's Reading." The evening session, 7.30 P. M., will be addressed by Hamilton Holt, of the Independent, on "Citizenship and the School."

The Germantown School will serve supper at six P. M. to all who have accepted their kind invitation.

A MEETING to be held at Upper Springfield, N. J., on First-day, Fifth Month 31, at 3 P. M. This meeting has been arranged by the Committee of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting. All interested persons are invited to attend.

NOTICE OF APPOINTED MEETING.—By arrangement of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, an appointed meeting will be held at Greenwich, New Jersey, on First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 7, 1914, at 3.30 P. M. Friends interested are invited to join in this opportunity.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station, trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.32, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester Bell Telephone 1144.

WM. B. HARVEY, Superintendent.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. Sixteenth Street, Phila., will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M.—Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

MARRIED.—In Salem, Ohio, Fifth-day, Fifth Month 21st, ROBERT LOVETT and CAROLINE BLACKBURN.

DIED.—In West Philadelphia, on Fifth Month 6th, of hemorrhage of the brain, SAMUEL R. JACOB, son of Joshua and Catharine Jacob (the former deceased), aged thirty-seven years.

THE better and most pleasing buildings are always constructed under the supervision of an experienced architect. The plans are intelligently made in the first place and as carefully followed to fit the expenditure allotted.

This is also the right way to buy booklets, folders, catalogues and all printed matter out of the ordinary. The finer grades of printing are to be had only by employing those who know how to plan as well as to execute. More than half the success in building a good house is in the architect's services. Likewise the best and most pleasing, and that means result producing, printed matter is to be had only by getting the plan right. BELTS FOR SEPARATORS

The exacting conditions presented by dampness and high speed are satisfactorily met by the toughness, flexibility and water resisting qualities of TANNATE WATERSHED BELTING.

It is made from leather of our Tannate tannage which possesses unusual strength. It is joined with strong waterproof cement, and is treated so as to turn water.

On high speed drives Tannate usually far outlasts oak-tanned belting. It saves stops for repairs. It takes strong grip on the pulleys and saves speed often lost by slippage.

Tannate makes for efficiency.

MAINTAINING A BALANCE.

It is a far call from those days of the Middle Ages when the devout astronomer unflinchingly rendered his verdict contrary to the decrees of the church, to this present day when the church seems almost ready to surrender itself to the scientist who is not over-devout.

Coupled up in every nature that approaches the subject of Bible study are these two elements: the devotional and the historical; happy, indeed, the individual in whom the two hold an even balance!

As a people who have inherited the traits of a Puritan age in which our fathers lived and with which they warmly sympathized, it is natural that the first of these should preponderate among us, and equally natural that the second, at the hands of many of us, should receive but scant welcome.

It becomes us, however, to reflect and to reflect profoundly, how far the second is responsible for the so-called orthodox views which we hold. The Christian spirit within us may tauntingly say to the other spirit within us, "Our natures and our kingdoms are so diverse that we can have no fellowship." There are good men all about us whose every action bristles with this feeling, and who in all honesty believe what they assert when they say that the historical study of the Bible deadens the best life within them, and turns what had been living streams of inspiration from the blessed Book into stagnant pools of dead philosophy.

Do not these good people too often in their reasoning fail to grasp the fact that our present Bible holds its place in Christendom because centuries ago it fought for that place and made peace with the intellects of those ages? "A true victor never wins a victory save through service." The Christianity of that early period served alike the intellects and the hearts of the people and found in that service a fruition of priceless value.

It would be false to say that the so-called critical study of the Scriptures has not been responsible for the first falling away in faith of many a would-be believer, do we reflect that the reverse of this statement is also true, that from the lack of an intelligent and devout use of the Bible, schisms and diversions have crept into the church, and that this has been responsible in many cases for its disruption?

There are expressions more or less current that are as a red flag of danger to many of us to-day, who, had we lived two generations earlier, would have substituted possibly for these some other difficulty which in the interim has become adjusted and which gives us now not even a shadow of worry. We are not as far from the period of intolerance as we think we are. We substitute one dogma for another and rest content in the change. It troubles us and it worries us when we feel our views are being marked unorthodox. We have not the tools of the scholar, we read his learned dictum, in which he claims that the findings of a previous century cannot be true, and our anxiety at yielding to these statements is only second to the dread we have that sadder revelations are yet to follow.

When one's mental equipment comes near the verge of such a disaster as this would represent, let him, if he wants to employ logic, turn for support to the words of Barclay and Claridge and Fisher, which though written by men of a despised sect at the time of its severest trials, yet will ring true to the appeals of both intellect and devotion.

There is nothing peculiar in the fact that our generation has a battle to fight; the only thing peculiar is that the conflict has taken the shape it has; had it taken some other form, it would have been equally peculiar. In this connection there are certain thoughts that we do well to emphasize. The question before the twentieth century Christian concerning the Bible is, how far does criticism go toward affecting our estimate of the Book, our confidence in it, its value to us, and what surrender we yield to its teachings?

It is idle to ask the man or the woman who reads to shun all treatises that deal with modern biblical criticism; the topic has a fascination for some minds to-day as almost no other subject has; we deplore it, and regard it as unwholesome to say the least, but our honest regret does not alter circumstances. The four statements just made are fundamental in character, and we shall find that in all of them modern criticism does not in itself alter the individual's view-point.

Let us remember that whatever criticism accomplishes, this fact stands, the Bible remains. Critics may differ as to authorship and chronology and other matters that trouble us much more, but the great lessons of the Book are untouched; it stands a great testimony in itself to itself. It unfolds the most wonderful revelation of God's majesty and attests it by evidence which no court and no criticism can possibly touch. Where it reads, "The mouth of the Lord has spoken" or "Thus saith the Lord" we know the word is final, and who can point to a single illustration of critics temporizing with these great eternal utterances?

Do those Psalms that breathe the very breath of heaven, convey a less perfect lesson because devout scholars raise the doubt that some of them were not sung by King David? Do they lose one iota of their spiritual power because the date of their composition is placed backward or forward a few decades? Does it trouble the devout Christian because his more scholarly brother tells him that the book of Isaiah shows a dual authorship, that the research of the last century has brought to light facts which had they been known when the Bible was first gathered into books would have caused a little different division? These are little more than idle questions to the one who is profoundly intent on the spirit of the message.

When our Lord, sorrowing over the unjust imprisonment of His beloved friend and forerunner, turned His face northward toward His Galilean home. He came to Jacob's Well. The incident in the simplicity of its setting cannot be excelled, and the lesson He taught there cannot be too often pressed home upon us. It is the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom that we most need to know, not to know about, and the great central fact of His teaching on this occasion was one which no criticism of any kind can touch to harm.

No criticism can dim the lustre of the lessons He taught or detract from the matchless majesty of His Divine nature. He is to us, and must ever be, despite all criticism, "the Light of the World, God manifest in the flesh, the Son of God and the Son of man, who loved us and gave Himself for us, the just for the unjust."

In that tender message of the great apostle to the youthful Timothy we know how he regarded the Scriptures and how they were "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

As centuries ago these sacred records had the power to make men wise unto salvation through faith that is in Christ Jesus, so in centuries to come they will be one of our Heavenly Father's means for accomplishing man's salvation. It happens that in our times they are assailed in a manner that they have not experienced before; we may, none the less, know with positive assurance that nothing that is a part of God's planning will be permanently injured and that which has been the Book of books will continue to be a means of winning souls to His kingdom. To be over-fearful is anti-Quaker. But half the story has been heard if we listen only to those who seem to have shattered some of our long-cherished pictures; the great eternal truths proclaimed in the sacred volume are made, if it were possible, more stable by the searchlight cast upon them.

FLOOD TIDE ON THE MARSHES.

"And the sea lends large, as the marsh; lo, out of his plenty, the sea

Pours fast: full soon the time of the flood time must be:

Look how the grace of the sea doth go

About and about through the intricate channels that flow

Here and there,

Everywhere,

Till his waters have flooded the uttermost creeks and the low-lying lanes,

And the marsh is meshed with a million veins,

That like us with rosy and silvery essences flow

In the rose-sand-silver evening glow.

.....
The creeks overflow: a thousand rivulets run

'Twixt the roots of the sod; the blades of the marsh-grass stir;

Passeth a hurrying sound of wings that westward whirr;

Passeth, and all is still; and the currents cease to run;

And the sea and the marsh are one.

"How still the plains of water be!

The tide is in his ecstasy.

The tide is at his highest height,

And it is night."

—SIDNEY LANIER, quoted in "Sand Dunes and Salt Marshes."

THE SPIRIT OF THE DISCIPLINE.

(SHOWN BY EXTRACTS FROM OLD AND NEW EDITIONS.)

BY EDITH SHARPLESS.

Preaching at stated times comes under the system to be guarded against. The Discipline regarding war contains the following:

"Friends are exhorted faithfully to adhere to our ancient testimony against wars and fightings and in no way to unite with any in warlike measures, either offensive or defensive, that by the inoffensiveness of our conduct, we may convincingly demonstrate, in our lives, to be real subjects of the Messiah's peaceful reign, and be instrumental in the promotion thereof towards its desired completion, when according to ancient prophecy, nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

Regarding trade or business queried after there is much wise counsel given; the following is a short quotation, "We affectionately desire, that Friends may humbly wait for Divine counsel in all their engagements and duly attend to the secret intimations and restrictions of the spirit of Truth in their business and trading, not suffering their minds to be hurried away by an inordinate desire of worldly riches, remembering the observation of the apostle in his day, and so often verified in ours, that, 'They that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare and erring from the faith, pierce themselves through with many sorrows,'" but "Where there is an honest desire to seek first the Kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, with a single eye to the Lord for direction, we believe He will point out the proper place, and the mode for his children to provide things honest in the sight of all men, and to serve Him according to His blessed will, in doing which they will partake of true peace and the right enjoyment of the things of this life."

In reading the history of our early Friends we can but be deeply impressed with the love manifested by one toward another, causing the remark of one who knew them, "See how these Friends love one another;" indeed, they sometimes offered to be imprisoned in the place of others who were suffering imprisonment, and later, when there were, those who were in danger of swerving from the Truth, they were concerned to labor with them in the restoring love of the Gospel, endeavoring to show them their errors in meekness and brotherly compassion and if possible know them brought into true fellowship again, but if this could not be, to testify against their wrong doings by discontinuing them from membership in the Society, which was the extent of the Society's censure against such, but to be done in such a disposition of mind as may convince them, that we sincerely desire their recovery and restoration."

"It is advised that where any transgress the rules of our Discipline, they may without partiality, be admonished and sought in the spirit of love and Divine charity, so that it may be seen by all, that the restoring spirit of meekness and Christian love abounds, before church censure takes place, and that a Gospel spirit is the spring and motive to all our performances, as well in discipline as in worship."

"Our various meetings for Discipline have all distinct allotments of service, and as experience shows, that when this service is attended to in uprightness and dedication of heart, with a single eye to the honor of our Holy Head and the help and edification of one another, in the love wherewith He hath loved us, our assemblies are often favored with His aid and direction."

"Friends are affectionately desired and exhorted to be diligent in the attendance of their meetings, and when met, humbly seek to be clothed with the spirit of wisdom and charity, this will divest the mind of a dependence on our own strength and abilities, endue us with patience and condescension toward each other, and being preserved in fellowship agreeably with our Lord's declaration, "One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren."

This review may be closed with quotations from an epistle written by George Fox to Friends of the Yearly Meeting in London, 1676, relating to the order which Truth leads into, "Let every one's faith stand in the power of God, which Jesus Christ is the author of, that all may know their crown of life. For all outward things without the substance, life, and power, are as the husk without the kernel, and do not nourish the immortal soul, nor the new-born babe, but that by which it is nourished, is the milk of the Word, whereby it groweth in the heavenly life, strength, and wisdom." "The Gospel is not of man, nor by man, but is the power of God, and answers the Truth in all; all the possessors of it are to see that all walk according to it, which everlasting order is ordained of God already and all the possessors of Him, possess their joy, their comfort and salvation. This joyful order keeps all hearts pure to God, in everlasting peace, unity and order; feel it and keep the order of it, both men and women, and come to be heirs of the Gospel, which brings life and immortality to light, and to see over that power of darkness, by Him who was before the power of death was. In this is the holy order of love and peace, so keep in this, that keeps you always pure; what men and women act in this, they act in that which will stand when the world is gone."

With changes in the condition of things around us some minor changes in our Discipline have from time to time been made, but the spirit of it, I trust, has and will remain the same. Let us not so much ask, if our Discipline is adapted to the present day, as, are we concerned to live in obedience to its wise precepts, tender counsel and earnest exhortations from the teachings of Him who is Head over all things to His Church and people and who, it was declared [He] had come to teach His people Himself.

A TESTIMONY AGAINST LOTTERIES.

The following clipped from a recent paper, shows that the Northumberland, Penna., Public Press is bearing a very practical testimony against lotteries. Would there were more printers and publishers like-minded.—J. C. M.

"We wish to announce to the public that from this time forth no lottery tickets, commonly known as 'chance tickets,' will be printed for any organization or individual in the job department of the Public Press, and no exceptions will be made for anybody.

"This rule will also apply to baseball pool tickets, which are nothing more than plain gambling tickets. No more lottery tickets nor baseball pool tickets will be turned out at the Public Press office.

"We believe there are enough legitimate methods for churches, fire companies and business men to make money without resorting to illegitimate and questionable ones. Talking and joking about bad practices will never abolish them. The thing to do is to cut them out.

"The Public Press cannot consistently condemn gambling on cards in back rooms and out-of-the-way places in its editorial columns, and then promote the same evil (only in another form) by printing chance tickets and baseball pool tickets in its job department.

"Neither can we excuse ourselves by saying that certain people demand such printing and we must supply it. The only manly course for us to pursue is to stop printing such tickets and thereby help to abolish the evil."

In renewed times of proving, and fresh trial of faith, the best we can do seems to be, to endeavor to be still, both in body and mind, that the secret word of instruction may be rightly distinguished, either in reproving, humbling or opening new springs of help and of pure knowledge, for our own advantage or that of others.

MARY CAPPER.

THE SITUATION IN IRELAND.

The vote taken last week in the English Parliament has brought the condition of our Friends in Ireland freshly home to the minds of their many friends in Philadelphia. It would be impossible to forecast events, but as years ago messages of loving sympathy passed from their fathers to ours when the citadel of our faith was assailed in this country, so to-day a feeling of universal sympathy wells up in our hearts for them and the prayer goes up that He Who has ever been the only safe refuge in times of distress and apparent defeat may be their abiding place now.

In a letter dated near the middle of last (Fifth) month from an aged Friend in Dublin to one of our oldest members in Philadelphia, we catch the sad picture of what to both of them seems like utter disaster for the Irish cause, but in the former there is the reverse picture of what may be expected from earnest prayer and a trust that is genuine and living, in the arm of a Mighty Deliverer.

Those who have kept themselves posted with the trend of events in Ulster know the situation, and whatever their political views may be they feel a warm interest in the welfare of the Protestant interests in north Ireland. God in times past has worked great miracles before our very eyes and has made "even our enemies to bless us"; out of the troubles of to-day He will work greater blessings than we can dream of, but we need not expect them to be according to our finite planning.

In the letter from Dublin alluded to, this expression occurs:—"In the Dublin Y. M. C. A. Union prayer meeting, special meetings have been held weekly for over two years to plead with our Heavenly Father to condescend to defeat our bitter enemies in the present impending terrible crisis."

The question in Parliament has agitated English law-makers for a century and more, the present may be a phase in its history that will soon pass, or it may result in the establishment of a principle that combines more of justice and common good than anything that has preceded it. In both cases it is our conviction that our Friends of Dublin Yearly Meeting feel with the good man, their fellow-countryman, who spoke as follows at a large mass meeting recently held at Belfast. He said: "The Creator of man has been the friend of man, and so they came to Him in their dire distress, feeling their need and seeking His help. Not only were they to pray in a meeting like that, but he felt that in their homes and in private they should likewise bring before the Almighty the great suspense in which they were and the anguish that filled the minds of multitudes. God, he felt, was their ally, as He was the ally of His ancient people. He said they were to go not only to make petitions, but likewise to confess their sins, and to ask for the Divine Spirit to purify them. He could truly say that there was no thought of hatred in their hearts toward their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. At one time he considered that sectarianism had reached a very low ebb, and there were various ways in which all classes in the community had been co-operating. But the legislation which was threatened some twenty years ago had largely dissipated that happy condition of things. He hoped that peace might speedily come, and the former condition of things be restored. He felt he could say that the people of this province had exhibited a self-restraint which was well worthy of notice and well worthy of gratitude. In conclusion, he expressed the belief that they had no need to despair of their cause. He would remind them of that fateful night when, in a way they could not have foreseen, it pleased Providence to intervene on their behalf. It turned out on that occasion that the soldiers of the nation were not mere mechanical tools. They recognized the hand of God in that deliverance, and they gave Him thanks for it. He felt they had many instances in the past to encourage them to go forward with gratitude and hope."

A BEAUTIFUL IMAGE.—A deaf and dumb person, being asked to give his idea of forgiveness, took a pencil and wrote—"It is the sweetness which flowers yield when trampled upon."

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL REUNION.

A very happy occasion was the reunion on Fifth Month 22nd of nearly eight hundred representatives of "all who have ever been connected with Friends' Select School, whether as members of the committee, teachers or scholars." The invitation was issued "under the joint auspices of the management of the School and the F. S. S. Alumni Association."

A base-ball game on the School Athletic Grounds at Twenty-third and Market Streets was the first entertainment on the programme. But the principal exercises were the afternoon and evening meetings at 140 N. Sixteenth Street. Between these meetings supper was served in the dining-room and under a large tent on the playground. Those who were at school together gathered in groups, and exchanged memories and renewed old acquaintance, while some of the Senior Class and youngest Alumni diligently and cheerfully served the meal to their older brothers and sisters.

The school building was open for inspection and there were some very interesting and commendable exhibitions of school-work, notably in the manual training and the arts and crafts departments.

At the opening of the afternoon meeting there was an address of welcome by the clerk of the school committee. Then very interesting and entertaining reminiscences were given by Coleman L. Nicholson, John E. Carter, Samuel L. Allen, Susanna S. Kite, Rebecca Nicholson Taylor and Arthur N. Leeds, representing respectively the decades from 1830 to 1890. These were woven into a history of Friends' Select School by the connecting outline furnished by the chairman, Walter W. Haviland, principal of the School.

Attention was drawn to the interesting coincidence that just two hundred and twenty-five years ago was established the first school in Philadelphia, under the official care of Friends, as shown by the following extract from the Minutes of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, dated the twenty-sixth of the Fifth Month, 1689:

"Friends being willing to encourage a school in this town, and in order thereto, they have agreed with George Keith to assure him a certain salary of fifty pounds a year, to be paid quarterly, with house rent convenient for his school and family, with the profit of the school for one year, and for two years more to make his school worth to him one hundred and twenty pounds a year, if he shall think fit to stay in this place, the said George also promiseth to teach the poor (which are not of ability to pay) for nothing. The aforesaid George Keith, having heard the proposal of Friends, readily assented and agreed thereto, his salary beginning from the time that the school begins. It is agreed that it be mentioned also in the next Quarterly Meeting for their concurrence with the same."

Little is known about Friends' Select School before 1830. At first the boys' school was in Orange Street Meeting-house, and the girls' in Twelfth Street Meeting-house. The boys' school was moved to a building on Cherry Street between Eighth and Ninth Streets, where it remained until 1886, when the present building was occupied by both boys' and girls' schools. The girls' school building was on St. James Street from 1834 to 1846, when it was destroyed by fire—a great event to the scholars. In 1857 a new building on Seventh Street below Race was erected and occupied until 1886. A few years after moving to Sixteenth and Cherry Streets the scholars were merged into the present co-educational institution, under one principal.

Vivid pictures were given of struggles with street boys who attacked the plain hats worn by the Quaker lads in early days; of spelling bees and astronomical observations; of the brickyards and the play in them; of the impressive costume of a little girl in the '70's; of the weekly attendance at Arch Street Meeting; and also of the teachers and their methods. Strong evidence was given, almost unconsciously, of the central and permanent importance of the personality of the teachers.

Susanna House, whose services extended over four decades, was present, and, when asked to rise on the platform, received hearty expressions of the appreciation of her scholars. Joseph Paul Morris and Eleanor Howell Little, speaking for the later decades and Blanche Susan Doe, representing the present students, turned attention to the future of the School, urging the loyalty that is based on hopes as well as memories, and that aspires after growth in the power and efficiency of the School, a finer school-spirit, and larger service in helping young people of the community to win the truth.

Benjamin R. Hoffmann spoke on behalf of the Friends' Select School Alumni Association, of which he is President. By an amendment in its constitution, its membership now includes all who have ever been connected with the School in any capacity. An earnest appeal was made to all present to become active members of the Association, such membership involving simply an annual contribution through the Alumni of one dollar or more toward the welfare of the School.

Further reminiscences enlivened the subject of the evening meeting, "Our Ideals for Friends' Select School." Zebedee Haines suggested lessons for the future by an impressive account of his own experiences in connection with his principalship of the School. Francis B. Gummere said the longer he teaches the less he feels like throwing stones at the teachers of the old days. They had two ideas to which we shall do well to return. Firstly, they believed in definiteness. They prepared men to look at objects—not in a hazy way at the landscape; they instilled beliefs rather than opinions; and the few subjects they taught they taught thoroughly enough to serve vocationally in later life. Secondly, they spelled work w-o-r-k, and not p-l-a-y.

J. Henry Bartlett spoke of the family spirit he found at Select School. In England the ecclesiastical system still largely prevails, which takes children from their homes and puts them in the "public schools," which seem survivals of the monastic institutions. That our system of public education in America is one of day-schools and not boarding-schools is due to the family idea of education contributed by the Society of Friends. The home has a right to its children, and the children to their home, above all in the difficult period of adolescence. The International Association for Home Education has but adopted the ideals long held by Friends in making the home the centre of the educational system, and the school a mere ally of the home. At Select School he found that the parents and other relatives were interested in the school the children of the family attended. This ideal is a reality for which we should consciously work. It is the family feeling that must cure such survivals of warfare between teachers and scholars as still exist.

J. Henry Bartlett spoke feelingly of the large hope and large promise which are what a teacher sees in his pupils, and of the great joy of seeing these fulfilled. He urged that the school preserve the ideal received from John H. Dillingham, to whom spiritual contact with a higher, unseen Power was a manifest reality.

Stanley Rhoads Yarnall spoke of the close, intimate relationship between teachers and taught as characteristic of Friends' schools, as well as of the schools of the Dunkards and Moravians, and of its great influence in the lives of the scholars. Nowhere else do we find a greater individual concern for and interest in the children and their truest Christian character. This gives our Friends' schools an important and unique place in Philadelphia, even now when education in other schools is going forward by leaps and bounds. But we can no longer go on making just that type which we formerly produced. The old education is futile in face of the college requirements of to-day, and we must follow the new lines. By standardizing the curriculum at Friends' Select School to meet these modern demands, J. Henry Bartlett made a most important contribution to this school, and paved the way for all the secondary schools in the Yearly Meeting.

Stanley R. Yarnall urged an enlarged hope for the future helpfulness of Select School to the community and a loyal backing of those now running the School, if we want it to succeed.

This forward look dominated both sessions of the reunion. Testimony to what the School has meant to its old scholars strengthened the feeling of responsibility for like helpfulness to young people of the city in the present and the future, and there was a new vision of possible influence and usefulness.

What will perhaps be longest remembered but can least easily be described, was the spirit of fellowship and good comradeship that pervaded the reunion. To have realized the existence and the strength of this bond between the oldest and the youngest members of this family, between committee and teachers and scholars, should be a fresh asset, not only in individual lives, but in the life of Friends' Select School.

NOTES FROM ABROAD.

III.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

We arrived at Queenstown early on the morning of the 30th of Fourth Month; our passage across the Atlantic had been like a pleasant ride on a river boat, as only one day was at all unpleasant. Thankfulness alone fills our hearts to Him who has so far more than fulfilled His gracious promise to go with and preserve us, and we have taken courage to hope that it is an index of what lies before us during our long journey. We fully appreciate, as never before, why "Dear Old Ireland" is so precious to those who have lived there, for its perennial verdure is most attractive, especially at this season of the year. The brilliant yellow of the furze (gorse) surmounting the stone and earth fences and innumerable areas in the beautifully green fields is an exceedingly pleasing feature in the landscape. The tender, conveying us from the Cedric into the harbor of Queenstown, was well filled with returning emigrants, and from its open deck we had a splendid view of the terraced cliff, upon which that city is built. While S. rested at the "Queen's Hotel," M. and I climbed the hill and found some very attractive villas overlooking the harbor, with its picturesque islands. Would that one might convey to those we left at home the sensations that flooded the soul as we looked back over the trackless waters we had crossed so comfortably. Surely Miriam, as she stood on the banks of deliverance, could not have felt more gratefully. The first thing that attracted our attention was the severely-walled-in appearance of everything. Oh! deliver us from such exclusion. But equally from the rum, with which so many seemed to be saturated more or less, which may have made this protection necessary.

The philosophy of life is one of its great consolations and so we at once put it into practice, by concluding that no one place or people have all the advantages. Truly these Irish gardens, with their exquisite flowers and superbly-kept lawns and fruit trees, compare favorably with any that we have ever seen, the moist climate contributing much to their beauty and fruitfulness.

Farmers can work out of doors more days in Ireland than they can in any other part of Europe. If farm laborers apply to the guardians for the poor and truthfully represent that they have no suitable home, they are given a cosy two or three-roomed house on a half acre for ten pence a week, or a shilling a week on an acre of land.

The ride from Queenstown to Dublin, via Cork, cannot soon be forgotten, as we had another glorious day of sunshine, with which this island has been unusually favored during the past three weeks. The light green tints of spring, mingled with the golden yellow of the furze, clothed hill and dale completely, while the apple and pear blossoms added their charm to the landscape. Ireland is beautiful—far more beautiful and fertile than we had supposed—and her farmers are far better off than they have been for fifty years. If one of them has a grievance with his landlord on account of rent he may summon the latter into court in order to get a just valuation of the land by the Land Commissioners, for a period of fifteen years, during which time he cannot be evicted as long as he pays the rent. The improvements he may place upon the land are his own, and in case he wishes to purchase, the Government will set the value upon the land and advance the money to be paid during a period of sixty years at the expiration of which the farmer will come into possession. Of course this is dependent upon a willingness on the part of the landlord to sell. The larger part of the open country is thus owned by the farmers, subject to the interest (probably not exceeding four per cent.) and the return loan charged. The country appears very well tilled and the low, one-storied, thatched cottages in this part of Ireland are picturesque and attractive, so one cannot see on the surface any valid reason for discontent. The sheep and cattle were much in evidence, which, with the variegated scenery, makes one love the country.

We were met in Dublin by our dear Friend, Henry Bell, and escorted to the Eustace Street Meeting-house, where the Yearly Meeting is now sitting. The attendance was larger than usual, and after a very earnest discussion on the state of Society, the credentials from our Monthly, Quarterly and Yearly Meeting were read, and a very warm welcome extended to us, and a precious covering spread over the meeting, so we felt a living bond of fellowship to unite us to all that is best in this Yearly Meeting. The one chief concern on this occasion was that the Lord Jesus Christ should have the pre-eminence in all things and be glorified in our daily lives. An Epistle, to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting from Dublin, expressing this and the comfort of our fellowship in Him, was adopted and forwarded.

The meeting on First-day morning was a real Friends' meeting, comparing very favorably with those held in Philadelphia during Yearly Meeting. The periods of silence between the utterances were long enough and weighty so as to be impressive and refreshing.

The reports from the schools under the care of the Yearly Meeting were very interesting and brought out an exceedingly lively discussion. The humor of these dear Irish Friends is irresistible at times, and one struggles in vain to suppress a smile at their mother wit. We had the privilege of dining with some Friends who gathered about their hospitable tables some twenty to thirty guests, and it reminded us of such times about our father's table for many years during Yearly Meeting week. There is a great advantage in this social hospitality. The old and young are thus brought into that free, intimate intercourse which imperceptibly strengthens their best life and interest in the affairs of the Church. It is extremely interesting to follow the efforts of the Young Friends to carry on the work of our Society in this Yearly Meeting. They have been working away very diligently for a decade or more, and have studied the writings of our Early Friends and have a clearer conception of the mission of our Society than their elders sometimes express.

The only normal relation between the old and young is an intimate fellowship, in which each feels the need of the other in all their mutual interests—both social and religious. This has proved the strength of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in the solidarity that now prevails throughout its membership.

We were greatly favored in having such a precious feeling at the usual annual breakfast in Bloomfield (retreat for the insane) which reports to the Yearly Meeting. A large company of Friends are invited each year to meet at this institution and inspect the premises, which are being much improved. Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin and Max I. Reich, from London, were present. The former, a little later in the day, gave an exceedingly interesting account of his visit to Madagascara, when Robert Simkin added his experiences in West China. We were reminded that the Christian Church has in its Founder an infinite power which was impelling men and women to be satisfied with nothing less than the evangelization of the whole world, and the appeals for help on the part of the Chinese was very impressive. There is nothing more significant than the uniting of all the Protestant forces on the mission fields, in order to present a common and harmonious Gospel. This is having its helpful effect on the churches at home. The Christian Church is rapidly learning to feel in terms of fellowship rather than to think in terms of creed. This is the basis upon which our own Society was formed at its rise.

The discussion of Home Rule has been wisely kept out of the deliberations of this Yearly Meeting, as there is a very strong feeling and some diversity of opinion on that subject. Indeed, the self-control and good-will manifest during its sessions is a high tribute to the Gospel of love and peace, and we have received every Christian courtesy and have become much attached to many of these dear Friends. They love the Lord Jesus and are nobly struggling to serve Him.

OF INTEREST ON BOTH SIDES OF THE ATLANTIC.

In advance of the sessions of London Yearly Meeting, reports of standing and special committees and also reports forwarded by the Quarterly Meetings are put in type and circulated both in order to save the time of the sessions and to make action more intelligent and efficient. With a membership of over 20,000 this is much more necessary than with a smaller body, as interests multiply with numbers if there is life. These reports make nearly 200 closely printed pages. A copy has been sent to the office of THE FRIEND and the following excerpts seem to be of general interest to Friends everywhere.—[Eds.]

TRIENNIAL REPORT BY THE GENERAL MEETING FOR SCOTLAND, FOR THE YEARS 1911, 1912 AND 1913.

Since the date of our last report the number of Meetings in Scotland has been increased by the addition of an Allowed Meeting at Helensburgh, the General Meeting for Scotland now consisting of Aberdeen Two Months Meeting, with two Particular Meetings; and Edinburgh Monthly Meeting, with six Particular Meetings, and two Allowed Meetings. The number of members in the General Meeting at the thirty-first of Twelfth Month, 1913, was 342, being an increase of fifteen, as compared with three years ago. The number of regular attenders not in membership has been returned at 118, as compared with 135 three years previously. In Aberdeen Two Months Meeting there is no recorded minister, and no one in the station of Elder, and there is only one recorded minister in Edinburgh Monthly Meeting.

With such a small total membership spread over so large an area as is comprised by the General Meeting for Scotland, and with seventy of that total resident outside the limits of the General Meeting, it is not surprising to hear that our Particular Meetings are feeling the smallness of their numbers. In this connection also it is necessary to remember that of the home members, some are resident at such a distance from the Meeting to which they belong as to render their regular attendance thereat out of the question.

Notwithstanding these drawbacks we are thankful to be able to record that our Meetings for Worship are regularly held, and that they are generally felt to be occasions of edification and blessing.

The visits of Friends from a distance have helped us to realize from time to time something more of our privileges, as well as our responsibilities, as members of a Society that is not everywhere so scattered as it is in Scotland.

While recognizing our own weakness, we cannot but feel encouraged to hold to the Truths committed to us. These, we are assured, will endure, and our desire is, that we and all Friends may be found faithful to them, and thus make our lives a testimony to the power of the Spirit of Christ to redeem from error and from evil.

Signed by direction and on behalf of the General Meeting for Scotland, held at Glasgow on the fourth of Fourth Month, 1914.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON THE OPIUM TRAFFIC. FOR YEARLY MEETING, 1914.

The year 1913 has been the most momentous one in the history of the Anti-Opium movement, for, on Fifth Month 7th, the welcome news was announced in the House of Commons that no more opium would be exported from India to China. A resolution calling upon the Government to release China from her treaty obligation to admit Indian opium and to set her free to prohibit the importation of the stocks which were accumulating at Shanghai, have been moved by J. Townyn Jones, the member for Carmarthen East, seconded by Thomas Edmund Harvey, and supported by Theodore C. Taylor. The announcement, made in reply by the Under Secretary of State for India, that the Government had decided "never again to send any more opium to China, with the single condition that they desired to be satisfied that China, as they believed her to be to-day, is steadfast in the pursuit of her present policy, and determined to get rid of the indigenous poppy," was received with deep thankfulness by those who have so long been working for this end. But disappointment was mingled with satisfaction, for China was still to be obliged to admit the stocks of some 20,000 chests of Indian opium which had accumulated at her ports.

An International Committee, of which Joseph G. Alexander is a member, has been formed to promote the carrying out of the resolutions of the Hague Convention.

To meet the frequent requests for literature, a revised edition of "A Brief Statement of Facts Concerning Opium" was prepared by our Committee and published in Tenth Month. We shall be glad to supply copies to Friends who will carefully distribute them in their meetings, adult schools, etc.

Whilst profoundly thankful for the progress already made, the Committee feels that its work is not yet done, but must now be mainly directed to the evil as it exists in the British possessions and protectorates in the far East.

On behalf of the Committee.

REPORT OF THE CONTINENTAL COMMITTEE TO THE MEETING FOR SUFFERINGS

NORWAY.—The Annual Meeting was held at Stavanger as usual in 1913. Our friend, J. J. Armistead and his wife are still engaged in their Mission work on the Northwest coast of Norway. They write cheerily of it, but feel that, as age increases, their physical ability lessens for a work involving so much exposure, and at times hardship. They long that younger Friends may feel called to take up the burden.

DENMARK.—Friends held their Annual Meeting at Veile this year, and felt it a time of encouragement and blessing. They much value this opportunity of meeting together. Tom Bryan and several members of his family were a much appreciated addition to their number.

Friends at Copenhagen and the Meeting there have this year been visited by several English Friends. The grant by the Meeting for Sufferings towards the expenses of a public meeting-room has been a real help, and they now always have a few from outside to join with them.

Danish Friends have been cheered this year by an application for membership from Johannes Sorensen and his wife, which has been acceded to. J. Sorensen is, like his father, P. William Sorensen, a lighthouse keeper, and, though his duties will prevent his often meeting with other Friends, the moral effect will be helpful. He speaks English well. On the other hand, our Danish Friends have sustained a heavy loss in the removal by death of Chr. Bakgaard, at the age of fifty-six. He was an earnest worker in the Lord's service and strongly upheld Friends' principles, and his life was consistent with his Christian profession. His place cannot readily be filled.

FRANCE.—The few French Friends remaining in the South of France, mostly now elderly, in some of the towns and villages in the departments of the Gard and the Drôme, show much appreciation of intercourse by letter or personal visits from English Friends. They have, however, had very few visits of late, though travelers to the Riviera pass through Valence and very near Nîmes and Cognéens. It is sad if there should not be a continuance of those who, under our name for more than a century and previously from the days of the Camisards, have borne such a noble testimony to spiritual worship and against war. Justine Dalencourt writes cheerfully of the work in Paris. Last autumn she again visited most of the localities where Mothers' Meetings, etc., are carried on in connection with and aided by the Friends' French Mission.

The Mission in Brittany, under Charles D. Terrell's care, holds meetings in halls or rooms in cottages. Special attention is given to work amongst the children and to temperance work.

Our friend, Caroline Armfield, is busy at Thiat, Haute Vienne, in connection with the French Protestants, with Mothers' and Children's Meetings principally.

GERMANY.—Here we have little to report. The unexpected and almost sudden death of our dear friend, Louise Peitsmeyer, who, with her intimate knowledge of English and acquaintance with English Friends, had for so many years acted as correspondent and interpreter, has led to the closing of the last of the old Friends' Meetings in Germany. A few individuals at Minden and Obernkirchen still profess our principles. None of these speak English.

A letter received from the Monthly Meeting at Constantinople expresses "thankfulness for the loving sympathy of English Friends during past months of uncertainty and constant demand on time and thought," and goes on to say that "the generous gifts of Friends in England have been of more value than we can tell in perseveringly relieving suffering and showing our Moslem friends that true Christianity gives power to rise above party spirit, and to think lovingly of all who need our help, of whatever race or creed." Amongst those who attend the meetings at Constantinople are Turks, Greeks, Armenians and Bulgarians, and an Assyrian from Nineveh is specially mentioned as being very regular in coming.

On behalf of the Continental Committee,

SAMUEL J. ALEXANDER,
Clerk.

CHRIST AND WAR.*

We have in hand from Friends' Book and Tract Committee in New York City a copy of "Christ and War." It is a Peace Study Text-Book. Friends have a certain hereditary equipment for Peace work, but none on this account need feel the time spent on this admirable presentation wasted. It puts our equipment in order for battle! We append herewith a worthy review of it from Friends' Fellowship papers:

The author modestly describes his book as "A Peace Study Text-book," but it is much more than that; it is a work for which many have been waiting long—compact, adequate and suggestive. Experts like Norman Angell have specialized in their own particular fields of investigation, but a book has been lacking which sounded the universal note by combining in one the religious and economic aspects of the peace question. Students and inquirers, however, can now turn with confidence to this compact volume, assured that it will meet all the demands made upon it.

The subject is handled in eight chapters, equally divided between the Old and the New Testament, and from the outset it is made clear that these two forms of advocacy are not contradictory, but complementary. In the first section the arguments are based unreservedly on the fact that the Kingdom of God is a present reality and not a far-off ideal. From point to point the author moves, never relying on precious good-texts, but always adjusting his position to the spirit as well as to the mind of the Master. Difficult passages in the New Testament are truthfully read, and favorable ones occasionally given a fresh setting, until at last the reasonable conclusion is reached that "Jesus Christ calls us to follow Him in His suffering and death; this is not compatible with the waging of war, even in the cause of justice or in self-defence. . . . The spirit of Jesus is able to transform the world, but it cannot do this while the people through whom it ought to work, the followers of Christ, acquiesce in a lower ideal than that which He showed us."

In the second part the author traverses ground already made familiar by the investigations of Norman Angell and Jacques Novikow; but he is by no means content to follow passively in the tracks of these pioneers, and though he acknowledges his indebtedness to them, he is sufficiently independent to offer contributions and criticisms of his own. Three chapters are particularly arresting—"The Dawn of Hope," "Is it Impossible?" and "Reason versus Force." The first of these is devoted to the consideration that war is irrational and futile on both political and economic grounds; the second to the demonstration of the fact that no true interest of humanity would suffer if war were abolished; and the third to the vested interests which exist to promote rivalry in armaments and so prevent people from recognizing that the day of war is over.

From the first page to the last the book is thorough, stimulating, and balanced, and when the student has assimilated the arguments and opinions so carefully set forth in its pages he will find himself thoroughly equipped for every phase of a great and pressing controversy.

SALE OF "THE SHELTER FOR COLORED ORPHANS."

It will interest Friends of "The Shelter for Colored Orphans" to know that on Fifth Month 15th the Board of Managers signed an agreement for the sale of its present buildings, grounds and equipment at Forty-fourth and Wallace Streets, Philadelphia. The purchasers want to take possession in the Eighth Month next, before which time we expect, with help from the Children's Bureau and the Children's Aid Society, to find permanent or temporary homes for our family of forty-two colored girls. Our heirlooms of antique furniture, and such books, pictures, etc., as we retain in possession will be stored until we have built a new home.

For some time the Board of Managers have felt that it would be very much to the advantage of our children if we had the "cottage system" of buildings, doing away with the disadvantages of life in a large group; if the Shelter were in the country, and if the caretakers and teachers were the best sort of colored people, rather than white persons.

Way began to open for the realization of our desires more than a year ago, when we received an invitation from the Institute for Colored Youth to move to Cheyney, and to co-operate with them, having our children taught by their pupil teachers. As we conferred together this plan more and more commended itself to both boards of managers. All that was needed was money to buy land and to build at Cheyney. The sale of the present Shelter property, at rather better advantage than was expected, now justifies us in proceeding. A choice location on the grounds of the Institute for Colored Youth has been offered for the new "Shelter" buildings, and architects are preparing plans. At first there will probably be the school-house, and two cottages, each accommodating fifteen children and their house-mother. It is hoped that work may soon be begun on these, and that before many months have passed our family may be gathered together again in what will be really a home to them. While the two institutions will continue each to carry out the different purposes for which they were respectively established, we believe their proximity and co-operation will increase the economic management and the efficiency of both.

MEETING AT STONY BROOK.

If readers of THE FRIEND will refer to the issues of Second Month 12th and 10th, 1914, they will find a full account of Stony Brook Meeting. The meeting-house is of note to Friends in many ways, as the center of one of the earliest settlements in this section of New Jersey, antedating the Presbyterian meeting-house in Princeton by thirty-seven years. This quaint old place of worship has been closed for more than thirty years to anything of a religious nature.

First-day, Fifth Month 24th, marked a new epoch in its history. Its doors and windows were opened, the cobweb festoons of its silent walls had been removed, and about three hundred interested people gathered to hear the messages of Gospel love, telling of God's plan of Redemption for mankind as one after another of our favored ministers proclaimed the unsearchable riches of the Gospel of Christ, who paid the debt and became the Mediator between God and fallen man. All were encouraged to accept Him as their eternal hope of glory and many could say, it is the truth, the very truth.

It was a sober, quiet, orderly time; some persons of note were present, and seemed to be thankful for the opportunity of attending a meeting of this kind. We humbly trust that more of our closed meeting-houses may again resound with the same Gospel truths, and that there may be a flocking to Christ as doves to the window, that earnest seeking hearts may be gathered in to be true workers in the Lord's vineyard, and become pillars in His temples, to go no more out forever.

MY SYMPHONY.

To live content with small means;
To seek elegance rather than luxury, and refinement rather than fashion;
To be worthy, not respectable; wealthy, not rich;
To study hard, think quietly, talk gently, act frankly;
To listen to stars and birds, to babes and sages, with open heart;
To bear all cheerfully; do all bravely, await occasions, hurry never;
In a word, to let the spiritual, unbidden and unconscious grow up through the common.
This is to be my symphony.—CHANNING.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

JESUS THE CARPENTER.

Selected by M. L. B.

If I could hold within my hand
The hammer Jesus swung,
Not all the gold in all the land,
Nor jewels countless as the sand,
All in the balance flung,
Could weigh the value of that thing
Round which his fingers once did cling.

If I could have the table He Once made in Nazareth,
Not all the pearls in all the sea,
Nor crowns of kings or kings to be
As long as men have breath,
Could buy that thing of wood he made—
The Lord of lords who learned a trade.

Yes, but His hammer still is shown
By honest hands that toil,
And round his table men sit down:
And all are equals, with a crown
Nor gold nor pearls can soil:
The shop at Nazareth was bare—
But Brotherhood was builded there.

NEWS ITEMS.

BRITISH FRIEND.—Wm. and Robert Smeal, of Glasgow, in their prospectus, say that owing to the discontinuance of the Irish Friend at the close of 1842, there seemed to be a need for a similar paper. Accordingly the British Friend was started First Month 31, 1843. It was stated that the new paper would advocate the abolition of slavery and the slave trade; the protection of aborigines; improvement of the condition of their fellow subjects—natives of India; moral reform; peace societies, and the cause of temperance. Literary and scientific contributions, it is stated, would be welcome. The immediate repeal of the Corn Laws was also advocated. That this course was steadily pursued is shown by the files of the paper.

The paper, at first a quarto (1843-1845), was in 1845 changed to octavo, which size was retained until the close (1846-1913).

The editors were William and Robert Smeal, 1843-1860, when William Smeal died, and his brother Robert continued as editor until his death in 1886. J. G. Smeal, a son, held the place until 1892, when the paper was sold to a group of Friends by whom the editorship was intrusted to William Edward Turner, of Birkenhead, to which place the paper was moved. In 1897 W. E. Turner removed to Colwyn Bay, North Wales, taking the paper with him. In 1901, on account of W. E. Turner's failing eyesight, Edward Grubb became assistant editor, and in Eighth Month of the same year editor-in-chief, when the paper was moved to London, and in 1906 to Croydon, where it remained until its discontinuance last year.—Bulletin Friends' Historical Society.

Two groups of English Young Friends are visiting Young Friends in the United States this summer. The first group, which starts about [Sixth Month] 18th, consists of Raymond Whitwell, Robert Davis, Sylvia Marriage, M. Ethel Crawshaw, Margaret S. Thorp and Harriet M. Newman, with James G. Douglas representing Irish Young Friends and Dublin Yearly Meeting. The later group will probably include Elizabeth Fox Howard and Olive Graham. Among the engagements of the visiting Friends a short stay at the Whittier Guest House is probable.—The Friend (London).

WM. COOPER reports in The Australian Friend the presentation of the memorial of the Meeting for Sufferings bearing on the Defence Act to the Prime Minister on the morning of Third Month 12th. The conclusion of this report follows:

The Prime Minister, in reply, doubted whether he should have received this deputation at all, but he had done so and given Friends an opportunity to state their case, and he was glad that in doing so they had confined themselves entirely to a matter of conscience. He expressed his sincere respect for the Society of Friends, but the law said that every male member of the community should serve the community by learning to bear arms. They (Ministers) were there to carry out the Act; and they intended to do so without discrimination, though as leniently and humanely as possible. He could not understand the position that Friends assumed; they would not even take up non-combatant duties, works of mercy, healing the sick, caring for the wounded, and others of like character. The Prime Minister spoke of the enormous expenditure for war purposes of all the leading nations of the world, among which Britain's share was certainly not the least, and of the probability that she too would shortly be forced to adopt compulsory military training. He said—"I believe there is a better way; but until the nations have learned the better way, every other nation must be prepared." He regretted the fact, but had to yield to it, that there was no hope for Australia except in arming herself; to fail to do so was to invite disaster, and to lose the freedom we now possess. The law, as it existed, was made by the will of the people, and there was no hope of relief to Friends from its provisions, except by influencing public opinion.

The Minister for Defence (Senator Millen) said that if the Society of Friends could bring forward any suggestion whereby their difficulties could be overcome without opening the door to fraud and subterfuge, he would gladly give it consideration. Conscience, he said, was not some tangible thing that could be produced and demonstrated. W. COOPER.

[We are permitted to print the following extracts from a personal letter.—Ems.]

CANTON, China, Fourth Month 20, 1914.
Five years have passed since I arrived in Canton. Since that time many changes have occurred in my life and in that of the community in which I live. When I first came to this compound there was but one permanent building standing—a three-story recitation hall. Now there are in addition three dormitory buildings, each accommodating one hundred students, a hospital building and five permanent residences, while a fourth dormitory, a building for the students' Y. M. C. A., an administration building, a residence for the Chinese dean of the College and my own residence "The William Penn Lodge" are in process of construction. Ground will soon be broken for the permanent buildings of the primary school. The money for these buildings has all been contributed through the generosity of Chinese and American friends.

More important than these material developments of the college has been its growth in other lines. The curriculum of studies has been very greatly improved and the standard of the school raised so that there is not an institution in China to-day with a higher grade of education than the Canton Christian College. More than this there has been a great change in the religious atmosphere. Four years ago there was something of an anti-foreign feeling on the part of the students toward the foreign staff and there was a real antagonism on the part of many boys toward Christianity. The attitude that now exists can best be shown by figures taken from the senior class of the middle or high school department. There are twelve boys in this class. When they entered one was a professing Christian, now there are eleven Christians and one strongly sympathetic to Christianity.

During the last few months my relations with the home base have undergone a change. The Christian Association of the University of Pennsylvania has decided to transfer my colleague, Dr. J. C. McCracken, to Shanghai, where he will be affiliated with the medical department of St. John's University, henceforth to be called the University Medical School. With Dr. McCracken's departure I lose one of my best friends in Canton.

I believe that the place for me to work is Canton, and therefore I have decided not to go to Shanghai, but to accept the invitation of the Canton Christian College to become a member of their staff. This institution, which is planned very much after the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut and Robert College at Constantinople, now has over four hundred pupils distributed between the primary, grammar, high school and college. It is the purpose of the College to develop a medical department as soon as possible.

In connection with my position as a member of the college staff I have been invited to become a visiting physician to the Canton Hospital, the first missionary hospital to be established in China about seventy-six years ago. This institution has about 250 beds, and at present I am in charge of the medical wards and laboratory.

I am president this year of the South China Branch of the China Medical Missionary Association and editor of the Medical Journal published in Chinese, now completing its second year.

Last year I was in charge of one of the hospitals in the city for eight months, during which time over four thousand patients received treatment from the hospital.

Much of my time is occupied with professional work, but my object in coming to China was not professional. I believe that no young man without a knowledge of Jesus Christ and acceptance of Him as his personal Saviour can truly understand the meaning of life. The young men of China are capable of the highest spiritual attainments. The future destiny of this country depends to a great extent on what measure the truths of Christianity are instilled into the lives of the Chinese young men of the present generation. It is with this in view that my colleagues and myself daily teach them the Bible and speak to them of the need of developing a strong Christian character.

In a few weeks I expect to start for a few months' furlough and shall perhaps see thee in the homeland. Upon my return to Canton I shall be living in the William Penn Lodge, and if at any time thy travels bring thee to Canton a cordial welcome will await thee here.

Any details of the nature of the work of the Canton Christian College and my work here would be gladly furnished. I am sure, by my friend Edward C. Wood, with whom I constantly keep in touch through correspondence.

I would that thee might fully realize the joy that has come into my life through my work and service for the Chinese people in Canton. Because of the part that thee has taken in it in the past I have felt like writing to thee at this time.

With kind regards, I remain as ever thy affectionate friend,

WM. W. CADBRY.

An appeal for funds is made to those interested in the Merchantsville Meeting of Friends. Fifty dollars are needed to pay the interest now due on mortgage. Remittances should be sent to the Treasurer.

In Great Britain, membership in the Royal Society is unquestioned recognition of distinguished attainment in scholarship in science. It is notable that there should now be such a long list of Friends who have won this distinction. It is given in the following:—

Our readers will have learned with interest that, as foreshadowed in these pages a few weeks back, Arthur Stanley Eddington, Plumian Professor of Astronomy at Cambridge, who ten years ago was Senior Wrangler, has been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society at the early age of thirty-two.

As we reckon, he is the eleventh member of the Society of Friends who holds the blue ribbon of science. The other Friends who are Fellows of the Royal Society are John Gilbert Baker, of Kew; Joseph Barcroft, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge; George S. Brady, M. D.; Professor J. Theodore Cash, M. D.; Edward Fry; Joseph Jackson Lister, Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge; Daniel Oliver, of Kew; Professor Francis Wall Oliver; Ralph A. Sampson, Astronomer-Royal for Scotland; Professor Sylvanus P. Thompson.

This is an impressive list and representative of a remarkable width of interest and learning.—The Friend (London).

Friends' Fellowship Papers is the name of the organ of the Young Friends' Movement. The number for Fifth Month is made notable by the subjects of the several articles but especially by the constructive spirit of the whole. It is clear that cultivation of the spiritual resources of Quakerism is much on the hearts of young Friends. We quote a paragraph from an article entitled "Ourselves and Other People."

"What, then, is the specialty of our Quaker faith? It resolves itself, into two parts; first, the emphasis we lay on certain phases of the message; second, the methods we choose for presenting it. As a matter of fact, it is very difficult to separate the two. Because we emphasize certain truths as of supreme importance we adopt certain methods. We emphasize the possibility of direct contact between the individual and his God, and therefore we eliminate from our worship the office of the visible priest, and lay stress on spiritual communion rather than on definite instruction. Because we believe in each man's responsibility to his Divine Guide we hesitate in any way to force or over-ride his judgment and prefer to wait till we can all agree rather than go forward with a dissentient minority. These are typical points in which our theory works itself out in a practice peculiar to ourselves, a practice which seems to us appropriate to the proclamation of the message, and the needs of our own organization."

The short essay entitled "Games of Chance," issued by the late Women's Yearly Meeting, is now in print and may be had for gratuitous distribution by addressing Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, or Friends' Institute, 20 S. Twelfth Street.

Friends are encouraged to avail themselves of this opportunity for speaking a word against the insidious attractions of gambling.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated that the largest locomotive in the world, constructed by the Baldwin for the Erie Railroad, was lately tried between Philadelphia and Baltimore with a train of 50 coal cars weighing 4012 tons. The 90-mile run, northbound, was made in ten hours and twenty minutes. Railroad men say the train is the heaviest ever hauled that distance by a single locomotive.

Estimates of the State Free Employment Bureau indicate that Kansas this year will need more than 42,000 men from outside the State to harvest the wheat crop. With a crop of 135,000,000 bushels in prospect there is the problem of obtaining enough men to harvest it.

The value of birds to the public has been thus stated: "Birds may not inaptly be called a police force of the air, the chief duty of which is to restrain within bounds the hordes of insects that if unchecked would devour every green thing. Notwithstanding the fact that the acreage under cultivation in the United States is larger than ever before, and that the crops are greater, the cost of foodstuffs continually mounts upward. Meanwhile the destruction of farm and orchard crops by insects and by rodents amounts to many millions each year. If any part of this loss can be prevented it will be so much clear gain. Since birds perform such invaluable service, every effort should be made to protect them."

The Department of Health in this city has lately advised persons to be vaccinated against typhoid fever. It says: "The value of anti-typhoid vaccination as a means of protecting the vaccinated person against this serious disease has been established beyond question."

A despatch from Georgia says: "More than 3000 hogs in Mitchell County have been inoculated with cholera serum within the last few months by the county demonstration agent, Ridge Roundtree. There is not a single infected hog in the county."

As a preventive measure to stop further spread of glanders among horses, which is endemic in the city at this time, Chief Davis, of the Bureau of Water, in co-operation with the Board of Health, the State Health authorities and horse owners and teamsters generally has ordered the discontinuance of all public street watering troughs on or before Sixth Month 1. Instead of the water troughs Chief Davis suggests the introduction of spring spigots at which teamsters and horse drivers may water their animals from individual buckets.

It is stated that winter wheat promises to make a record crop this year. All the conditions are favorable and nearly 36 million acres are planted to this crop, according to the Department of Agriculture's reports.

A despatch of the 27th from Washington says: "Acting on information from Oklahoma that from 12,000 to 15,000 men would be required to help harvest and thresh the wheat crop in that State, Secretary Wilson today ordered bulletins placed in postoffices throughout the country describing Oklahoma's needs. Wages in Oklahoma are from $2 to $2.50 a day with board, and that of the 12,000 or 15,000 men required for the wheat harvest 85 per cent. would find additional employment handling the forage crops, promising four to six months' steady work."

It was stated from Chicago on the 27th: "A resolution favoring study of the Bible in the public schools and urging churches to petition State Legislatures for laws that will bring about the desired condition was adopted to-day by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. Its aim, as expressed in the language of the report, was "that legislation may be obtained, permitting, as optional or otherwise, the reading of the Bible in the public schools, or recognition of the Bible, for credit or otherwise, in the curriculum of our educational institutions."

It is stated that more than 60,000 lives have been saved by hygienic laws enforced by the State Health Department since its organization in 1906, according to statistics presented at a meeting of the Philadelphia County Medical Society, at the College of Physicians. The population of the State in 1906 was, in round numbers, 7,141,000 persons, and had risen in 1913 to 8,107,000, while the death rate had dropped from 16 to 14 persons per 1000 of population, according to Doctor Dixon, who said that if the same conditions which prevailed in 1905 had continued the number of deaths in this period would have been almost 60,000 in excess of that reported. He attributed this great decrease to the success which has followed the efforts of the State Department of Health.

A great dam across the Mississippi at Keokuk, Iowa, has formed a navigable lake of 100 square miles.

FORGIVEN.—Suffragettes in England have lately caused much disturbance. A telegram of the 21th inst. from London says: "Suffragettes raided numerous streets in the west end of London early this morning, smashing windows. Several of the women were arrested."

The Government of Ireland or Home Rule Bill has lately passed the British House of Commons. The object of the bill has been stated succinctly to be to allow an Irish Parliament to deal with purely Irish affairs, while preserving the control of the Imperial Parliament and government over matters touching the Empire as a whole. Even without amendment the bill cannot become operative before eight months from the date of its passage. Under the Parliament Act the bill can now become law even if rejected for the third time by the House of Lords, where it received its first reading.

It is stated that Japan has ratified the treaty of arbitration with the United States.

The present Secretary of State has made a large number of arbitration treaties, which insure peace with many countries.

It is stated that a similar treaty with Great Britain is under way. It is awaiting the consent of the British self-governing colonies. Such a treaty with the Netherlands has been signed.

It is stated that "artificial wood" is a new French invention. It is made of straw, but, it is said, can be as strong and hard as oak. The straw is boiled and treated to a secret chemical process until it becomes a pasty mass, then it is pressed into planks, or into any other shape desired. It can be worked with wood-working machinery. This is thought to be a most important invention, because the world's lumber supply is becoming smaller.

The steamship Empress of Ireland, of the Canadian Pacific line, was destroyed on the 29th ult., by a collision with a Danish collier in the St. Lawrence River, about 150 miles from Quebec. About 900 persons, it is supposed, perished.

THE MAKING OF A BOOK.

THE making of a truly good book deserves the most thoughtful consideration possible. What face of type and what size of type will best suit the subject matter, what shall be the length of type line, how shall the margins be planned for the best effect, what paper may be used that will best fit the requirements of cost and endurance—and the binding—shall it be boards, cloth, leather or something else? All these and many more are factors which the printer who is an architect as well as an artisan will plan long before the manual labor on the job begins.

IN ESSENTIALS UNITY.

Whether the poet Whittier invented the phrase, "the acid sect," or whether he merely adapted it to the uses of his verse does not appear. Evidently it is a serviceable phrase with both positive and negative content. Acids are of untold use in dissolving and resolving stubborn material, and sects have done great things in promoting Christianity in human society. It is often contended that with human nature as it is, almost endless in its variety, the religious appeal must be made so as necessarily to develop a sectarian spirit. The Society of Friends in its early development was in measure a protest against this point of view. Its very name discarded, intentionally, the use of the expression church, and its protest against ordinances and ritual left it without the time-honored distinctions of most religious organizations.

In modern times there has been a wide-spread revolt in some sections of our country against the ancient Quaker nomenclature, and apparently against the principles at stake in establishing it. In other words, ancient Quakerism was a movement apart from (some would say against) sectarianism, while modern Quakerism in many places has been a movement to make the sect more distinct as such, and to put it in the conventional uniform (of manner and method) common to the denominations of Christendom. To be on this common platform without a compliance with the essentials that prevail there seems to some minds quite impossible. It must be remembered, indeed we are often sadly reminded, that ordinances and ritual can be most elaborate and complete and not be religious at all.

It is fair, however—it may be most important—for Friends to remember that a Society organized like ours in the course of development may lose the emphasis on the adjective religious. Not infrequently in printed appeals to the public has this key-word in our official title been omitted. "The Society of Friends," save for its historical suggestions, does not differentiate us from countless other societies. "The Religious Society of Friends" adds the element which has been presented to our minds as "essential" and has prompted the title for this editorial, "In essentials unity." In the recognition of the religious as fundamental we must find not only the basis of unity, but the impulse for our service as individuals and as an organized body. We need to remind ourselves that it is possible, that in some cases it becomes easy to leave out the religious element even in our meeting affairs. The function of our meetings for discipline is not merely to transact business, but to cultivate the religious spirit in transacting business. The function of our meetings for worship is not alone communion and the elevation of soul which results from communion, but an effort to subdue the lower nature and to substitute for it the higher. Thus we should go out from such meetings with an evident increase of the religious spirit in our lives.

The organization of our Society is not more remarkable in any feature than in the evident intention to put the emphasis on the religious and to keep it there. As an instrument for world service in all social lines it made a wonderful impress during the first century of its history. The significant point all the while was that as a Society it did not invent work and assign it to individuals. On the contrary, as individuals under religious prompting were led into work the Society had resources to further their concerns. The revival of late of interest in our meetings as the core of our system may once again have this same issue. Indeed, there are promising signs of such a development. None who observe it can be other than impressed with the fact that religious concerns having such an origin possess great potency along lines of active unity in the body. Can the scattered sheep of our household have any better hope than this of being reunited?

One other point suggests itself as a corollary to this, and possibly answers the question, "What in the Christian world is the cure for the 'acid sect'?" An increase of religious life, a more real Christian experience, what in general terms we call religion, is the solvent of denominational differences. Everywhere we turn amongst denominations we find both in the present and in the past men and women who have been actually so religious that we become quite unaware of their affiliation or sect. And is not this the chief merit of our position as Friends that we put (or should put) the emphasis on the reality of the religious life apart from sacrament or ritual or name?

J. H. B.

THE TWENTIETH MOHONK INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION CONFERENCE.

This Conference was held on the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth of Fifth Month, with a larger attendance than heretofore. Amongst those present were many people of prominence from this and other countries; among the latter were the representatives in this country of the Republics of China, Peru, Switzerland and Bolivia. John Basset Moore, late Counsellor of the Department of State, was the presiding officer.

A feeling of discouragement seemed to prevail before the opening session, which soon disappeared as the belief was repeatedly expressed that there was a steady and decided advance in the sentiment in the minds of the peoples of the civilized nations in favor of the settlement of international difficulties by peaceful rather than by warlike means.

The "A. B. C." mediation proceedings at Niagara, whether they accomplish a settlement of the Mexican difficulties or not, are thought to mark an epoch in the history of the Western continent, and will open the way for a better understanding and friendship between all the nations and peoples thereof. A message was telegraphed to the mediators at Niagara, encouraging them in their efforts to bring about a more happy condition in Mexico. Preparations for a Third Hague Conference were discussed, and several subjects which should be brought before that meeting were suggested by Andrew D. White, who was at the head of the American delegation at the first Hague tribunal. The preparations for the celebration of the one hundred years of peace between Great Britain and the United States on a vast scale was explained. A monument at Ghent and monuments along the border line of Canada at various points of the 3,500 miles of the boundary were proposed, and various other ways suggested to show to the world how two of the most active and aggressive nations can adjust their differences peacefully.

A spirit of international brotherhood was encouraged. A hopeful aspect of the peace movement is the work amongst the students in the colleges in this and other countries, and in Young Men's Christian Associations the world over. Representatives of about fifty business organizations were present.

The following platform was adopted as expressing the general sentiments of the Conference at this time.

ALEXANDER C. WOOD.

PLATFORM.

The Twentieth Annual Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration while deploring the fact that the history of the past year has been disfigured by wars in both hemispheres, attended at times by shocking barbarities, recognizes unmistakable signs of the advance of the public opinion of the world towards the peaceful settlement of international disputes. The general peace of Europe has been maintained in spite of the grave situation in the Balkans, and in the face of threatened war, the American people have shown a praiseworthy self-restraint, and have accepted with commendable spirit the tender of good offices made in accordance with the recommendations of the First Hague Conference, by our sister republics of South America—Brazil, Argentina and Chile.

We recognize the far-reaching importance of the proffer and acceptance of mediation, and record our confidence that the work of the conference of mediators, now in session, will result in an honorable and permanent settlement of the points at issue between the United States and Mexico. We express unqualified endorsement of President Wilson's declaration that this country does not aim at territorial aggrandizement.

We call renewed attention to the necessity of such legislation as shall place all matters involving our relations to aliens and to foreign nations under the direct and effectual control of the federal government and the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Foreign governments can deal only with our national government; and the respective responsibilities of the States and of the nation should promptly be so readjusted as to terminate the anomalous conditions under which our friendly relations with other powers have repeatedly in recent years been menaced.

We urge such action by our government as shall secure the convoking of the Third Hague Conference at the earliest practicable date, with such thorough preparation of its program as shall ensure for the Conference the highest measure of success. We remember with satisfaction the initiative of our government in calling the Second Hague Conference and in securing provision in its convention for the assembling of the Third Conference. We express our satisfaction that steps have already been taken by our Government to facilitate the calling of the Third Conference. We urge upon our people and upon all peoples the importance of making provision for convening the Conferences at regular intervals.

We recommend that in addition to the present Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague, as established under the conventions of 1890 and 1907, there be established as soon as practicable, among such powers as may agree thereto, a court with a determinate personnel, as advised by the Second Hague Conference.

We gratefully recognize in the establishment since the last Mohonk Conference of the Church Peace Union, in the large development of the British and German Peace Councils, and in the recent solemn appeal of the churches of Switzerland to the churches of Europe for united effort in behalf of the cause of peace, an impressive witness of the drawing together of the world's religious forces for the promotion of international justice and co-operation; and we bespeak for the coming International Church Conference in Switzerland the earnest support of the American churches.

We express anew our deep interest in the proposed celebration of the Centenary of peace between the United States and Great Britain, to be inaugurated on Christmas Eve, 1914, the anniversary of the signing of the Treaty of Ghent. We commend to the world the impressive example of the unfortified Canadian boundary line of four thousand miles. We rejoice that the plans for the proposed celebration include the official participation of many nations, and urge the widest possible co-operation in this commemoration of the triumphs of a marvellous century of international good will and of progress toward international justice and righteousness.

Resolution submitted by the Press Committee of the Conference:

In view of the powerful influence exercised by the press, be it resolved that it is the sense of the Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration that the cause for which we are striving would be aided and encouraged through the convening of a congress of editors in Washington, D. C., for the discussion of International arbitration and for the awakening of the public conscience to the advantages of a peaceful settlement of differences arising between nations.

BOYS WHO STAND FOR PEACE IN NEW ZEALAND.

In an accompanying illustration in The Friend (London) are shown the portraits of four lads who are responsible for the publication of the Repeal, the monthly organ of the Passive Resisters' Union in New Zealand. Except E. Mann, they have all been fined, imprisoned, sent for military detention, deprived of their rights of citizenship, and summoned again and again, all because they resolutely decline to be taught the profession of a soldier. Frank McCullough is the editor, and Hector Mann the manager and cartoonist. The latter has just been committed to military detention for his second term. E. Reginald Williams is the printer and publisher. A correspondent writes: "They are a good lot,—earnest, self-sacrificing, and such fine examples to others." And another says: "These boys are marvels."

Some Cases in Court.

S. Schaffer, represented by — Cassidy, who proved that the lad last time he went to camp lost £40 worth of potatoes; heavy rain fell whilst he was at camp and the crop, which would have been harvested, was ruined. Fine 20s. and costs.

T. S. Cox pleaded that in his district of Marshland numbers of able-bodied young men, far more so than himself, were not drilling. The officer reported that he had drilled regularly until March, 1913, and since then had neither attended camps nor drills. Cox: "That is so, but I want to say I don't intend to attend any more." Fine 10s. and costs, being a first offence.

The Question of Alternative Service.

A grave position has arisen over the question of alternative service. . . . General Godlee has now announced that "certain amendments to the Defence Act to relieve the conscientious objector from military obligations by the provision of some form of alternative service are under consideration."

The National Peace Council, representing ten different societies and organizations, has unanimously adopted the following statements in opposition to all proposals for alternative service.

The document deserves the very careful and thorough consideration of Friends, for the decision will have far-reaching consequences to our Society, not only in Australasia but also here at home. The Defence Acts Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, which had the matter under consideration at its meeting on the 30th ult., postponed further deliberation upon it to a future meeting:

1. The Council regards conscription as a distinct danger to the modern democratic State, enabling reactionary interests to force their will upon the majority by means of the illegal use of force. It regards such an evil and dangerous law, although part of the law of the country, to be not morally binding on the consciences of citizens, or of young men who are not yet citizens. Therefore the Council cannot agree, or advise anyone to make any bargain with Parliament, representing the military authorities, for permission to render alternative service to military training.

2. It would point out to those who are interested in the cause of Peace the obvious embarrassment under which the supporters of conscription are now placed. It is clear to the Council that the difficulties of setting up conscription are so great that the scheme will be dropped, and our country be free from its menace. The first Conscription Act of 1909, contained a "doctrinal conscience clause;" the amending Act of 1912 allowed those who had personal "religious" objection to military training to be exempted; and in 1913 a Parliamentary Committee of twenty members reported in favor of "conscientious" objectors being exempted. And the Minister of Defence reported to a deputation of the Society of Friends that he concurred with that report. The supporters of conscription have thus been forced to bay again and again.

3. These concessions are obviously made in an endeavor to secure popular support to the scheme of conscription. The militarization of a young, free nation like New Zealand would be an unparalleled calamity. The National Peace Council rejoices at the many evidences of the failure to put into action the militarist's ideal of "every man a soldier" and "a nation in arms." From statements made by responsible politicians of their difficulty in administering the scheme, by admissions made by military officers of the many tricks resorted to to escape conscription and of the largely increased number of prosecutions necessary under the Act, it is clear that the supporters of conscription realize that it will have to be dropped. For the sake of many lads and young men who are forced into militarism, with its false international ideas, its stultifying discipline, and its dangerous moral associations, the National Peace Council has no other course but that of frank hostility to conscription, and can, therefore, make no bargain under it, and will be satisfied with nothing short of its repeal.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.

On Fifth Month 29th our Quarterly Meeting once more assembled in the historic meeting-house at Burlington, New Jersey. In this place, which has witnessed the going out and coming in of so many of our forefathers, it was comforting to remember that He who was their God is still our God and that He was in our midst on this occasion.

Early in the meeting a concern arose for greater humility in our daily lives, and we were reminded that subservience to the power of riches and worldly possessions leads away from the straight and narrow way of life into the broad way of destruction. We were admonished to place our trust and faith in our Heavenly Father alone, for His tender mercy and compassion on all of His children, sinners though we are, is our only hope of salvation.

"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city the watchman waketh but in vain"—nevertheless the watchman must be found faithful in his watching.

For "THE FRIEND."

[Although we had an account of the recent meeting at Stony Brook in last week's issue, the following is furnished by an esteemed subscriber from a recital of one not in membership with Friends, but descended from them. It will interest our readers to know the effect of the meeting upon such.—E.D.]

OLD STONY BROOK.

Last Sabbath we attended a meeting held by the Friends of Chesterfield Preparative Meeting in the old Stony Brook meeting-house, which was built, we think, in 1752, and was used in 1776 as a hospital during the battle of Princeton. There had not been a religious service there for nearly forty years. Some one had cleaned it all up, cut the grass around the building, and in the graveyard, and had made a path through the woods from the trolley road. There was a great crowd, many more than could possibly get into the house. Of course, as the meeting was extensively advertised, a large number who were not "Friends" were there, but all, or nearly all, had Quaker ancestors. The people quieted down at the appointed hour (3 P. M.), and it was not long before a young man, unknown to us, spoke. Then Zebedee Haines rose and in a very touching manner spoke of "the wonderful love of the Saviour." This was the thread that was woven into his whole address and no one could help feeling that it came from the depths of a full heart. Then William Bishop preached a clear-cut Gospel sermon, unfolding in a very earnest style the plan of salvation, closing with a most powerful appeal to those present to make the decision to accept, that day, the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour. This was followed by a prayer, and the meeting closed.

After the service was over the people visited the graves. Among the prominent persons buried here were Richard Stockton, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and Benjamin Clark, who gave the ground to the Friends for a meeting-house. I wonder what these would have thought could they have seen the meeting-house grounds filled with great autos, and Friends, Presbyterians, Methodists and Episcopalians all crowding into that quiet little house and into the graveyard to do honor to the dead or to drop a tear over some scarcely legible brown rough stone at the head of a grave of some one long passed away, but loved and not forgotten.

ANCIENT LETTERS.

JOHN LAWSON, A PRISONER, TO MARGARET FELL:—
 "Dear Sister:—In the unity of the truth my tender love salutes thee and all the brethren and sisters in the truth. Dear hearts, walk worthy of your calling, for holy and perfect is He who has called you out of the world. Stand ye perfectly freed from the world, and take heed to be not tangled again with those things you have once been set free from, but walk circumspectly, having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; but every one of you who have been so taught, abide in the light, and stand pure and clear out of the works of darkness, that your Father and my Father may be glorified, that you all may have unity with God and unity one with another, growing up together as branches of one vine—all watching one over another for good, improving the manifold graces received from God for the good of one another, strengthening one another daily in your most holy faith. We are all well, pray for us that we may stand faithful in the Lord. My two friends and fellow-prisoners send their love to you all. Dear hearts, fare you all well.

May the God of all power keep thee, my dear sister, in His eternal wisdom and strength, for thou hast not been unmindful of the servants of the Lord, but hast shewed thyself to be a loving mother towards all the tender babes of Christ. Grace, mercy and peace be multiplied daily towards thee, my dear sister in the Lord!"

THE CALL OF ETERNITY.

This call comes from every part of the universe of God. The heavens declare it. The ocean speaks it, the seasons, following each other so regularly and perpetually, proclaim it. The winds and the storms echo it. The brightness of a summer day cannot destroy it, and the darkness intensifies it. It is everywhere.

Who has the courage to listen to it? What shall be said about that man who, with this call ringing in his soul for twenty years, more or less, has refused to hear it? What excuse can one make at the end of life for neglecting it?

It is an INVITATION—a glorious invitation made to a poor helpless man, lost at the very threshold of this limitless eternity. It is an invitation from darkness to light; from danger, despair and death to safety, salvation and happiness. It promises pardon, peace and purity. It invites a starved soul to an eternal banquet. It promises joy and blessing for sorrow and sighing. This call cannot be imitated or suppressed, but rings clear as a bugle, through darkness, gloom and doubt, both a call and a challenge. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matt. xi: 28).

It is also a WARNING—a terrible and impressive warning of impending danger. It issues from the unexplored world with a force that should awaken the drowsy, alarm the careless and quicken the laggard. By day and by night its voice never ceases. It is a call that moves the sensibilities, and produces temporarily a strange and awful feeling of uncertainty, undermining the very foundations of life. It also reaches the intellect, reproving, convincing and persuading. It may be neglected, despised, ridiculed, and rejected, but it cannot be ignored. It will be heard. It reaches every station and condition of humanity, throwing across the pathway of life a signal of approaching doom. "Turn ye, turn ye, from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel!" (Ezek. xxxiii: 11).

How few there are who pay any attention to this most wonderful call! The great mass of humanity rush madly on in their chosen path, neither hearing its blessed invitation nor heeding its fearful warning. There can be but one result. Nature and revelation both show that punishment must follow—sure, fearful and eternal. The call of eternity is to repentance and salvation. What shall be said of him who neglects it? "A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself; but the simple pass on and are punished." (Prov. xxii: 3:)—Tract by W. A. SELLEW.

FRIENDS' HISTORICAL EXCURSION TO BURLINGTON, N. J.

About one hundred and fifty persons shared in the excursion by boat, on the twenty-third of Fifth Month, 1914, and another hundred or more attended the gathering at the meeting-house late in the afternoon. The weather was propitious and the ride up the river extremely pleasant. There are villages and towns now on the banks of the Delaware, a great railroad bridge spans the river, and the forests are gone from its banks, but as the members of the party viewed the scenery from the deck of the boat, they were able to understand the enthusiasm of John Crips who wrote home in 1677: "I do believe that this river of Delaware is as good a river as most in the world. It exceeds the river of Thames by many degrees."

Printed slips were circulated during the ride explaining the points of interest in and about Burlington, and Amelia Mott Gummere was present to answer questions. The time was short, however, and most were obliged to content themselves with a very brief inspection of the city. At five o'clock the whole company gathered in the meeting-house to hear an illustrated lecture on "Old Burlington," by Henry S. Haines, a well-known citizen. Here again the want of time was felt, as the lecture had to be cut short. Supper followed, the Society adding coffee and ice cream to the supplies which individuals had provided for themselves. The members of Burlington Meeting were admirable hostesses, furnishing an unlimited supply of those accessories not easily carried in lunch boxes, and contributing in no less degree by their kindly management and courtesy.

Supper was eaten on the lawn at the rear of the meeting-house, and it is proper to remark here that those who have not taken a walk in the burial ground of Burlington Friends' Meeting should make haste to do so at an early day. It is an "historical excursion" of no mean import, simply to pass reverently by the graves of George and Sarah Dillwyn, John Hoskins, Thomas Scattergood (of Revolutionary times), Richard Mott, John Cox, Stephen Grellet, Rachel Grellet, William J. Allinson, Joseph Taylor (founder of Bryn Mawr College), Samuel J. Gummere and many others almost equally well known in the annals of our Society. The return by boat in the evening was varied by substitution of shifting lights along the banks of the stream, but it was a contented party which scattered from Chestnut Street wharf and carried into many homes the recollection of the Burlington excursion of 1914.

Let it appear that there was no "history" being acquired that afternoon, let us add a paragraph or two as to what was or might have been learned. Burlington, as a Friends' settlement, is older than Philadelphia, and second only to Salem in this part of the country. It was the ship Kent which in the year 1677 carried two hundred and thirty Friends from England, where they were suffering persecution for conscience' sake. Half of these people were from London and half from Yorkshire. The voyage was long but uneventful. Two deaths on the way over had a depressing effect on the minds of the passengers. We who read the accounts now are tempted to belittle their trials, when we recall that five years later, when the ship Welcome bore William Penn and his associates toward Philadelphia, the smallpox broke out on board and there was an average of one funeral per day for three weeks.

When the Kent arrived in the Delaware, after touching at the mouth of Raccoon Creek (now Swedesboro), they worked up the river to the site of their proposed settlement, called at first Beverly, then Bridlington, finally Burlington. John Crips, before quoted, wrote back to England: "This is a town laid out in twenty proprietaries, and a straight line drawn from the river side, up the land, which is to be the Main Street, and a market-place about the middle. The Yorkshire ten proprietors are to build on one side, the London ten on the other." True to their religious character immediate provision was made for gatherings for worship. The sail of the ship Kent provided the first shelter. Afterward private houses were used. The well-known "six square" meeting-house was not finished until 1691. It stood a little in the rear of the present house. Only a year elapsed before steps were taken for the organization of a Monthly Meeting. Witness this opening minute of Burlington records:—

"Since, by the good providence of God, many Friends, with their families, have transported themselves into this Province of West New Jersey, the said Friends, in these upper parts, have found it needful, according to our practice in the place we came from, to settle Monthly Meetings for well ordering of the affairs of the church. It was agreed that, accordingly it should be done, and accordingly it was done, this fifteenth of Fifth Month, 1678."

This meeting, be it noted, had no superior meeting. It came into existence by its own action. By 1681 it had subordinate branches as follows: Shackamaxon (Phila.), Chester, Pa., Rancocas, Falls, (Pa.) and a branch on Long Island. These soon acquired the stature of Monthly Meetings themselves, but the mere mention of the names gives a sense of the early importance of Burlington.

A general meeting was held at Burlington in 1681 and at Salem in 1682. As this was to be an annual event the name "Yearly Meeting" gradually came into use. Wm. Penn was present at Burlington in 1683, and Penna. Friends held a general meeting in Phila., only a month later. In 1684 and again in 1685 the two general meetings were held. Then Friends were able to reach a sensible conclusion that there should be one general meeting (or Yearly Meeting) for Penna., New Jersey, etc., which should meet alternately at Burlington and at Philadelphia. This arrangement continued in force for a period of seventy-five years. In 1760, Philadelphia was agreed upon as being more central for all concerned. W. W. D.

WHEN QUAKERISM WAS YOUNG.*

BY GERTRUDE ROBERTS SIERER.

We push aside for a brief space to-night our constantly multiplying activities, and seek escape from this insistent twentieth century with its ever-encroaching complexities, in a more primitive, less complex, but perhaps no less active period of our past. Yet the very act of looking backward, the very fact that this is the Friends' Historical Society is a sign that Quakerism is no longer young. For youth, forgetting the things that are behind, pushes forward in the open road ahead, which seems in undeviating course to lead to certain success. "The world is all before them where to choose." But with success achieved or missed, the stress and strain of effort over, there comes the possibility of reflection, the opportunity of returning to our past and of telling adventurous tales of the days when we were young.

The emphatic reassertion of biology of the law of heredity, the reiteration of psychology of the importance of early environment, our somewhat hysterical interest in eugenics, and our eagerness for Montessori Methods—in short, our zeal to be well-born and our frantic attempts to become well-bred, give ample excuse for another glance at our origin and youth. But lacking the philosophic mind necessary to understand the psychology of primitive Quakerism, I can present no scientific explanation of the mystical experiences of our spiritual ancestors, no illuminating interpretation of their psychic life, so sensitive to the power of suggestion. I must be satisfied to attempt that more superficial, more popularized view of the good old days which may appropriately be styled a moving-picture show.

Those were serious times when Quakerism came into existence. "England," says Green the historian, "became the people of a book, and that book was the Bible. . . . A new conception of life and of man superseded the old. . . . A new moral and religious impulse spread through every class. The whole nation became in fact a church." "It is indeed probable," says another author, "that at no other period did England provide in equal richness the mass of spiritually-minded seekers after truth that existed in those days of triumphant Puritanism." The environment was favorable for the development of a great religious movement. Faith stood on the very tiptoe of expectancy awaiting the coming of a prophet with a personality so dominant, an experience so real, so vital that he could bring to these troubled, earnest seekers after truth a message of life.

"All sorts of heroes," says Carlyle, "are intrinsically of the same material; given a great soul open to the Divine significance of life, then there is given a man fit to speak of this, to sing of this, to fight and work for this, in a great victorious, enduring manner. There is given a hero, the outward shape of whom will depend on the times and the environment he finds himself in. Out of this seventeenth century Puritan environment, charged with religious thought and religious feeling, emerged George Fox. The power of the man, and the power of the times met in favorable consent in this dominant personality, answering in every particular the requirements of a hero. For surely his was a great soul, open to the Divine significance of life. A man less great, less truly magnanimous could scarcely have conceived in those partisan days of semi-tolerance, a message so comprehensive, the scope of which was social as well as religious, universal rather than sectarian. And the program of this ambitious young prophet was nothing less than the transformation of the world.

Some one has said that we differ from each other chiefly in the size of our thought units. Perhaps most of us usually achieve thoughts merely microscopic in size. Occasionally a great statesman grasps a national thought. Cecil Rhoads thought in continents, but this weaver's son, apprentice to a shoemaker and dealer in wool, by the fire of his living genius, thought of the world as children of the light.

This man, greatly good, able to imagine intensely and comprehensively, is described as "being in his behavior very reserved, not using any needless words, or discourses that tended not to edification, very temperate in his eating or drinking, his apparel homely yet decent." At nineteen, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, he earnestly sought the Truth, and about three years later he had the great vital experience which transformed his life. He saw the infinite love of God, he felt the intimate consciousness of the indwelling life of Christ, he knew the need of seeking souls, and heard the call to proclaim what he had himself experienced.

"He was a man fit to speak of this, to sing of this, to fight and work for this in a great, victorious, enduring manner."

This heroic manner compels our admiration as it commanded the attention of his hearers in the seventeenth century. His confident claim to spiritual knowledge, "Though all the world should lie in wickedness, he had the truth and might leave the rest to God."

His directness and boldness of speech; his courage in attacking all forms of insincerity, even when entrenched in established conventions; his mystical experiences; his clear discernment of underlying principles of justice, temperance, commercial honesty, and religious education, his practical application of these principles in social reforms; his insistence in season and out of season upon the absolute claims of Truth; all these mark Fox as a great man, great in intellect, in courage, in integrity, in imagination. In this practical reformer we detect no tentative holding of opinion, no reverence for tradition or custom, but the certainty of belief in the life within. With no refinement of phrases, no subtle analysis, but with hard, pure words he proclaimed this loving presence, which was the controlling power of his own daily life. For he interpreted the inner life through the outward, publishing the significance of the Divine presence not only in burning words luminous with the passion for truth, but also through practical religious and social reforms. In the simple honesty, the blunt sincerity, the enthusiasm, the compelling vision of this youth, we detect the "great, victorious, enduring manner of the hero, strong in will, to strive, to seek, to find and not to yield."

His soul was not like a star that dwelt apart, untouched by the spiritual struggle about him. It was open to the Divine significance of life in seventeenth century Puritan England, in the Ranters, the Seekers, the Baptists, in all who sought the light though groping afar off. In the freshness of his experience, and in his abounding life he appropriated from his surroundings whatever could be turned to the use of truth; and in turn, reacted upon his environment with the positive power of a dynamic character, confident of his message, sure of the call to proclaim it.

Such assurance is always convincing, such abounding life is always contagious; and Fox soon gathered about him a group of ardent disciples, many of them capable business men, most of them with a gift for leadership, all with a real first-hand experience and a zeal for work. "From the dales and fells, and from the country sides of the north," says T. Edmund Harvey, "went out a band of preachers whose names are hardly known to the historian, but whose lives and teaching had the deepest influence on seventeenth century England. Simple yeomen, most of them, whose message came more strong by this the spoken word than the written page." They were no passive hearers of the word; but in the freshness of their experience they began to speak with the vigor, the enthusiasm and the assurance of youth. Fox was but twenty-two when he had the experience out of which sprang the Quaker message. John Audland was the same age when he became an eager pioneer of the new movement: "A man of a sweet, ruddy, amiable countenance, and of a cheerful spirit." Burroughs, "a brisk young man of a ready tongue," was just turned nineteen when he went out with Howgill to spread the good news. "In his natural disposition he was bold and manly, dextrous and fervent, and what he took in hand, he did it with his might, loving, kind and courteous, merciful and flexible, and easy to be entreated." What a picture of a boy of nineteen! With these younger men there were others of more experience in years, but no less enthusiasm of spirit. Camm, "a man of great zeal," a capable and prosperous business man; a leading man of affairs in the North of England; Hubberthorne, "slow in speech but of great reliability and sound judgment;" and Widders, "a grave, solid man, and had a great discerning of spirits,"—"a man whose face was refreshment and whose words were few."

(To be concluded.)

MY HEART IS BUT A LOWLY INN.

My heart is but a lowly inn
Like that of old in Bethlehem,
Where busy cares come wayfaring,
And vagrant fears their clamor bring,
And traders barter silk or gem,

And craving wants, like cattle dumb,
Wait at their stanchions to be fed,
While service, clad in homely clout,
All the long day speeds in and out
And late and weary creeps to bed.

Yet, Lord, if through the flushing night
I, too, may see Thy moving star,
And feel, as then, the air astrir
With breath of frankincense and myrrh
By pilgrim wisdom brought from far;

And if the radiance grow and glow
Through every mean and humble place
Till, touched by that unseathing flame,
In penitence and tender shame
I know the Christ-child's beauteous face,

Then shall the drowsy servitors
Straightway arise and shout and sing,
And all my heart's poor hostelry,
Transformed by love and praise, shall be
A palace for the new-born King!

DOORS, OPEN AND SHUT.

FOR THE WESTTOWN GIRLS.

Dean Farrar quotes some writer as saying, and according to him it is a great writer, that there are some truths so true, that instead of being prepared for use in the workshop of the mind, they are left to lie in the lumber-room of the memory, side by side with useless errors. And he goes on, "It is no paradox to say that the most vitally important of all truths are often ignored as mere truisms, though they lie at the basis of all that is most necessary for our peace in this life and our blessedness hereafter.

"To be able to grasp these truisms is to know the open secrets of holiness and happiness. God has made them so plain that the wayfaring man, yea, and even fools, need not err therein." "The word is very nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart."

Now I would not for a moment have you think that I am taking you for a body of uninstructed girls, for I assure you that I have nothing new to tell you. (I knew a little boy, who, when a kind visiting Friend tried to give him some helpful words, answered quickly, "Oh, thou need not talk to me that way; for I know all about goodness.") I have nothing that you have not heard at home in the nursery with mother, or around the breakfast table at the family reading time—but because we must all have "line upon line, and precept upon precept," I will ask you to listen to me for awhile, and I will call my little paper, "Doors. Open and Shut." What a plain, every-day thing to talk about, there is no need to think what a door may be. We can make no mistakes there. But tell me one thing, is there any difference between a door and a wall? It seems to me we might say that a wall is meant to keep one out, and a door is meant to let a person in.

In the Bible, a door is spoken of very often. Jesus Christ said to the people, and He says it to us now, whenever we will listen, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock, if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me."

We rejoice when we hear of any great and lovely person who is likely to come and visit us, and so, shall we not make ready in any way we can, and listen until we hear the gentle knock at the door? He will come in, and take supper with us, we need not be afraid that the food is not fine enough for Him—He will not criticise us, I believe, if we are true and sincere, and will tell Him what we need, and truly ask His help.

O Jesus, Thou art standing
Outside the fast-closed door,
In lowly patience waiting
To pass the threshold o'er:
We bear the name of Christians,
His name and sign we bear:
O shame, thrice shame upon us,
To keep Him standing there.

O Jesus, Thou art knocking:
And lo! that hand is scarred,
And thorns Thy brow encircle
And tears Thy face have marred:
O love that passeth knowledge,
So patiently to wait!
O sin that hath no equal,
So fast to bar the gate!

O Jesus, Thou art pleading,
In accents meek and low,
"I died for you my children,
And will ye treat me so?"
O Lord, with shame and sorrow
We open now the door:
Dear Saviour, enter, enter,
And leave us nevermore.

Another door is the door of the closet. "And thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." That, too, is not a hard thing to do. The closet is within us, and we can often find a little time to go quietly into it, and pray to the kind Father if we are tired, if we are lonely, if we are worried, if we do not feel well, and we think God cares more than any one else about us, how sweet to us to feel that in that quiet little closet we can tell Him so. And then, when we are glad, when we are happy, when we have something particularly nice to feel, when some sorrow or disappointment is taken away, shall we not want to slip away into the closet and shut to the door, and thank God for any of these things. We shall not want to take only our complaints into the closet, shall we? I hope that none of us would be like those Elizabeth Barrett Browning tells of, when she says, "And lips say God be pitiful! that ne'er said, God be praised!" I trust there will be times when the closet will be filled with secret songs of joy and praise. "And thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly." A prayer need not be long to be a true one; the man in the Bible who did not even lift his eyes, and who smote upon his breast, saying, "God be merciful to me, a sinner," did not make a long prayer, but it was a very earnest one, and we are told that he went down to his house justified—that means forgiven.

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,
Uttered or unexpressed;
The motion of a hidden fire
That trembles in the breast.

Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear;
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near.

Prayer is the simplest form of speech
That infant lips can try;
Prayer, the sublimest strains that reach
The Majesty on high.

There is another story of a door in the Bible. We have all heard it read a good many times; I think it is a favorite story, but a very sad one. Great painters have tried to paint it, and a great poet has written a poem about it. In that story of the ten virgins, the five wise ones and the five foolish ones, we know how they were all waiting for the bridegroom together, but suddenly when they were called up to go to meet Him, the five foolish girls had not made any preparations, and had to hurry away to buy oil for their lamps. So, when the bridegroom came the others went in to the feast, and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the foolish ones, and called, "Lord, Lord, open to us." But He answered, "Verily, I say unto you, I know you not." In Tennyson's poem of "Guinevere" the little nun sings to the sad Queen this song. We see that it's about the foolish virgins, as they hurry back with their lamps to the wedding feast, we can almost see their fluttering garments in the night wind, some of them are torn and some soiled, with the heedless life they have led up to this time. But they are in great earnest now, eagerly pressing forward to join their wiser friends, in honoring the bridegroom.

SONG.

"Late, late, so late! and dark the night and chill!
Late, late, so late! but we can enter still."
"Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now."

"No light had we: for that we do repent;
And learning this, the bridegroom will relent."
"Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now."

"No light, so late! and dark and chill the night!
O let us in, that we may find the light!"
"Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now."

"Have we not heard the bridegroom is so sweet?
O let us in, though late, to kiss His feet!"
"No, no, too late! ye cannot enter now."

It is a sad story, but do not let us be disheartened by it, for in the same chapter the Lord was very tender and kind to the servant and said, "Well done, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things." We see by this that we shall not all of us find great things to do in life, only let us be faithful to what is right and pure, and we shall be remembered by the loving Saviour. Now I remember another door told about in the Bible, but this door opens outwards, and we are to watch that no wrong thing comes out. There is a little prayer for all of us, "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, keep the door of my lips." We can all think how hard it is to keep this watch, for ourselves, but God wants us to see that no unkind words come out of our mouths, no untrue words, no impure, or unclean words, that will help the heart inside to grow more kind, more true, more pure. "And out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

Then there are the doors of privilege, the doors of opportunity. We must not wait for a command, an injunction, each time to set us forward on the path of duty, on the preparation for meeting the bridegroom at last, we have the whole story of the life of Jesus at our command; we can study to find in that the inspiration for what will fit our case; we can be young, we can be lively, and healthy, ready for active life, yet we can be disciples too, we can be wise virgins. Such a familiar quotation is this, "For what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God," and how simple it all sounds, at first, but study it deeply, will you, each for herself, what doors will open before us, as we with good will growing stronger and more consecrated all the time as we (with humility depend on our Divine Helper) aim to "do justly" every day, in all our dealings; justly to the dear parents who have sent us to school and who are looking for best returns, justly to the teachers, to the other girls, as well as to people who touch our lives rather more remotely. Then the love of mercy, to be wrought into our daily lives. As a silver thread running through a fabric lightens it up, so we find a merciful spirit bringing our beautiful little acts of love and helpfulness, and door after door will open to us, of loving service. We shall never have very far to seek for someone to help with a touch of sympathy, be it an old man or a little child. The test will be the faithfulness to the high standard, and simple and honest love to "the Lord our God" will be our anchor.

Once again let me tell you of doors, this last time it is in a hymn or Psalm. I think it must have been a sort of Church Processional in the worship of the temple, in the days of the Israelites. Men and women marching, and praising God with voices and with trumpets. We can almost hear the stately tread as they begin, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, the world, and they that dwell therein, for He hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods. Who shall ascend unto the hill of the Lord, or who shall stand in His holy place, He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart," and on, and on, until they chant, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, even lift them up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in." Then with a loud shout of song and trumpets, "Who is this King of glory? The Lord of hosts, He is the King of glory."

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

ABOUT fifty children, members of Concord Quarterly Meeting, with a few visitors and some parents and care-takers, gathered in the meeting-house at Media on the afternoon of the sixth at 2.30 o'clock.

After a time of silence, the speaker of the afternoon, Agnes L. Tierney, of Germantown, was introduced, and gave a helpful and interesting talk on "Heroes and Heroines." She told of a recent visit to the school-farm at Lincolndale, New York, where boys whose record has not been a good one are shown, upon entering, a blank sheet of paper, and told that their lives may now be like that, pure and clean, and bear only such impressions as they themselves put upon it.

The hero of the school is Abraham Lincoln, whose picture hangs in every room, and whose virtues of courage and of patience they are trained to emulate.

So we all have our heroes; those whom we admire, and by the example of whose lives we try to shape our own, as we set our watches by the regulators kept for that purpose.

The story of the "Hall of Heroes," which a man once saw in his dream, was then told. Each room was dedicated to the heroes of one especial type, and each had its own motto. But the highest room of all was kept for the "heroes of love," and its inscription read, "Greater love hath no man than this; that a man lay down his life for his friends." In the centre was a statue representing the Saviour, who is the great Hero, whose life has been in some measure the regulator of all truly heroic lives.

In conclusion, the young people were encouraged to a fuller knowledge of His life and His sayings, and an earnest endeavor to live in close touch with Him.

Harriet M. Rhoads then spoke briefly, encouraging our younger members to attend meetings and to feel themselves a part of them.

We were invited to a social hour, which was divided between refreshment and some lively games in the spacious yard of the meeting-house. It was a happy afternoon for all.

THE WOMAN WITH THE SABLE FURS.

I had seen her again and again, this woman with the sable furs. Sometimes she was entering or leaving her carriage. Then I would pass her face to face on the street. Her bearing was that of a queen. Her tailored skirts were always of the finest broadcloth, and her coat of rich fur.

I mentally shrugged my shoulders every time I passed her. She impressed me as exceedingly haughty, self-sufficient, and overbearing. So I set her down in my own mind, without knowing aught about her.

Some one asked me to assist with a church supper. I had promised, and on the evening arranged for it I was flying about, assisting in little things.

The supper room was crowded. The places at the tables were taken, and many were waiting their turn. I saw the woman with the sable furs come in and look about with her haughty, self-sufficient glance. As her eye swept calmly over the room, it gave the impression that it saw everything there was to be seen. It gave its clear, broad sweep, and rested at last upon the table where two young women with little children in their arms were trying to eat. The women were shabbily dressed. They looked careworn and over-worked. They were getting little enjoyment from their suppers, for their year-old babies pulled at the plates and clutched at the forks.

The woman with the sable furs looked upon them. I turned away disgusted, for I fancied I read the scorn in her face.

Bused with serving, the little incident passed from my mind. After a few minutes I returned to that end of the table. The two young women were eating their supper with an expression of satisfaction and ease. The babies were not with them.

"Where are the children?" I asked.
"A lady offered to take care of them until we finished," was the reply.

I turned away. As I passed the open door leading into a small class room, I saw again my lady with the sable furs. She sat with a child resting against each arm. The babies were gurgling with laughter. They rubbed their cheeks against the soft fur and called it "Kitty-kit."

Several weeks passed before I saw her again. This time it was in the crowded station at a junction. The seats were filled. A number stood in the center of the room awaiting the incoming train.

A querulous old body sat back in a corner seat. She smelled of snuff and tobacco. She wore a knitted hood of the style of a quarter century back. Her shawl was heavy and cumbersome. She had come in on the eleven o'clock accommodation after a ride of several hours, and was compelled to wait until three o'clock for the train on the main line.

"But I had a fine dinner," she told me with satisfaction. "At the hotel. Everything you could think of, and servants and all fixed up to kill."

"You did not go alone?" I exclaimed. The only hotel of any importance was several squares away.

"No, a lady took me. She came in on the same train I did. When she knew I was alone, she invited me to go. She said I shouldn't worry. She'd see I got on the train all right. I'm slow and a bit uncertain."

I moved away, wondering what good fairy had put it into some one's mind to make the old woman's day happy.

When train time came I knew it was my lady of the sable furs. She led the old woman away, and I saw them enter the car together.

My eyes were wide open now. I had been expecting to find dead leaves and barren bushes. Instead I had stumbled upon a rare, dainty flower, whose sweetness lingers with me even yet.—Sunday School Times.

NEWS ITEMS.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING FIGURES.—The statistical returns presented to the Yearly Meeting this week show a total membership (including those residing abroad) of 19,942 persons, a net increase of 166 in the year. The Quarterly Meetings chiefly responsible for the increase are London (56), Yorkshire (36), Warwick (34), Beds. (29), and Norfolk (18); also the Australian General Meeting (46). The decreases in several other Meetings reduce the total gain. The number of persons received by renunciation was 344 and as minors 77. Ten years ago the membership totalled 18,221. The number of Recorded Ministers continues to show a steady decline. The number, 329 (199 men and 130 women), is 9 less than last year, 19 less than two years ago, and 65 less than in 1904, when the number stood at its highest in recent years. The number of Recorded Ministers, however, represents a diminishing proportion of the vocal ministry in our meetings.—The Friend (London).

"ANNUAL MONITOR."—Shortly before his death, William Robinson, who had long edited the Annual Monitor, strongly urged the acceptance of the editorship upon Francis A. Knight, of Winscombe. For the last six years our Friend has regularly issued that faithful record of Friends who have passed away. His editorship has been marked by the introduction of portraits and by greater variety in the nature of the obituary notices. We regret that circumstances have now obliged him to relinquish his task. As announced on another page, he has chosen as his successor Joseph John Gill, of Newcastle-on-Tyne. The new editor has for many years had control of the memorial notices which form a regular feature of the Acknowledged Scholars' Report, and we bespeak for him the support of all Friends interested.—The Friend (London).

FINANCIAL STATISTICS are not interesting to the general reader, although they are necessary to the cause they represent, and perhaps some of us pay them too little heed. In looking over the Report of Friends' Peace Association I was surprised to see that there were only 114 Annual Subscriptions last year; and the question asked itself, "Where are the 3,000 and more adult members of our Yearly Meeting who are not represented in the Report?"

That they believe in Peace and sincerely desire it we cannot doubt. But what are they doing to promote Peace at this portentous time when the cloud of war hangs threateningly on our horizon?

We trust they are doing much. Every earnest effort in the home, the School, or the social circle to instil Peace ideals, and arouse enthusiasm for Peace, is of incalculable worth. But may each one be sure that he is doing something for the cause.

And are there not many Friends who could easily add to their own efficiency, and the efficiency of our Peace Association, by giving one dollar a year to its support? Let us hope that the Report for 1915 will show at least 600 Annual Subscribers.

MARGARET SHEPPARD.

THE FOLLOWING review of a book that has more than once been alluded to in THE FRIEND is taken from the last issue of the Bulletin of the Friends' Historical Society: "John Woolman, His Life and Our Times; Being a Study in Applied Christianity." By W. Teigmouth Shore. Macmillan & Co., Ltd. 1913. 12mo, ix, 273 pp. 5 shillings net.

From England, where John Woolman laid down his saintly life, comes an appreciation of the man and his work which is still another effort to visualize this remarkable character. He shares with Shakespeare an almost total lack of facts dealing with his personal life, for his Journal has the first requisite of a classic, in that it might have been written for any, or for all, time.

To make up for this absence of the human, or rather, the personal, note, W. T. Shore has supplied some interesting pages on the Quaker Philadelphia of John Woolman's day.

The "Story of an Old Farm," by Andrew Mellick, which he quotes for the country setting of Northampton Township, belongs rather to the hills of Northern New Jersey than to the perfectly flat, and ultra-English surroundings in which Woolman was born. No more conservative, plain Quaker social atmosphere ever existed than the Jersey village of Ranocoes in the eighteenth century. The atmosphere depicted by Andrew Mellick is essentially Dutch, while Burlington County, even in the survival of certain customs, to-day bears evidence of its pure English ancestry. The house in Mt. Holly, incorrectly illustrated by Bowden ("History of Friends in America," Vol. 2, p. 303) as Woolman's, was, in fact, built in 1786, by another tailor, also a Quaker, Jabez Woolston, as the date-stone still testifies. It would be ungracious to dwell on slight slips, such as the "appointment" of Woolman as "Minister at Mount Holly Particular Meeting" (p. 45); the location of the Philadelphia merchant, John Smith, in Burlington, in 1748 (p. 58), and various other errors.

What we seek is Woolman's "Christianity" applied to "Our Times"—and we are disappointed when we miss this altogether. Nevertheless, let us rejoice at having a sympathetic pen dwell so lovingly on the wonderful Journal and selections from Woolman's essays. It is much to have attention again called to their timeliness, and the loveliness of a saintlike character loses nothing in the hands of W. Teignmouth Shore.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

The remaining Senior exercises, consisting of recitations and original essays, except those reserved for Graduation Day, were finished last week in our morning collections.

Benjamin R. Hoffman, president of the F. S. S. Alumni Association, who recently took an extended trip through the Orient, showed some unique and beautifully colored slides in the course of his recent lecture before the School on "Northern Persia of To-day."

EMILY OLIVER addressed the members of the lower School on the 4th inst. very interestingly on "Child Life in Syria."

On three recent afternoons the Boys' Athletic Meet has been held in sections on the field at Twenty-third and Market Streets. Awards for honors in this meet, as well as in baseball, basket-ball and tennis, for both boys and girls, were announced in morning collection on the 5th. The All-Round Championship of the School is awarded to a boy and also to a girl in consideration of the following points: first, the spirit and loyalty of the candidate; second, faithfulness in practice; third, number of sports engaged in; fourth, skill in these sports. Blanche S. Doe, of the Senior class, was awarded the championship for girls, and Fred A. Brecht for boys.

MARY H. BAILEY, the School Secretary, sailed on the 5th inst. on the S. S. Mesaba for a vacation trip in Europe.

FORREST A. DEGRAFF is to be in charge of the work in Mathematics at the summer Normal School in Richmond, Va. It is expected that he will conduct three courses for teachers.

WESTTOWN NOTES.

By the time these notes reach our readers the year's work will have been virtually accomplished. The graduating exercises take place on the morning of the 17th, and consist of essays read by four members of the class, the valedictory and an address to the class. In the afternoon of commencement day there will be various games on the campus between students and old scholars, and as there will be no meeting of the Alumni Association in the evening, before the usual supper hour the large family will have scattered.

FOR certain reasons it has been decided, for the present year at least, to shift the Alumni Meeting to the autumn. The date has been already fixed, Tenth Month 3rd. The executive committee of this association have recommended that classes of the past years, planning reunions in the autumn, fix upon this same Seventh-day, ample time for the class gatherings will be allowed and in this way a full alumni meeting may be expected and the class reunions made quite as enjoyable as under former plans.

IN connection with the graduation exercises for the 17th, the speakers appointed by the faculty are Willard H. Smedley, Marguerite L. Brinton, Helen R. Brown and Kenneth Oliver. Ida Roberts was elected by the class as valedictorian, and William V. Dennis, of Friends' Select School, was invited to address them.

WITH the beginning of vacation needed repair work on the buildings will be commenced and pushed as rapidly forward as possible. The largest item of work will be the erection of the addition to the south front of the boys' wing of the building. The plan contemplates the surrender of room No. 9 on the first floor and the three small chambers over it; this space, with the addition that is to be built to the south of it, will make comfortable apartments to be occupied next year by George and Lydia Jones. Later bulletins from Westtown will inform of other work that is to be done. The new water system is now far advanced toward completion and gives promise of meeting a demand that has long been urgent.

NUMEROUS changes in the teaching staff are to be made. Wm. B. Harvey, as is generally known by our readers, expects to travel with Wm. C. Allen and wife, leaving San Francisco for China before the opening of the autumn term. He will probably leave Westtown on Eighth Month 20th, his duties being largely assumed by Charles S. Carter, who will become resident at the School. David H. Forsythe will take up new duties and responsibilities in connection with THE FRIEND and also some others at 207 Walnut Place; Samuel H. Brown goes to Harvard for a year of study. Chas. W. Palmer, after a year's absence at the University of Pennsylvania, returns to teach science, and Le Roy Jones, of Indiana, enters as a new member of the faculty. Helen D. White has resigned and expects to teach in the Germantown Friends' School, and Sarah J. Braeken as teacher of cooking is succeeded by Fannie E. Beal, a graduate of Columbia.

AN unusually large number of our family plan to indulge in foreign travel. The most extensive journey contemplated has been already alluded to. In addition, Mary Ward plans to spend the summer in England, the special object of her outing being to visit, so far as she can, scenes associated with the seventeenth century history of Friends. Anna Walton makes a general tour with members of her family and Edith L. Cary plans to give the major part of her time to Rome and Italy.

DERIVE the past fortnight the athletic events at the School have been most interesting, notable among these was the "water meet" on the lake on the afternoon of the 2nd. Games of cricket and baseball have been played on our own grounds with Colbarcroft, Havorford, Penn Charter and Old Scholars, besides many games between classes at the School. Early in the term a game was played with Williamson School on their grounds. A tennis tournament has been carried on for two weeks or more; the successful contestants will be announced in a few days.

THE Lake House rarely fails to be the scene of some wholesome diversion three or four times each week. A supper was recently given there by a few of our teachers to Leslie Pinckney Hill and wife and Julia Phillips, of the Cheyney Institute.

IT has been a source of gratification to the faculty to note the increasing number of boys who are expecting to spend their summers at some healthful occupation, notably to work on farms. If any Friends have need of a Westtown boy during the summer, it is possible that the need can be filled, though at the present writing all applicants seem to be furnished with jobs.

DERING the past week we have had few of the Committee with us. Zebedee Haines attended meeting on the 4th. The First-day evening collection on Fifth Month 23rd was addressed by Watson W. Dewees on "Some Facts Concerning the Bible," and on the 30th ult. selections from Dr. Steiner's "The Parable of the Three Cherries" were read to the boys and Annie B. Gidley talked to the girls on the "Choice of Books for Idle Hours." Augustine Dwyer gave a lecture on "Longfellow, the Poet and the Man," before the Literary Union at their last meeting.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"I FULLY respond to the excellent remarks in relation to the observance of one of our highest privileges, as well as a reasonable duty, the attendance on our Religious Meetings—the more we are awakened to a sense of our unworthiness, yea, very nothingness, of our entire inability to say, or do rightly without Divine help, in the same proportion will we value the precious opportunity to present our bodies a living sacrifice—whether it be in exercise of soul for the arising of life in ourselves or in that communion which we bless. 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?' The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?' For we being many are one bread and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread—then are we edified, and the Head of the Church glorified. May we never lose our very distinctive, and to me most precious mode of worship, that of silent waiting in our own tents—that we may know our work to be with the Lord, and our judgment with our God."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Director of Health in this city it is stated starts a vigorous campaign to prevent blindness. He does it under the new law requiring an immediate report from persons having the care of infants whose eyes become inflamed, swollen or reddened at any time within two weeks after birth. It is also compulsory to make a similar report in writing to a regularly qualified practicing physician in the district. Says the Director: "Great good will be accomplished by the new law by preventing any possible delay in the recognition and treatment of the disease. It can be cured, and the eyesight saved, in most cases, if proper treatment is started early, but it results in damaged eyesight or total blindness if treatment is delayed or the dangerous disease is neglected."

James J. Hill, in pointing out the exodus from farms as a menace, says the farm will fail and the foundation of America's prosperity be undermined unless agriculture is restored. "The average wheat production in the State of Minnesota is about 13 bushels," he says. "The average in Denmark is 38; in England, 32; in Holland, 34." The saving feature of the situation is the interest that is being awakened in agricultural improvement. He says that, although much has been done, it is only a beginning.

A despatch of the 1st from Redding, Cal., says: "An official report from forest rangers in northern California brought the news that Mount Lassen, a peak 10,477 feet high in the Sierra Nevada range, between Plumas and Shasta Counties, was in eruption, and that ashes covered the ground for three miles. Large boulders have been hurled from a new crater, which opened in the side of the mountain, with lateral fissures running in all directions. A cloud of smoke and steam hangs over the mountain."

A despatch of the 2nd from Buffalo, New York, says: "Three Seneca Indians, accused of fishing illegally in Eighteen-mile Creek, used a treaty dated 1797, sanctioned by the Senate and signed by the President, as a defence. The case came before Justice Pooley in habeas corpus proceedings. Chief Kennedy produced the book containing the treaty which gave the Indians perpetual rights to fish and hunt in the section of the county where they were arrested. Justice Pooley held that the treaty superseded the State laws and the Indians were released."

It is said that the Philadelphia Rapid Transit Company carries an average of 1,500,000 passengers a day, and on days transports 2,000,000. If the cars were pulled by horses, 45,000 of the animals would be required, or more than 20 times as many as are within the city limits.

A Philadelphia paper says: "The Child Federation which has conducted during the present year 20 classes in a course of instruction on the care of babies, is urging the school board to adopt the course as a regular part of the curriculum of the department of household economy. Such instruction to girls between 12 and 14 will reach 11,000 and these pupils would not only be in a position to care wisely for the babies in their homes and have the fundamental knowledge for use in the future in their own households, but, in addition, to impart much valuable information to their own mothers, all of which will go far toward reducing the infant mortality. The Child Federation proposes to conduct a series of lectures for the teachers who will take up the new work, and will have a committee made up of five of the most distinguished pediatricians of Philadelphia to give these lectures weekly, or bimonthly at least, at a time most convenient for the teachers."

A despatch of the 4th from Wilmington, Del., says: "Commissioner Gibbons to-day announced that he had investigated a number of cases of destitute families and had given permission for the children to work this summer despite the fact that they have not reached the age of 14 years. He found that it was necessary for the children to work for a time in order that the families might live."

A despatch from Washington of the 4th says: "One hundred and ninety-one persons were killed and 3726 injured in train accidents on railways in the United States during the quarter ending Twelfth Month, 1913, according to a report to-day by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Compared with the corresponding period in 1912, these figures show a decrease of 59 persons killed and 608 injured in train accidents."

The N. E. Life Insurance Co. has recently published some vital statistics based upon sixty years' experience covering 180,000 policies. From these figures it appears that if the average mortality of all those applying for insurance be reckoned at 100 per cent., that of total abstainers from intoxicants and injurious drugs will be about 125 per cent.

It is stated that the Commissioner of Labor and Industry, John Price Jackson, has issued a warning to committees in charge of the commencement exercises and other popular assemblages with reference to the dangers incurred by using halls which have insufficient exits and aisles, and in permitting the exits and aisles to be crowded. He says many of the popular halls have less exit space than is safe, and when in addition crowds are permitted to stand the menace becomes grave.

It is stated that after observing 600 school boys for seven years, Superintendent Davis of Menominee, Michigan, has reached these conclusions about cigarette smoking: That boys who do not smoke average from 2 to 10 per cent. higher in scholarship than boys who do. In athletics the non-smokers have a still greater advantage. Illness and poor conditions of home life almost always accompany the cigarette habit. These facts are sent to Current Events by the United States Bureau of Education.

FOREIGN.—A despatch of the 31st ult. from Liverpool says: "The death roll from the Empress of Ireland's crew, which largely was drawn from Liverpool, happily has not proved as large as earlier messages suggested. But even as it is the loss was so heavy that Liverpool has been turned into a city of mourning. The message that 237 of the crew of 413 had been saved brought hope to many but intensified the agony of watching and waiting for the publication of names.

It is stated that with the perfection of the tele-phonograph, invented by Waldemar Poulsen, the Danish electric engineer, begins what is declared a new era in the history of sound recording. The tele-phonograph is calculated to reproduce the quality of the spoken voice with a clearness that is unknown in the phonograph, for all scratching sounds are eliminated. Moreover, it is far superior in sensitiveness to the ordinary phonograph, since it will readily record low sounds, such as whispering and breathing.

The steamship Aquitania of the Cunard line, making her first voyage to New York, is 901 feet long and has a gross tonnage of 47,000. The ship has been designed to accommodate a total of 4210 persons. Of the total of 4210, 876 will travel first class, 594 second class and 1700 in the third class. The crew numbers nearly 1000. The Aquitania had a smooth trip of 5 days, 17 hours and 45 minutes. Her average speed was 23.10 miles over a course of 3181 miles. Her highest daily run was 602 miles.

A despatch from Sydney, N. S. W., of the 28th says: "The most severe earthquake shocks ever registered by Australian seismographs were recorded at half-past 12 this morning by the instruments at the Government observatory at Riverview. The waves lasted three hours. Indications were that the upheaval was in the neighborhood of the Friendly Islands in the southern Pacific."

NOTICES.

THE MAKING OF A BOOK.

THE making of a truly good book deserves the most thoughtful consideration possible. What face of type and what size of type will best suit the subject matter, what shall be the length of type line, how shall the margins be planned for the best effect, what paper may be used that will best fit the requirements of cost and endurance—the binding—shall it be boards, cloth, leather or something else? All these and many more are factors which the printer who is an architect as well as an artisan will plan long before the manual labor on the job begins.

"I bless the name of my God, who has condescended to rectify my spiritual senses in such a manner as to fit me to relish the true spring of ministry through His meanest instruments, with all the tinctures it may carry with it of the pipe or casket through which it is conveyed."—MARY PEISLEY.

BELIEVEST THOU?

On more than one occasion when our Lord would teach some vital lesson concerning Himself, or was about to demonstrate His Divine power, He brought His hearers to self-searching by a penetrating question: "Believest thou this?" "Believe ye that I am able to do this?" And when some in His own country were offended at His teaching, it is said that He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief. "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" was his gentle chiding to the self-confident, but easily-dismayed, disciple. Yet the Master was full of compassion toward the honest-hearted who did not yet altogether know Him; and He was ready to enlarge and confirm the willing but struggling faith voiced in that cry of extremity,—"Lord, I believe! Help Thou mine unbelief."

These humbling lessons are not outworn; and though the question touching our own faith may not be precisely, "Believe ye that I am able?" it may nevertheless be one which should put us upon deep inquiry with ourselves, to see whether we have not some form of unbelief which still hinders the doing of mighty works in us and through us. It seems suitable to press home a little the question as to whether we do really and entirely believe in some of our own professed principles. How is it, for example, as regards those cardinal ones involved in our manner of holding meetings for worship? It appears that many Christians of other denominations are now coming to recognize something of the value of "a waiting worship," and are observing a period of silence in some of their meetings; so that our long-tried and "well-sanctioned" practice is just now, from this new accession of interest, rather more popular even with ourselves perhaps. But this is not the whole matter.

"They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength," is a promise of which we have been often reminded. Is our confidence in it equal to the test of leaving to Him the whole issue, whether that renewal of strength come in silence or through ministry? Or are we disposed, when a meeting passes in silence, to reckon some of our companions unfaithful or indifferent, and to cast about us with reflections? A living silence and a living ministry have much relation to each other; but surely no occasion of worship can be wholly flat and unprofitable where there is any diligent seeking, any wrestling in spirit for the blessing. It may indeed become so, if such exercise be supplanted by vocal offerings, the chief strength of which is something less than the qualifying grace of Divine authority and anointing.

Again we have maintained—and have supported our position with many lively illustrations—that gifts in the ministry are bestowed without regard to worldly station, even dignifying the unlearned, as in the primitive church. William Penn said that "rather the best preachers" in his day were mechanics and husbandmen; and Robert Barclay confessed to the tendering effect upon his own mind of "the virtuous life" accompanying the ministry of some illiterate persons.

True, both of these men are witnesses to the truth that all endowments, whether of natural inheritance or of education, when sanctified and dedicated to the Master's use, will have a part, and do have a part, in fulfilling His word and in showing forth His praise; but if in former times the weak and the despised were chosen in order that "the excellency of the power" should be ascribed to the right source, dare we conclude that there is now no place for a ministry that is not clothed with "excellency of speech or of wisdom"? Beyond all doubt, the Lord will give grace and glory to His own work; but equally beyond doubt is it that we need to have our senses exercised to discern "the spring of the ministry," and our hearts opened to receive its refreshing streams, even if sent through lowly channels,—even if administered by a servant who, like John Woolman, may be far removed from some of the current thought and custom of his day.

M. W.

You will easily gather, from the contents of this little volume ("The Sufferings and the Glory"), that I regard the central historical fact in the traditional message of Christianity to be the Death of its Founder, and not any other incident or event or statement that may be on record; and that, if this be correct, the central doctrine of Christianity ought to be an interpretation of its central fact; or, in other words, if historically "Christ died," then dogmatically, "Christ died for the ungodly," which becomes, when translated into the language of experience, "The Son of God loved me and gave Himself for me." The historical fact and the evangelical message go together; if we have an evangel we know why.—J. RENDEL HARRIS, in the Introduction to "The Sufferings and the Glory."

HUMILITY and contrition of spirit seem the only safe dwelling-place whilst we are clothed with these poor corruptible bodies, and we shall find that there is great need of patience unto the end of our Christian pilgrimage.

MARY CAPPER.

[The following extracts from a private letter concerning a visit to Holland will, I think, interest the readers of THE FRIEND.—S. C.]

"I think I must have been fifteen or sixteen when Motley's "Netherlands" fired me with an intense desire to know more about them, and during all the long, long interval I have read and thought much about the brave little country; but somehow we never planned to go there, thinking a land fifteen or twenty feet below sea-level could not be very bracing or healthful. However, with the offer of Italy, south of France, Switzerland and Holland, we fixed on the latter, and this day four weeks we started on what has proved one of the very brightest and most charming of our many holidays. To some Holland might seem very flat and uninteresting; to us it was alive and thrilling on an extraordinary degree.

We each had our pet specialty; J. was exceedingly interested in the wonderful system of canals; C. in the glorious paintings and the artists; I with the statesmen and martyrs. And so we moved about the Hague, attended by a silent troop of loved and greatly honored friends. We could not get into the long desired "House in the Wood," because the palace in the city was undergoing spring cleaning. I wanted very much to see the room where Motley wrote and the lonely home of our William III's childhood; but we had the pleasure of seeing the two Queens on their return from a drive, with little Juliana, who waved a basket of odds and ends gathered in the woods at the little crowd of people waiting to salute the royalties. Both Queens have dear, good, kind faces. One does so hope that the brave little country may go on prospering as it does at present. It is a singular illustration of the invigorating influence of contending bravely with difficulties that would have submerged a sluggish people. The keeping out of the sea is a wonderful triumph; and they are now contemplating the redemption of a vast quantity of land by lessening the area of the Zuyder Zee. It was so odd while enjoying a bracing walk along the dykes at Horne to know that in a few years at most there would be cultivated fields.

We saw the fields of tulips and hyacinths at Haarlem in almost barbaric splendor. The post cards are very ugly in their stiff divisions of color; as we looked on the fields in their setting of blue water, blue sky, and intensely green grass, the crudeness was softened, but still it did not give quite the rapture of a wilder nature.

We attended the Reformed Protestant Church at Amsterdam. An English service has been held in this church for three hundred years, and was regularly attended by the Pilgrim Fathers while they were in Amsterdam. When their Puritan souls were annoyed by the dresses and behavior of the local ladies they removed to Leiden and sailed from there to Plymouth on their western emigration. On the wall of the church is a very nice tablet sent from Chicago; I forget exactly the words, but it began, "We are all one in Christ," then mentioned the names of the leading Pilgrims and returned thanks for all the hospitality Amsterdam had shown them so long ago.

A strong, fine man gave us a beautiful sermon, which somehow united and merged past, present and future in a great and solemn oneness. After the sermon the pastor asked us to come to the vestry and gave us the particulars about "the ladies falling out." He showed us the beautifully carved pulpit erected in honor of Wilhelmina's accession, and the grand brass ornamentation sent by William and Mary from England.

"The crowning source of religious insight is, for us all, the actual loyalty, service, devotion, suffering, accomplishment, traditions, example, teaching and triumphs of the invisible church of the faithful. And by the invisible church I mean the brotherhood consisting of all who, in any clime or land, live in the Spirit."—JOSIAH ROYCE.

Do not say "Life is short." Christ's life was short, yet He finished the work that was given Him to do.

WHEN QUAKERISM WAS YOUNG.

BY GERTRUDE ROBERTS SHERER.

And in the work to which they had given their lives, they needed all their enthusiasm and courage and endurance, all their faith and sanity and intelligence. In the north and in the south, in Wales and in Ireland, crowds of hundreds and thousands flocked to hear them; mobs often boisterous in their rude opposition, but who coming to riot remained to listen. They needed their physical strength for those three and five-hour sermons preached from a rock on the hillside, on a stool, under a tree, in the open field, in steeple-houses. They needed their endurance in the long journeys on horseback and on foot, in the nights spent in a haystack in rain and snow, in a vigil sitting among furze bushes till it was day; in the days and nights in the stocks—seventeen hours at a time in freezing weather—in the brutal treatment of infuriated mobs, who beat them and stoned them; in the vile jails of seventeenth century England, where they suffered long. They had opportunity to exhibit their virtues of character in examinations eight hours long before prejudiced magistrates; in meeting in Christian spirit the controversial violence of the day; in facing with confident faith the narrowing, hardening spirit of puritanism. Yet they knew no fear, no weariness. They poured out their lives in lavish service; for they had felt that Divine touch which is the call to discipleship and leadership.

It is no wonder that the whole-hearted zeal of these first ministers, "guided by faith and matchless fortitude," won many followers; for to proclaim the truth became their business in life. "The virtues of a man," says Pascal, "ought to be measured, not by his extraordinary exertions, but by his every-day conduct." But the every-day conduct of these valiant men consisted in extraordinary exertions. From the congregations of thousands to whom they brought the good news hundreds joined with the children of the Light. We can get some idea of the growth of numbers from the fact that in London alone in 1678 it is computed that there must have been 11,000 members; and from 1661 to 1697, 13,562 Friends suffered imprisonment. The Quaker message was not then conceived as something for a few especially spiritually-minded people of superior intelligence and unusual inwardness of life, but for the great seething mobs, for magistrates and servant maids, for jailers and colonels, for grocers and woolen drapers, and for soldiers and horse jockeys. It was not an ornament of life to be proudly protected and exclusively enjoyed, but the power of life itself, which transformed people of all ages, all conditions into children of the light.

In those early days there was no organization, but a life; no society, but warm intimate fellowship; no church, but loyal disciples and willing apostles; no doctrinal system, but a call to service; no conscious founding of a new sect, but a strong spiritual army bound together by unity of experience and spirit, and courageous enough to give to that experience an all-round application to every-day life. For the truth was not a personal possession to be hoarded and secluded, but a glorious Gospel to be published to all, "whether they be in forms, without forms, or got above all forms." "Let all nations hear the sound by word or writing," wrote Fox. "Spare no place, spare no tongue nor pen, but be obedient to the Lord God, go through the work and be valiant for the truth upon earth."

Yet in the universality of the work, practical details were not ignored. There seems, on the contrary, to have been an adaptation of means to ends, and much good sense applied to religious matters. When facilities for travel and communication seem sadly lacking there was a large body of itinerant ministers traversing Great Britain and Ireland, carrying spiritual freshness and inspiration to local groups and keeping them in touch with the wider movement, and acting as counsellors in new communities. There was time for long letters, admonishing and encouraging, and time to go to meeting. Howgill wrote to Margaret Fell, "We have about twenty meetings a week." In one day nine "steeple-houses" were visited in Durham. In how many of those meetings did they speak three or five hours? There was time for fellowship and opportunity for developing leadership. For with a minimum of organization the work was not carried on in a haphazard manner; the workers met, the field was marked out, action decided upon, ministers sent out. In 1636 there are frequent statements that imply some order and arrangement in the sending out of ministers. In correspondence the desire is expressed that the little meetings should not be left entirely to wait and that not only should they be visited by the traveling preachers, but some minister should be sent to stay a while and act as elder. George Sands in a letter to Fox writes that Uxbridge meeting had declined since Burroughs had gone elsewhere, and asks Fox to send a minister. But wearisome routine and formal methods had not exhausted the tremendous initial energy. Yet with its energy, its faith, its enthusiasm, Quakerism could not escape the faults of its qualities. Young men in their ardor and strength will scarcely make prudence and caution their guiding principles of the cause that has claimed their devotion. We are sometimes inclined to be a bit apologetic of those youthful days, as if Quakerism, with all the advantages of youth, should scarcely be allowed its faults. We would have it "be a boy again, but be a father too!" Their zeal was not always according to wisdom; glowing enthusiasm sometimes led to extravagances of language and conduct. Yet we may generally find the root of these excesses to be a clear sincerity, an effort to make practice keep pace with profession. In their belief that university teaching could not produce spiritual ministers of religion they undervalued all education; for they failed to see that man's spiritual nature is not entirely separate from his intellectual. This attempted separation led to strange symbolism. Under a strong feeling of religious duty with great solemnity, "Wm. Simpson went three years naked and in sack cloth in the days of Oliver and his parliament as a sign to them and to the priests showing how God would strip them of their power;" and this prophetic sign was enacted by various others, once at Oxford by a girl of seventeen, and always more zealously because their natural feelings shrank from what they believed to be a Divine command. Their open scorn of learning and their extravagant practices at Oxford brought upon them persecution by these "Black Tribes of Scholars." The great freedom in their meetings caused complaints to arise "of the songs and hymns and prayers that made melody and rejoiced the hearts of some, but being not in wisdom of words altogether made some scruple." In 1633 George Fox tolerantly replied to such a complaint, "Why should not them that sing have liberty of conscience to sing in your meetings? I do look upon thee as a competent judge whether they sing in grace or us." Among the traveling ministers there was some jealousy. Local Friends were sometimes burdened by them, especially by a few unsuitable women who ministered confusion among them. Burroughs, "the brisk young man of the ready tongue," sent one woman preacher to Fox with this note: "This little short maid that comes to thee, she has been this long while abroad, and in her there is little or no service as in the ministry. It were well to be laid on her to be a servant somewhere. That is more her place. I leave it to thee. Friends where she has been have been burdened by her." Care seems to have been taken to call in unsatisfactory preachers. Wm. Dewsbury severely rebuked Elizabeth Coates and ordered her to return to her home and wait. He wrote to Margaret Fell to send a man and a horse for Sarah Knowles, for her to return: "The truth is under suffering until she be in her family again." Cornwall and Devon stipulated that some ministers be sent them and rather men Friends, for they did not care to have any women.

The spirit of criticism was known in the seventeenth century. Objection was made to the preaching of ministers as being "words without power." Fox was compared to the pope because of his great influence. He was criticised for sending ministers about, and for the introducing into meeting-houses "of things like to pulpits."

Plainness of speech sometimes brought difficulties; as when a woman Friend called a minister "a greedy, dumb dog." Fox on one occasion roughly checked a flatterer with the words, "Repent, thou swine and beast." He warns the children of the light against jars and strife, against preaching in a little, peevish, hasty, fretful mind, against gossip and tattling, idle words, and probably the fault preceded the warning. "They had yet to learn that the inspired servant of God remains a man, liable to much of human error and weakness."

It is obvious that Quakerism had "somewhat to cast off, somewhat to become," but "it was better youth should strive through acts, uncouth toward making, than rejoice in aught found made." These pioneers had no years of Friendly tradition to look to, no hoary customs to venerate, no beaten track to follow: they had the privilege of blazing a trail. It was not a smooth, level road, but it led to the high hills. We have been working at it for two hundred and fifty years, making it smoother, firmer, easier to travel. We have cut through a few vistas, and planted many high hedges; we have straightened a few dangerous theological curves that escaped their notice, and have accentuated others, and we have built a scientific bridge or two. The way is much less steep, entirely without danger, and perfectly comfortable. But it seems to be traveled less than when it was a mountain trail. "When pain ends, gain ends, too."

I wonder if faith shines more clearly upon us than upon those children of the light, or if hope glows more reassuringly, or if love unites us in a closer bond of fellowship as we look back over the long road, than in those early days of looking forward. But since "man is set to instruct himself by his past self" it is not altogether amiss that we should glance again at the brave days of old to see what was mistaken and vanishing, what was excellent and permanent, not that we may sentimentally "pine for what is not," but that we may recall with courage —

"Youth shows but half,
Trust God, see all, nor be afraid."

As two men, whom we will designate as A. and B., were engaged in conversation, they reached a bridge. A., a church member, was pleading with B. to give his heart to the Lord, and confess that allegiance in membership with the Lord's people.

"I am better now than some who are church members," answered B., giving two instances; one, a man whose special short-coming is forgotten; the other, a woman whose temper was in her way.

On the water below, not far from the bridge, was a floating hulk, aimlessly drifting; and further down the stream was a little steamer working up against the current.

A. called attention to these, and asked his companion which was likely to reach the bridge the sooner.

"The steamer," replied B.

A. then compared the temper-tempted, who was trying to rise to the steamer, and B. to the hulk. In some respects, to be sure, the woman was lower down perhaps just then, but she was making an effort to come up stream—to use her opportunity. B., like the hulk, while apparently nearer the bridge, was aiming for no higher things, with diligence, and would probably at that rate soon be surpassed by the one who was trying to attain.

The incident is recalled from memory of the account and in B.'s particular the result not clear, but it is believed to have been helpful to him to strengthen to definite action. However that may have been, is there not force in the comparison, which should stimulate those who do not endeavor to right action, and cheer those who do even amid hindering things?

WE cannot at one and the same time be Christians and deny the foundation of Christianity.

DIVERSION.*

BY EDWARD C. WOOD.

In taking up this subject I do not wish to stand in a spirit of condemnation or judgment of others who may not hold just the same opinions that I do. I merely desire to tell the facts and the principles which have led me to the conclusions which I now hold, speaking in a spirit of love and desire that all of us may live for the cultivating of the best that is in us and in others.

The need of some kind of diversion is acknowledged by all. Some can take it merely in a change of occupation, that is a blessed faculty, but most of us need something lighter. "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," is true for almost everyone.

I suppose the most prevalent amusements at the present time are the theatre, the opera, concerts, parties with or without cards and dancing, and athletic games.

The question as to just what amusements we had better employ and those we had better leave alone must be decided on the basis of another principle than the pros and cons of the righteousness of the amusement, though that of course must play an important part.

Considering the theatre from the standpoint of a profession, A. M. Palmer, the great theatre manager, says: "The chief themes of the theatre are now, as they ever have been, the passions of men, ambition leading to murder; jealousy leading to murder; anger leading to madness; and even worse."

An English writer sometime since computed that Sir Henry Irving had committed at least 1,500 murders, on the stage, while Barry Sullivan had added at least 2,000 more stage murders than this to his list; that Charles Wyndham had been divorced from 2,800 wives on the stage; that some one else, in the same public place, had been "foully betrayed or abducted" 3,200 times, that Ada Cavendish had been betrayed, deserted or abducted 5,600 times, and so on along the list of popular actors.

It is a well-known fact in medical science that persistent simulation of disease tends to produce the disorders simulated; that the human system, in fact, comes to adapt itself in large measure to the will pressure which is put upon it by its indweller. If this be true with the physical system, how much truer with the more keenly sensitive and more quickly responsive moral nature? Let a pure man, or a pure woman, deliberately plan and repeatedly endeavor to think and feel and seem to act as if impure, or even as if dallying with temptation and weighing the possible gains of impurity and crime—and can it be that impurity and crime will continue to have the same abhorrence of men to such a person, as if their very semblance had been counted abhorrent?

Clement Scott, a leading theatrical critic of the London press, prominent also as an author and traveler, made this criticism of theatre life: "Stage life, according to my experience, has a tendency to deaden the finer feelings, to crush the inner nature of men and women, and to substitute artificiality and hollowness for sincerity and truth; and mind you, I speak from an intimate experience of the stage, extending over thirty-seven years. The temptation of the stage is, and has been, quite as bad for me as for anyone else, if not worse. It would disorder any life and shipwreck any temperament, however religious, to have our whole mind devoted to the showy and alluring for thirty-seven years."

In no other approved sphere of art does a person have to identify himself in feelings with the evil part as he does in the play. "The profession of an actor stands all by itself in demanding of its votary that his main purpose and endeavor shall be to seem what he is not, to appear something else than his real self; and herein lies the essential and irremedial evil of his profession." Because of this a man cannot but fail to lose his abhorrence of evil and fear of its results which should be every pure man's possession. My personal experience of the theatre has not led me to think otherwise. And does not this apply to the onlooker as well as to the player?

"This paper was read before a 'tea meeting,' Germantown, Pa., and originally appeared in The American Friend. Thanks are due to Robert E. Spier's "A Young Man's Questions," to H. Clay Trumbull's "Border Lines in the Field of Doubtful Practices," and G. Campbell Morgan's "Discipleship," for many of the best thoughts in the essay.

When we say that we patronize the theatre to uplift it, do we not give an excuse rather than a reason for our attendance? On how much of a higher moral plane in proportion to the life that supports it is the theatre to-day than it ever has been? Or of what increased educational force is it? Religious play-goers are not seeking moral lessons when they go to the theatre. Is it not futile, is it not wrong, to attempt to reform an immorality by fostering and supporting it?

And is it possible to support the so-called "good plays" without giving sanction to those that are just a step beyond?

And now briefly to take up another common amusement, let us ask ourselves the question: Why is it that such a large percentage of Christian people object to cards as a game? Is it not that card playing is so liable to engross attention and to occupy time unduly? The use tends to the abuse. Say what you will about the possibility of temperance, in this matter, and I will here agree with you as to its possibility, yet the tendency and majority of practice is in the other direction.

A good whist player was saying only the other day that if he wanted a good game of cards it was necessary for him to play for money, for, to all the other men of his acquaintance skilled in the game, it was uninteresting unless the gambling element was thrown in. And is it not true that there are many such eager and constant card players for whom all interest in the game lapses if they cannot play for money?

"Gambling in its various forms, such as betting and raffling and lottery, has been under discussion for many years, and the consensus of the world's best opinion is practically against it. It is ostracized in all choicer social circles. A man that is known to be a gambler is counted as below the better standard in the community in which he moves, and by which he is measured. The world's progress is manifestly away from gambling as a permissible practice."

"The main evil in gambling in any form is in its introduction of the idea of 'chance' or 'luck' as a factor in human affairs, as over against the idea of a fitting reward of intelligent and persistent personal endeavor. It is well to learn at the beginning of life that success or failure depends, under God, upon knowledge and skill and labor and fidelity, in whatever sphere of activity one is exerting one's self." Gambling in any form is at variance with sound business principles, and its tendency must ever be always pernicious.

Betting generally "rests on the assumption that the man who bets knows more than his partner to the wager or that his opinion is better. Then he is acting meanly in taking advantage of a more ignorant man, with the purpose of making money out of his ignorance."

"The man who loses on a bet gets nothing for his money, he accomplishes nothing with it." Phillips Brooks says in this connection: "Money to the simple, healthy human sense is but the representative of energy and power: . . . and to carry in your pocket money which has become yours by no use of your manly powers, which has ceased to be another man's by no willing acceptance on his part of its equivalent,—that is a degrading thing."

It is said that "gentlemen" bet only where there is no certainty. John Ruskin says of this: "You concentrate your interest upon a matter of chance, instead of upon a subject of true knowledge, and you back your opinions—simply because they are your own. All the insolence of egotism is in this, and so far as the love of excitement is implicated with the hope of winning money, you turn yourself into the basest sort of tradesman . . . those who live by speculation."

Surely the reason for a diversion is to give rest by giving a pleasing variety in the exercise of one's faculties and enjoyment thereto, so that a person may take up once more his lifework with freshness and renewed vigor. Any amusement may be abused—but is it not better to spend our money and our time in the safer forms, those that do not in themselves contain pernicious principles? . . . A danger in all diversions is that they become an end rather than a means. Personally, I steer clear of the more "fashionable" amusements and practices because I find them leading me amongst people where the highest and best things are thought of but little, where they are crowded out by the continued and selfish seeking after pleasure, not to mention what I know of the ruining effect of these amusements on the lives of so many young men. There is something better in life than pleasure for pleasure's sake. Let us seek and choose our enjoyments then on the basis of the upbuilding of character.

Surely the object of our being is the perfecting of our highest possibilities, so our play must be recreative, constructive, never destructive. As a physical, mental and spiritual being, then, may we not lay down the following principles to help us to choose our recreation: "Any form of play that injures my physical powers, or dwarfs my mental vigor, or takes away my spiritual sense, is impossible for me as a Christian man." Only that is legitimate which recreates and fits me for larger service. Again, I am not to seek recreation which involves injury to my fellow-being. I am only to have fellowship in recreation with a man upon principles which are highest and best for him, and never upon what he sets up for himself if they are lower than the highest.

And so where our diversion will in any way detract rather than add let us pass it by, seeking only those things which are best for ourselves and others and which count for the highest in the lives of all men.

CAMDEN, N. J.

THE CONCLUSION OF NORTH MEETING.

Nine months ago Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting accepted the judgment of a large representative committee that the Northern District Monthly Meeting should be laid down, and its membership be united to the Monthly Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets. The date fixed for this conclusion is now at hand. The morning of the twenty-first, at 10.30, will be the final opportunity for the interested public to join Friends in the First-day worship that has been shared for so many years by those near and dear to us, if not by ourselves. One can hardly make the record without a sense of sadness. Those who feel it most, those who have stood faithfully by the meeting in the face of a vanishing Friendly community, deserve now the largest measure of sympathy and support as they are obliged to close the doors and seek another habitation. At such a time a sense that our actual spiritual habitation is independent of outward place gives us strength to rise above mere sentiment and to believe that the All Wise is also the All Good even in outward vicissitudes and changes.

There may be a point, however, even yet in lingering over the strength of sentiment that gathers about a place where the Truth has been honored so long. Unexpectedly one finds that this sentiment is not confined to the family or household of Faith, that is called upon to go out as it were "into another country." Outsiders—those who look on—find the heaven of such a centre and are ready to testify to it. Two such instances may be cited. The first testimony is from a good woman who knows the city and the Noble Street neighborhood from the very best point of view for a valuable judgment. For some years she was an able settlement worker, and more recently as the wife of a wealthy philanthropist who looks upon his estate as a trust from the Heavenly Father, she has been able to understand social problems from that special vantage ground. We cannot reproduce her conversation exactly, but something like the following passed recently between her and a Friend with whom she met. "You do not mean to tell me that the Friends are intending to close the Sixth Street Meeting? Really, they don't appreciate what a loss it will be to the city! Its silent witness for the Quaker virtues, and for the belief in the immediate presence and power of God is beyond computation! Is the action due to a lack of funds to keep it going? If so, I am sure that can be remedied."

The other instance was that of a well-known business man in the city, descended like many another from Friends, but not a member. After an emphatic expression of his regret for the decision, he said that it was his intention to express this regret by attending the concluding meeting. He also sent a message to one of our aged ministers that he hoped it would be right for him to be present on that occasion.

These regrets may now seem ill-timed—they should not be wholly useless. The problems involved have been studied with much care for several years, and the decision about to go into effect is regarded as the best means of "strengthening what remains." Only by a good measure of noble self-sacrifice has the North meeting been maintained so long. It is a comfort to know that this self-sacrifice has not been wasted. The further investment of it in the city meetings that remain and in country meetings will have a sure harvest.

ANNUAL MEETING AT GREENWICH.

Probably at no time in the history of THE FRIEND have so many appointed meetings been announced as during the past two months. Some of these have been in pursuance of individual concerns; some others have been arranged by Quarterly Meeting Committees—two or three have come to be annual meetings, not a little after the plan of the Half Year Meetings, once very common in the Society. The meeting at Greenwich may be considered of the latter class, although actually held under the responsibility of a committee of Haddonfield and Salem Quarter.

The history of the Friends' settlement on the Cohansey River and the circumstances of prosperity and decline in the Greenwich meeting have been written up more than once for THE FRIEND. The saddest part of the record is the fact that it has a counterpart in a dozen or more neighborhoods in New Jersey. In nearly all of them the traditions of Quakerism are such that it is an easy matter to gather one or two hundred sober persons together in an appointed meeting and to have the largest possible measure of appreciation of the effort. It is that the utmost that can be expected?

This question and others related to it must have been much in mind as the more than two hundred people filled the house at Greenwich on the afternoon of the seventh. Probably fifty of the two hundred were Friends from other neighborhoods in New Jersey and from Pennsylvania. The one hundred and fifty others were what George Fox would have described as "sober" Baptists and Presbyterians and Methodists. The Presbyterian minister probably voiced the feeling of all of these in acknowledging the uplift and encouragement to them of such a face to face and heart to heart meeting in the Divine Presence. If Quakerism is in any true sense primitive Christianity revived it ought to be a common meeting ground for all such sober people. Who can tell whether the present "drawing together" of the sects may not have been sensibly promoted by the faithfulness of Friends in the past toward such open public meetings! Or who is not ready to believe that the most effective service for Friends in furthering this good object now may not be in multiplying such occasions under Divine leadership, rather than in joining in any piece of new church machinery!

The Headship of Christ in the Greenwich meeting was at least a reality and made the meeting what it was. The variety of offering was not without the unifying thread of manifest inspiration. There were heard, exhortation and testimony and teaching and prayer, but the one Lord was exalted as "over all." It is no mean function to discharge in a neighborhood—this of calling all to the essentials of faith and to a common ground of practice, viz.: obedience to the witness of Truth in every item of a surrendered life.

FRIENDS' ACADEMY, MOORESTOWN.

The Annual Commencement of the Moorestown Friends' Academy was held the evening of the fourth of Sixth Month. In spite of the stormy weather, a large audience assembled to do honor to the graduates and hear President Isaac Sharpless of Haverford College deliver a most excellent address on "The Education that Fits One to Do Things."

President Sharpless called attention to the lack of thoroughness in the education of the American youth, as evidenced by so many failures on the part of those who take the entrance examinations for West Point and Naval Academy. Also, the young men who hold the Rhodes Scholarships at Oxford do not show the same efficiency as our English cousins. President Sharpless emphasized the necessity of greater attention to the proper development of our brighter pupils who are to be the future leaders of the human race. He spoke of the fact that leading scientific men to-day encourage a broad, liberal education for young men before they begin to specialize. Perhaps no part of President Sharpless's address was listened to with greater interest than his statement of the need of the kind of education which Friends' Schools and colleges stand for.

Friends' Academy has finished one of the best years in its history. Nothing startling has been attempted or accomplished, but a steady, healthy growth in the things worth while has been in evidence.

FROM LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

It has been the custom of English Friends for some years past to permit full stenographic reports of the Yearly Meeting. These reports are printed in the Society periodicals, and enable absent Friends to follow the proceedings quite intelligently. The following excerpts will give some impression of the subjects in hand the present year.

In the discussion of "Unity and Co-operation" with other bodies of Christians:

John Morland said we were face to face with the most important question that could come before us—namely, how the Society was to do its best for the universal Church. The illustrations of mistakes and encouragements to be met with in Madagascar and East Africa did not really arise in the matter. Love and unity were the Christian revelation. Among the apostles the unity was one of love and redemption. In the flowers we saw God's handiwork in great variety and utterly devoid of uniformity, but everything was perfect and of God. It was natural for the early Friends to say, "This is the truth and there is no truth outside it," and for centuries we had been following them. But sometimes we turned round and thanked God that there had been Methodists and Anglicans, and Salvationists, who greatly differed from us, but were also flowers of God. He felt it would be a mistake either to sanction or not to sanction what had been done in Madagascar. It needed experts and those who had devoted their lives to that special purpose. But he thought we might put it on record that we desired to put nothing in the way of the unity of the Church of Christ. And if we did that, was it not right to look at the other side, that as each body of Christians had done what they could, it was incumbent on us to hold fast to what we believed. We should not help the universal Church by being submerged by it, for he believed Friends had a great contribution to make towards the Church of the future. In the absence of form there was a protest against too much form, which might be a tendency on those who followed these forms to make them realize that after all the spirit was greater than matter and that it was the spirit that mattered. We should show that our faces were set towards peace and unity, believing that God had a great purpose of love to all the nations of the world, and would bring them to the one fold and the one Shepherd.

In considering the report on Education much excellent matter was presented on "The After Care of Our Scholars." The following is the expression of the principal of a well-known school in Birmingham, a minister amongst Friends:

Anne Joyce thought we should remember that young people at the time of leaving school had many ambitions. It was safe to work on that side of their thoughts. If we wanted to secure their interest we must put ourselves in the attitude that we wanted partners in the work of Friends for the world. The present generation had a wider outlook than the last; it saw quite clearly that the service of God was the service of man. It was coming to see that there could be no division into religious and secular but that in many different ways and by different methods the Kingdom of God was coming. Young people believed they were going to move the world; and if everybody thought that, the world would be moved one of these days. Our young people wanted to do the big things and to be long to something big. Surely here was a big thing—namely, that all good was part of the agency which was tending to bring in the Kingdom of God.

When the American epistles were under review the following was expressed:

Joseph Elkinton referred to the work of the Indian Rights Association. It used to be said that the only good Indian was a dead Indian, but that attitude had passed. After 200 years of dishonor in the way their Government had treated the Indians, that Government now held them in respect. They now had at the head of their nation one who was a man, a statesman, and a scholar, and a man of peace who had succeeded in holding back the dogs of war.

The Yearly Meeting decided to send an epistle to Philadelphia. During the consideration of that proposal we note the following:

Anne Warner Marsh concurred. There was that in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting which would be a most valuable contribution to our common Christianity at the present time. This matter, she believed, was intimately related to that considered the previous day. She believed we were now ready for the hand of the Lord, which was stretched out to do us good. Let us in every respect be open-eyed, open-minded, for the blessing which God was waiting to give us.

Probably no subject stirred the meeting more deeply than that of the "Proposed Christian World Conference" and the part Friends might take in it. The view of one recently amongst us will have large approval.

Max I. Reich felt it was our duty to get at the Divine mind on this question. Was the Lord aiming at an outward reunion of a divided Christendom or a revival of Christianity? The reunion of denominations as such was an idea which left him cold, but if we were aiming at the revival of Christianity that was the aim of early Friends. They did not regard the Society as a denomination or a branch of the Christian Church, but held that they had come out of the apostasy of Christendom to a life and spirit and power in which all sects would have finally to be swallowed up.

"THERE'S NEVER A STAR but brings to heaven
Some silver radiance tender;
And never a rosy cloud but helps
To crown the sunset splendor;
No robin but may thrill some heart,
His dawnlight gladness voicing,
God gives us all some sweet way
To set the world rejoicing."

"NOT MY WILL."—Our Saviour crowned his consecrated life by saying, "Not my will, but thine, be done." The world is rocked by the discordance of contending wills. The uncurbed will ruins peace, wrecks home, and spreads desolation everywhere. Says Dr. Pressense: "My will, not thine, be done," turned paradise into a desert; "Thy will, not mine, be done," turned the desert into a paradise, and made Gethsemane the gate of heaven.

The ruin of lost man is thus described: "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way." And this turning to our own way has filled the world with trouble, with confusion, with sin. Sin is lawlessness, and it can never end until we yield to the divine will, and cease to give loose reign to every lawless desire. One will must be supreme before the world can ever know peace; and that will is the will of the Omnipotent One. Let us seek to know His will, and bow our hearts in submission, and we shall find that God's will is "good-will to men," and that it brings "peace on earth."—The Christian.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

We are coming, we are coming,
From every sovereign State;
From the shores of old Atlantic,
From Pacific's golden gate;
From the land of fluffly cotton,
From the fields of yellow grain,
From the mountains, from the valleys,
From the broad and fertile plain.
We know no North, we know no South,
No kith, no clan, no creed.
We're sons and daughters of the free,
Our bond one common need.
In this melting-pot of peoples
God hath set this truth on high,
"Righteousness exalts a nation,"
And this ancient wrong must die;
We've enlisted in His army,
We'll obey His sovereign word,
For we stand at Armageddon,
And we battle for the Lord.

J. K. SHIELDS.

THE GREAT CONVENTION at COLUMBUS last autumn was such a gathering as the above verses describe. Not enough has been said and written about it. Conventions have become commonplace. We may fail to recognize the ones that are truly significant. But let us trust the "sure appeal of Truth to time," and be assured that "the Future, grand and great," will bear a just testimony.

The edition of The American Patriot (Westerville, Ohio) for Twelfth Month, 1913, a special edition of 130 pages, contains the speeches made on that occasion. A finer collection of present-day orations on the Temperance Question could not be easily obtained. Regarding the platform of that convention, J. J. Curran, the distinguished Catholic priest of Wilkes-Barre, said, "There is room on that platform for all; nor can any race, creed or nationality monopolize it. It is a signal fact and propitious sign of the times that the Catholic priest and Protestant minister can, and do, stand side by side, shoulder to shoulder, on that platform. The cause is God's and humanity's. We shall battle for the cause whether on the lower plane of temperance or on the higher plane of total abstinence whether in the lesser ranks of local groups or in the larger files of national movements; we shall battle for the cause."

THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, at the fifty-sixth session of the general assembly, held in New Castle, Pa., adopted resolutions against admitting to membership in the church, "attorneys who present petitions for liquor licenses, persons who rent buildings for the sale of liquor, and men holding membership in clubs maintaining sideboards."

SAFETY FIRST is the new cry of industry. It is wisely economic. It would be a splendid motto for every town and every State. Accepted and applied, it would close every saloon in the land. "Safety first" is not the fact where any saloon doors open. In the motto there is humanity and the surest economy. "Safety first," not the "revenue" from license fees. "Women and children first"—not the liquor seller.—The National Advocate.

ALCOHOL ON THE JOB.—If the various apparently unprejudiced newspaper correspondents of the City of Mexico are to be credited, we now have the spectacle of a drunken murderer running amuck in that country, mocking the whole civilized world. He is keeping fleets of warships busy on both coasts and an American army of ten thousand men at work. Drunk bands of cutthroats roam over that stricken land with torch and knife, leaving a trail of smoke and blood wherever they go. Alcohol is busy writing another chapter of woe in the history of the world. American Patriot.

PENNSYLVANIA'S FIGHT against the liquor traffic, by Dr. C. F. Swift before the Columbus Convention:—

"We are in the midst of a great conflict, and I am here to pledge you that Pennsylvania will furnish men and women to fight until this victory is won. I think it is still 'black.' Pennsylvania stands about ready to make a change on the map. I want to say that we have as many loyal temperance, anti-saloon, Prohibition men and women to the square mile as any State in the Union.

"A little over a year and a half ago the Anti-Saloon League of Pennsylvania told the Pennsylvania Railroad that they must stop serving liquors on their dining cars. They told us they would not do it. We counseled a little with them and told them if they did not do it we would soon begin operations, and to keep us from operating they quit it, but as they quit it they told us, 'See here, I want you Anti-Saloon League fellows to understand that we will present a bill at the next meeting of the Pennsylvania Legislature, and there we will show you what we will do.' They presented it, and it was my privilege on the floor of that house to challenge the right of the Pennsylvania Railroad to run a saloon through the State of Pennsylvania on wheels. We discussed it, and we defeated it nearly two to one.

"I noticed the other day a little clipping from the paper that said Attorney-General Hogan, of Ohio, has found that the constitution forbids a moving saloon, and consequently has instructed the State Liquor License Commission to issue no license to railroad companies for selling wet goods hereafter.

"We have won another battle. About three and a half years ago an officer of the Liquor Association of America in an address in Chicago said this: 'We may be driven from pillar to post in Iowa, in Michigan, in Illinois, in Indiana and some of the Southern states, but we still have our Gibraltar, thank God; it is the old Keystone State, Pennsylvania.'" Less than a year ago the same man, making an address in Cincinnati, Ohio, said: 'Gentlemen of this convention, the fanatics, the Anti-Saloon League of Pennsylvania, has honeycombed our Gibraltar and we are now nowhere safe in this country any more.' That is victory number two.

"Now, you have heard a great deal from time to time about the grandeur and safety of the Brooks law. I want to tell you what we learned over there, and what we are teaching our friends, the enemy—and they knew it better than we did—we have learned that you can no more regulate a saloon into a harmless existence than you can regulate a cancer in the human body. It can't be done, and that is why we stand and are struggling for Prohibition. The physicians have told us that there is no other remedy for the cancer but extermination. I am here to say that Pennsylvania believes that there is no other remedy for the liquor traffic than extermination. My friends, I wonder if we have yet learned the privilege, the duty and the opportunity of the church of Jesus Christ? Long, long, we have toiled and labored and sacrificed for the salvation of men. The Church of God has prayed through all the centuries gone by, 'Thy kingdom come, and thy will be done.' When 'thy kingdom comes' it will be a saloonless kingdom, and when His will is done there will be no man to pass over the bar the accursed stuff to ruin some other man for a paltry dollar. But I wonder if we have learned this other fact, that the Kingdom of God will never come into this earth until men offer the same prayer at the throne of the nation, which is the ballot box, as they offer at the throne of the church, which is the altar.

"Now, it is a strange thing to me why the saloon exists at all, and it has puzzled me a great deal. I challenge the whole saloon business to give me one single reason other than the reason of the dollar that is in it, for the man that's in the business, for the existence of the saloon. I stand here to throw out the same challenge through all these States of ours. I challenge the saloon to bring me a boy it has ever made better. I challenge it to bring me a husband that it has made truer. I challenge it to bring me a father that it ever made nobler. I challenge it to bring me to a home to which it ever brought peace, quiet and the spirit of love and humanity. I challenge the saloon business to show me a community to which it ministers any life, any peace, any quiet, any nobility, any manhood. It does not do it. Then, . . . why do we permit it to exist? Will you answer?

"Any business that can take a child from its mother's arms and lap and bosom and turn its face toward hell and destruction and sorrow, should not be permitted to exist. Any business, my friends, whose service is slavery and tyranny, any business that has been proven at the bars of our courts to be guilty of almost every crime upon the catalogue of crimes; any business that can take a human life and make out of that life a monster, and transform that life into a tragedy, ought to be put out of business."

THE PROHIBITION MEASURE before the present Congress, in which Friends have manifested interest in very practical ways, was acted upon by the Judiciary Committee of the House, being referred back to that body without recommendation. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate has not acted as yet, but a slight amendment is being considered, agreeable to the framers of the bill, that it is hoped will remove certain objections on the part of "States' rights" people in the South.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"MEETING THOUGHTS."—There is a School for girls in Philadelphia which for many years been doing a good work in such a quiet way that too few people know of it, or how well it is fulfilling its name of "Aimwell."

The children are not Friends, but are expected to attend meeting, and that they may gain as much good as possible from it, their Principal has made a study of it for them in this way: In blank-books are written certain questions, and to help the children in answering these, readings and talks are given explaining how the Society of Friends came by its name, who George Fox was, and what he believed, how Friends worship and why it is often in silence, and so on. Beside this, the children are asked to tell their "meeting thoughts." The names of ministers who have been present, or spoken, are written on the blackboard, that they may remember these Friends and connect the name with the message given.

Some of the girls have trials and cares of their own. One is a little Armenian, who has lost her mother, and has to take her place at home as best she can, beside doing her school work. They belong to different denominations; some are Catholics. Would you not like to hear how much help they find in our quiet meetings? Thinking that you would, some of their "meeting thoughts" have been copied for you:

"In meeting to-day, S. K. said something referring to our lesson of George Fox. I was thinking of George Fox part of the time during meeting. A still, small voice is all we need, and that brought George Fox to be a Friend."

"S. C. spoke of the water-pots at Cana of Galilee. . . . The water-pots of stone were empty, which refer to our lesson to-day. Our hearts should be empty when we go to meeting, and wait for God to fill them."

"The Bible was the thing to make people happy; but I think it is not only the Bible, but the Holy Spirit."

"In meeting to-day, S. C. and W. D. spoke. The thing that impressed me most was that we are tempted to do evil, we would do more if it was not for God leading us the right way."

"To-day in meeting J. K. spoke, but I could not understand him very well. I was asking the dear Heavenly Father to make me strong to be able to help some one else to trust in Him, so that the one I help will help some one else."

"Some of the Jews were looking for a great prince instead of one to help them to be better in their spiritual life. That reminded me that we sometimes look for great things when there are little things waiting for us."

None of the girls who have put down these "thoughts" are more than fourteen years old; most of them are younger. They are also asked to tell how going to meeting has helped them. One says, "Meeting has helped me by giving me more power and ability of study, and also making me nearer to my Heavenly Father."

Another: "Meeting has helped me to live a better life; it has also helped me with my home duties."

The little Armenian, in her quaint English, "I think that the meeting and the Bible have helped me in great deal way, to live a better Christian life, and get far from temptation, and do the right things."

One girl, who lives in a bad neighborhood, puts it thus: "Yes, the Bible-work and meeting have helped me to lead a better life; because I know if I am in danger the Lord will help me. When I think of these girls around here, I am glad that I know there is some One else to help me from the life they lead."

And here is a good thought: "Meeting and Bible class-work have helped me; perhaps not in one big way, but sometimes one way and sometimes another."

They learn also why Friends' meetings are different from a Church service. One says, "Friends worship in silence because they believe we can talk to our Heavenly Father, and if there is music and singing our minds would be on it, and we could not talk to God. Friends also believe that women as well as men can be ministers, and receive this gift from God. The ministers are not paid, because Friends believe that this gift is given to the ministers from God, and should be given to others, freely, without money."

One little Catholic, eleven years old: "The Friends get communion with God in their hearts."

The little Armenian girl says: "Friends have baptism and communion in a spiritual (spiritual) way. They think it is not necessary to be baptized and take the communion as Christ is the High Priest. We can do it in a spiritual way any time and place."

What would our "meeting thoughts" be, if we wrote them down?

For "THE FRIENDS."

YEARLY MEETING AT WESTERLY.

New England Yearly Meeting of Friends opened at Westerly, R. I., with a meeting for ministers and elders on Sixth-day, Sixth Month 5, 1914, at eleven o'clock.

There were gathered with the Friends from these parts, three from the vicinity of Philadelphia, three from Ohio and four from North Carolina, five of whom held minutes for service at the Yearly Meeting.

Near the opening of the meeting a Friend offered a tribute of thanksgiving to our Heavenly Father that he had put it into the hearts of so many of his servants to meet with them here who are but a handful and feel so keenly their stripped condition. The meeting was felt to be a season of much favor both to visitors and visited.

The two meetings for worship on First-day at ten o'clock A. M. and four o'clock P. M. were, to many, times of true inward worship and silent communion which drew us near to each other in the bonds of true Gospel fellowship, and prepared our hearts to receive the messages handed forth by the Great Head of the Church through the medium of his anointed ministers, several of whom had good service in the meetings to the comforting of many hearts.

The meeting for business on Second-day morning opened under a feeling almost of discouragement because of their small numbers, less than fifty persons being in attendance. But we were reminded that it was not by large numbers that the Lord wrought deliverance to the children of Israel, but by His power and by the faithfulness of the few. The representatives from the two Quarterly Meetings composing the Yearly Meeting were all present. Minutes were read and returning minutes granted to the following Friends: Esther Fowler, a minister from New Garden Monthly Meeting, Ohio; Jesse Edgerton, a minister from Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting, Ohio; J. Howard Edgerton, an elder and companion to his father, Jesse Edgerton, from Middleton Monthly Meeting, Ohio; Benjamin Vail, a minister from Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa., and Henry T. Outland, from Rich Square Monthly Meeting, North Carolina. The reading of these minutes brought forth many touching expressions of gratitude to the Master, who had called His servants from other places to come with messages of Christian love and encouragement to the few scattered Friends of New England Yearly Meeting. Epistles were read from six Yearly Meetings with which New England corresponds and a committee named to reply thereto, if way should open therefore. There was also read a letter from a Yearly Meeting of Friends in China, which was referred to the same committee for consideration. After the usual instruction to the representatives to confer together on the subject of clerks at the rise of the meeting, we adjourned to four o'clock in the afternoon.

At the second session the names of Job S. Gidley for Clerk and Mary J. Foster for Assistant Clerk were reported and approved.

The state of Society as revealed by the reading of the Queries and Answers occupied much of this session. Much valuable counsel and encouraging advice was called forth both from members and visiting Friends, particularly in regard to attendance of all our meetings and for the reading of the Holy Scriptures.

The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings of the past year were read and approved, after which the meeting adjourned to three o'clock Third-day afternoon.

The first business coming before the meeting on Third-day was a communication addressed to Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, re-affirming the stand Friends have always taken against all war, encouraging him in his efforts to preserve peace, and expressing a hope for a successful adjustment by the mediators at Niagara Falls. There was also presented a petition to Congress urging their favorable action on the joint resolution for a prohibitory amendment to the Constitution of the various States. Both documents were approved and ordered signed by the Clerk of the Yearly Meeting and referred to the Meeting for Sufferings to be forwarded. The Epistle Committee produced replies to the epistles received from the other Yearly Meetings, with which the meeting expressed good satisfaction and they were ordered signed by the Clerk.

They also produced a letter of tender sympathy and encouragement and Christian love to the Yearly Meeting of Friends in China, which minute, with the united approval of Friends, was ordered signed on behalf of the meeting and sent to that body.

The Committee appointed at the first session on Treasurer reported the name of Harvey C. Perry, which was approved.

The business being completed, the Clerk read a fitting concluding minute and we separated feeling that the Yearly Meeting had been one of Divine favor and spiritual uplift. A meeting for Divine worship on Fourth-day follows the closing of the Yearly Meeting.

NEWS ITEMS.

PHILADELPHIA Friends, having the management of the Mission School in Tokyo, Japan, find special need of money and articles for their annual box. Some articles needed are: children's books, dark woolen bags for books, drawing cotton, suspenders, handkerchiefs, dress goods, outing flannel, tea towels, napkins, table cloths (three yards and four-and-a-half yards long), grey cotton blankets—largest size, quilts for the museum.

Please mark gifts with the donor's name, also state their value—for insurance and customs duty. Packages should be left at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, by Eighth Month 31, 1914.

EMILY B. STOKES,
1504 LOCUST STREET.

THE death of Jane Eliza Brayshaw at her residence in Manchester, on the twenty-seventh of Fifth Month, removes one well known amongst English Friends. She served London Yearly Meeting some time as clerk and was ever one of those radiant personalities that command to all the serenity and poise of the best type of Friend. Her husband, Alfred Brayshaw, has been for years a valued subscriber of THE FRIEND and at times a helpful correspondent of the Editors. Edith J. Wilson, a daughter, has served London Yearly Meeting as assistant clerk, and her two sons, A. Neave and Shipley N. Brayshaw, have been acceptable visitors in Philadelphia.

A WEEK-END CONFERENCE on "A FORWARD MOVEMENT for Friends" will be held at Haverford College on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth of this month. A Committee of young Friends has been engaged for several weeks on the careful planning of the program and is now able to issue a tentative outline:

SEVENTH-DAY, SIXTH MONTH 27th.

- 4.30 P. M. Quakerism and the Church Universal.
- 7.00 P. M. Informal Conference on a Wider Fellowship for Friends.
- 8.00 P. M. The Challenge.

FIRST-DAY, SIXTH MONTH 28TH.

- Morning. Visits to Neighboring Meetings.
- 4.00 P. M. The Aims and Spirit of the Forward Movement will be described by representatives from various parts of Quakerdom.
- 7.30 P. M. Consecration to Spiritual Service.

The speakers will be mostly Philadelphia Friends, though some will be those who have an outside viewpoint.

Board and lodging are provided by the college at the rate of fifty cents for each meal or night's lodging. Those desiring rooms should apply in advance and early to Henry J. Cadbury, Haverford, Pa.

This invitation is signed by Agnes L. Brown, D. Robert Yarnall and fourteen other Friends.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

The closing exercises of Commencement week at Friends' Select School were more than usually interesting. The graduating class, numbering twenty-three, held their Class Day celebration on Fifth-day afternoon, and entertained the large gathering of their friends with the program customary on such occasions, though some of the productions were thoroughly original and well written.

On the next afternoon, Sixth-day, the final exercises took place. Following the reading of the Scriptures by Benjamin Cadbury, the Clerk of the Committee, came the students' share in the program. Ruth W. Brainerd read an essay on "The Triumph of the Maccabees," in which she described the heroic struggle of the Jews to preserve the purity of their national worship. Wordsworth's "Ode on Immortality" was recited in an excellent manner by Blanche S. Doe, who holds the highest honors in her class. The dangers inherent in radical socialism were emphasized by Edward S. Thorpe, Jr., in an oration on "Socialism, the Great Illusion." The Valedictorian, F. Marion Spencer, discussed interestingly the subject of woman's education, closing with a brief and highly original address to her classmates.

The diplomas were then presented to the graduates by the Principal, Walter W. Haviland, after which Professor Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford, addressed the class. In his remarks he urged his hearers to learn to live. He pointed out the necessity, first, of wanting to achieve highly, then of enlarging one's life by devotion to earnest effort. His closing words were a plea for loyalty to the best and highest.

The honor graduates were Blanche S. Doe, Ruth W. Brainerd and F. Marion Spencer.

W. V. DENNIS.

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL has just closed another successful year. Every school alive to the interests of its patrons is an expanding enterprise, so it is but natural to suppose a full line of improvements are in view for the summer vacation. The following are taken chiefly from the school paper—The Pastorian:

"Plans were made early last winter for future extensions and improvements of the school buildings as funds permit. It is likely that three years will pass before they are all carried out.

"The work now contemplated for this summer comprises an addition and much needed repairs and alterations to the house at the athletic field, a change in the heating system in the school buildings, the construction of a Primary play room, and the enlargement of the lunch room.

"The two boilers that now heat the buildings will be removed from the front and rear basements and a new central plant will be installed under the library, from which pipes will be run to the different units of our group of buildings. If possible, a complete ventilating system will be installed that will provide washed and heated air in ample quantities to all the rooms. It may be that this last part of the plans will have to wait a little longer, unless part of the funds can be contributed by good friends of the school.

"The lunch room will be enlarged to fill the entire west side of the basement. The new room will be equipped with a modern cooking and serving outfit and with longer counters and additional tables with patent seats. The rear Primary basement will be converted into a play room for younger children, equipped with simple apparatus. It will be amply lighted with ten windows and will provide a fine place for play on stormy and wintry days. Often the Primary gymnasium classes can use it when the gymnasium is needed for older pupils.

"The second part of the plans will have to be deferred for another year. It is the improvement of the locker facilities of the gymnasium. The proposition is to throw the two locker rooms together and to have the whole space used by the girls; then to build under the southeast part of the gymnasium a large basement locker room for the boys, well lighted and ventilated by area windows. The space is large enough for ample locker rooms for older and younger boys, a dressing room, director's room, and shower bath.

"The third part of the plans may be carried out next year or within the next few years if all goes well. It is the erection of a third story over the entire Primary building. This will provide three or four Intermediate class rooms and two or three Primary rooms. The Intermediate work will be largely transferred to these new rooms and two of the present rooms will be thrown together into a large study room that is now much needed. The addition will permit some laboratory extension and the use of the Primary collection room for assembly purposes only.

"These extensions are not planned with an idea of adding to the numbers of our Primary or Intermediate school—they are already as large as the Committee desires—but to give more room and conveniences for regular school work, and to bring our equipment up to a higher efficiency.

"All these plans require wise foresight, conservative enterprise, and, above all, faith in the future of our school—perhaps also patience, but we do not wish to wait too long. The old school will, we trust, be exerting a growing influence for good, and standing for sound education long after the present pupils are grandfathers and grandmothers and all the present teachers and Committee Friends have gone to their long home. New occasions will arise and new educational needs develop that no one can now foresee or even dream of. Each new generation must solve its own problems and we can only do our best in our time to meet the requirements that a wise policy recommends, so far as ways and means are at hand."

"Our only regret is that our school houses must delve down into the earth or mount up into the sky for the space they need. There are compensations that we sometimes forget if we are out off from close contact with the crowd, and not the least of these is the liberty one feels to touch the earth itself and not be reminded of its exceeding high valuation."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES. A despatch from Washington of the 8th says: "Nine hundred million bushels of wheat, almost half of the average world's wheat production, and a new record for the United States, is the prospective total yield of the farms of the country this year, the Department of Agriculture announced to-day in its Sixth Month report. The enormous crop will be 137,000,000 bushels more than ever was grown before in the United States in any one year."

It is stated that colored people own 3733 farms and other real property in Missouri to the value of $27,768,750. In South Carolina there are 25,000 more colored than white children enrolled in the public schools.

All through the South there is a marked movement toward the division of great plantations into small farms, the most of which negroes acquire as tenants or eventually as owners. There are two phases in the forward movement of the colored race that are of the utmost significance—the one is its intense avidity for education; the other, its reach for agricultural independence.

A recent statement says one of the most important decisions the Supreme Court has handed down in months is that upholding the treaty with the Chippewa Indians in 1855—so far as the liquor clauses are concerned. The effect is to make three-fourths of Minnesota "dry" permanently, irrespective of the wishes of the inhabitants, and it is the biggest victory Prohibition has won in years.

It is stated that as a further step toward increasing the safety of travel by rail, under modern conditions of heavy trains and high speed, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is likely to adopt a steel rail weighing 120 pounds to the yard as the standard. The heaviest rail now in use by the Pennsylvania weighs 100 pounds to the yard. This is also the standard of a few other great trunk lines on their main divisions.

In a report recently made public the Society for Organizing Charity sets forth the work accomplished in the first six months of its campaign against professional street begging. The Society has been working in co-operation with the police, and announces that from Twelfth Month 12th of last year to Fifth Month 23, 1914, 454 mendicants have been removed from the streets. Investigations showed that of this total 225 were capable of earning a living. Most of them were sent to the House of Correction for terms ranging from three to six months.

A despatch of the 9th from Redding, Cal., says: "Mount Lassen was steaming again to-day. Clouds of steam could be seen issuing from the mountain's crater for many miles around, and the snowy summit of the peak, which yesterday showed bright white, was again blackened to-day by volcanic ashes. The outburst was ushered in by a rumbling, heard at Mineral, 16 miles away, and an earthquake shock was felt."

FOREIGN.—A cargo of iron ore has lately been received from Chili for the Bethlehem Steel Company. The mines from which the ore has been taken are said to contain millions of tons of ore.

A despatch of the 8th from Goettingen, Germany, says: "The Society for Investigating the Internal Structure of the Earth to-day declared it had succeeded in discovering, by means of wireless telegraphy, subterranean springs and ore deposits. It states that it also has ascertained their depth by the use of electrical waves applied according to the method invented by Professor Leimbach, of this city. Professor Leimbach used wireless telegraphy for underground communication between the potash mines in the Northern Hartz Mountains when he sent messages a distance of nearly a mile and a half at a level of 1000 feet below the surface."

In an international Congress lately meeting in Paris, in which 27 nations are said to have been represented, a plan for international commercial arbitration was submitted and Dr. Roberto Pozzi, of Milan, Italy, moved a resolution approving of the reference to arbitrators of controversies between citizens of different countries, and adding that the various legislatures should clothe foreign arbitrators with powers to fulfil their functions and should provide for them the protection of the law and give executive force to the judgments pronounced by them.

The steamship Aquitania of the Cunard line lately arrived at New York after a passage of nearly six days. It is said that this is the longest ship but one that ever docked at New York, 901 feet. She brought 1055 passengers and a crew of more than 1000. Time from Liverpool to the light-ship, 5 days, 17 hours, 43 minutes.

A despatch from Paris of the 12th says: "An unprecedented cold wave, with violent hail storms, continues to ravage the agricultural regions of France. A temperature of 21 degrees Fahrenheit was registered during last night at Charolles, in Burgundy. The crops in this district have been destroyed."

It was stated from London on the 9th inst.: "From documents found to-day in militant headquarters in Tufhill Street, Westminster, which were raided by Scotland Yard detectives, it has been ascertained definitely that high wages are being paid to women engaged in the work of burning buildings and fighting policemen. Detectives found the secret offices by trailing a well-known militant leader, who was suspected of being involved in a plot to do personal violence to King George." On the 15th it was said: "Undaunted by the anger they have aroused among the populace or the attention they are receiving at the hands of the police, who to-day raided their latest refuge in Ken-sington, the militant suffragettes continue their campaign of annoyance."

"If I cannot wield lance and sword as the King's men of old, I cannot wield the pen. It may be, that in the Providence of God, the shedding of ink in the cause of right shall set the world further ahead in our day than the blood-letting of all the ages past."—JACOB A. RIIS.

THE NEW VOLUME.

Just as we are putting matter in order for the last number of the present volume of THE FRIEND, an esteemed subscriber sends us the sentiment copied from Jacob A. Riis as above. She herself is one who is often engaged in "the shedding of ink in the cause of right," and it is altogether fitting that she should have part in reminding us as we look forward to the eighty-eighth year of service opening to THE FRIEND that we should be bound to our task by a high sense of duty. Those who have preceded us have maintained the work in that spirit. This was liberally recognized a few months ago by one who made a very welcome addition of $1000 to the endowment fund. In the letter containing his check he said, "The consistent and candid course of THE FRIEND, and its advocacy of the doctrines of pure Christianity as promulgated and exemplified by Fox, Penn and Barclay, I can truly say have been a comfort to me, and I feel like aiding and encouraging what seems to me to be so valuable an instrumentality in so good and great a cause." It would be difficult to put in more clear and succinct language what we believe has been the past platform of the contributors and editors of THE FRIEND. The point of moment now is how can we progress steadily toward a more perfect realization of this worthy service of "a good and great cause."

Well do we appreciate that we cannot expect to exceed the courage and devotion of those who have gone before us. They served whole-heartedly. They sought Divine leadership in their service. They had multiplied evidences that their labor was owned and blessed. Our best hope is that in the same spirit our pens too may be at the "service of the King." Perhaps, however, it is not presumption to strive for an enlarged field, and to expect a more varied harvest of good. Unless we misread the signs of the times in the Christian world our lot is now cast in a period of construction. There are still natures so eminently analytical that they demand the stimulation that is furnished by critical study and research. The life of faith in some cases seems to stir up a challenge similar to that which prompted our Lord to say, "But who say ye that I am"? In the main, however, the Christian dynamic, the real life of faith, is leading the world onward in so many lines toward a spiritual goal that even doubting Thomases are carried with the current of good. That is what we mean by saying we live in a constructive age. We should hope in some degree to make common cause with these constructive forces, and to be able in good measure to show that the special mission of our Society is to present these forces without the limitations of ritual and systems of clerical authority. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is thus made free to conquer the world.

Some practical considerations are closely related to any such hope of an expanding mission. It is an embarrassment to us to be obliged constantly to urge the question of the subscription list. An additional five hundred subscribers, however, seems to be a most reasonable claim for our paper. We have in hand a list of names of about that number of Friends whom we think should be regularly on the subscription list. The $1000 which they would yield would put us on a self-supporting basis. It is apparently easy by liberal private subscription to secure the $1000 and so avoid a deficit, but this means of support is lacking in the very element of extending loyalty that we so much desire. Every paid subscriber—particularly, every paid subscriber who feels the $2 as some sacrifice—becomes an active partner in our effort and is able to help us in many valuable ways.

It appears to be the custom of the periodical press to appeal constantly to regular subscribers to assist in the effort to increase subscription lists. Two or three times a year the very greatest religious weeklies make an appeal of this kind. Is it too much for us to expect that our subscribers will join us in this effort of extension? Not a few of them do so, and voluntarily solicit subscriptions and in special cases pay for several names on our list. The method of other papers, cited above, convinces us that we may properly stimulate this form of interest. We have active and interested agents, but we desire that every subscriber shall become a voluntary agent and so an active partner in the cause. In this way our little weekly can rise more and more to the dignity of an organ of vital Quakerism.

No particular changes are contemplated in the new volume. The name of Davis H. Forsythe will appear as publisher, but it is expected the editorial staff will continue as at present. The Board of Contributors meet at the office monthly and invest the resources of their interest and good judgment in the paper. As acknowledged in a previous editorial, Friends in increasing numbers are willing contributors by their pens to our columns. It is fitting also to say that the firm that for more than sixty years has done the printing of the paper, belongs in the list of those who have a distinct sense of service in the publication. The senior member of the firm is a Friend, and his attitude is quite apart from that toward a commercial undertaking.

It is naturally impossible to make this inventory of resources and to appeal for an extension of them without a keen sense of responsibility. The desire to improve and to expand must in no degree subordinate the determination neither to sacrifice nor to compromise anything of that inheritance of principles that has made the Society of Friends an exponent of vital Christianity. Our appeal is to all to be united in this "good and great cause."

CONSCIENCE AND ITS LIMITATIONS.

Conscience is defined as the moral faculty, the faculty by which man judges of his own actions, and considers them right or wrong.

I do not find the word conscience in the Old Testament, but the faculty is plainly alluded to, as when Joseph's brothers said one to another, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear."—Gen. xlii: 21.

In the New Testament the word occurs frequently, and the working of conscience is clearly shown in John viii: 9, when the Pharisees who had been accusing a sinful woman and were told by Jesus, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her"—"being convicted by their own consciences, went out one by one." When their thoughts were turned in on themselves, they found that in condemning the woman, they condemned also themselves.

We find mention of a good conscience, which seems to mean a clear conscience, and an evil conscience, which is one that fails to guide. Paul says of some who willfully went wrong, that even their mind and conscience are defiled.—Titus i: 15; a wcak conscience is also mentioned, as one having unnecessary scruples, which nevertheless should be attended to till further light comes. As conscience is merely a human faculty, it can only guide us as far as our knowledge of right and wrong goes. Conscience would lead a heathen to offer gifts and sacrifices to propitiate the spirits of evil he believes in; it might lead a Japanese to kill himself as a mark of respect to his emperor; even in Christian nations, many feel it right to go to war, and nearly all religious persecution has arisen from a mistaken conscience. The apostle Paul himself tells that before he knew the Lord Jesus: "I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth."—Acts xxvi: 9.

So we see that it is of very great importance that the conscience should be trained and enlightened. There are three ways, all to be used. First, it is the duty of parents to teach their children the Christian virtues, such as truth, honesty, unselfishness, purity. Second, as life opens out with its complex claims, those of us who have the privilege of the open Bible should habitually study it, to know what is the mind of Christ in these matters. Thirdly, we may learn our own right path by attention to the Holy Spirit speaking in our hearts. When the Lord Jesus was about to close his earthly life, He told His disciples that it was expedient for them that He went away, for His spiritual presence in their hearts as the Holy Spirit would be more helpful to them than His physical presence on earth. He made wonderful promises about this Divine "Comforter," the Holy Spirit, that should come, "He shall guide you into all truth." "He shall bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." So, to this day, if Christ's followers store their minds with His teachings as recorded in the Testament, I believe that the Comforter will bring to the remembrance of the attentive soul just the teaching suited to his need at any particular time. Thus the Spirit leads Christ's faithful followers. But to the world outside the fold He has a different message. Christ's promise for these was "He shall convict the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment;" so, when one feels, through a mysterious enlightenment of his conscience, a condemnation of something he has done, or a revelation of the sinfulness of something he thought of doing—or if there comes to him a vision of the beauty of unselfishness—these revelations come from the Holy Spirit convicting him of judgment, of sin, and of righteousness; and if he heeds the warning, he will be led to self-forgiveness and purity, and so come into the fold.

There is a passage of rather curious construction in first Peter, chapter two, the first part of which has been much quoted by Friends: "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ."

The curious thing about this is that it does not indicate that this grace teaches all men these blessed truths, but us. I find the same change from the third person to the first in the Revised Version and in the Twentieth Century New Testament; and a Friend, who was a reverent student of the Bible, pointed out to me that it was only to us, who know of Christ's salvation and His teaching as given in the Bible, that the full message of this blessed grace has come. We surely believe that many men who never heard of Christ have yet been saved through Him, they giving heed to conscience and to the Voice speaking to their darkened hearts; but they missed "that blessed hope," and the joy and power it brings.

Think what it is to a heathen who has dreaded re-incarnation as some vile beast, to learn that he has an all-powerful and loving Father, who is ready to welcome him to a Heavenly home. So conscience is not enough; we need also the light of the Gospel.

[In last week's issue we published a report of the Yearly Meeting recently held at Westerly, R. I. Since that has appeared, a second report has been received, which contains in part the same items that we printed a week ago. The draft of the Epistle sent to Friends in China, as well as the message to the President of the United States and the reply from his secretary did not appear in the previous report, so we give them now; also certain remarks made by visiting Friends not included in the other.]

From New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Westerly, Rhode Island, by adjournments, from the sixth of Sixth Month to the ninth of the same, inclusive, 1914.

TO CHENG TU YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS:

We have been deeply moved by your letter of appeal that we come to your aid with the teaching and example of Christ, and help to save your people. Dear friends, it is only as we reach out to help others that we ourselves are helped. "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it."

Our hearts are full of gratitude that the people of China are throwing wide the doors and welcoming the followers of the Divine Master. We betide us of the Occident if we give you of the Orient our gross materialism and fail to give the spiritual vision of the risen Christ, who by His Holy Spirit transforms even to the washing of regeneration. Nor may we of the West put a limit to the contribution which you of the East may make to a deeper and more spiritual interpretation of the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour, through that mysticism which is natural to the Oriental mind and concept.

Through schools, through hospitals, through the preaching of the Gospel, we rejoice, that under Divine guidance, we may be of service to you. But when we consider how little we do we are humiliated, and the more so in view of what you are doing for yourselves in the extension of Christ's kingdom among your fellow-men, through your abiding faith under trying conditions.

We are stirred by the marvelous transformation of China. We realize that this generation has the opportunity and therefor the responsibility of carrying the Gospel to a great nation of multitudes of people, with centuries upon centuries of history—to a nation which is to be more and more a world power, because it has thrown wide open its doors and is every day more and more intimately in touch with the whole world.

We hear ringing in our ears the Divine commission of the risen Christ—"Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Forgive us that we do so little. Know that our hearts go out to you, and our prayers to the Giver of every good and perfect gift—that you may "know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God."

Signed by direction and on behalf of the Meeting,

JOB S. GIDLEY, Clerk.

We will quote a few of the expressions from those from other Yearly Meetings.

One, who lives several hundred miles from Westery, said after attending the Select Yearly Meeting on Seventh-day morning, "This one meeting is well worth our coming here."

Another, after the close of the Yearly Meeting, said, "I never attended a better meeting." Both of these had passed the meridian of life and had had wide experience. Others said, "It is good for us to be here."

The following is from a letter received:

"I fondly hope New England Yearly Meeting will fare well in the love and favor of our common Lord and Master. The seed of the Heavenly Kingdom is still in it—the fruits of the Spirit are to be seen and felt, and I want to encourage you in a feeling that the Great Head of the Church has gracious designs concerning you.

"It is not a light matter when seven Yearly Meetings find a common cause so dear to them, and it is reason to hope the waiting spiritual worship which so many of the professors of the name of Friends have ceased to value, will continue to be a power in the earth."

The following memorial was forwarded to its destination by telegram Fifth-day morning and the reply which follows was received the next morning:

TO WOODROW WILSON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

The New England Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends, assembled at Westery, Rhode Island, reaffirms its ancient testimony to the unrighteousness of all war, and is united in a deep concern that all international differences shall be settled by arbitration. We urge in particular that no efforts be spared to prevent the shipment of arms and ammunition to either faction in Mexico. We earnestly desire a successful outcome to the mediation conference at Niagara Falls to the end that all differences in Mexico may be settled without further bloodshed.

Signed by direction and on behalf of the Meeting,

JOB S. GIDLEY, Clerk.

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington, June 11, 1914.

JOB S. GIDLEY, Clerk:

Dear Sir:—Allow me to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of this morning, and to say that I shall bring it to the attention of the President, in whose behalf I beg to thank you warmly for wiring him. I am sure he will appreciate the sympathetic interest and good will of the New England Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends.

Sincerely yours,

J. P. TULLY,
Secretary to the President.

NOTES FROM ABROAD.

IV.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

A fortnight in the Emerald Isle has left an abiding impression of its beauty and the problems to be found among some of its most hospitable and delightful people. The scenery in its mountains and along its coast have a fascination all their own; it held us in its spell from the moment we arrived at Queenstown until we left Kingstown for Holy Head on the 16th inst. Our dear friends, Henry and Anna Jane Bell, took us home with them after Yearly Meeting. They live at Waterford, about half way between Dublin and Cork, and we shall not easily forget the glimpses over the sea as the railway followed the shore, sometimes at quite an elevation above the water. The brilliant blossoms of the furze, surmounting the innumerable hedges, with a background of universal green, was a perfect picture, especially when the low, one-storied, straw-thatched, white-washed cottages dotted the landscape in every direction. The fields are of irregular size, from one-half to three acres, nearly always surrounded by these picturesque hedges, so we likened them to a huge crazy quilt.

Frederick Bell took us a memorable auto ride to Ennis-corthy, where we found George and Charlotte Milne, living in the midst of one of the prettiest sections of Ireland. We cannot understand why any one should wish to leave so beautiful a country, so far as the country itself goes, but when we saw the hundreds of men sitting on the walls waiting for a job to come their way we began to suspect something was vitally wrong. To state the case plainly, the Celt has a constitutional indisposition to work, and when the situation is complicated by superstition and drink—to say nothing of religious bigotry and intolerance—one can account for the emigration of about 4,000,000 souls from this lovely island during the past century. There is the greatest difference between the north and the south of Ireland in the general appearance of prosperity and the industry of its population. We heard a great deal about the Ulster position, and our sympathies go out to Friends who believe they will suffer if Home Rule is enforced.

I talked with one of the Ulster Volunteers and tried to impress him with the short-sighted and un-Christian position he and his 100,000 comrades, who are drilling, have taken toward their fellow countrymen.

He listened most respectfully and said as we parted, "I thank you, sir, I never looked at it that way before." One could wish that politics and religion were not so sadly mixed as they are in this Home Rule question. (See Fred J. Haskin, in The North American.) This man was the gardener of our beloved hostess, Jane Green, of Belfast, whose late husband, Foster Green, among many philanthropic services, established a hospital for tubercular patients in the suburbs of that city. We visited this institution with her and were much impressed with its ideal situation and condition. The patients represented some of the best citizens, and they were all so thankful for such a beautiful home we could but realize how blessed is the memory of the just and merciful.

Belfast is much more like Philadelphia than any city we have visited since leaving home. Prosperity is stamped upon everything we saw along its broad streets and drydocks. In one of the latter was a large Italian steamship and nearby floated the Britannic, with a tonnage of 50,000. When loaded with its own machinery and cargo it will draw forty feet, whereas at the present time only half that depth was below the water-line. The Aquitania, now on its maiden trip, has a total length of 900 feet and 57,000 tonnage. The impression one gets by walking around and photographing a craft of this sort brings home the superiority of mind over matter, and as we talked with the workmen who were placing the engines and boilers in the Britannic, with its upper deck towering more than one hundred feet above our heads, it seemed almost impossible that so stupendous a vessel could go to the depths of the sea as did the Titanic, which was built right here, and had every promise of long service. The similar fate of the Empress of Ireland has brought sadness to the whole nation, and we wonder when such catastrophes shall cease. The "double skin," with several feet between the outer and inner sides of the vessel, will doubtless be of use. The shipbuilding and linen industries have established the character and thrift of Ulster and one earnestly desires that nothing shall undermine it.

We were shown through the great linen works at Bessbrook by James N. Richardson, after he had most kindly entertained us at his home and shown us the comfortable buildings which he, with his brothers and late beloved father, erected for their two thousand workmen.

Our good friend, Edwin Squire, took us up Ben Madagain, (Cave Hill), overlooking Belfast and the Lagan River, with the ruined castle of Carrickfergus to our left. We could easily imagine William of Orange arriving there shortly after William Penn had entered upon his "Holy Experiment" in the wilds of Pennsylvania, and contrast the way of the sword with the way of Brotherly Love. Religious and social animosities are so much more intense in Europe than in America one is continually thankful to have been born where class and creed are not so much in conflict.

Cave Hill stands thirteen hundred feet above the sea, like a mighty sentinel, and its sky outline bears a striking resemblance to Napoleon—after you once see it—in a reclining position. There are three caves in the perpendicular face of the rock, said to have been frequented by smugglers in past times. The one we entered was about thirty feet in depth and was a fine refuge from the storm in such a time of need.

The Monthly Meeting held at Megaberry, near Lisburn, was a time of spiritual refreshment. The weather was perfect, the landscape charming, and the ride on a jaunting car refreshingly novel to us. Wm. and Jacob Green lived in this section of Ireland. We had an experience in visiting the Cromlech not far from Tramore on the south shore of Ireland, through the kindness of William Hill, of Waterford, which will not fade from our memory. This pile of immense stones, probably erected by the Druids to mark the grave of one of their chiefs, is admirably located in a very sequestered spot on the edge of charming woods. Some six large stones have been planted on end so as to support a yet larger one, horizontally. The latter was ten feet above the ground and some twelve feet long and five or six feet wide. The opening to the enclosed space under this flat rock was just wide enough to enter, while two or three persons could stand closely together within. This prehistoric monument of a departed people has a peculiar effect upon one's imagination. The spirits of those primitive chiefs seemed strangely near—as if a few thousand years had been telescoped into so many seconds. And this in turn opens up the question of the slow development of the race, in its age-long evolution, or of our individual minds for that matter. The perspective and philosophy of history will ever enrich the soul as the spiritual light of revelation casts its beams down the vistas of time.

At this writing, the pure spirit of our beloved neighbor, Helen Harris, who has perceptibly been dwelling in the power of the eternal life for some weeks, is now sweetly passing to her Heavenly Home.

Sixth Month 3, 1914. Kingsmead Close, Selly Oak, Birmingham, Eng.

In response to a question from the Editor of the Aldersgate, the Primitive Methodist magazine, John H. Barlow, as Clerk of the last Yearly Meeting, has expressed his opinion, in the [First Month] issue, along with those of other leaders in the churches, on "the greatest need of present-day Christianity." He says: "Your question is a difficult one and I feel myself ill-qualified to answer it. I have, however, felt for a long time that one of our greatest needs, if not the greatest, is a fuller apprehension of Jesus Christ and a closer application of His Spirit and teaching to every relation of life."—The Friend (London).

AN INCIDENT.

One beautiful summer morning, a party of fifteen or twenty young men and women started out from Philadelphia for a day's outing, a picnic in the woods. We took the train, and after riding six or eight miles, stopped off at a little country station and wandered across the fields to find a cool and shady spot. Our path led us over a pasture field, where the cows were grazing, and the bars were taken down to let us through, and very thoughtlessly were not put up again. We soon discovered a lovely place to have our picnic, and so we put our baskets down, and after resting, decided to have an early luncheon, as we were very hungry. We spread a tablecloth on the grass, and had everything in readiness, when suddenly a man on horseback came tearing up, and in angry tones wanted to know "what right we had on his grounds?" His face was flushed, and it was easy to see the man was intoxicated. We girls were dreadfully frightened, for he used very bad language, and to add to our dismay pulled a revolver out of his pocket and threatened to shoot us if we were not away "in a few minutes." One of our number, an impulsive, outspoken man, replied, "We do not intend to go, and how dare you talk that way?" and said much more, which seemed to infuriate the young farmer. I do not know what would have happened, we were trembling with fear, the horse's hoofs were even on the tablecloth, when quietly another of our group walked up to the horse, stroked and patted him, and looked up into the man's face, saying in the gentlest voice, "You are in the right, we have trespassed on your property, and we are very sorry if we have done anything wrong, if you will give us time we will take our things and go away." The man turned, looked at him, and said, "You're a gentleman, you can stay all day if you want to, only put the bars up when you go through the field," then he rode away. A hush fell on us all, and I think some of us were crying. It has been many years since this happened, and the young man who befriended us all has gone to his Heavenly home, but I shall never forget his kind, gracious words and the expression of his face, as he quieted the man, who was seemingly "beside himself." Truly, "A soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger."

GERMANTOWN.

PROGRESS OF THE PEACE MOVEMENT.

WM. C. ALLEN.

It is a fact that the international peace cause is occasionally regarded by some people on the Pacific coast as a fad. People of the west who are generally interested in problems connected with human betterment often consider it as something new and visionary. They little understand the profound forces behind the movement and the constituency developing it in Europe and the eastern states.

In the east or in Europe, particularly in Germany, France, or England, many prominent bankers, merchants or statesmen are so deeply impressed with the moral and economic evils of militarism that they think little of traveling hundreds of miles to address banquets or other great gatherings on the subject. The literature in connection with the peace propaganda is extensive. The propaganda is not carried on by sentimentalists. A tremendously quickened international conscience is at work. The sins developing from war and of armed peace are as never before being keenly recognized.

One great cause for the development of public opinion adverse to militarism the past year has been the exposures relating to the methods and operations of the great international syndicates and corporations engaged in the manufacturing and sale of armaments, and of naval and military supplies. These concerns are absolutely cosmopolitan. While posing as patriots in one country they readily provide the machinery of destruction for another. They build battle-ships and guns for their own lands and at the same time under another partnership name will construct in other countries armaments that are likely to be used against their own people. Their shares and directorates in different nations are interlocked. They sometimes send their embassies from one country to another to foment ill-feeling, or skillfully create war scares when legislative appropriations are about to be made. Men who govern empires, or who rule little countries, are often either through family or personal association peculiarly interested in the success of these armament makers. Officials at the head of the navy and military departments of civilization are, naturally, their allies and are constantly demanding more supplies. The inevitable result of all this is that unnecessary international fears keep otherwise sane populations in a ferment and suspicious of each other. A great demand for warships and military equipment is created and amazingly extended by this systematic and diabolical business. The people have recently been learning how they have thus been bamboozled in the sacred name of patriotism. Their assets are being transferred to the treasuries of these huge syndicates. The latter have only to build naval plants in new countries and to create a demand for their wares, and the gold of the public, through indirect taxation, flows into their coffers. As the people become acquainted with all these revelations they are beginning to demand that this revelry of international graft and greed shall cease.

The physical and moral damage to young men and indirectly to unfortunate women—resulting from a system that takes men out of normal social life into warship and barrack-life—is increasingly admitted. Christian men and women are beginning to question as never before if they can sanction a scheme that develops sins and diseases which our Christian civilization is endeavoring to abolish.

As intellectual and moral forces come more insistently to the fore, men are beginning to less and less value an appeal to arms. Recent wars have proved that the equities of a dispute cannot be decided by physical force. Even the winning country loses more than it gains. A few men who are generally safely ensconced in their offices and clubs obtain prestige or wealth from the beastialities of human conflict, whilst national vigor and virtues are impoverished thereby. The great mass of men suffer the consequences and afterwards pay the bills. Men recognize that, as with other sins, the race pays a fearful penalty for supporting the confusion and wreckage of war. So the advocate of internationalism is increasingly listened to. He points to the fact that hundreds of international disputes have been settled by arbitration, and every settlement has been lived up to. He tells of the grandeur of unarmed peace as exhibited in the honorable settlement of some grievous quarrels with England and Canada within the past one hundred years, largely because the boundary between the latter country and our own has by treaty been unfortified. He calls attention to the prosperity of Canada, where the arts of peace are glorified, and compares her with unhappy Mexico, where military ideals have been exalted. He takes case after case to prove the moral and economic losses wrought by listening to the war-makers, and shows from history that destruction of life and property in wars eventually effect national downfall. He demonstrates that war is a reversion to barbarism and that no violation of the Divine laws—no murder, arson, deceit, destruction of property or wrecking of once happy homes—can be called the "glory of the tented field," or really make other wrongs right. The advocate of internationalism proves that men can, if they will, find a better way.

The development of international law has, of recent years, been very great. This is not only establishing the stability of the principle of arbitration but is also creating a broad and clearly-defined basis upon which is surely being constructed a system of judicial procedure which at some not distant day may supplant international arbitration. Men are beginning to realize the futility of murder and revenge in national, as in private quarrels, and this is accompanied by the conviction that courts of law can afford the only sane and equitable method of securing permanent and honorable settlements. Some of the strongest statesmen of the age have indicated their faith in the possibilities of the future to the extent of declaring that even an international police may not be necessary to enforce the findings of an international court because of the magnifying strength of public opinion in civilized communities with their interwoven interests and responsibilities. Thus far an enforcing power has never been required.

Where are the followers of Jesus Christ in respect to this great movement? Have they faith? Do they sometimes travel hundreds of miles to definitely plead for the Prince of Peace at great church functions? Do they see in the light of Christ that all the greed and graft associated with militarism is not of their Master; and do they rebuke it? Do they protect against the immoralities inevitably growing out of warship and barrack-life? Do they condone war and preparations for it? Or do they plead for, and prayerfully live out, lives of peace? Do they recognize the damage done to foreign mission work by these vast preparations at home to kill men abroad for whom Christ died? Are the churches at the front of this great movement which includes the cleverest and strongest men of the age and millions of weary workers? Or do the followers of Christ timidly lag behind? We may thank God because the churches are also taking a grip on this coming reform. It is peculiarly their province to do so.

CLIPPINGS FROM THE LIFE OF WILLIAM DEWSBURY.

EMILY FOUSTHEE.

The remarkable train of circumstances which attended the rise of the Society of Friends makes that event an era in church history, the history not of a man but of a movement. The calling of George Fox, and the early Friends was not assumed by themselves through any choice of their own, they were used as instruments to lead the way to a new religious reformation. We must not think of them as living in an age when religion was neglected, but rather it was the subject uppermost in men's minds. Before Fox began to preach men were feeling after the truths which he proclaimed; it was discussed wherever men met together, poor women in the street talked about sin and salvation, even the children grew sober over their play from a fear it might be displeasing to God. Still, most of the religion was very much on the surface, and did not seem to change peoples' lives. Many in England had grown weary of the formalism of the Puritans, of the endless discussions about bishops and elders, how the Psalms should be sung in church, whether mince pie might be eaten at Christmas, May-day celebrated, and other questions about outward forms of religion. They were longing for a religion which should touch not only their intellects but their innermost souls; to know His Gospel as a message of glad tidings to all, to the poor and ignorant, to the rich and to the learned. Some had stopped attending any place of public worship, but held little meetings in their homes, often in silence; they called themselves "Seekers," and we find that in many localities these were among the first to receive and to welcome the message of universal and saving Light preached by the early Friends. Their fingers were already groping at the shutters of the soul's windows, they had but to open them for God's daylight to come in, to realize the words of the Master, "The kingdom of God is within you."

Early in the reign of Charles I. Allertrope, a village of Yorkshire, was the home of a poor shepherd boy, who early sought to be acquainted with and to serve his Heavenly Shepherd, his Almighty Father, to know His voice from the voice of the stranger. William Dewsbury, called one of the "finest and wisest" of the early Friends, was about the same age as George Fox. Certain advices addressed by Fox in 1656 "To the Brother in the North," refer to the leading topics which are embraced in our present Discipline. They are endorsed in George Fox's handwriting. Wm. Dewsbury's parents appear to have been religious characters. The death of his father, which occurred when the son was only eight years of age, made a very deep impression on his naturally serious and reflective mind, and while grieving over his great loss, he heard, what appeared to him, a voice, which said, "Weep for thyself, for thy father is well." So powerful was the effect of this message on him that from that time he spent many hours, which in childhood are naturally devoted to play, in retirement, in prayer and in meditation, under a sense of his lost condition. He tells us, "Even before that time, the Light in my conscience did witness against me, and cause some trouble in me; but I departed from the Light, and followed the counsel of my own heart, which led me into vanity, and to live without the fear of God. When I was eight years of age the words of the Lord came to me: 'I created thee for my glory; an account thou must give me for all thy words and actions.' Convicted by the silent monitor within, my understanding was enlightened, my conscience bore witness that such was my condition."

William Dewsbury, having now attained the age of thirteen, endeavored to change his course; he became thoughtful and serious beyond his years, he began to read his Bible and books on religious subjects from his own choice. About this time he was placed by his own request apprentice to a cloth-weaver near Leeds; he had heard there were people in that neighborhood, who were more strict in religious observances than most others. But he was disappointed in not finding what he sought. At the outbreak of the Civil War, he was about twenty-one years of age, and his term of apprenticeship being over, he was caught with the spirit then prevailing, and entered the parliamentary army, under the plea of "going up to the help of the Lord against the mighty" and fighting for the Gospel. In the army he expected to meet with fellow-travelers whose minds had passed under similar baptisms as his own. Again he was deceived. He came to know that there are spiritual enemies to encounter, and that this is the only warfare in which Christians must engage, the words of Christ came to him, "Put up thy sword into the sheath, if My Kingdom were of this world then would My children fight." A few years later having experienced in himself the efficacy of the one saving baptism, he began to feel a strong desire to declare to others what the Lord had done for his soul; he was freely given up to enter at once, as the Lord should direct, upon the work of a preacher of the Gospel. But he says, "I received a direct command to refrain until the year 1652, when there would be a greater hungering for the knowledge of the right way of the Lord in the hearts of the people." While in this state of suspense, he had to pass through deep provings; this no doubt was a preparation for the great work and service to which he was appointed. William Dewsbury first met George Fox in 1651, and joined the ranks of the Quakers. The interview afforded the parties an opportunity of ascertaining the grounds of true fellowship; for it is clear that William had been previously instructed in the same school and by the same Divine Teacher.

As it had been revealed to him, he was called to the ministry in 1652. He says: "The message now was, the leaders of my people cause them to err, in drawing them from the light of their conscience. Freely thou hast received, freely give and minister; what I have made known to thee in secret declare thou openly."

Although Wm. Dewsbury, when engaged in the service of his Lord as a minister of the Gospel, appears to have been greatly favored, and to have had many seals to the convincing power of his ministry, yet it was permitted, in Divine wisdom, that he should prove himself to be a faithful witness to his full conviction of the Divine origin of the doctrine he preached, and the self-denying testimonies he exemplified in his daily life by the meekness and Christian cheerfulness with which he bore imprisonments during nearly the whole last twenty-five years of his life.

Sewel informs us, that in 1654 there were above sixty ministers among Friends who traveled in the service of the Gospel. Records of those times can give us but a faint idea of the cruelties, abuses and imprisonments Friends were subjected to; but they believed themselves required of the Lord to bear their testimony boldly against an "unscriptural ministry," in the steeple-houses and in the open market places. By their unwearied labors and patient suffering many were convinced.

In 1661, four thousand Quakers were imprisoned in England, and between '61 and '86 about twelve thousand suffered imprisonment and more than three hundred died in prison or as the result of cruel treatment. At one time five hundred Friends were crowded in the dungeons of Yorkshire Castle.

William Dewsbury was one of this number, and several of his extraordinary epistles written from this dungeon bear this date. He had been liberated but a few months when he was seized and sent to Warwick jail with some other Friends. He had given thanks after supper at an inn, which was construed by the informer and magistrate into preaching at a conventicle. The oath of allegiance was tendered, and as his conscience prevented him from taking it, he was thrown into jail, where some others were kept, for ten years without further trial. We note for how trivial a reason sometimes the early Friends suffered.

The dismal dungeon in Warwick jail in which William Dewsbury spent at least four of the nineteen years he was confined is still to be seen. The following description was written in 1815. "This offensive vault, which may now be seen in the prison, is eighteen feet ten inches under ground; in the middle is a cesspool, on the side is a stream for the prisoners to slake their thirst. There is a large, heavy chain that passed through a link in the chains of each of the felons, which was then carried up the steps and secured to the outer door of the vault; light and air come only through an iron grate on the top and nearly even with the surface of the ground. We do not know much about the rest of the accommodations of this particular jail, but the prisons of England were very similar, and after we read of the hardships Friends and others were forced to endure, it is marvelous that any escaped alive."

It was during the time of his last imprisonment in Warwick that Wm. Dewsbury's little grandchild, Mary Lamm, to her great joy, was allowed to make her home with her grandfather, waiting on him, and cheering him in his loneliness. Her parents lived in Bedfordshire, and we find it hard to picture the pleadings before those good Quaker parents would consent to their precious little daughter, only twelve years old, living among such suffering and distress.

How William Dewsbury, a very affectionate, tender-hearted man, and the other prisoners, with hope well-nigh exhausted, must have been revived by the presence of a bright little sunbeam moving about in the dark cells, like a gleam of sunshine from their homes! History does not tell us how long this happy companionship lasted, but so great a joy was to be followed by a crushing sorrow. On the first day of Second Month, 1680, Mary was stricken down with a violent jail fever; her mother and aunt Joan Dewsbury came to nurse her, but loving skill could not save the little maiden, whose strength had been so reduced by the close confinement in those wretched quarters. Before many days, the news was passed from ward to ward that Mary was dead. No doubt a very tender bond of affection existed between these two. Almost Mary's last words to him were, "Dear Grandfather, I do not believe thou wilt stay long behind me;" his reply was, "Dear Granddaughter, I shall come as fast as the Lord orders my way."

The account given by her grandfather of her exercises and expressions during her last days shows she was remarkably mature in religious understanding.

With the proclamation of James II, when he issued his warrant for the discharge of Friends, and the suspension of the penal law, came the release of William Dewsbury; his health was permanently impaired, and he was so very feeble that it was difficult and painful for him to walk. He visited Friends at some of their meetings. He went up to London in 1688, and preached a powerful and impressive sermon, the only one of all his sermons which has been preserved.

He expected to attend the Yearly Meeting, but a returned attack of jail fever caused his immediate return home, which was made by short journeys; his death followed two weeks later. On his death-bed he gave this wonderful testimony: "Therefore, Friends, be faithful and trust in the Lord your God; for this I can say, I never played the coward, but joyfully entered prisons as palaces. In the prison house I sang praises to my God, and esteemed the bolts and locks put upon me as jewels; and in the name of the eternal God I always got the victory."

DR. MARIA MONTESSORI'S PEDAGOGICAL ANTHROPOLOGY.

During the past winter the famous Italian educationist, Dr. Montessori, made a brief visit to the United States. In a half dozen of our principal cities she appeared on the lecture platform, mostly before large audiences of educated people, who had paid a high price for seats, and had correspondingly high expectations of profit and inspiration from her addresses. It is perhaps safe to say that in the main these appearances were sorely disappointing to the audiences. It is to be feared that many got the impression that the learned "dottoressa" is a mere passing show, appealing to a love of adventure in the sacred field of child training. This was due to several reasons, but principally perhaps to the fact that she did not use the English language. One can hardly deal with the refinements of pedagogical science in popular addresses through an interpreter.

In spite of the widespread feeling of disappointment certain notes of appreciation appeared to be general. Chief of these was the expression heard at every hand, "She really has a remarkable personality." This impression of her was heightened by the reels of moving pictures which showed her in the school-rooms in Rome. As she moved about among the children all could perceive even in such kaleidoscopic flashes that it was the woman and not a method—not any new discovery in fact—but that has actually made a world-wide stir in education. A very important part of this personality was the trained voice that in melody and power put our best American performance to shame. Those in the audience dull of hearing could detect practically every word of the flowing Italian (although ignorant of its meaning), while the English into which it was translated was given in notes that left no intelligent impression upon deaf ears. Indeed, the effect of the contrast between the two at the end of an hour was painful in the extreme.

When one turns from these public appearances ("exploitation" if we choose to use the most common term of criticism in the case) to the book whose title we have written at the head of this article there is no longer room for a difference of opinion. Even those who have indulged most freely in ridicule of the pilgrimage (vide "Journal of Education") gladly admit that the book is "monumental." This adjective might have a personal meaning, but as applied in this case it relates to its contribution to the great cause of education. By common consent in many directions the book is admitted to take a very first place at once in the list of really scientific contributions to the cause.

It is a somewhat massive volume of 500 pages. Behind it is the knowledge required in Italy for a medical degree (five years' study after a college degree in this case) and an added four years of patient, painful sacrifice and research with the subject of Pedagogical Anthropology as a thesis. Still added to this several years of experimental experience in the Children's Houses has carried the great body of scientific principles over into the domain of the practical and given them point and force for every-day use. One would not wish to have a pedagogical library reduced to one volume, but if that necessity were forced probably this would now be the one volume of greatest service. It is, however, in the main a technical work and it is too much to hope that it will be generally read. A very brief summary will indicate something of the scope of the volume.

The first chapter deals with Certain Principles of General Biology. The forms and types of stature (as macroscelia and brachy-scelia) are shown to be definitely related to distinct types of character in individuals and in nations, thus justifying the claim for a science of Pedagogical Anthropology. This science is then in the five succeeding chapters reduced to a method through mathematical calculations of indices. Thus we arrive at the "index of weight," the "cephalic index," the "thoracic index," etc., etc. The purpose of such calculations is at least two-fold. It gives the basis for the determination of a normal index, and discloses the need of special educational treatment in cases where the normal is widely departed from. Chapter V treats of The Skin and Pigments and begins the treatment of Stigmata. Dr. Montessori takes the conservative and hopeful view of physical marks of degeneracy, and by the mathematical process of calculating indices shows clearly that very few human beings are wholly clear of such stigmata. These conclusions, or more properly the means of determining them, are treated in Chapter VIII on Statistical Methodology. The concluding chapters, "The Biographic History of the Pupil and his Antecedents" and "Applications of Biometry" bring the work to an issue of supreme interest. One feels awed at the power committed to parents and to teachers in moulding character through training and environment. The great need is knowledge and an intelligent use of knowledge. The race was meant for progress upward into spiritual realities. Such a conclusion as the result of close scientific research of the relationships of body and soul is inspiring indeed.

Some liberal quotations from the monumental work have been copied for readers of THE FRIEND. It will be a good fortune for any if they are thus drawn to study the great work.

J. H. B.

"Let us compare the appearance of man upon the earth to the discovery of the motive power of steam and to the subsequent appearance of railways as a factor in our social life. The railway has no limits of space, it overruns the world, un-resting and unconscious, and by doing so promotes the brotherhood of men, of nations, of business interests. Let us suppose that we should choose to remain silent about the work performed by our railways and their social significance in the world to-day, and should teach our children only about the accidents, after the fashion of the newspapers, and keep their sensitive minds lingering in the presence of shattered and motionless heaps of carriages, amid the cries of anguish and the bleeding limbs of the victims.

"The children would certainly ask themselves what possible connection there could be between such a disaster and the progress of civilization. Well, this is precisely what we do when, from all the pre-historic and historic ages of humanity, we teach the children nothing but a series of wars, oppressions, tyrannies and betrayals; and, equipped with such knowledge, we push them out, in all their ignorance, into the century of the redemption of labor and the triumph of universal peace, telling them that 'history is the teacher of life.'—Introduction, p. 4.

"Hitherto, we have not learned how to study; we know only, or at least the majority of us do, how to absorb the contents of books. The only true student is the scientist, who knows how to advance slowly, we educators on the contrary plunge in a dizzy headlong rush, through all acquirable knowledge. To study is to look steadily, to stand still, to assimilate and to wait. We should study for the sake of creating, since the whole object of taking is to be able to give again; but in this giving and taking we ought not to be mere instruments, like high-pressure suction pumps; in work of this sort we ought to be creators, and when we give back, to add that part which has been born and developed within us from what we acquired. It is wise to give our acquired knowledge time not only to be assimilated, but also to develop freely in that fertile psychic ground that constitutes our innermost personality. In other words: assimilate by every possible means, and then wait."—Introduction, p. 31.

"Accordingly, the act of holding acquired knowledge within ourselves for a period of time results in self-development; superficial learning, on the contrary, means the exhaustion of our personal resources. We become steadily more exhausted and more inefficient, through too much study; and instead, we ought to become all the time more flourishing and more robust if we studied in the proper way; and this is because we squander our psychic powers, instead of acquiring new energy. The consequence of this mistaken method is that we rapidly forget all that we have learned. Everything is acquired at the cost of effort; what we need is to labor patiently, in order to acquire in the real sense. To-day it is the fashion to study in order to enter upon that particular business or profession that is destined to be our life's work; what we ought to do instead, is to devote our energies to the conquest of thought and to the elevation of the spirit."—Introduction, p. 32.

WHAT IS THE KORAN?

In the course of an article in Der Christliche Orient, Johannes Awetarian gives a useful description of the Koran. He says it contains 7,200 verses, of which about one-third are copied in a garbled and unintelligent way from the Bible. Another third consists of repetitions merely, contributing nothing new to the rest of the book; and the remaining third, received in part from the pagan Arabs, deals with personal affairs of Mohammed, also with his family, and especially his wives, then sets up political and ceremonial rules for the followers of Mohammed. These last are borrowed from various religions and sects; for instance, the washings come partly from the Hanefites, who date before Mohammed's time, and partly from the Persians; and the forms and times of prayer from the Jews and the Arabs. There is nothing in the Koran that is original, that one might take as proof of Divine revelation. It professes itself that it came to confirm the earlier books, the Old and New Testaments, whereas later Mohammedan priests cast the Bible aside as being a forged book. But it stands there in the Koran in black and white, that the Old and New Testaments are God's revelation, and that it is the duty of all Mohammedans to accept God's revelation; but he who will not believe in a Divine revelation is called a Kafir, that is "an unbeliever." Hence it is not easy for the Mohammedan scholars to come forward with any really effective arguments against Christianity, for the Christians rely upon a book which even the Koran declares to be revelation from God. The statement by which people have hitherto been led astray, that the Bible has been superseded or is a forged book, will no longer give them a sufficient hold upon a thinking generation.

Now the Mohammedan scholars are realizing that in the old way they can no longer get over their difficulties, and in the newer catechisms have seized the opportunity of altering various passages referring to the Bible. In their old catechism they used to read: "I believe in God and His four books—namely, Taurid i Musa (the Law of Moses), Zebur i Davud (David's Psalter), Indjil i Isa (the Gospel of Jesus), and the Koran." In the new catechisms, however, they write, "I believe in God and His books, of which the last and most perfect is the Koran, which contains everything that was in the books that were before it." But this stratagem will not help them for long, because they are unable to stand up to this latter in the case of an argument. At the most they will be able to prevent some simple ones for a little time from reading the Holy Scriptures.—From the Light Bearer.

NEWS ITEMS.

WORK AT GUILFORD COLLEGE.—As one of the early outposts of the Society of Friends and one which through many vicissitudes has steadily kept on its beneficent way, I think the work of Guilford must be of interest to all who wish to see our work lengthened and our stakes strengthened.

Friends generally are pretty familiar with the anti-bellum and the intrabellum history of the Institution, both of which are full of interest. Perhaps of late less has been known except to those who from time to time have gladdened those who abide here by their visits. In the meantime

Guilford has grown from a school housed in one building with an attendance of about an average of thirty pupils to a college with a full course of study, nine large well-built brick buildings, an able corps of instructors and an average attendance of two hundred and fifty students, this year's graduating class numbering thirty-one. These students live in five dormitories, two for girls, three for young men. Both young men and women take their meals in the dining-room at Founders' Hall, with the exception of those girls who board themselves at New Garden Hall, and such of the young men as belong to the Club system.

New Garden Hall is a well-equipped residence hall, arranged carefully for the accommodation of such girls as wish thus to reduce the expense of a college course. There they live as in their own home, with a Matron and Domestic Science teacher who is a graduate of Drexel. Everything is provided for their comfort and convenience. This has been done by a committee of women Friends of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, assisted largely by Friends elsewhere; and while it is a part of the college proper in all other respects, it is not in any way a tax upon the college. The committee looks after its needs and administers to its necessities. There is an endowment fund belonging expressly to it.

On the other hand, the provision for the Club boys is most inadequate. These are young men of earnest, industrious habits, most of whom earn the money themselves with which they meet the expenses. The best students in college are often in this number. To meet their necessities, a few years ago a slender domicile was hastily erected to serve as dining-room, kitchen and rooms for the Matron and two maids. It is a mere shell of a house and is now out of repair and wholly inadequate to meet the needs of the ever-increasing number of young men who prefer this manner of living. These young men rent rooms for residence in one of the college dormitories or in some cottages provided for the purpose.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.—New York Yearly Meeting was held Fifth Month 27-31, at Union Springs.

The Meetings on Ministry and Oversight occupied the day preceding the opening of the Yearly Meeting proper. The reports from all the Quarterly Meetings on Ministry and Oversight evidenced a spirit of helpfulness.

The consideration of the state of Society on the first day of the Yearly Meeting revealed a good degree of present activity and a bright outlook for the future. The members of the Yearly Meeting are engaged in a wide range of Christian activities, many of which may be included in the term "Social Service." The statistical report showed the present membership to be 3,578.

Interest in temperance work is increasing. A stirring temperance address was given by Clinton N. Howard, of Rochester.

Royal J. Davis, who addressed the meeting on Peace, showed that it is not to be considered an end, but a means. It is necessary that Friends should have a better knowledge of political situations. Their zeal should be according to knowledge. He suggested that young Friends studying law devote themselves to international law.

Education was given unusual attention from the fact that the Yearly Meeting was held in Union Springs, where the Yearly Meeting Boarding School, Oakwood Seminary, is located. The work of that Institution has been successfully carried on during the past year in spite of the recent illness of the Principal, Walter H. Wood. The life of the School is characterized by a wholesome Christian atmosphere. The amount of the standing debt has been reduced. Following the report of the Trustees an address was given by William Wistar Comfort, of Cornell University, on "Present Conditions in Education." He showed the necessity of a closer personal contact between teacher and pupil. On Seventh-day evening, a meeting of the Oakwood Old Scholars' Association was held, which was largely attended. It was followed by a reunion and supper on the Seminary campus.—Abridged from The American Friend.

FIRST PARAGRAPH OF PRINCIPAL'S REPORT TO BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS, SIXTH MONTH 16, 1914.—"The School year comes to a close with satisfactory results morally and intellectually, if not financially. It has meant for me nine months of considerable anxiety and of study. In our last faculty meetings we all seemed to be unanimously agreed that we have made solid spiritual progress. The attitude of the student body as a whole towards the great questions of personal responsibility, duty doing, faithfulness in labor, and loyalty to the professional ideals of the School has been markedly improved. Our students are themselves foremost in testifying to this progress. In our distinctly religious life the difference between the beginning of the year and the end is impressive. Seriousness of thought about the deepest and highest things of the spirit has become noticeable in the open expressions to which we have had the privilege of listening in Sunday School, Prayer Meeting, Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. Students seem to realize more and more that our welfare lies very largely in their hands. They are not only realizing this mentally, and making verbal expressions about it, but they are acting. Most of our discipline has been managed by the Students' Council. The judgment shown by students in those cases which the Faculty has referred to them has been good and effective. As an incentive for the whole school to higher endeavor two prizes were offered by the Council, one to the student achieving the highest grade in English, and the other to the student showing, in the judgment of the Faculty, the greatest general improvement during the year. The Sunday School, by means of weekly mite collections, has now enough money to help two needy but meritorious students next year. There is hereafter to be a permanent Sunday School Scholarship Fund. I think I have already spoken of our missionary work in this community. Not the least part of this missionary spirit is the activity of our students in trying to find young men of the requisite quality and preparation to enter here. None of these things means money directly, but they do show, as we think, solid progress towards the fundamental ideals of our cause."

HELEN B. HARRIS, whose death is noticed in J. E.'s "Notes from Abroad," was buried on the 6th inst., near her late home at Chetwynd House, Selly Oak. We extract the following from a notice of the funeral in The Friend (London):

"Perhaps the most striking effect of the funeral to most of us was the entire absence not only of the outward signs of mourning, in accordance with the wishes of Rendel Harris, but also that the garment of praise in very truth took the place of the spirit of heaviness. And it is probable that some who were present had never before so strongly felt the reality of the Christian hope which can remove the sting from death, and triumph through Jesus Christ in the midst of sorrow."

CHARLES E. HOWIE, of Melbourne, writes that statistics supplied by the Australian Defence Department show that the number of senior cadets and citizen forces training throughout Australia at the end of 1913, was 121,622, and that the number of prosecutions to the same date was 22,143, or one prosecution for every six in training. In Tasmania the figures are 1 prosecution for every 3.5 men in training, and in New South Wales, the State with the largest population, 1 for every 5. The number of senior cadets and soldiers in training in the three States of South Australia, Western Australia and Tasmania was 22,575. The prosecutions for the Commonwealth thus nearly equalled the total number in training for three out of the six Australian States.—The Friend (London).

In view of the number of teachers who are studying at the Dalton Hall, Manchester, Eng., it is interesting to notice that the Manchester University has just decided to grant a new degree—that of "Master in Education." This will be open to graduates of universities who have successfully completed a course of training for teachers and educational administrators, and who have gained practical experience in some branch of educational work. Hitherto, while it has been possible to take education as a subject in the course for a degree in Arts, or to obtain an educational diploma, the teaching profession in England, with its 200,000 members, has not, like the professions of medicine and law, had any degree that was distinctively its own. The institution of such a degree marks an advance in the evolution of the profession, and it is also a sign that educational theory is emerging from its pre-scientific stage. It is fitting that Manchester, the first English University to possess a Chair of Education, should also be the first to establish a special faculty of the subject with its appropriate degree.—The Friend (London).

ON Fifth Month 15, 1914, The Friendly Circle of Pasadena, Cal., held the last meeting under the appointments of 1913-14. So strong was the feeling of appreciation for the fellowship of these meetings, that it was decided not to take a "Summer Vacation." But what is The Friendly Circle of Pasadena?

It was organized in 1907 for all people of Friendly tendencies. Its organization and object are expressed by two words: "Friendly Circle."

What fine discrimination is shown in the name—"The Society of Friends." The Circle is composed of members from any branch of Friends.

Once in attendance, always a member. The meetings are monthly, and are held at the homes of Friends. An evening is devoted to each of the four sections: The Literary and Educational, the Philanthropic, the Civic, and the Historical, at which a program appropriate to its respective title is given. We have listened to illustrated talks on the Los Angeles Aqueduct, or trips to Japan or Mexico. Sometimes it has been a pleasure trip through the wonderful mountains and deserts of the West. History and politics—also missionary work in the Orient—have engaged our attention. But our chief aim is to extend the broad hand of fellowship and love to one another, and equally to the stranger, who comes within our gates. Coming from all parts of the world, we have felt drawn to all peoples. The sentiment has been expressed that a Friendly Circle as round as the earth might be established. Our motto is—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

WESTTOWN NOTES.

THE last weeks of school pass with wonderful rapidity, particularly to the senior class, whose members realize more and more that their days at Westtown are numbered.

CLASS-DAY was celebrated on the 8th inst. with the usual exhibition in the gymnasium in the afternoon; much interest was manifested as the various characteristics and prophecies were announced, some humorous as may be supposed.

THE class supper, given by the senior class, and served by members of the first class, was a very pleasant affair; nearly 150 persons partook of the hospitality of the seniors; the large canoe-room in Industrial Hall was tastefully decorated for the occasion. A number of speeches were made near the close of the supper, which added spice to the occasion. The party then had a sociable on the south lawn, where the prizes for cricket were awarded, as well as the numerals to the boys for other athletics.

ON Sixth Month 16th the Literary Union held its last meeting of the year; the program was made up in part from essays of the graduates; the gymnasium was quite well filled with visitors.

THE Class of 1912 had their re-union in the Lake House, twenty-three members being present.

FORTY-SEVEN boys and girls were graduated on the 17th inst.; the day was a choice one for the occasion. Many relatives and friends of the senior class and of the School were with us, and everybody apparently was happy—though there was an undercurrent of regret both on account of the graduates leaving the old School and a like feeling with the School in losing so many loyal pupils.

THE vacation repairs are about to be begun; one of the most extensive will be painting with oil paint the girls' second floor rooms and corridors; more varnishing will be done than usual. Among other things the hospital and the engineer's cottage are to be painted. The material for the addition to the front of the east wing is largely on the ground; the cut stone work is holding up the job at present. Four car-loads of crushed stone (220 tons), as well as water wheel, pipes, I-beams, etc., are landed at the old mill, and it is hoped that work will soon be started on the new water and hydro-electric plant.

WITHIN the past two weeks, shipments of certified milk and cream have been sent to Abbotts Alderney Dairies; Woodman's have increased their orders, so that the dairy house presents an interesting appearance in the late afternoon with its good-sized shipments of boxed milk.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A recent case of injury to pedestrians by an automobile in this city has been tried in court, during which Judge Sulzberger said: "The streets are the property of the people, and pedestrians are supreme in the right to the use of the streets at the crossing points. The driver of an automobile must recognize this right at his risk, and stop his machine at street intersections. Streets must be crossed, and there must be a reasonable provision for crossing them in safety. We must, therefore, recognize the intersection as such crossing points. At such intersections the pedestrians must have the right of way, and the driver of the vehicle must recognize this right at his risk."

Official reports received at the Department of Public Health in Harrisburg show that 369 cases of typhoid fever developed in Pennsylvania during the Fifth Month, being the fewest number reported in any Fifth Month since the department was established and the keeping of records begun.

The Mount Lassen volcano in northern California has lately been in eruption. It is stated: "The most recent previous volcanic eruption in the United States, according to geologists, occurred at a point about eleven miles east of Lassen peak, the vent being known as 'the Cinder cone.' The time of this eruption is estimated at from 80 to 200 years ago. Basalt flowed down the slope into the valley and formed a dam which gave rise to a body of water now called Snag Lake, because of trees which were killed by the basalt flow." Mount Lassen was known to be a volcano, but was thought to be almost or quite extinct. It is situated in the northeastern part of California, about 200 miles north of Sacramento.

It is stated that immigrants arrived at American ports at the average rate of more than 2900 every week-day during the last ten months. This makes it certain that the immigration for the fiscal year ending Sixth Month 30th will far surpass all previous records. It will exceed 1,300,000 for the year.

In a recent meeting in Chicago, the General Federation of Women's Clubs put itself on record as follows: "If thereas, The liquor traffic is responsible for three-fourths of the crime, vice and misery in this country; be it Resolved, That the women of the General Federation place themselves on record as opposed to the liquor traffic and in favor of such Federal or State laws as will tend to eradicate this evil."

A newspaper published in this city has mentioned that the ordinance referred to in the recent proclamation of the Mayor, promising a rigorous enforcement of the "sane Fourth" principle, provides that any person who fires off a toy pistol shall be arrested and fined $10 for each offense, and that any dealer who sells such articles shall be fined $100 for each pistol or other noise-making contrivance that he sells.

A despatch from New York City of the 19th says: "Nearly 20 per cent. of the 12,955 fires in this city during the year 1913 were caused by carelessness with cigars, cigarettes and matches, according to a report filed to-day with Mayor Mitchell by Fire Commissioner Adamson. In addition, children playing with matches and fires caused 588 additional fires. Bonfires and brush fires signifying fences were responsible for 1058 fires. The total damage was $7,467,999."

A despatch from Washington of the 19th says: "Secretary Houston to-day decided 'What is Wine,' and made a pure food ruling of far-reaching importance to all domestic wine makers, particularly those in Ohio and California. It prohibits the use of the name 'wine' on products made by the addition of water to the juice, pomace or pulp of grapes, and defines wine to be 'the product of the normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of the fresh, sound, ripe grapes, with the usual cellar treatment.' The new decision provides that where any water is added to the pomace of grapes, it is not permissible to label the product 'otherwise than as imitation wine,' and affects all wines made after Sixth Month 12, 1914."

In a despatch from Lethbridge, Alta., of the 19th, it is stated that a mighty explosion to-day entombed 250 miners employed in mine No. 20 of the Hillcrest Collieries, Ltd. Men in mine when explosion occurred, 600, of whom 350 escaped. Number since taken out, 50, of whom 36 died later. Miners still entombed, 200, doubtless killed by fire which followed the explosion, or else smothered by gas. Several mine rescue experts expressed the opinion that it would take at least a week to reach the bodies of some of those entombed. A majority of the miners were foreigners."

TORONTO.—A despatch of the 17th from London says: "This has been a day of disaster to ships off the British coast. A heavy fog has been chiefly to blame for a series of serious accidents, the most important of which were a collision between the North German Lloyd liner Kaiser Wilhelm II, carrying 1300 passengers and the steamship Lucerna, in the English Channel, the running ashore of the hospital ship Maive on the west coast of Scotland and a collision between the torpedo-boat destroyer Vulcan and a schooner at the mouth of the Thames. While there was a great deal of excitement among passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm, there was no loss of life, and no person was seriously injured. The damage to the hulls was so great, however, that both ships decided to seek port, and after standing by each other until it was ascertained that neither needed immediate assistance, they started slowly for Southampton."

It has been recently stated that considerable anxiety is felt among the people of Naples because of the activity of Mt. Vesuvius, which is becoming greater daily. Great clouds of smoke emitted from the crater hover over the city, constantly reminding the inhabitants of the menacing danger.

A recent despatch from Panama mentions that a large vessel lately passed through the canal from Colon to Balboa in ten hours without incident. This is regarded as an evidence that the canal is now ready for the passage of commercial vessels.

The Cunard Steamship Company has concluded to abandon the stoppage of their large vessels at Queenstown. It is stated that Chairman Booth, giving evidence before the Queenstown Harbor Committee to-day, declared that in view of the danger to vessels of the size of the Mauretania and Lusitania, and the loss involved in waiting outside for tenders, no offer of a subsidy or a promise of improvement of the harbor would induce the company to accept the mail contract including Queenstown as a port of call.

CHARACTER shows quite as plainly in the printed matter of a business house as it does in the salesmen sent out by that same house. Where booklets, catalogues, envelope enclosures and other forms of advertising printing are given the same thought and study as is accorded to the sales department, there can be found a firm that knows that their printing must be placed with printers who do something more than merely set type and run presses. The architecture of the job counts here, as well as the construction.

Light, Smooth, Lasting

Nonkink Garden Hose

The freshness and fruitfulness of lawn and garden often depends on showers from your hose.

It is a pleasure to refresh them with Nonkink Hose; it is so light and smooth and keeps sound so long.

Let us send you some, with such Reels, Nozzles, and Sprinklers, as you may need.
